8717. FEELING, Judging from. The industrious peasant, sitting in his easy chair, sees his childer gathering round him, and courting his affections by a hundred little winning ways; he looks, and smiles, and loves. The next day he returns to his labor, and cheerfully bears the burden of the day, to provide for these, his little ones, and promote their interest. During his day's labor, he may not feel his love operate in such sensible emotions as he did the evening before. Nay, he may be so attentive to other things, as not immediately to have them in his thoughts. What then? He loves his children. Indeed, he gives proof of it, by cheerfully enduring the toils of labor, and willingly denying himself many a comfort, that they might share their part; and were he to hear of their being injured or afflicted, he would quickly feel the returns of glowing affection in as strong or perhaps stronger motions than ever. Thus the believer may have real love to God in exercise, only it does not work in the same way as at some other times.

A. Fuller.

8718. FEELING, Over-Sensibility of. To feel is amiable; but to feel too keenly is injurious both to mind and body; and a habit of giving way to sensibility, which we should endeavor to regulate, though not to eradicate, may end in a morbid weakness of mind, which may appear to romantic persons very gentle and very interesting, but will undoubtedly render its victims very useless in society. Our feelings were given us to excite to action, and when they end in themselves, they are impressed to no one good purpose that I know of.

Bishop Sandford.

8719. FEELING, Past. A man of fashion lived in dissipation and committed grave crimes, of which he was convicted, and for which he was sentenced to be hung. Dr. Leifchild visited him in Newgate prison, and endeavored to induce him to repent and prepare to meet his future judge. The condemned man listened impatiently and answered, "Sir, I appreciate your motive. I am not ignorant of the truths you have been stating. I could unfold to you depths of iniquity which would make you stand aghast. But I am not now about to become the pusillanimous creature that calls for pity and mercy, when I know it cannot be shown me. I can not feel and I will not pray. You see that stone," pointing to the pavement, "it is an image of the insensibility of my heart to all the impressions you are striving to make." Repeated visits, though courteously received, were followed by no better results. He said near the last with great emphasis, "I told you it would be all in vain; I am past feeling." Thus he continued indifferent or defiant, counting the time, upon his watch, and announcing that in so many hours he should be in hell. In this hardened state he went out of the world.

8720. FEELING, Unsatisfactory. It is astonishing how whimsical people are about the way they will be saved! When God saves a man by thunder and lightning, he never likes it; he wishes he had been brought to God in the sunshine; and when a man is brought to God in the sunshine, he never likes it, but wishes it had been in the storm. Poor John Bunyan, in his deep experience, wished he had been brought in a gentler way to God; and many think they cannot be children of God, because they have not had so deep an experience as he had.

Spurgeon.

8721. FEELINGS, Influence of the. There are, certainly, moments in life when, though we may wish, may labor, to be common-place in our sensations, and matter-of-fact in our conduct, we cannot succeed. A tide of feeling will rush upon us, too powerful for the dikes and mounds raised up by reason and philosophy. Our minds sink under the flood of weakness, if it be so, which flows warmly over, impregnating, and probably purifying, every thought; for these moments may surely be considered as our best, the true intervals of enjoyment, when we throw off the thralldom of social restrictions, and revel alone in a boundless realm of freedom and romance. It is at such times that the imagination fixes on some object with an interest more than real—an exaggerated intensity, creating an atmosphere around, and giving to the meanest things within its influence a character not properly their own, as the fragrance of the rose envelops, and might seem to breathe from, the veriest weed that crawls beneath it. Gratian.

8722. FEELINGS, Training the. As a gladiator trained the body, so must we train the mind, to self-sacrifice "to endure all things," to meet and overcome difficulty and danger. We must take the rough and thorny road as well as the smooth and pleasant; and a portion, at least, of our daily duty must be hard and disagreeable; for the mind cannot be kept strong and healthy in perpetual sunshine only, and the most dangerous of all states is that of constantly-recurring pleasure, ease, and prosperity. Most persons will find difficulties and hardships enough without seeking them; let them not repine, but take them as a part of that educational discipline necessary to fit the mind to arrive at its highest good. Charles Bray.

8723. FEELINGS, Variety of. Pleasure is in its nature a relative thing, and so imparts a peculiar relation and correspondence to the state and condition of the person to whom it is a pleasure. For of those who discourse of atoms, affirm that there are atoms of all forms, some round, some triangular, some square, and the like; all which are continually in motion, and never settle till they fall into a fit circumspection or place of the same figure; so there are the like great diversities of minds and objects. Whence it is that this object, striking upon a mind thus or thus disposed, flies off, and rebounds without making any impression; but the same luckily happening upon another, of a disposition, as it were, framed for it, is presently snatched at, and greedily clasped into the nearest unions and embraces. South.

8724. FEET, Sliding of the. During my journey in the Himalayas, was often reminded of passages of scripture. The mountain roads are very narrow. They are not often wide enough for more than two men to walk together, and we generally find it easier to follow in single file. I never saw the men who carry loads walking two abreast. There are ascents and descents so steep as to require the traveler to plant his foot firmly and carefully, in order to prevent his falling—sliding—down the hill. In some places the roads lead around the side of a mountain, or along the bank of a torrent, with a precipice, either perpendicular, or nearly so, immediately on one side of it, of hundred of feet in height. Sometimes the sharp ascent or descent is combined with the precipice on one side, and a further complication of the difficulty is made by both a slope of road toward its outer edge, and a chalky or friable kind of stone in the pathway, affording no safe hold to the feet. In many of these places the traveler looks down a giddy slope of a hundred, a thousand, or two thousand feet, on which no foothold could be found, with the consciousness that a false step, or a breaking of the bank under his foot, would precipitate him into the ravine filled with stones. I came to a place where the bank above the road had slipped and filled the pathway, excepting about eight inches at the outer edge. As the ravine was not very deep, and therefore did not look very fearful, I rode around the heap, and my horse's hind foot broke down the remainder of the pathway. He carried me safely over, however; but I could not help quoting to myself the words of the Psalmist, "My steps had well nigh slipped."

J. Warren.

8725. FEET, Washing the. I never understood the full meaning of our Lord's words in John 13: 10, until I beheld the sort of East Indian natives return home after performing their customary ablutions. The passage reads thus, "He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit." Thus as they return to their habitations barefoot, they necessarily contract in their progress some portion of dirt on their feet; and this is universally the case, however high their dwellings may be to the river side. When, therefore, they return, the first thing they do is to mount a low stool, and pour a small vessel of water to cleanse them from the soil which they may have contracted on their journey homewards; if they are of the higher class of society, a servant performs it for them, and then they are "clean every whit." Does not this in a figure represent to us the defilement which a Christian contracts, although he may have been cleansed by faith in a crucified Saviour; and the necessity of a continual application of the precious blood of atonement, in order that the soul may be "clean every whit?"

Statham.

8726. FELLOWSHIP, Human. God has created mankind for fellowship, and not for solitariness, which is clearly proved by this strong argument:—God, in creation of the world, created man and woman, to the end that the man in the woman should have a fellow.

Luther.

8727. FELLOWSHIP, Instinct of. The craving for fellowship shows itself at first in the youngest and most innocent childhood, and is the last feeling that dies out in humanity. None are so criminal as to have no power of love to others, and everything proves the value of fellowship, the great result being that "the great multitude which no man can number" will be bound together in one common unity.

Barry.

8728. FETISH, African. The fetish of the pagans in Western Africa differs but little in its nature and object from the greegree of the Mohammedan, only it is not so generally worn on the person. Fetish may be made of a few pieces of colored rags, string, feathers, egg shells, the head of a snake, the claws of wild animals or certain birds, or a lock of a white man's hair. These and various other articles are fancifully combined and consecrated by the pagan priest, sometimes sprinkled with the blood of a sacrificed animal, put into a calabash and hung from a tree to keep off thieves disease or other misfortune. Sometimes it is used with the soil from a grave added, to curse or kill an enemy.

8729. FETISHES, Ashantee. The Ashantees have the most surprising confidence in the fetishes, which they purchase at an extravagant rate from the Moors, believing that they make them invulnerable and invincible in war, paralyze the hand of the enemy, shiver their weapons, divert the course of balls, and avert all evils but sickness (which they can only assuage) and natural death. The king gave to the king of Dagwumba, for the fetish or war-coat of Apokoo, the value of thirty slaves; for Odumata's, twenty; for Addo Quamina's, thirteen; for Akimpon's, twelve; for Akimpontea's, nine; and for those of greater captains in proportion. The generals being always in the rear of the army are pretty sure to escape, a circumstance much in favor of the Moors. Mr. Bowditch relates that several of the Ashantee captains offered seriously to let him fire at them; in short, their confidence in these fetishes is almost as incredible as the despondency and panic imposed on their southern and western enemies by the recollection of them; they impel the Ashantees, fearless and headlong, to the most daring enterprises; they dispirit their adversaries almost to the neglect of an interposition of fortune in their favor. The Ashantees believe that the constant prayers of the Moors, who have persuaded them that they converse with the Deity, invigorate themselves and gradually waste the spirit and strength of their enemies. This faith is not less impulsive, persistent, and overwhelming than that which achieved the Arabian conquests.

Moister.

8730. FICTION, Truth of. We must remember, that fiction is not falsehood. If a writer puts abstract virtues into book-clothing, and sends them upon stilts into the world, he is a bad writer; if he classifies men, and attributes all virtue to one class and all vice to another, he is a false writer. Then, again, if his ideal is so poor that he fancies man's welfare to consist in immediate happiness; if he means to paint a great man and paints only a greedy one, he is a mischievous writer; and not the less so, although by lamp-light and among a juvenile audience his coarse scene-painting should be thought very grand. He may be true to his own fancy, but he is false to nature. A writer of course cannot get beyond his own ideal; but at least he should see that he works up to it; and if it is a poor one, he had better write histories of the utmost concentration of dullness, than amuse us with unjust and untrue imaginings.

Helys.

8731. FIDELITY, Classic. Though many of the followers of Ulysses were dragged and haled by Polyphemus, and had their heads dashed against the ground, they would not confess a word concerning their lord and master Ulysses, nor discover the long piece of wood that was put in the fire and prepared to put out his eye; but rather suffered themselves to be devoured raw than to disclose any one of their master's secrets; which was an example of fidelity and reservedness not to be paralleled.

Plutarch.

8732. FIDELITY, Duty of. The duty of a sailor is not to take to the boat, pull ashore, and leave the shrieking passengers to perish; but to stick by the ship as long as there is a hope of saving her. And the duty of a Christian is not to desert his post in the world, but to stay by it, to keep the ship afloat, and the world from perishing.

8733. FIDELITY, Examples of. Tarachus, at one time a Roman soldier, during the Diocetian persecution in 303, was accused of being a Christian, and taken before the governors of the province for examination. He declared himself a Christian and an enemy to all idols. He defied torture and endured it with joy. To his tormentors he said: "I am strengthened by your blows, and my confidence in God and in Jesus Christ is increased." After this, being bidden to sacrifice he answered, "I am sixty-five years old; thus have I been brought up and I cannot forsake the truth now." He was then remanded to prison and loaded with chains to await death with his brethren. Probus next came before the judge. He was asked to renounce Christianity and promised honor and advancement. He answered "I want nothing of that kind. Formerly I owned considerable estate, but relinquished it to serve the living God through Jesus Christ." He was beaten till his blood flowed in streams and his tormentors asked, "Is thy obstinate folly incurable?" With every stroke they asked him, "Where is thy helper?" He answered, "He helps me and will help me; so that I do not obey you." "Look, wretch, upon thy mangled body." "The more my body suffers for Jesus Christ the more is my soul refreshed." Then he was cast into prison heavily ironed. Andronicus, a young nobleman, next stood before the governor. He confessed his rank and his faith in Christ with much boldness. The judge said, "Youth makes you insolent; I have my torments ready." Andronicus answered, "I am prepared for whatever may happen." He was exhorted to sacrifice before his body was mangled and he put to a cruel death. He replied, "I have never sacrificed to demons from my infancy and I will not now begin." He was tortured upon the rack, scraped with broken tiles, and salt was rubbed into his wounds, but remaining immovable was ordered to prison like the others. Three several times were these undaunted martyrs tortured. Each time with every conceivable cruelty, but with seared and scarred flesh, members cut off, teeth smashed in and tongues cut out, they maintained their fidelity to Christ to the end. At last they were thrown to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre of Anazarbus. They refused to touch them, and by the order of Maximus they were executed with the sword.

8734. FIDELITY, Military. An instance of the discipline in the Russian army occurred at a fire in the town of Bardosek. A sentinel on duty, having been forgotten, remained at his post. His watch-box was consumed, and his clothes were on fire, when a corporal arrived to relieve him. The Emperor hearing of the circumstance, sent the man fifty roubles, decorated him with the order of St. Anne, and gave instructions for him to be made a non-commissioned officer.

8735. FIDELITY, Result of. A large drug firm in the city of New York, advertised for a boy. Next day the store was thronged with applicants, and among them came a queer-looking little fellow, who had been abandoned by his parents, attended by his aunt. Looking at him, the merchant promptly said, "Can't take him; places all full. Besides, he is too small." "I know he is small," said the woman, "but he is very willing and faithful." Something about the boy made the merchant think again. His partner remarked that he did not see what they wanted of such a boy. But after consultation, the boy was set to work. A few days later a call was made on the boys in the store for some one to stay all night. The prompt response of the little fellow contrasted well with the reluctance of others. In the middle of the night the merchant looked in to see if all was right in the store, and discovered his youthful protegee busy scissoring labels. "What are you doing there? I did not tell you to work at night." "I know that you did not tell me to, but I thought I might as well be doing something." In the morning the cashier had orders to double the boy's wages. Only a few weeks elapsed before a show of wild beasts passed through the streets, and, very naturally, all hands in the store rushed to witness the spectacle. A thief saw this opportunity, and entered in the rear to seize something, but in a twinkling found himself seized by the diminutive clerk aforesaid, and after a struggle he was captured. Not only was a robbery prevented, but valuable articles which had been taken from other stores were recovered. When questioned by the merchant why he stayed behind to watch, when all the others had quit work, the reply was "You told me never to leave the store when all the others were absent, and I thought I'd stay." Orders were given once more to double his salary. In 1860 he was receiving a salary of $2,500, and afterwards became a partner in the establishment.

8736. FIDELITY, Uncompromising. Anastasius, a zealous Christian, greatly coveted and often prayed for the martyr's crown. In Cesarea he openly rebuked a company of magicians. He confessed that he had once been one such, but renounced the practice and became a follower of Christ. Upon this he was thrown into a dungeon. After three days he was brought out, chained by the foot to another prisoner. His neck and one foot were drawn and fastened near together by a chain, and in this way he was compelled to carry stones. He was upbraided, his beard was plucked out, he was kicked and beaten. Called again before the governor, and urged to pronounce the Magian incantation, he would only reply, "I am a Christian." He was then disrobed and beaten with knotty clubs, without being bound, which he endured without moving or flinching. After this he was offered choice of office in the king's service if he would only privately renounce Christ in words. If he would only do this little thing he might adhere to him in his heart. Anastasius replied that he would never even seem to dissemble. He was then sent to king Chosroes, of Persia, by whom liberal offers were repeated, and when rejected, were followed by threats and reproaches. The martyr said to the king's messenger, "Do not give yourself so much trouble about me; by the grace of Christ, I am not to be moved." He was inhumanly beaten day after day, with bitter reproaches for having rejected the honors and bounties of the king. Heavy weights were laid upon his limbs, cutting to the bone. His endurance, patience and tranquillity was so great that it was reported to the king. One more attempt was made to overcome him. He was hung up by one hand for two hours, with heavy weights attached to his feet. Seeing that his will could not be overcome, preparations were made to strangle him. He rejoiced and thanked God for so happy a conclusion to his life. He was strangled A. D. 628.

8737. FIDELITY, Vows of. Christ came to possess the land, to garrison it, to occupy the field, to set it round with sacred sentinels, and to bring all his host in military order to serve him in fighting his battles. Accordingly he commissioned his apostles, when they thus went forth to their work, to commence it by the sacramental vow—"baptizing them"—placing them under the most solemn oaths to high heaven who were engaged in the work of the redemption of our fallen world. And as it is a work which engages the fullness of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the sacred vow of consecration was to be in that name, the names of the Persons of the Trinity, who unitedly engage in this work of man's redemption. It is a common usage, we believe, in the formation of armies, to hateach individual soldier, when mustered in, shall take a solemn oath of fealty to the power that he serves. Dr. Curry.

8738. FIGHTING till Death. Pietro Candiano, one of the dukes of Venice, died fighting against the Nauratines with the weapons in his hands. So a saint lives fighting and dies fighting, he stands fighting and falls fighting, with his spiritual weapons in his hands. Brooks.

8739. FIGHTING, Hard. After Commodore McDonough's great victory over the British fleet on Lake Champlain, the commander of the British land forces, Sir George Prevost, went to him to inquire the secret of his success.

He replied, writing on the sheet which contained the inquiry, "Hard fighting." He pushed on the battle, though his ship, the Saratoga, was riddled with shot, twice on fire, and in a sinking condition. He was twice knocked down, and reported killed, but revived and returned to the gun, which he sighted till victory was gained.

8740. FIGURES, Natural. "Nothing," says M. De Breteville, "is so easy or so natural as a figure. It has often given me pleasure to listen to peasants using in their talk figures so varied, so animated, and so free from vulgarity, that our artificial rhetoricians were quite outdone; and when I have heard this rhetoric of nature, I have been ashamed of myself for having made eloquence a study so long and to so little purpose." To which Du Marsais adds: "I am convinced that more figures are made in a single day at the market than in many days' sessions of the academy." The language of barbarous nations abounds in figures. Mr. Henry Rogers observed, "The old Scandinavians forbid trespass on the unfenced field, inasmuch as it has 'heaven for its roof,' and is 'under God's lock.'" Sir Philip Sidney "found the whisperings and disputations of the common people of his day to taste of a poetic vein."

8741. FIRE, Legend of Kindling. St. Kentigern lived in Scotland in the sixth century. While a boy at school with an old monk he was a great favorite with the master, which excited the jealousy of the other boys. In those times there was no ready means of rekindling fires, and it was the custom to keep them constantly burning. The boys were required at night in turn to rise and mend the fire. When Kentigern's turn came the boys extinguished the fire to injure him. Going to the fire place he found the fire entirely out. He took a few sticks and laid them on the cold hearth and blew upon them, invoking the name of the Trinity. The flame kindled at once, and with this miraculous fire the church candles were lighted.

8742. FIRE, Nature of. It is now known that fire is neither a distinct substance nor essence, as supposed by the ancients. It is a phenomenon consisting of the sudden and abundant evolution of heat and light produced when certain class of bodies, called combustibles, enter into chemical combination with the oxygen gas, which constitutes one of the constituents of the atmosphere. The term combustion, in the modern nomenclature of physics, has been adopted to express this phenomenon. Dr. Lardner.

proached the king, and accused three high officials, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, with defying his authority. The enraged king ordered the offenders before him, and recited his unalterable mandate to them. They replied, "O, Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, the God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning, fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O, King! but if not, be it known unto thee that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." The great king, so heroically defied, waxed furious, and ordered the furnace heated seven times hotter than usual. The rebels were tightly bound, and cast into the raging furnace, whose flames slew the executioners. The king looked into the furnace, and saw the three worthies walking, unbound and unharmed, and with them a fourth person, like the Son of God. The astonished king, calling the Hebrews by name, confessed that they were servants of the most high God. At his command they came forth, with no mark of fire upon them, or even a hair singed. Then Nebuchadnezzar issued a decree to all people prohibiting any utterance against the God of these worthies, "because there is no other god who can deliver after this sort." (Dan. 3.)

8744. FIRE, Symbols of. Several eminent critics believe the lamp of fire was an emblem of the Divine presence, and that it ratified the covenant with Abraham. It is an interesting fact that the burning lamp or fire is still used in the East in confirmation of a covenant. Should a person in the evening make a solemn promise to perform something for another, and should the latter doubt his word, the former will say, pointing to the flame of the lamp, "That is the witness." On occasions of greater importance, when two or more join in a covenant, should the fidelity of any be questioned, they will say, "We invoke the lamp of the Temple," as a witness. When an agreement of this kind has been broken, it will be said, "Who would have thought this? for the lamp of the Temple was invoked." That fire was a symbol of the Divine presence, no one acquainted with the sacred Scriptures can deny; and in the literature and customs of the East, the same thing is still asserted. In the ancient writings, where the marriages of the gods and demi-gods are described, it is always said the ceremony was performed in the presence of the God of fire. He was the witness. But it is also a general practice, at the celebration of respectable marriages at this day, to have a fire as a witness of the transaction. It is made of the wood of the mango-tree, or the Aal or Arasu, or Panne or Patasu. The fire being kindled in the centre of the room, the young couple sit on stools; but when the Brahmin begins to repeat the incantations, they arise, and the bridegroom puts the little finger of his left hand round the little finger of the right hand of the bride, and they walk round the fire three times from left to right. "Fire is the witness of their covenant; and if they break it, fire will be their destruction." In the Scanda Purana, the father of the virgin who was to be married to the son of the Rishi, said to him, "Call your son, that I may give him to my daughter in the presence of the god of fire, that he may be the witness;" that being done. "Usteyar gave his daughter Verunte in marriage, the fire being the witness" Roberts.

8745. FIRMNESS, Christian. In Galen's time it was a proverbial expression when any one would show the impossibility of a thing, "You may as soon turn a Christian from Christ as do it." There is an obstinacy of spirit which is our sin. But this is our glory. "In the matters of God," said Luther, "I assume this title, 'Cedo nulli,' I yield to none." Flavel.

8746. FIRMNESS, Duty of. Mere softness will not do. The down bed needs the solid wall of masonry behind it. A glove of velvet should cover the hand of iron, but an iron hand should be within the velvet glove. In railway trains there is a contrivance to prevent the collision of carriage against carriage. On the outer extremities, where likely to strike each other, there is a soft, spongy covering. Within, and at the very centre, is a spring, strong but yielding, yielding but strong. We ought ever to "speak the truth in love," and "be ready always to give an answer," to every man that asketh. W. Arnot.

8747. FIRMNESS, Memento of. During the battle of Manassas, about 11 o'clock a. m., when that gallant and meritorious officer, Brig. Gen. Bernard E. Bee, was endeavoring to rally his troops in the small valley in rear of the Robinson house, he noticed Jackson's brigade, which had just arrived and taken position a little in rear of him, in a copse of small pines bordering the edge of the plateau where was about to be fought the first great battle of the war. Bee, finding that his appeal was unheeded by his brave but disorganized troops, then said to them, "Rally, men, rally! See Jackson's brigade standing there like a stone wall." Those words gave the appellation to that brigade, and thence to its heroic commander.

Beauregard.

8748. FIRMNESS, Symbol of. Stones still in the quarry are said to be living, like plants, connected with and nourished by their roots. The epithet means the firmness of that thing signified by the name of a stone, for nothing is firmer than stones growing in a quarry, as cleaving fast to a rock by the root. Burder.

8749. FLAG, Devotion to His. On seeing a young Prussian soldier who was pressing his flag to his bosom in the agonies of death, Napoleon said to his officers: "Gentlemen, you see that a soldier has a sentiment approaching idolatry for his flag. Render funeral honors at once to this young man. I regret that I do not know his name, that I might write to his family. Do not take away his flag; its silken folds will be an honorable shroud for him."

Bourrienne

8750. FLAG, Preserving the. The passion of a French soldier for his flag is vividly revealed in a story of Sedan. At the moment of capit ulation, a captain, a lieutenant of Zouaves, and a brave sergeant, resolved that the flag which had been left in their keeping should not fall into the hands of the Prussians. So they took the emblem of France to pieces, one concealing the banner under his uniform, the other putting the balls into his pocket, and the third keeping the eagle. After the capitulation, it was agreed that all the relics should be confided to the care of the sergeant, who, being an Alsatian, could speak German. The brave sergeant then managed to escape from his captors, to don the guise of a peasant, and to obtain a basket, in which he placed the memorials of French glory. He then covered the precious relics with a mass of tobacco, which he gathered from the peasants, and, thus guarded against detection, he managed to pass through all the German lines, and to reach Paris.

8751. FLAG, Protected by the. A man came from Europe to this country, and went to Cuba in 1867. He was arrested for a spy, court-martialed, and condemned to be shot. He sent for the American and English consuls, and proved to them that he was no spy. They went to one of the Spanish officers and said, "This man you have condemned to be shot is an innocent man." The Spanish officer said, "The man has been legally tried by our laws and condemned, and the law must take its course and the man must die." The next morning the man was led out; the grave was already dug for him, and the black cap was put on him, and the soldiers were there ready to receive the order, "Fire," and in a few moments the man would be shot and be put in that grave. Then the American consul took the American flag and wrapped it around him, and the English consul took the English flag and wrapped it around him, and they said to those soldiers, "Fire on those flags if you dare!" Not a man dared; there were two great governments behind those flags. So Christ calls us to take shelter from our sins and all our enemies under the shadow of his cross.

8752. FLATTERER, Beware of a. Beware of him who flatters you, and commends you to your face, or to one he thinks will tell you of it; most probably he has either deceived and abused you, or means to do so. Remember the fable of the fox commending the sizzling of the crow, who had something in her mouth which the fox wanted. Be careful that you do not commend yourselves. Sir M. Hale.

8753. FLATTERERS, Beware of. Take care thou be not made a fool by flatterers, for even the wisest men are abused by these. Know, therefore, that flatterers are the worst kind of traitors; for they will strengthen thy imperfections, encourage thee in all evils, correct thee in nothing, but so shadow and paint all thy vices and follies, as thou shalt never, by their will, discern evil from good, or vice from virtue: and because all men are apt to flatter themselves, to entertain the addition of other men's praises is most perilous. Do not, therefore, praise thyself, except thou wilt be counted a vainglorious fool: neither take delight in the praise of other men, except thou deserve it, and receive it from such as are worthy and honest, and will withal warn thee of thy faults; for flatterers have never any virtue; they are ever base, creeping, cowardly persons. A flatterer is said to be a beast that biteth smiling. But it is hard to know them from friends, they are so obsequious and full of protestation; for as a wolf resembles a dog, so doth a flatterer a friend. A flatterer is compared to an ape, who, because she cannot defend the house like a dog, labor as an ox, or bear burdens as a horse, doth therefore yet play tricks and provoke laughter. Raleigh.

8754. FLATTERY, Love of. When Alexander had bestowed some considerable reward upon a jester, Agis, the Argive, through mere envy and vexation, cried out upon it as a most absurd action; which the king overhearing, he turned him about in great indignation at the insolence, saying, "What's that you prate, sirrah?" "Why truly," replied the man, "I must confess, I am not a little troubled to observe, that all you great men who are descended from Jupiter take a strange delight in flatterers and buffoons; for as Hercules had his Cercopians and Bacchus his Silenians about him, so, I see your majesty is pleased to have regard for such pleasant fellows, too." Plutarch.

8755. FLATTERY, Poison of. He was justly accounted a skillful poisoner who destroyed his victims by bouquets of lovely and fragrant flowers. The art has not been lost; nay, is practiced every day by the world. Latimer.

8756. FLATTERY Rebuked. Leo the emperor used to say, "Occulti inimici pessimi," a close enemy is far worse than an open. When a court parasite praised Sigismund the emperor above measure, the emperor gave him a sound box on the ear. When Aristobulus the historian presented to Alexander the great book that he had written of his glorious acts, wherein he had flatteringly made him greater than he was, Alexander, after he had read the book, threw it into the river Hydaspes, and said to the author, "It were a good deed to throw thee after it." When the flatterers flattered Antigonus, he cried out, "Mentiris, mentiris in gutture, hæ virtutes non latent in me," thou liest in thy throat; these virtues that thou speakest of I have not in me, but I am like a leopard, that have ten black spots to one white. Augustus Cæsar and Tiberius Cæsar were deadly enemies to flatterers, inasmuch that they would not be called lords by their own children. A good symbol is attributed to Trebonianus Gallus, viz.: "Nemo amicus idem et adulator," no flatterer can be a good friend. Aristippus, the philosopher, washing herbs for his dinner, said, "If Diogenes knew how to make use of kings, he need not live upon raw herbs, as he doth;" to which Diogenes replied, "that if Aristippus could content himself with herbs, he need not to turn spaniel, or flatter king Dionysius for a meal's meat." Flatterers are the very worst of sinners. The flatterers told Cæsar, that his freckles in his face were like the stars in the firmament; they bought and sold Aurelius the emperor at pleasure. And Augustus complained, when Barrus was dead, that he had none now left that would deal plainly and faithfully with him.

Brooks.

8757. FLATTERY, Ruin by. When vice is extolled by the name of virtue, so that man is induced to sin not only without regret but with joy and triumph, and is hardened beyond the modesty of a blush for his enormities, this sort of flattery, I say, has been fatal even to whole kingdoms. It was this that ruined Sicily, by styling the tyranny of Dionysius and Plalaris nothing but justice and a hatred of villainous practices. It was this that overthrew Egypt, by palliating the king's effeminacy, his yellings, his enthusiastic rants, and his beating of drums, with the more plausible names of true religion and the worship of the gods. It was this that very nigh ruined the staunch Roman temper, by extenuating the voluptuousness, the luxury, the sumptuous shows and public profuseness of Antony, into the softer terms of humanity, good nature, and the generosity of a gentleman who knew how to use the greatness of his fortune. What but the charms of flattery made Ptolemy turn piper and fiddler? What else put on Nero's buskins and brought him on the stage? Have we not known several princes, if they sung a tolerable treble, termed Apollos; when they drank stoutly, styled Bacchuses; and upon wrestling, fencing, or the like, immediately dubbed by the name of Hercules, and hurried on by those empty titles to the commission of those acts which were infinitely beneath the dignity of their character?

Plutarch.

8758. FLESH, Infirmities of the. If I cannot take pleasure in infirmities, I can sometimes feel the profit of them. I can conceive a king to pardon a rebel and take him into his family, and then say, "I appoint you for a season to wear a fetter. At a certain season I will send a messenger to knock it off. In the meantime, this fetter will serve to remind you of your state; it may humble you, and restrain you from rambling."

Newton.

8759. FLESH, Weakness of the. And how sad it is to think, that the inferior part of our nature is true to its instincts and passions, and the superior has lost its power and fails of its vocation! Just as you sometimes see, in ancient mansions, the portion once devoted to divine service laid in ruins, while that which was designed for the good cheer of men is whole and in full repair; so it is with man; if we may so speak, the church of humanity is in a state of miserable decay and dilapidation, but the hall of entertainment is sound and furnished well. The principles and affections that belong to the lowest range and sphere of our being remain to grace and gladden life and fellowship, but the spirit which alone can consecrate and sanctify them is gone. As to religion, we are in woful plight, but our sensuous nature is quick and vigorous. How sorrowful to think that what we have in common with animals should be strong and prosperous, and what allies us to the Deity should be weak and morbid.

Morris.

8760. FLOODS, Eastern. The rains and floods and winds of an Eastern monsoon afford a striking illustration of this passage (Matt. 7: 27). When people in those regions speak of the strength of a house it is not by affirming, "It will last so many years;" but, "It will outstand the rains: it will not be injured by the floods." Houses built of the best materials, and having deep foundations, often in a few years yield to the rains of a monsoon. At first a small crack appears in some angle, which gradually becomes larger, till the whole building lumbers to the ground. And who can wonder at this, when he considers the state of the earth? For several months there is not a drop of rain, and the burning sun has loosened the ground on which the edifice stands; then all at once the torrents begin to descend, the chapped earth suddenly swells, and the change injures the foundations. Only the house founded upon a rock can outstand the rains and floods of a wet monsoon.

8761. FLOWERS, Benefit by. I could tell you many stories of persons who by considering the flowers have got good. You remember how Mungo Park was traveling in the desert, and as he thought to lie there and die, how he caught sight of a little flower springing up in the sand by his side, and he thought—if God cares for the flower in the wilderness he will care for me. You remember Picciola and his prison flower—how, when despairing in his dungeon, the flower came up through a niche in the floor, and how it taught him many a useful lesson, and kept him from despair. When John Bunyan went to the house of the interpreter and was led into his room, the interpreter showed him all the beautiful symbols, and said to him, "Consider the lilies how they grow." It was a clod, now it hath come forth out of the black earth; God hath fashioned it. And as thou lookest on that remember all thy beauty is God-given. What a clod he finds thee, and how beautiful he is making thee. Consider the lily; it was not so always; it drinketh up continually out of the cup into which the water is poured, and so, if thou wilt continually receive the water which God will give thee, thou wilt grow in beauty and in purity. Consider the lily. Seest thou how earth feeds it, and air fans it, and heaven sends dews upon it; how earth and air and heaven combine to bless it? So all kinds of auxiliaries and agencies go to help thee. Consider the lily, how it grows; see from what it springs, and to what beauty it attains, and for what uses it blooms; and as thou considerest, learn the lesson. It is well to go into the interpreter's room.

S. Coley.

8762. FLOWERS, Blessing of. How the universal heart of man blesses flowers! They are wreathed round the cradle, the marriage-altar, and the tomb. The Persian in the far East delights in their perfume, and writes his love in nosegays; while the Indian child of the far West claps his hands with glee as he gathers the abundant blossoms—the illuminated scriptures of the prairies. The Cupid of the ancient Hindoos tipped his arrows with flowers; and orange-flowers are a bridal crown with us—a nation of yesterday. Flowers garlanded the Grecian altar, and hung in votive wreath before the Christian shrine. All these are appropriate uses. Flowers should deck the brow of the youthful bride, for they are in themselves a lovely type of marriage. They should twine round the tomb, for their perpetually renewed beauty is a symbol of the resurrection. They should festoon the altar, for their fragrance and their beauty ascend in perpetual worship before the Most High. Mrs. L. M. Child.

8768. FLOWERS, Devotion to. Luther always kept a flower in a glass on his writing-table; and when he was waging his great public controversy with Eckius, he kept a flower in his hand. Lord Bacon has a beautiful passage about flowers. As to Shakespeare, he is a perfect Alpine valley—he is full of flowers; they spring, and blossom, and wave in every cleft of his mind. Even Milton, cold, serene, and stately as he is, breaks forth into exquisite gushes of tenderness and fancy when he marshals the flowers. Mrs. Stowe.

8764. FLOWERS, Influence of. A society has been formed in London, under Lord Shaftesbury's influence, which gives a box, tastily shaped for the window, and choice flower seeds and slips, to the very poor, who will promise to cultivate them. The result has been surprising. The flowers in the windows have brought decency and taste into the rooms, and saved the father from the ale-house in thousands of instances.

8765. FLOWERS, Lesson of. Flowers, of all created things, the most innocently simple and most superbly complex, playthings for childhood, ornaments of the grave, and companions of the cold corpse in the coffin! Flowers, beloved by the wandering idiot, and studied by the deep-thinking man of science! Flowers, that of perishing things are the most heavenly. Flowers, that unceasingly expand to heaven their grateful, and to man their cheerful, looks; partners of human joy, soothers of human sorrow; fit emblems of the victor's triumphs, of the young bride's blushes: welcome to the crowded halls, and graceful upon solitary graves. Flowers are, in the volume of nature, what the expression, "God is love," is in the volume of revelation. What a desolate place would be a world without a flower! It would be a face without a smile; a feast without a welcome. Are not flowers the stars of the earth, and are not our stars the flowers of heaven? One cannot look closely at the structure of a flower without loving it. They are emblems and manifestations of God's love to the creation, and they are the means and ministrations of man's love to his fellow-creatures; for they first awoken in his mind a sense of the beautiful and good. The very inutility of flowers is their elegance and great beauty; for they lead us to thoughts of generosity and moral beauty, detached from and superior to all selfishness; so that they are pretty lessons to nature's book of instruction, teaching man that he liveth not by bread or from bread alone, but that he hath another than an animal life. Mrs. Balfour.

8766. FLOWERS, Love for. Flowers seem intended for the solace of ordinary humanity: children love them; quiet, tender, contented ordinary people love them as they grow; luxurious and disorderly people rejoice in them gathered. They are the cottager's treasure; and in the crowded town, mark, as with a little broken fragment of rainbow, the windows of the workers in whose heart rests the covenant of peace. Passionate or religious minds contemplate them with fond, feverish intensity; the affection is seen severely calm in the works of many old religious painters, and mixed with more open and true country sentiment in those of our pre-Raphaelites. Ruskin.

8767. FLOWERS, Pleasure in. A gentleman, who was invited to view a grand building, holding in his hand a flower at the time, said he "wished to be excused; for I see more of God in this flower than in all the beautiful edifices in the world."

8768. FOLLOWING CHRIST in Earnest. Many follow God as Samson did his parents, till he lighted upon a honeycomb; or as a dog doth his master, till he meet with carrion; and then turn him up. Demas forsook God, and, embracing this present world, became afterwards a priest in an idol temple. Trapp.

8769. FOLLOWING CHRIST Fully. That flower that follows the sun, doth so even in cloudy days; when it doth not shine forth, yet it follows the hidden course and motion of it; so the soul that moves after God keeps that course when he hides his face; is content, yea, is glad at his will in all estates, or conditions, or wants. Salter.

8771. FOLLY, Royal. The emperor Caligula had a horse called Swift, with which he was infatuated. He had the horse sup with him. He set before him provender in a dish of gold, and gave him wine to drink in goblets of gold. He made this horse his colleague in the supreme pontificate, and would have made him a consul had he lived. The horse was allowed a house, family servants and household stuff. His stable was marble, his manger ivory, and his harness purple, adorned with precious stones.

8772. FOLLY, The Sinner's. Think what folly it is to dig for dross with mattocks of gold; to bestow the precious affections of our souls on white and yellow clay. How monstrous it is to see a man with his head and heart where his feet should be! to see the world in the heart and on the throne, and Christ at the footstool; to see the world possessing God's room both week-day and Sabbath-day, and getting the service which is due to him alone! How many are they who, on the Sabbath-day, worship the trinity of this world, mentioned 1 John 2: 16, more than the Trinity of heaven. Boston.

8773. FOOD, Forfeiture of. For what is food given? To enable us to carry on the necessary business of life, and that our support may be such as our work requires. This is the use of food. Man eats and drinks that he may work; therefore, the idle man forfeits his right to his daily bread. Jones of Nayland.

8774. FOOD, God's Provision of. We are apt to think of the fields and the orchards as feeding us; but who makes the flax grow for the linen, and the wheat for the bread, and the wool on the sheep's back? Oh! I wish we could see through every grain-field, by every sheep-fold, under the trees of every orchard, the King's wagons! They drive up three times a day—morning, noon, and night. They bring furs from the Arctic, they bring fruits from the tropic, they bring bread from the temperate zone. The King looks out and he says, "There are twelve hundred millions of people to be fed and clothed. So many pounds of meat, so many barrels of flour, so many yards of cloth and linen and flannel, so many hats, so many socks, so many shoes;" enough for all, save that we who are greedy get more shoes than belong to us, and others go barefooted. None but a God could feed and clothe the world. None but a king's corn-crib could appease the world's famine. None but a king could tell how many wagons to send and how heavily to load them, and when they are to start. They are coming over the frozen ground to-day. Do you not hear their rumbling? They will stop at noon at your table. Oh! if for a little while they should cease, hunger would come into the nations, as to Utica when Hamilcar besieged it, and as in Jerusalem when Vespasian surrounded it; and the nations would be hollow-eyed, and fall upon each other in universal cannibalism; and skeleton would drop upon skeleton; and there would be no one to bury the dead; and the earth would be a field of bleached skeletons; and the birds of prey would fall dead, flock after flock, without any carcases to devour; and the earth in silence would wheel around, one great black hearse! All life stopped because the King's wagons are stopped. Oh! thank God for bread—for bread! Talmage.

8775. FOOD, Miraculous. A legend says that Abraham, in a time of famine, sent his servants to a friend in Egypt for corn. The friend refused it, saying it was only wanted to use in hospitalities or to be given to the poor. The chagrined servants, to conceal their ill-success, filled their sacks with fine white sand. Abraham learning this, was much troubled, and fell into a deep sleep. Sarah, not knowing the servants' failure, went to the sacks and found good flour, and baked bread. Abraham awaking asked her where she had obtained the flour.

"From your friend in Egypt," said she. "Nay," said the Patriarch, "it could have come from no other than my friend God Almighty."

8776. FOOD, Necessity for. Food is fuel. We require food frequently for just the same reason that a fire requires coals frequently, and a lamp oil—because we are burning away. The air that we breathe in our lungs contains oxygen, and this oxygen combines with or burns the muscles and other organs of our bodies, just as it does the coals in a fire. The heat produced in a man's body in the course of a day is considerable in quantity, though not very intense in quality. Taking the average, it is enough to raise five and a half gallons of water from freezing point to boiling point, and this is about the heat that would be given off during the burning of a pound of coals. All this heat comes from the slow wasting or burning of the substance of the body, so that it is evident that if we did not make up for this constant loss by eating food, our organs would soon be wasted away and consumed. A moment's thought will show how closely this agrees with well-known facts. Why does an animal become so thin during the slow and painful process of starvation? Because the slow fire in his body is not fed with the fuel of food. Anon.

8777. FOOD, Providential. Rev. R. Moffat in his missionary explorations in South Africa, found his wants miraculously met. At one time, having been a night and a day without food, while pursuing his journey near evening, greatly exhausted and with no prospect of any relief, he saw in the distance a line of dust coming with the fleetness of an ostrich. It came within two hundred yards of him, and proved to be caused by a spring-bok chased by a wild dog. The dog overtook and killed his game at that place, and the missionary and his party received it with thankfulness, as food from God. It was a dog, this time, that brought his servants meat.

8779. FOOD, Spiritual. Matter is for mind. Souls grow as plants grow, by appropriating things ab extra to their use; and all things ab extra, even the most distant star that skirts the outer line of space, are for souls. But how is this appropriation to be made? How is this outward universe to promote the growth of our souls? Not without our willing and earnest effort. Put the acorn into a congenial soil, and external nature, by a necessity, will draw all the elements of vitality from its "milky veins," and elaborate them into majestic forests. The seed has no resisting force; it is passive in the plastic hand of nature. But it is not so with mind; it has a choice in the matter. No outward force, however mighty, can either injure or benefit, stunt or develop, the soul, without its consent. The outward universe, though organized for its service, may become its ruin. In many instances, instead of souls using it to their own growth and grandeur, it "uses them up;" deadens their sensibilities, benumbs their energies, moves them as mere wheels in its triumphal car. That men are, in numerous instances, "the creatures of circumstances," is a fact; that they are so by necessity is a falsehood. Dr. Thomas.

8780. FOOD. Thanks for. Gratitude for the common blessings of Providence is one of the most manifest duties of those who enjoy them, and is very properly expressed by giving thanks on their reception. Such a practice prevailed equally amongst heathen, Jews, and Christians. Athenæus says that in the famous regulation made by Amphictyon, King of Athens, with respect to the use of wine, he required that the name of Jupiter, the Sustainer, should be decently and reverently pronounced. The same author quotes Hermeias, an author extant in his time, who mentions a people in Egypt, inhabitants of the city of Naucrates, whose custom it was on certain occasions, after they had placed themselves in the usual posture of eating at table, to rise again and kneel; the priest then chanted a grace, according to a stated form among them, after which they joined in the meal. Clement of Alexandria also informs us that when the ancient Greeks met together to refresh themselves with the juice of the grape, they sang a piece of music which they called a scholion. Livy, too, speaks of it as a settled custom among the old Romans to offer sacrifice and prayer to the gods at their meals. Triguantius, a Jesuit, in his narrative of the expedition of the Jesuit missionaries into China, says of the Chinese, that "before they place themselves for partaking of an entertainment, the person who makes it sets a vessel, either of gold, or silver, or marble, or some such valuable material in a charger, full of wine, which he holds with both his hands, and then makes a low bow to the person of chief quality or character at the table. Then from the hall or dining-room he goes into the porch or entry, where he again makes a very low bow, and, turning his face to the south, pours out this wine upon the ground as a thankful oblation to the Lord of heaven. After thus repeating his reverential observance, he returns into the hall." As to the sentiments and behavior of the Jews on this point, Josephus, detailing the customs of the Essenes, says that the priest begs a blessing before they presume to take any nourishment: and it is looked upon as a great sin to take or taste before. And when the meal is over, the priest prays again, and the company with him bless and praise God as their preserver, and the donor of their life and nourishment. From the Hebrew ritual it would appear that the Jews had their psalms of thanksgiving, not only after eating their passover, but on a variety of other occasions, at and after meals, and even between their several courses and dishes; as when the best of their wine was brought upon the table, or the fruit of the garden. To this day the Jews are said to have their zemiroth, verses or songs of thanksgiving. The continuance of the custom among the Christians is founded in the high example of our Saviour himself. The primitive converts appear to have universally observed it. We read that St. Paul, "when he had spoken, took bread, and gave thanks to God in the presence of them all; and when he had broken it, began to eat" (Acts 27: 35). In the days immediately following the Apostles, we find abundant traces of this practice in the writings of the Fathers, particularly in the Clementine Constitution, in Chrysostom, and in Origen.

Anon.

8781. FOOL, An Elect. Pyoterius, a hermit of the Nile, was directed by an angel, "Go to the convent at Tabenna, and there shalt thou find an elect vessel full of the grace of God, and thou shalt know her by the crown that shines above her head." He tarried not till he reached the convent, and had the sisters pass in order before him. As each passed, he said, "The Lord hath not chosen thee." Then he asked, "Are there yet any more?" The abbess replied, "All are here save one, a half-witted creature, who is the kitchen drudge." "Bring her to me," said the hermit. When she came in, she was dressed in soiled garments, and had an old cloth on her head, but the hermit saw there the shining crown, and, falling at her feet, besought her blessing. They were all astonished. She had been the butt of all. The sisters in faultless habits swept by her proudly, or stopped only to pull her nose or slap her face. She bore her lot cheerfully, and was now indicated as the Lord's chosen. This is the legend of St. Isidora, illustrating how "fools shall not err."

8782. FOOLS: Angry with. Were I to be angry at men being fools, I could here find ample room for declamation; but, alas! I have been a fool myself; and why should I be angry with them for being something so natural to every child of humanity?

Goldsmith.

8783. FOOLS: Brevities. People have no right to make fools of themselves, unless they have no relations to blush for them.—Haliburton.—Of all thieves fools are the worst; they rob you of time and temper.

Goethe.

8784. FOOTSTEPS, Tracing. The Arab who has applied himself diligently to this study, for it is only to be acquired by long practice, can generally ascertain, from inspecting the impression: 1. Whether the footsteps belong to his own or to some neighboring tribe, and consequently whether friend or foe has passed; 2. He knows, from the slightness or depth of the impression, whether the man who made it carried a load or not; 3. From the strength or faintness of the trace, whether he passed on the same day or one or two days before; and 4. From a certain regularity of intervals between the steps, a Bedouin judges whether the man is fatigued or not, and hence he can calculate the chance of overtaking him. This faculty of distinguishing footsteps on the ground extends to beasts (horses and camels) as well as men, and, in the exercise of it, the same observations will lead to the same results.

Robinson.

8785. FOP: Brevities. A fop, who admires his person in a glass, soon enters into a resolution of making his fortune by it, not questioning but every woman that falls in his way will do him as much justice as himself.—Hughes.
—Nature has sometimes made a fool; but a coxcomb is always of a man's own making.—Addison.
—Foppery is never cured; it is the bad stamina of the mind, which, like those of the body, are never rectified; once a coxcomb, and always a coxcomb. Johnson.

8786. FORBEARANCE, Example of. Of Mr. John Henderson it is observed, that the oldest of his friends never beheld him otherwise than calm and collected. It was a state of mind he retained under all circumstances. During his residence at Oxford, a student of the neighboring college, proud of his logical acquirements, was solicitous of a private disputation with the renowned Henderson. Some mutual friends introduced him, and having chosen his subject, they conversed for some time with equal candor and moderation; but Henderson's antagonist, perceiving his confutation inevitable (forgetting the character of a gentleman, and with a resentment engendered by his former arrogance), threw a full glass of wine in his face. Henderson, without altering his features, or changing his position, gently wiped his face, and then coolly replied, "This, sir, is a digression; now for the argument." Buck.

8787. FORBEARANCE, Love of. The apostle to the Indians, Rev. John Elliot, was characterized by his great love of peace. His advice to one in difficulty was, "Brother, compass them; learn the meaning of those three little words—bear, forbear, and forgive."

8788. FORBEARANCE, Pagan. The Emperor Antoninus said, "It becomes a man to love even those that offend him." Epictetus said, "A man hurts himself by injuring me: what, then, shall I therefore hurt myself by injuring him?" Seneca observed, "In benefits, it is a disgrace to be outdone; in injuries, to get the better."

8789. FOREBODING, Mistaken. John Condor was born in Cambridgeshire, England, June 3, 1714. His grandfather, Richard Condor, kissed him, and, with tears in his eyes, said, "Who knows what sad days these little eyes are likely to see?" Things wore at that time a threatening aspect, relative to Dissenters. Dr. Condor remarked upon mentioning the circumstance, "These eyes have, for more than sixty years seen nothing but goodness and mercy follow me and the churches of Christ, even to this day." Many a grim foreboding has heralded the greatest blessings.

8790. FOREBODING, Natural. We expect that nature will execute the chastisements of the spiritual world. Hence all nature becomes to the imagination leagued against the transgressor. The stars in their courses fight against Sisera. The wall of Siloam falls on guilty men. The sea will not carry the criminal, nor the plank bear him. The viper stings—everything is a minister of wrath. On this conviction nations constructed their trial by ordeal. The guilty man's sword would fail in the duel; and the foot would strike and be burnt by the hot ploughshare. Some idea of this sort lurks in all our minds. We picture to ourselves the spectres of the past haunting the nightly bed of the tyrant. We take for granted there is an avenger making life miserable.

F. W. Robertson.

8791. FORESIGHT, Divine. It has been adduced as a striking illustration of the Divine foresight, that the season of the birth of the young of certain animals should be adjusted to the season of the year, and to the period of the food most conducive to its well-being; the preparation for the birth of the animal, and the preparation for the birth of its food (say the larvæ of insects), dating from very different points of time. McCosh.

8792. FORGETFULNESS, A Drunkard's. John Clerk of Edinburgh, had been dipping into the convivial bowl, and had stayed out until early in the morning. Trying to go home he lost his way. Seeing some one coming towards him, he stopped the person with the question—"Do ye ken where John Clerk bides?" "I'm thinking," was the reply, "ye're Mr. John Clerk yourself." "Ay, ay!" answered he, "I ken that vary weel, my man; I ken I'm John Clerk, but I dinna ken where I live."

8793. FORGETFULNESS, Question of. A preacher in Germany was one day assailed by some opponents, and one person remarked that the Bible was full of fables. The objector referred to Paul having forgotten his mantle. The preacher said, "That is a passage quite suitable for me, perhaps also for you. I am very forgetful. I see here that the great apostle could forget, and this comforts me, and admonishes me also, that I should endeavor to make good what I forget. I thought once like you, and forgot the one thing needful; but I now endeavor not to forget the goodness of God. Have you, brother, forgotten this?"

8794. FORGIVENESS, Bravery of. The brave only know how to forgive; it is the most refined and generous pitch of virtue human nature can arrive at. Cowards have done good and kind actions; cowards have even fought, nay, sometimes conquered; but a coward never forgave—it is not in his nature. The power of doing it flows only from a strength and greatness of soul conscious of its own force and security, and above all the little temptations of resenting every fruitless attempt to interrupt its happiness. Sterne.

8795. FORGIVENESS, Christ-like. Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor of England, after having been tried at Westminster and condemned to death without any just cause, said to his judges, "As St. Paul held the clothes of those who stoned Stephen to death, and as they are both now saints in heaven, and shall continue there friends for ever; so I verily trust, and shall, therefore, most heartily pray, that though your lordships have now here on earth been judges to my condemnation, we may nevertheless hereafter cheerfully meet in heaven in everlasting salvation."

8796. FORGIVENESS, Conditioned. A Sunday-school teacher improving upon the day's lesson on the subject of forgiveness, asked a boy whether, in view of what he had been studying, he could forgive those who had insulted or struck him. "Ye-es, sir," replied the lad slowly, "I guess I could;" but he added in a much more rapid manner, "I could if he were bigger than I am."

8797. FORGIVENESS, Difficult. It is more easy to forgive the weak who have injured us, than the powerful whom we have injured. That conduct will be continued by our fears which commenced in our resentment. He that has gone so far as to cut the claws of the lion, will not feel himself quite secure until he has also drawn his teeth. Colton.

8798. FORGIVENESS, Divine. An English criminal, notorious for his crimes, was sentenced to be executed. While in prison he became thoroughly convicted of the enormity of his sins and truly penitent. He found pardon, and his heart was so filled with the love of God, that he cried out continually, "He is a great forgiver! He is a great forgiver."

8799. FORGIVENESS, Duty of. The duty of Christian forgiveness does not require you, nor are you allowed, to look on injustice, or any other fault, with indifference, as if it were nothing wrong at all, merely because it is you that have been wronged. But even where we cannot but censure, in a moral point of view, the conduct of those who have injured us, we should remember that such treatment as may be very fitting for them to receive may be very unfitting for us to give. To cherish, or to gratify, haughty resentment, is a departure from the pattern left us by him who "endured such contradiction of sinners against himself," not to be justified by any offence that can be committed against us. And it is this recollection of him who, faultless himself, designed to leave us an example of meekness and long-suffering, that is the true principle and motive of Christian forgiveness. We shall best fortify our patience under injuries by remembering how much we ourselves have to be forgiven, and that it was "while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." Let the Christian therefore accustom himself to say of any one who has greatly wronged him, "That man owes me an hundred pence."

8800. FORGIVENESS, Freedom of. The first thing I remember is the death of my own father; I was four years of age. My mother was soon taken sick, and my eldest brother ran away from home about the same time. Troubles never come singly. Day after day mother would send us one and a half miles to the post office for letters from my runaway brother. She would often say: "Oh, could I hear that he was dead, it would be such a relief to me." It seemed as if she loved him more than the rest of us. I remember hearing her pray past midnight, "Oh God, bring back my boy. Bring him back, wherever he is." She used to leave a vacant chair at the table for him. I can remember how her hair turned gray. Before I was a Christian I used to pray, "Send back that boy." One day a stranger was seen coming up the hill. He came and stood on the porch outside the window, with arms folded, looking at mother. She said, "Oh, my son, is it possible you have come home? Come in." "No, mother," he said, "not until you forgive me." She rushed to his arms and forgave him! But my friends, this forgiveness is nothing to the sin that your heavenly Father wants you to confess to him. Oh, may you be wise to come to him now while God is willing.

Moody.
8801. FORGIVENESS, God-like. A high official in England once went to Sir Eardley Wilmot in great wrath, and narrated the story of a great insult which he had received. He closed by asking him if he did not think it would be manly to resent it? "Yes," said the judge, "it will be manly to resent it; but it will be God-like to forgive it." The effect was to change the purpose and cool the anger of the insulted man.

8802. FORGIVENESS, God's. Let me go and saw off a branch from one of the trees that is now budding in my garden, and all summer long there will be an ugly scar where the gash has been made; but by next autumn it will be perfectly covered over by the growing; and by the following autumn it will be hidden out of sight; and in four or five years there will be but a slight scar to show where it has been; and in ten or twenty years you would never suspect that there had been an amputation. Now trees know how to overgrow their injuries and hide them; and love does not wait so long as trees do. It knows how to throw out all divine and beneficent juices, as it were, and hide from sight the wrongs done. And God says he forgives in the same way. He will never again make mention, as he declares in Ezekiel to his people, of their sins. He will never taunt them with them.

Beecher.
8803. FORGIVENESS, Hope of. The young monk, Martin Luther, lay in his cell at Erfurt, stricken with severe sickness, and his soul riven with a deep sense of personal guilt. There he had prayed and fasted, and, like many other votaries of the Romish faith, had inflicted painful penances upon himself, but all in vain: a wound had been made which nothing but the grace of God could cure. His concern about his state had added strength to the fever that was wasting his frame, and brought his life to the verge of the grave. A venerable inmate of the monastery entered his cell. The old monk manifested the deepest sympathy for the poor sufferer, and attempted his best to comfort him. He slowly and gravely repeated the words of the "Apostles' Creed," "I believe in the forgiveness of sins." And, like cold water to a thirsty soul, or the first streak of the dawn to the lost and benighted wayfarer, the words of the old man brought light to the eyes and sent a thrill of joy to the heart of the seeker after peace and righteousness. The forgiveness of sins! The words stuck to him. And although he could not yet see how pardon was to be obtained, or on what ground it could be offered, yet the mere thought of its possibility filled him with hope and comfort and encouragement. "There is forgiveness with God, then," he said to himself. "There is a way of salvation, then. There is a door of hope. No matter how easy or how difficult to enter this gate. No matter how long or how short a time I take to find it. No matter how many or how few are seeking admission besides myself. It is enough for me to know that there is a chance, a possibility of obtaining salvation, and that my sins, which are many, may be forgiven."

8804. FORGIVENESS, Law of. A boy who had done a wrong, and confessed it, was sentenced by his father to live for three days upon bread and water as a punishment. For two days the plate of dry bread and cup of cold water was set before him, instead of his usual fare. On the morning of the third day, his father asked him how he liked his fare? The child answered, "I can eat it very well, papa, but I don't much like it;" and, after standing in silence for a few minutes, looked up, and said, "Can't you forgive me, papa?" "No, sir, I cannot; my word has passed, and you must take your three days, as I told you." The question was repeated, "But can't you really forgive me, papa?" "No," was the answer, "I cannot break my word." The boy said, "Then, papa, how could you say the Lord's Prayer this morning?" The father was struck with the child's reproof, ordered the bread and water to be removed, and said, with evident pleasure, "My boy, you have preached me a better sermon than ever I preached in my life."

8805. FORGIVENESS, Nobility of. Hath any wronged thee? Be bravely revenged; slight it, and the work is begun; forgive it, and it is finished. He is below himself that is not above an injury.

8806. FORGIVENESS, Power for. Two wheels protrude from a factory, and are seen in motion on the outer wall by every passenger. They move into each other. The upper wheel is large, the under small. From without and at a distance you cannot tell whether the upper is impelling the under, or the under moving the upper. This question, however, might be settled by an inspection of the interior. By such an inspection it would be found that the larger and higher wheel communicates motion to the lower and smaller. If the upper wheel, which communicates the motion, should stand still, so also would the lower; but more than this: if the lower wheel, which receives the motion, should by some impediment be stopped, the upper wheel would also stand still. It is in some such way that God's goodness in forgiving freely for Christ's sake our sins impels us to forgive from the heart those that have trespassed against us. The power is all from above; yet, though we by our goodness do not set the beneficent machinery in motion, we may see our badness cause it all to stand still.

8807. FORGIVENESS, Profession of. "I asked a little gentleman at St. Just," says Wesley, "what objection there was to Edward Greenfield, a pious tinner, on whom the constables had seized." He said, "Why the man is well enough in other things, but his impudence the gentleman cannot bear. Why, sir, he says his sins are forgiven!"

8808. FORGIVENESS, Refusal of. There dwelt in Antioch, in the third century, a priest named Sappricius and a layman named Nicephorus, between whom a strong friendship existed. At length they became estranged, and would not speak to each other. After a time Nicephorus became convicted of the great sin of hatred, and sought reconciliation in various ways, without success. At last Nicephorus rushed into his presence, and with confession and tears begged pardon for Christ's sake. Sappricius, hardening his heart against his brother, refused to be reconciled. The Valerian persecution then breaking out, Sappricius was arrested, bore an unflinching testimony to Christ under the most exhausting tortures, and received joyfully his sentence that he should be beheaded for being a Christian. On his way to execution, Nicephorus cast himself before him, saying, "Martyr of Jesus Christ, forgive me my offense." He received no answer. This he repeated at the place of execution, and pleaded in view of his glorious confession and approaching martyrdom. The soldiers called him a fool for seeking pardon of a man about to be executed. Sappricius could not be moved to forgiveness. He was ordered to kneel that his head might be cut off. "Stop!" he cried, "do not put me to death; I will do what you desire; I am ready to make the sacrifice." Nicephorus, dismayed at his apostasy, cried, "Brother, what are you doing? Renounce not Jesus Christ. Forfeit not the crown you have already won by tortures and sufferings." But the spirit which enables men to endure martyrdom was withdrawn from him, because he would not forgive his brother, and he basely denied his Lord and Master. Then Nicephorus, filled with agony at Sappricius' fall, said to the executioners, "I am a Christian and believe in Jesus Christ, whom this wretch has renounced; behold me here ready to die in his stead." All were astonished. The officers knew not what to do, but reporting the case to the governor received the order, "If this man persists in refusing to sacrifice to the immortal gods, let him die by the sword." His refusal was not to be overcome, and he was executed and received the bright crown of martyrdom.

8809. FORGIVENESS Required. Rev. Mr. Taylor arranged a gathering of all those who had been brought to the knowledge of Christ by the means of his ministry. Service was held in the church, which was filled by hundreds of the New Zealanders, and after the service was over the administration of the Lord's Supper began. The first rail was filled, when Mr. Taylor saw a man kneeling at one end, suddenly get up and walk down the whole length of the church and take his seat; and before he could recover from his surprise, the man returned and knelt at the same spot and received the communion. Mr. Taylor was so struck with the man's manner that he afterward questioned him reproachfully why he had thus disturbed the congregation, when he received for an answer: "Mr. Taylor, when I went up to the table, I did not know by whom I should kneel; and when I found myself kneeling side by side with a man who, a few years ago, murdered my father, and drank his blood, and whom I swore that I would murder the first moment that I set eyes upon him, you may imagine what I felt. It overpowered me; I could not stand it; and I got up and walked back to my seat, and as I did so I saw that upper room and the supper, and I thought I heard a voice say, 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' That did not overcome me. I sat down in my seat, and at once I thought I saw another sight—I thought I saw a cross and a man nailed upon it, and I heard him say, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;' and so I went back."

Missionary Advocate.

8810. FORGIVENESS, Seeking. A Christian said recently, "One day last week, as I had just seated myself at dinner, I was told that a boy outside on horseback wished to see me. I went out and found it was a neighbor's boy. I invited him in, but he declined, saying that he had something weighing very heavily upon his mind, and that he could not rest until he told it to me. 'I have,' said the boy, with tears in his eyes, 'trespassed a number of times on your property, stolen your fruit, etc., and I could not rest until I had asked your forgiveness.' I told him taking my fruit was no injury to me; that if God had forgiven his sins, it was all right with me. He rode off, thanking me, and seemed much relieved. Now, that boy displayed a very different spirit from a certain brother with whom I had a conversation the other day. I told him he should be willing to ask forgiveness of a friend whom he had offended, and that he should forgive his brother. 'O no! said he, 'I can't do that; it lies too deep in my heart.' And yet that man desires God and the Church to forgive him. But Jesus says, 'If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses.'"

8811. FORGIVENESS a Settlement. A minister to whom one of his parishioners told his tale of sorrow, reproved him thus: "Deacon, I remember your son stoutly rebelled against your authority some time ago, but afterward felt sorry and repented of his sin, and humbly asked your forgiveness. Did you forgive him?" "Of course I did." "What did you forgive him for?" "Because I could not help it, when I saw how sorry he was." "And does he still ask forgiveness?" "No—no! Nothing is said about it. It is all settled forever." "Now, do you believe that you can be better to your son than God is to you? He pardons like a God."

8813. FORGOTTEN, Fear of Being. Are not all things born to be forgotten? In truth it was a sore vexation to me when I saw, as the wise man saw of old, that whatever I could hope to perform must necessarily be of very temporary duration; and if so, why do it? Let me see! What have I done already? I have learned Welsh, and have translated the songs of Ab Gwilym; I have also rendered the old book of Danish ballads into English metre. Good! Have I done enough to secure myself a reputation of a thousand years? Well, but what's a thousand years after all, or twice a thousand years? Woe is me! I may just as well sit still. Barrow.

8814. FORMALISM, Avoid. Do not the "work of God negligently" (Jer. 48, 10.), let not thy heart be upon the world, when thy hand is lifted up in prayer; and be sure to prefer an action of religion in its place and proper season before all worldly pleasure, letting secular things, that may be dispensed with in themselves, in these circumstances wait upon the other; not like the patriarch who ran from the altar in St. Sophia to his stables in all his pontificals, and in the midst of his office, to see a colt newly fallen from his beloved and much valued mare Phorbante. More prudent and severe was that of Sir Thomas More, who being sent for by the king when he was at his prayers in public, returned answer he would attend him when he had first performed his service to the King of kings. And it did honor to Rusticus, that when letters from Cæsar were given him, he refused to open them till the philosopher had done his lecture. In honoring God and doing his work, put forth all thy strength; for of that time only thou mayest be most confident that it is gained, which is prudently and zealously spent in God's service. Jeremy Taylor.

8815. FORMALISM, Churchly. Posture and imposture, flections and genuflections, bowing to right and curtsying to the left, and an immense amount of man-millinery.

Sydney Smith.

8816. FORMALISM, Delusion of. If this hypocrisy, this resting in outward performances were so odious to God under the law, a religion full of shadows and ceremonies, certainly it will be much more odious to do so under the gospel, a religion of much more simplicity, and exacting so much the greater sincerity of the heart, even because it disburdens the outward man of the performance of legal rights and observances. And therefore, if we now under the gospel shall think to delude God Almighty, as Michael did Saul, with an idol handsomely dressed instead of the true David, we shall one day find that we have not mocked God, but ourselves; and that our portion among hypocrites shall be greater than theirs.

Chillingworth.

8817. FORMALISM, Fatal Delusion of. An English lady, a strong partisan of the Church of England, suddenly sickened, and with eternity before her, said to a clergyman who visited her: "It is kind of you to come to me, but it is in vain. It is too late to do anything for me now. Mine has been a Christless Christianity, and I must abide by the consequences. I have been a good church woman, and have passed for a good Christian. I have been diligent in my attendance at church, and have cared for an excellent ministry. I have never willingly passed by an opportunity of partaking of the holy communion. I have given largely to religious and charitable causes. I have admired Christianity, and have tried to bring its precepts into my practice. But I have never cared to know a living Saviour, to make a personal acquaintance with him, nor to know from him that my sins are forgiven. It is too late to seek it now. I have had the form of godliness without the power of it. I am lost—lost forever." She is one of thousands of staunch defenders and formal adherents of the church, but unsaved.

8818. FORMALIST, The Inconsistent. There are some if you would see their goodness, and be acquainted with their godliness, you must hit the right time, or else you will find none, like some flowers that are seen but some months in the year. This may be in the morning: you may take the hypocrite on his knees in a saint's posture; but when that fit is over, you shall see little of God in all its course, till night brings him again, of course, to the like duty. The watch is naught that goes only at first winding up, and stands all the day after; and so is that heart, that desires not always to keep in spiritual motion.

Anon.

8819. FORMALISTS Enemies to Christ. I find no such enemies to the cross of Christ as those who keep the form of religion, and are orthodox in their notions, but at the same time are ignorant of an experimental acquaintance with Jesus.

Whitefield.

8820. FORMS, Argument for. When we simulate the natural language of any feeling, we are apt to be affected by it almost, if not quite, to the same extent as when we contemplate it in another. If we strut along, brandishing a weapon, we feel somewhat like a hero for the moment. All unequivocally great actors have, while upon the stage, felt the emotions which they represented, and even for some time before and after. It is, for example, related of Mrs. Siddons, that, from the moment of her going into her carriage to proceed to the theatre, where she had to act a part, till her return home afterwards, she felt entirely as the person whom she was to represent, and could not without pain admit any other feeling into her mind. The celebrated French tragedian, Barron, who was naturally timid, always felt as a hero for several days after he had performed any of the principal characters of Corneille's plays. The semblance has been, to use a homely but expressive phrase, a shoeing-horn to the reality; and something has been created, and that a good something, out of nothing. The forms so universally used in worship are to be defended on the same grounds. Religious feeling has its natural language; submission is expressed by kneeling; solemnity by a composure of the countenance; imploration by the folding or clasping of the hands; the non-dependence on self, which is one of the first dictates of religion, finds a proper external expression in a lowly attitude and a downcast look. When these expressions of feelings are simulated, the actual feeling itself, if it be not present already, is apt to be induced, and the object is, of course, far better gained than it would be if looks and gestures, expressive of indifference or of the opposite feelings, were maintained.

F. F. Trench.

8821. FORMS, Value of. They are valuable in their own place, and for their own purposes; frames, as they are, to set the picture in; caskets for truth's jewels; dead poles, no doubt, yet useful to support living plants, and very beautiful when the bare stem is festooned with green leaves, and crowned with a head of flowers.

Dr. Guthrie.

8822. FORMULAS, Realities of. Formulas, too, as we call them, have a reality in human life. They are real as the very skin and muscular tissue of a man's life, and a most blessed, indispensable thing, so long as they have vitality withal, and are a living skin and tissue to him! No man, or man's life, can go abroad and do business in the world without skin and tissues. No; first of all, these have to fashion themselves, as indeed they spontaneously and inevitably do. Foam itself—and this is worth thinking of—can harden into oyster shell: all living objects do by necessity form to themselves a skin.

Carlyle.

8823. FORMULAS, Utility of. What we call formulas are not in their origin bad; they are indispensably good. Formula is method, habit, found wherever man is found. Formulas fashion themselves as paths do, as beaten highways, leading towards some sacred or high object, whither many men are bent. Consider it. One man, full of heartfelt, earnest impulse, finds out a way of doing somewhat, were it of uttering his soul's reverence for the Highest, were it but of fitly saluting his fellow-man. An inventor was needed to do that—a poet; he has articulated the dim struggling thought that dwelt in his own and many hearts. This is his way of doing that; these are his footsteps, the beginning of "a path." And now see: the second man travels naturally in the footsteps of his foregoer: it is the easiest method. In the footsteps of his foregoer; yet with improvements, changes, where such seem good; at all events with enlargements, the path ever widening itself as more travel it, till at last there is a broad highway, whereon the whole world may travel and drive. Formulas all begin by being full of substance; you may call them the skin, the articulation into shape, into limbs and skin, of a substance that is already there; they had not been there otherwise. Idols, as we said, are not idolatrous till they become doubtful, empty for the worshiper's heart. Much as we talk against formulas, I hope no one of us is ignorant withal of the high significance of true formulas; that they were, and will ever be, the indispensablest furniture of our habitation in this world.

Carlyle.

8824. FORTITUDE, Christian. Peter Balsam was apprehended in the persecution of Maximus. Being brought before Severus, the governor, he was asked his name. Peter answered, "Balsam is the name of my family; but I received that of Peter in baptism." "Of what family, and of what country are you?" "I am a Christian." "What is your employ?" "What employ can I have more honorable, or what better thing can I do in the world, than to live a Christian." "Do you know the imperial edicts?" "I know the laws of God, the sovereign of the universe." "You shall quickly know that there is an edict of the most clement emperors, commanding all to sacrifice to the gods or be put to death." Peter answered, "You will also know one day that there is a law of the eternal King, proclaiming that every one shall perish who offers sacrifice to devils; which you do counsel me to obey, and which do you think should be my option: to die by your sword, or to be condemned to everlasting misery by the sentence of the great King and true God?" Severus said, "Seeing you ask my advice, it is then that you obey the edict, and sacrifice to the gods." "I can never be prevailed upon to sacrifice to gods of wood and stone, as those are which you adore." "I would have you know, that it is in my power to revenge these affronts by your death." "I had no intention to affront you. I only expressed what is written in the divine law," "Have compassion on yourself, and sacrifice." "If I am truly compassionate to myself, I ought not to sacrifice." "My desire is to use lenity; therefore, still do allow you time to consider with yourself, that you may save your life." "This delay will be to no purpose, for I shall not alter my mind; do now what you will be obliged to do soon, and complete the work which the devil, your father, has begun; for I will never do what Jesus Christ forbids me." Then Severus ordered him to be tortured upon the rack. "What say ye now, Peter," he cried, "do you begin to know what the rack is? are you yet willing to sacrifice?" He answered, "Tear me with iron hooks, and talk not of sacrificing to your devils; I have already told you that I will sacrifice to that God alone for whom I suffer." At this the governor commanded his tortures to be redoubled. The martyr sang aloud with great joy, "One thing I have desired of the Lord; this will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life." The executioners became weary and others were ordered to take their place. The martyr's blood ran down in streams, and the pitying crowd cried out, "Obey the emperors; sacrifice and rescue yourself from these torments." "Do you call these torments?" replied Peter; "I, for my part, feel no pain; but this I know, that if I am not faithful to my God, I must expect real pains, such as cannot be conceived." Severus urged, "Sacrifice, Peter Balsam! or you will repent it." "Neither will I sacrifice nor shall I repent it." "I am just ready to pronounce sentence." Peter answered, "It is what I most earnestly desire." Then the governor thus sentenced him, "It is our order, that Peter Balsam, for having refused to obey the edicts of the invincible emperors, and having contemned our commands, after obstinately defending the law of a man crucified, be himself nailed to a cross." Thus the saint was crucified like his Master, A. D. 311.

8825. FORTITUDE, Demand for. None can aspire to act greatly, but those who are of force greatly to suffer. They who make the arrangements in the first run of misadventure, and in a temper of mind the common fruit of disappointment and dismay, put a seal on their calamities. To their power they take a security against any favors which they might hope from the usual inconstancy of fortune. Burke.

8826. FORTITUDE, Emblem of. There is a mother-idea in each particular kind of tree, which, if well marked, is probably embodied in the poetry of every language. Take the oak, for instance, and we always find it standing as a type of strength and endurance. I wonder if you ever thought of the single mark of supremacy which distinguishes this tree from all our other forest trees? All the rest of them shirk the work of resisting gravity; the oak alone defies it. It chooses the horizontal direction for its limbs, so that their whole weight may tell,—and then stretches them out fifty or sixty feet, so that the strain may be mighty enough to be worth resisting. You will find that, in passing from the extreme downward droop of the branches of the weeping willow to the extreme upward inclination of those of the poplar, they sweep nearly half a circle. At 90° the oak stops short; to slant upward another degree would mark infirmity of purpose; to bend downwards, weakness of organization. The American elm betrays something of both, yet sometimes, as we shall see, puts on a certain resemblance to its sturdier neighbor.

Holmes.

8827. FORTUNE, Best. A Greek maiden, being asked what fortune she would bring her husband, replied, "I will bring him what gold cannot purchase, a heart unspotted, and virtue without a stain; the inheritance from parents who had these, and nothing else to leave me."

Mrs. Balfour.

8828. FORTUNE: Brevities. Good fortune that comes seldom, comes more welcome.—Dryden.

—Receive the gifts of fortune without pride, and part with them without reluctance.—Antoninus.—Let Fortune do her worst, whatever she makes us lose, as long as she never makes us lose our honesty and our independence.—Pope.—Fortune gives too much to many, but to none enough.—Martial.—The wheel of fortune turns incessantly round, and who can say within himself, I shall to-day be uppermost!—Confucius.—We are sure to get the better of fortune, if we do but grapple with her.—Seneca.—There is some help for all the defects of fortune, for if a man cannot attain to the length of his wishes, he may have his remedy by cutting of them shorter.—Cowley.—The power of fortune is confessed only by the miserable; the happy impute all their success to prudence or merit.—Swift.—Fortune's wings are made of Time's feathers, which stay not whilst one may measure them.

Lilly.

8829. FORTUNE, Defiance of. We ought likewise with an invincible spirit, and a bold security as regards futurity, to answer Fortune in those words which Socrates retorted upon his judges, "Anytus and Meletus may kill, but they cannot hurt me." So she can afflict me with disease, can spoil me of my riches, disgrace me with my prince, and bring me under a popular odium; but she cannot make a good man wicked, or the brave man a mean and degenerate coward; she cannot cast envy upon a generous temper, or destroy any of those habits of the mind which are useful to us in the conduct of our lives.

Putarch.

8830. FORTUNE, Encountering. Vice asks Fortune how she will make a man unhappy. "Fortune, dost thou threaten poverty? Metrocles laughs at thee, who, sleeping in the winter amongs the sheep, and in the summer in the porches of the temples, challenging the kings of the Persians, that wintered in Babylon and passed the summer in Media, to vie with him for happiness. Dost thou bring on servitude, bonds, and the being sold for a slave? Diogenes contemns thee, who being exposed to sale by pirates, cried out, 'Who will buy a master?' Dost thou brew a cup of poison? Didst thou not offer such a one to Socrates? And yet he mildly and meekly, without trembling or changing either color or countenance, drank it briskly up; whilst those who survived esteemed him happy."

Putarch.

8831. FORTUNE, Example of. Appius, a Roman, was proscribed by the triumvirate. Becoming aware of the fact, he divided his wealth among his servants, and with them set sail for Sicily. But a fearful storm arose, and his servants placed him in a small boat, assuring him he would be safer. In the meantime they sailed away with the ship and all his riches. The ship in which they sailed was cast away, and they lost all, while the winds waited the little boat in safety to the desired haven.

8832. FORTUNE, Favorite of. Fortune always seemed to favor Timotheus, an Athenian general, and in every war he had an easy and assured victory. His rivals, envying his prosperity, painted Fortune casting cities and towns in his lap as he lay sleeping. Timotheus, seeing this emblem, said, "If I take cities while I sleep, what think you I shall do when I am awake?"

8833. FORTUNE, Not Blind. The Europeans are themselves blind who describe Fortune without sight. No first-rate beauty ever had finer eyes, or saw more clearly: they who have no other trade but seeking their fortune need never hope to find her; coquet-like, she flies from her close pursuers, and at last fixes on the plodding mechanic, who stays at home and minds his business. I am amazed how men can call her blind, when by the company she keeps she seems so very discerning. Wherever you see a gaming-table, be very sure Fortune is not there; when you see a man whose pockets are laced with gold, be satisfied Fortune is not there; wherever you see a beautiful woman good-natured and obliging, be convinced Fortune is never there. In short, she is often seen accompanying industry, and as often trundling a wheel-barrow as lolling in a coach-and-six.

Goldsmith.

8834. FORTUNE, Symbols of. Alexander, who carved out his fortune with the sword, caused that emblem to be painted upon a table within the compass of a wheel. He showed thereby that what he had won by the sword was liable to be turned from him by the wheel of fortune. There is nothing more certain under the sun than the law of change. The victor of to-day will be conquered to-morrow, the rich will be poor, and the reverse. It requires all the fullness of grace, and all the power of philosophy, to stand like Daniel, steadfast through all to "the end of the days."

8835. FORTUNE, Too Late. Among the Sierra Nevada Mountains, I was walking with some of the passengers to relieve the overladen stage, and one of them gave me his history. He said, "With my wife I came to California twenty years ago. We suffered every hardship. I went to the mines, but had no luck. I afterward worked at a trade, but had no luck. Then I went to farming, but had no luck. We suffered almost starvation. Everything seemed to go against us. While we were in complete poverty, my wife died. After her death, I went again to the mines. I struck a vein of gold which yielded me forty thousand dollars. I am now on my way to San Francisco to transfer the mine, for which I am to receive one hundred thousand dollars." "Then," said I, "you are worth one hundred and forty thousand dollars." He said, "Yes; but it comes too late. My wife is gone. The money is nothing to me now."

8836. FOUNDATION, Importance of the. The people of the goody city of St. Louis look forward to the time when the ponderous engine, followed by its heavily freighted train, shall roll on the iron track that is to span their great river. To sustain the burden on their projected bridge, they are constructing foundations of solid masonry, eighty feet in length and sixty feet in breadth, which are to be sunk seventy feet below the bed of the river, even down to the underlying rock formation, so useless do they deem it to raise supports for the great pressure of commerce on the basis of yielding water or of treacherous sand. Beloved, the immense burden which must come rolling on upon the next generation of living men demands of us that we build not slightly. Compute, if you can, the weight of interests with which the next hundred years will be freighted, and learn from your computation what moral masonry will be adequate to support that weight. Beneath all that man can build must lie the divine, the immovable Rock, which is the Son of God and the Saviour of men, and we, as builders, must go down to the rock and start from it with the foundations we lay. To do this, we must penetrate the accumulated débris of ages. It is said that an English builder, a few years since, determined to build a house within the walls of the old Jerusalem, and having resolved to lay its foundation on the rock of David's time, he found it necessary to excavate through fifty feet of accumulated rubbish. These Christian centuries have been prolific in religious rubbish, and whoever now will build with the Son of David must dig down through superstition, and priestcraft, and tradition, and prejudiced interpretations, until he find the "Word of the living God."

Dr. Hodge.

8837. FOUNDATION, Sandy. A sudden but violent storm arose, and loud thunder echoed through the mountains. "The brow of the hill whereon their city (Nazareth) was built, was every moment gleaming as the lightning flashed. The rain fell in torrents; and in the course of an hour, a river flowed past the convent door, along what lately was a dry and quiet street. In the darkness of the night we heard loud shrieks for help. The flood carried away baskets, logs of wood, tables, and fruit-stands. At length, a general alarm was given. Two houses, built on the sand, were undermined by the water, and both fell together, while the people in them escaped with difficulty. It was impossible not to pity these poor houseless creatures, and, at the same time, to thank God we were in a secure building."

A Sunday at Nazareth.

8838. FOUNDATION, Sura. Shortly after the destruction of the Ocean Monarch in the English Channel, one of the largest vessels that ever sailed from our shores, and built by Capt. McKay, of East Boston, a vessel was sailing in the vicinity, when the sailors thought they heard the voice of singing; they immediately lowered a boat, and starting in the direction from whence the sound came, they discovered a speck on the wave, which proved to be a Christian woman, sitting on a single plank, singing this hymn:

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly,
While the nearer waters roll,
While the tempest still is high," etc.

Those sailors who rescued her, might have supposed that the plank was all the support she had; but thank God, she was resting on the "foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ being the chief corner-stone." This noble Christian woman was taken on board the ship, and brought to Boston, where she lived a few years. Then she removed I think to Warren, Mass., and from thence departed to be with Christ forever.

T. J. Abbott.

8839. FOUNDATION, Without a. A strong-minded man, stricken with the pains of death, cried out in agony. His nurse tried to solace him. "Oh, don't talk to me of pain!" he cried, bitterly. "It is the mind, woman—the mind." Slowly and deliberately he said, "I knew it at the time—every time. I knew it—I knew that a penalty must follow sin; yet I have done wrong, knowing that it was wrong; first with a few qualms, then brushing aside conscience, and at last with the coolness of a fiend. For one minute of my life I have not lived for heaven, for God, for Christ; no, not one minute. Oh, yes, Christ died for sinners; but my intellect is clear—clearer than ever before, I tell you. I can see almost into eternity; I can feel that unless Christ is believed on, his death can do me no good." Soon after, he said, "I have been following up the natural laws, and I see an affinity between them and the great laws of God's universe. Heaven is for the holy: without are dogs and whoremongers. There's the distinction—it's all right, all right." At death he whispered, "It is awfully dark here; my feet stand on the slippery edge of a great gulf! Oh for some foundation!" He stretched his hand out, as if feeling for a way. "Christ," gently whispered his friend. "Not for me!" was his awful answer.

8840. FOUNTAIN OF LIFE, A Beggar at the. Here I see a beggar going along the turnpike road. He is worn out with disease. He is stiff in the joints. He is ulcered all over. He has rheum in his eyes. He is sick and wasted. He is in rags. Every time he puts down his swollen feet, he cries: "Oh! the pain!" He sees a fountain by the roadside under a tree, and he crawls up to that fountain and says: "I must wash. Here I may cool my ulcers. Here I may get rested." He stoops down, and scoops up on the palm of his hands enough water to slake his thirst; and that is all gone. Then he stoops down, and begins to wash his eyes; and the rheum is all gone. Then he puts in his swollen feet, and the swelling is gone. Then, willing no longer to be only half-cured, he plunges in, and his whole body is laved in the stream, and he gets upon the bark well. Meantime the owner of the mansion up yonder comes down, walking through the ravine with his only son, and he sees the bundle of rags, and asks: "Whose rags are these?" A voice from the fountain says: "Those are my rags." Then says the master to his son: "Go up to the house, and get the best new suit you can find and bring it down." And he brings down the clothes, and the beggar is clothed in them, and he looks around and says: "I was filthy, but now I am clean. I was ragged, but now I am robed. I was blind but now I see. Glory be to the owner of that mansion; and glory be that son who brought me that new suit of clothes; and glory be to this fountain, where I have washed, and where all who will may wash and be clean." Talmage.

8841. FRAILTY, Emblem of. It was in the bleak season of a cold autumn, by the side of a large moor, that I one day saw a shepherd's tent. It was composed of straw and fern, and secured under the warmer side of a hedge, with a few briars and stakes. Thither, for about a week, he took shelter until the herbage failed his flock, and he removed I know not whither. His tent was, however, left behind. A few days after, I rode that way, and looked for the shepherd's tent, but it was gone. The stormy winds had scattered its frail materials. R. Marks.

8842. FRAILTY, Reminders of. The Lamac or priests of Thibet, when ready to celebrate prayers, summoned the people with pipes made from dead men's bones. Their rosaries were made from the same, while they drank out of a skull. On being asked the reason for using these things, one of their chief priests replied, "They did it, ad fatorum memoriam." They piped with the bones of the dead that the sad whispers might warn the people of the approach of death. The beads they wore put them in mind of the frail estate of their bodies; and drinking from a skull mortified their affections, repressed their pleasures, imbibed their tastes, lest they should relish too much the delights of life.

8843. FRAILTY, Type of. There is cultivated at Paris a species of serpentine aloe, whose large and beautiful flower does not blow till towards the month of July, and about five o'clock in the evening. It then opens its petals, expands them, fades, and dies. By ten o'clock it has withered in the presence of a crowd assembled to see it. A striking emblem of the life of man. Bibl. Treasury.

8844. FRAUD, Prevalence of. From the great houses in the City of London to the village grocer, the commercial life of England has been saturated with fraud. So deep has it gone that a strictly honest tradesman can hardly hold his ground against competition. You can no longer trust that any article that you buy is the thing which it pretends to be. We have false weights, false measures, cheating, and shoddy everywhere. Yet the clergy have seen all this grow up in absolute indifference; and the great question at this moment agitating the Church of England is the color of the ecclesiastical petticoats! Many hundred sermons have I heard in England; many a dissertation on the mysteries of the faith, on the divine mission of the clergy, on apostolical succession, on bishops, and justification, and the theory of good works, and verbal inspiration, and the efficacy of the sacraments; but never during these thirty wonderful years, never one that I can recollect on common honesty, or those primitive commandments—"Thou shalt not lie, and thou shalt not steal." Froude.

8845. FREEDOM, Claim your. A captive eagle was tethered to a stick by a chain ten feet long. He marched round in a circle till a deep track was worn, and years of practice confirmed the habit. At length its owner took off his chain and set him free. Still he pursued his usual circle, not claiming his freedom till some one pushed him from the beaten track. As if astonished, he looked around, flapped his wings, then, fixing his eye on the sun, soared upward, and was free.

8846. FREEDOM, Cost of. Hegesippus instigated the Athenians against Philip, when one of the assembly cried out, "You would not persuade us to a war?" "Yes, indeed, would I, and to mourning clothes and to public funerals and to funeral speeches, if we intend to live free, and not submit to the pleasures of the Macedonians."

8847. FREEDOM, Decree of. The emperor of Russia had a plan by which he was to liberate the serfs of that country. There were 40,000,000 of them. Of some of them, their whole time was sold; of others, only a part. The Emperor called around him his council, and wanted to have them devise some way to set the slaves at liberty. After they had conferred about it for six months, one night the Council sent in their decision, sealed, that they thought it was not expedient. The Emperor went down to the Greek church that night and partook of the Lord's Supper, and he set his house in order, and the next morning you could hear the tramp of soldiers in the streets of St. Petersburg. The Emperor summoned his guard, and before noon 65,000 men were surrounding that palace. Just at midnight there came out a proclamation that every slave in Russia was forever set free. If one man can liberate 40,000,000, has not God the power to liberate every captive in New York? If there is a poor slave here, if there is a child of earth here to-day who wants to be liberated, I have come to show that Christ came to bring liberty to the captive. Moody.

8848. FREEDOM, Ignorance of. Miss Smiley said that after the war, when she went down South, she was in a hotel, and the room she was to occupy was so dirty that she said to the old colored woman that had charge of the room, "Auntie, you know I cannot live in such dirt as this, and you know, now, that we Northern people set you colored people free. I am from the North, and I want you to show your love for the North by cleaning up this room." She then went away for a short time, and when she came back in about half an hour the room looked as if a half a day's work had been spent on it. And the old colored woman came up to her and said: "There! now be's I free or beant I?" "Why, what makes you ask that question?" said the lady. "Oh," says she, "my old massa says I beant free at all, no one has a right to make me free at all, and he hasn't given me my freedom; and when go out and see the colored people, they tell me I am free: and now be's I free or beant I?" And there the poor colored woman had been free for months, and didn't know it. That is what the devil is doing with a great many. They are free, and don't know it. Now perhaps the colored woman could not read the proclamation, and find out. If you cannot read it, you can get some of your friends to read it. The truth shall make you free. The truth shall snap every fetter, set at liberty every captive. Moody.

8849. FREEDOM, Jubilee of. We had been at Richmond but a few hours before I heard that the colored people were going to have a jubilee-meeting down in the great African church that night, and I thought to myself, although I am a white man, I will get in there somehow. I had a hard fight to get in, but I did succeed at last. It was probably the largest church in the South. There were supposed to be 3,000 or 4,000 black people there, and they had some chaplains of our Northern regiments for their orators on the occasion. Talk about eloquence. I never heard better. It seemed as if they were raised for the occasion. I remember one of them, as he stood there on the platform, pointed down to the mothers and said, "Mothers, you rejoice to-day that you are forever free, all your posterity is free, that little child has been taken from your bosom and sold off to some distant State for the last time." And some of those women shouted right out in meeting, "Glory to God!" They could not keep the good news to themselves. They believed they were delivered. They believed the good news. Then this man turned to the young men and said, "Young men, rejoice to-day. It is a day of jubilee, a day of glad-tidings. We come to proclaim to you that you are free. You have heard the crack of the slave-trader's whip for the last time." And they shouted and clapped their hands and said, "Glory to God!" Then he turned to the young ladies and said, "Rejoice to-day! you have been on the auction block and sold to captivity for the last time." And then the young maidens clapped their hands and shouted for joy. It was a jubilee. What made them so glad? They believed they were liberated, and that is what made them so joyful. People want to know why Christians are so joyful. It is because they have been delivered from Satan. Some of those slaves had good masters, and slavery was not hard for them, but some of them had unkind and cruel masters; but I will tell you no slave in all the Southern States ever had so mean a master as you have, and you have more reason to rejoice that Christ has come to set you free than any prisoner in our Southern States, and every one of you ought to rejoice that you hear the good news that Christ has come to proclaim liberty to the captive, to recover sight to the blind, to set at liberty those that are bound. Jesus has come to open the prison doors and let out the captive. Moody.

8850. FREEDOM, Land of. Before the war we had three millions of slaves. If a negro escaped from the South and got as far as Mason and Dixon's line, he was not safe even then. There was a Fugitive Slave Law which would have surrendered back that negro even if he had crossed that boundary. But there was a line over which should he go he would be free, and that line was the Canada boundary line. If he could cross that he would be forever a free man. Now for my illustration. A poor negro escapes from Kentucky, and has succeeded, after many a weary day, in crossing the Ohio river. Though he has placed this barrier between him and his pursuers, still he knows he is not absolutely free; he knows they can take him back out of that State should they come up with him. He has not yet come under any law that will protect him; he is still under our own flag, and the flag of our country cannot protect him. He must go further. He knows he must reach Canada before the dreaded apprehension of being consigned back to his chains and tortures and stripes can be dismissed from his thoughts. He says, "If I can only get under that flag I am a free man—no slave can breathe under that flag." So the poor man makes his way toward this haven of rest. You can see him running. Yet a little while and he hears the bloodhounds behind him; he knows his old master is on his track; they have fleet horses and they will soon catch him. He is but a short distance from the line now, but his pursuers are in sight. Can he reach it in time? He is right on the boundary now; he makes one more effort and he is safe. Here you see him one moment a slave; now he has crossed the line and is free. Before he had reached the line he was subject to be taken back by his old master, and he and his posterity would have been slaves. Yet he has now crossed that line, and they cannot touch him. All at once he goes over the line and is free. One minute he is a slave; the next minute he is a citizen. Once a slave; now a free man. Will you not also leave the devil's territory, my friends? The banner floats from Calvary, and when you come under its folds you are safe. Moody.

8851. FREEDOM, Repression of. When I was at Naples, I went with Signor Manso, a gentleman of excellent parts and breeding, who had been the familiar friend of that famous poet, Torquato Tasso, to see the burning mountain Vesuvius. I wondered how the peasants could venture to dwell so fearlessly and cheerfully on its sides, when the lava was flowing from its summit; but Manso smiled, and told me that when the fire descends freely they retreat before it without haste or fear. They can tell how fast it will move, and how far; and they know, moreover, that, though it may work some little damage, it will soon cover the fields over which it hath passed with rich vineyards and sweet flowers. But, when the flames are pent up in the mountain, then it is that they have reason to fear; then it is that the earth sinks and the sea swells; then cities are swallowed up, and their place knoweth them no more. So it is in politics: where the people are most closely restrained, there it gives the greatest shocks to peace and order; therefore would I say to all kings, Let your demagogues lead crowds, lest they lead armies; let them bluster, lest they massacre: a little turbulence is, as it were, the rainbow of the state; it shows, indeed, that there is a passing shower; but it is a pledge that there shall be no deluge.

Milton.

8852. FREE GRACE, Duty and. Industry on our part is not superseded by the greatness and freeness of Divine grace; as when a school-master teaches a boy gratis, the youth cannot attain his learning without some application of his own; and yet it doth not, therefore, cease to be free on the teacher's part, because attention is needful in the learner. So it is here.

Arrowsmith.

8853. FREE GRACE, Experience of. Bunyan, in his Holy War, portrays the triumphs of grace in the treatment of the rebels in the town of Mansoul after their submission to Prince Emmanuel. The Prince ordered a delegation of prisoners to be sent from the town of Mansoul under the guard of Captain Boanerges and Captain Conviction. They were brought into the presence of the Prince in mourning robes, with ropes around their necks, smiting upon their breasts, and "durst not so much as lift their eyes up to heaven." Nor could they hold their peace, but they cried, "O wretched men of Mansoul! O unhappy men!" Then they fell prostrate upon their faces before the Prince. He ascended the throne and ordered the representatives to stand up before him. He asked them, "If they were servants of Shaddai, or had they suffered themselves to be corrupted and defiled by the abominable Diabolus? Would they have been content to have lived under such slavery and tyranny forever? And even when he came himself, against the town of Mansoul, did they not wish that he might gain a victory over them?" To all these questions they replied, "Yes, we have done worse, we deserve punishment, and even death, we have nothing to say, Lord; thou art just, for we have sinned." "Then the Prince commanded that an herald should be called, and he should go throughout the camp of Emmanuel and proclaim, with the sound of a trumpet, that the Prince had, in his Father's name and for his Father's glory, gotten a perfect conquest and victory over Mansoul, and that the prisoners should follow and say Amen." Then there was great rejoicing everywhere among the soldiers and captains of Prince Emmanuel's army, but in the hearts of the men of Mansoul this great joy was wanting. But the Prince called them to him again, and said to them, "The sins, trespasses, iniquities, that you, with the whole town of Mansoul, have from time to time committed against my Father and me, I have power and commandment from my Father to forgive to the town of Mansoul, and do forgive you accordingly." Having said this, he gave them a written parchment, and sealed with several seals, a large and general pardon, to be proclaimed through the whole town of Mansoul at the rising of the sun the next day. The mourning weeds were stripped from them, and he gave them "beauty for ashes the oil of joy for mourning, and the garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness." He gave to them each jewels of gold and precious stones, and took away their ropes, and put chains of gold about their necks, and earrings in their ears. Then were their fetters broken to pieces before their faces, and cast into the air. So overjoyed were they, their pardon being so sudden and glorious, they almost fainted; but the Prince put his everlasting arms under them, embraced them and kissed them, and bade them be of good cheer. Then he sent them away to their homes with pipe and tabor. Joyful was the meeting of those that had gone down prisoners, with friends on their return. And when they heard the wonderful news of the wisdom and grace of Prince Emmanuel their joy knew no bounds. There was pardon for every one in Mansoul, each one was mentioned by name. Emmanuel came with royal retinue, and took up his abode in the town. He made them a great feast at the palace. He gave them luxuries from his Father's court. Mandid eat angels' food, and had honey given him out of the rock.

8854. FREE GRACE, Memorial of. At the centennial year of British Methodism (1839), a commemorative medal was struck. On one side, in alto relievo, were the busts of John and Charles Wesley. From all the sermons and writings of John Wesley and the other founders of Methodism, they selected the following stanza from one of Charles Wesley's hymns, as best expressing the mission of that church:

"O, for a trumpet voice
On all the world to call;
To bid their hearts rejoice
In him who died for all;
For all my Lord was crucified,
For all, for all, my Saviour died!"

8855. FREE GRACE, Objections to. Bunyan represents the power of grace, as shown by its first offer to, and success with, the Jerusalem sinners, the murderers of Christ. Thus: "Repent, every one of you; be baptized, every one of you, in his name, for the remission of sins, and you shall, every one of you, receive the Holy Ghost. Objection. But I was one of those who plotted to take away his life. May I be saved by him? Peter. Every one of you. Objection. But I was one of them that bore false witness against him. Is there grace for me? Peter. For every one of you. Objection. But I was one of them that cried out, Crucify him! crucify him! and that desired that Barabbas, the murderer, might live, rather than him. What will become of me, think you? I am to preach repentance and remission of sins to every one of you, says Peter. Objection. But I was one of them who did spit in his face when he stood before his accusers; I also was one that mocked him when, in anguish, he hanged bleeding on the tree. Is there room for me? For every one of you, says Peter. Objection. But I was one of them that, in his extremity, said, Give him gall and vinegar to drink! Why may I not expect the same when anguish and guilt is upon me? Peter. Repent of these, your wickednesses, and here is remission of sins for every one of you. Objection. But I railed on him; I reviled him; I hated him; I rejoiced to see him mocked at by others. Can there be hopes for me? Peter. There is for every one of you. Oh, what a blessed Every-one-of-you is here! How willing was Peter, and the Lord Jesus, by his ministry, to catch these murderers with the word of the Gospel, that they might be monuments of the grace of God!"

8856. FREE GRACE, Power of. I was preaching one Sunday in a church where there was a fashionable audience, and after I got through the sermon, I said, "If there are any that would like to tarry a little while and would like to stay and talk, I would be glad to talk with you." They all got up, turned around, and went out. I felt as though I was abandoned. When I was going out, I saw a man getting behind the furnace. He hadn't any coat on, and he was weeping bitterly. I said, "My friend, what is the trouble?" He said, "You told me to-night that I could be saved; that the grace of God would reach me. You told me that there wasn't a man so far gone but the grace of God could reach him." He said, "I am an exile from my family; I have drunk up $20,000 within the last few months; I have drunk up the coat off my back, and if there is hope for a poor sinner like me I should like to be saved." It was just like a cup of refreshment to talk to that man. I didn't dare give him money for fear that he would drink it up; but I got him a place to stay that night, took an interest in him, and got him a coat, and six months after that, when I left Chicago for Europe—four months after—that man was one of the most earnest Christian men I knew. The Lord has blessed him wonderfully. He was an active, capable man. The grace of God can save just such if they will only repent. I don't care how low he has become, the grace of God can purge him of all his sin, and place him among the blessed. In proportion as man is a sinner, much more does the grace of God abound. There isn't a man but that the grace of God will give him the victory if he will only accept it.

Moody.

8857. FREE GRACE, Trophies of. Christ has put himself under the term of physician; consequently he desireth that his fame as to the salvation of sinners may spread abroad, that the world may see what he can do. And to this end he has not only commanded that the biggest sinners should have the first offer of his mercy; but has, as the physicians do, put out his bills, and published his doings, that things may be read and talked of. Yea, he has moreover, in these his blessed bills, the Holy Scriptures I mean, inserted the very names of persons, the places of their abode, and the great cures that by the means of his salvation he has wrought upon them to this very end. Here is, item, Such a one by my grace and redeeming blood, was made a monument of everlasting life; and such a one, by my perfect obedience, became an heir of glory And then he produceth their names. Item. I saved Lot from the guilt and damnation that he had procured to himself by his incest. Item I saved David from the vengeance that belonged to him for committing adultery and murder. Here also is Solomon, Manasseh, Peter, Magdalen, and many others made mention of in this book. Yea, here are their names, their sins, and their salvation recorded together, that you may read and know what a Saviour he is, and do him honor in the world.

Bunyan.

8858. FREE-THINKER, Simile of a. A visitor contemplating the grandeur of St. Paul's cathedral, London, says, "In the midst of my contemplations, I beheld a fly upon one of the pillars: and it straightway came into my head, that the same fly was a free-thinker; for it required some comprehension in the eyes of a spectator, to take in at one view the various parts of the building in order to observe their symmetry and design. But to the fly, whose whole prospect was confined to a little part of one of the stones of a single pillar, the joint beauty of the whole, or the distinction of its parts, were inconspicuous; and nothing could appear but small inequalities on the surface of the hewn stone, which, in the view of that insect, must have seemed so many deformed rocks and precipices."

8859. FREE-WILL, Dignity of. Rev. J. Bosworth gives the following conversation between King Alfred and Boethius. "I am sometimes very much disturbed," quoth Alfred. "At what?" I answered. "It is at this which thou sayest, that God gives to every one freedom to do evil as well as good, whichsoever he will; and thou sayest also, that God knoweth everything before it happens." "Then," quoth he, "I may very easily answer this remark. How would it look to you, if there were any very powerful King, and he had no freedmen in all his kingdom, but that all were slaves?" "Then," said I, "It would not seem to me right, nor reasonable, if servile men only should attend upon him." "Then," quoth he, "what would be more unnatural than if God, in all his kingdom, had no free creatures under his power? He, therefore, made two rational creatures free—angels and men. He gave them the great gift of freedom. Hence they could do evil as well as good, whichsoever they would. He gave this very fixed gift, and a very fixed law with that gift, to every man unto this end:—the freedom is, that man may do what he will; and the law is, that he will render to every man according to his works, either in this world or the future one—good or evil, whichsoever he doeth."

8860. FREE-WILL, Endowment of. It is a contradiction to let man be free, and force him to do right. God has performed this marvel of creating a being with free-will, independent, so to speak, of himself—a real cause in his universe. To say that he has created such a one, is to say that he has given him the power to fail. Without free-will there could be no human goodness. It is wise, therefore, and good in God to give birth to free-will. But once acknowledge free-will in man, and the origin of evil does not lie in God.

F. W. Robertson.

8861. FRETFULNESS, Argument Against. The argument used against fretfulness by the Psalmist deserves to be well fixed in our minds; and, indeed, if it were so, we should need no other argument: "Fret not thyself against the ungodly," etc., "for they shall soon be cut down like the grass," etc. (Ps. xxxvii.) Who could envy a flower, though ever so gay and beautiful in its colors, when he saw that the next stroke of the mower would sweep it away forever.

Bishop Horne.

8862. FRETFULNESS, Folly of. It is not wise to fret under our trials; the high-mettled horse that is restive in the yoke only galls his shoulder—the poor bird that dashes itself against the bars of the cage only ruffles her feathers, and aggravates the suffering of captivity.

Teachers' Treasury.

8863. FRETTING, Injurious. The rubbing of the eyes doth not fetch out the mote, but makes them more red and angry; no more doth the distraction and fretting of the mind discharge it of any ill humors, but rather makes them more abundant to vex us.

Bishop Patrick.

8864. FRETTING, Sin of. "I dare no more fret," said John Wesley, "than to curse and swear." One who knew him well said that he never saw him low-spirited or fretful in his life. He says, "To have persons at my ears murmuring and fretting at everything is like tearing the flesh from my bones. By the grace of God I am discontented at nothing. I see God sitting on the throne, and ruling all things."

8865. FRIEND, A Pretended. A wolf hung round a flock of sheep doing them no harm so long that the shepherd began to regard him as a friend rather than an enemy. Having need to leave the sheep for a day, he put the wolf in charge of the flock. The wolf saw his opportunity and began at once to devour the sheep. The shepherd on his return beholding the destruction of his flock, exclaimed, "Fool that I am! yet I deserve no less for trusting my sheep with a wolf."

8866. FRIENDS, Character of. Antisthenes used to wonder at those who were curious, in buying but an earthen dish, to see that it had no cracks or inconveniences, and yet would be careless in the choice of friends—to take them with the flaws of vice.

Feltham.

8867. FRIENDS, Choice of. We ought always to make choice of persons of such worth and honor for our friends, that, if they should ever cease to be so, they will not abuse our confidence, nor give us cause to fear them as enemies.

Addison.

8868. FRIENDS, Counsel of. A long life may be passed without finding a friend in whose understanding and virtue we can equally confide, and whose opinion we can value at once for its justness and sincerity. A weak man, however honest, is not qualified to judge. A man of the world, however penetrating, is no fit to counsel. Friends are often chosen for similitude of manners, and therefore each palliates the other's failings because they are his own. Friends are tender, and unwilling to give pain; or they are interested, and fearful to offend.

Johnson.

8869. FRIENDS, Courtesy of. Don't flatter yourself that friendship authorizes you to say disagreeable things to your intimates. On the contrary, the nearer you come into relation with a person the more necessary do tact and courtesy become. Except in cases of necessity, which are rare, leave your friend to learn unpleasant truths from his enemies; they are ready enough to tell them. Good-breeding never forgets that amour propre is universal. When you read the story of the Archbishop and Gil Blas, you may laugh if you will, at the poor old man's delusion; but don't forget that the youth was the greater fool of the two, and that his master served such a booby rightly in turning him out of doors.

Holmes.

8870. FRIENDS, Danger of. What the oracle foretold Timesias, concerning his planting a colony, that an hive of bees should be changed into a nest of wasps, may not impertinently be applied to those who seek after a hive of friends, but light before they know it upon a wasp-nest of enemies.

Plutarch.

8871. FRIENDS, House Full of. When Socrates was building a house for himself at Athens, being asked by a person who observed the smallness of the design, why a man so eminent should not have an abode more suitable to his dignity; he replied, that he should think himself sufficiently accommodated if he should see that narrow habitation filled with real friends.

8872. FRIENDS, Making. It is better to decide a difference between our enemies, than our friends; for one of our friends will most likely become our enemy; but on the other hand, one of our enemies will probably become our friend.

Bias.

8873. FRIENDS, Quarrels of. I have observed universally that the quarrels of friends, in the latter part of life, are never truly reconciled. A wound in the friendship of young persons, as in the bark of young trees, may be so grown over as to leave no scar. The case is very different in regard to old persons and timber. The reason of this may be accountable from the decline of the social passions, and the prevalence of spleen, suspicion, and rancor, towards the latter part of life.

Shenstone.

8874. FRIENDS, Securing. Scipio Junior, a most estimable Roman, kept the precept of Polybius, and endeavored never to retire from the forum till by some means he had engaged some one to be his friend or companion.

8875. FRIENDS, Test of. Namertes was on an embassy, when one told him he was a happy man in having so many friends, and asked him if he knew any certain way to try whether a man had many real friends or not. Namertes replied, "Adversity."

8876. FRIENDS, Three Sorts of. There be three sorts of friends: the first is like a torch we meet in a dark street; the second is like a candle in a lantern that we overtake; the third is like a link that offers itself to the stumbling passenger. The met torch is the sweet-lipped friend, which lends us a flash of compliment for the time, but quickly leaves us to our former darkness. The overtaken lantern is the true friend, which, though it promise but a faint light, yet it goes along with us as far as it can to our journey's end. The offered link is the mercenary friend, which, though it be ready enough to do us service, yet that service hath a servile relation to our bounty.

Quarles.

8877. FRIENDSHIP, Brevities. Friendship improves happiness, and abates misery, by the doubling of our joy, and the dividing of our grief.—Cicero.—Friendship contracted with the wicked decreases from hour to hour, like the early shadow of the morning; but friendship formed with the virtuous will increase like the shadow of evening, till the sun of life shall set.—Herder.—He that doth a base thing in zeal for his friend, burns the golden thread that ties their hearts together. Jeremy Taylor.

8878. FRIENDSHIP, Devotion of. The friendship of Epaminondas and Pelopidas is celebrated in Grecian history. At the battle of Mantinea, they locked their shields together and fought, repulsing all enemies, till Pelopidas fell upon a heap of dead, bleeding from many wounds. Epaminondas resolved to die rather than leave the body of his friend, whom he supposed to be dead. Badly wounded himself, he fought till rescue came, and both were saved. From that day their friendship became proverbial. They were made generals of the Theban army, of equal authority, and no envy or rivalry ever existed between them while they lived.

8879. FRIENDSHIP, Example of. There is a remarkable example of friendship told of such as never heard of him who is the friend of sinners. It is so remarkable indeed that it procured divine honors to Orestes and Pylades from the Scythians—a race so bloody, rude and savage, that they are said to have fed on human flesh, and made drinking-cups of their enemies' skulls. Engaged in an arduous enterprise, Orestes and Pylades, two sworn friends, landed on the shores of the Chersonesus to find themselves in the dominions and power of a king whose practice was to seize on all strangers, and sacrifice them at the shrine of Diana. The travelers were arrested. They were carried before the tyrant; and, doomed to death, were delivered over to Iphigenia, who, as priestess of Diana's temple, had to immolate the victims. Her knife is buried in their bosoms but that she learns before the blow is struck that they are Greeks—natives of her own native country. Anxious to open up a communication with the land of her birth, she offers to spare one of the two, on condition that the survivor will become her messenger, and carry a letter to her friends in Greece. But which shall live, and which shall die? That is the question. The friendship which had endured for years, in travels, and courts, and battle-fields, is now put to a strain it never bore before. And nobly it bears it! Neither will accept the office of messenger, leaving his fellow to the stroke of death. Each implores the priestess to select him for the sacrifice, and let the other go. While they contend for the pleasure and honor of dying, Iphigenia discovers in one of them her own brother! She embraces him; and, sparing both, flees with them from that cruel shore. Both are saved; and the story, borne on the wings of fame, flies abroad, fills the world with wonder, and, carried to distant regions, excited such admiration among the barbarous Scythians, that they paid divine honors to Orestes and Pylades, and, deifying these heroes, erected temples to their worship. Dr. Guthrie.

8880. FRIENDSHIP, False. False friendship, like the ivy, decays and ruins the walls it embraces; but true friendship gives new life and animation to the object it supports. Burton.

8881. FRIENDSHIP, Flawed. Friendship is a vase which, when it is flawed by heat, or violence, or accident, may as well be broken at once; it can never be trusted after. The more graceful and ornamental it was, the more clearly do we discern the hopelessness of restoring it to its former state. Coarse stones, if they are fractured, may be cemented again; precious stones—never. Landor.

8882. FRIENDSHIP, Immortal. The friendship of high and sanctified spirits loses nothing by death but its alloy; failings disappear, and the virtues of those, whose "faces we shall behold no more," appear greater and more sacred when beheld through the shades of the sepulchre. Robert Hall.

8883. FRIENDSHIP, Importance of. When a man, blind from his birth, was asked what he thought the sun to be like, he replied, "Like friendship." He could not conceive of anything more fitting as a similitude for what he had been taught to regard as the most glorious of material objects, and whose quickening and exhilarating influences he had rejoiced to feel. And truly friendship is a sun, if not the sun, of life. All feel it ought to be so. It would be common-place to dwell upon its delights and advantages. The theme of poets and moralists in all ages and countries, what can be said upon it has been said so often as to make repetition stale, so well as to make improvement impossible. How friendship is a pearl of greatest price; how it is often more deep and steadfast than natural affection, "a friend" sometimes "sticketh closer than a brother;" how it is as useful as lovely, "strength and beauty;" how it lessens grief and increases pleasure; all this is familiar as the lessons of childhood, and true as the elementary principles of our nature. Morris.

8884. FRIENDSHIP, Intercourse of. The world would be more happy, if persons gave up more time to an intercourse of friendship. But money engrosses all our deference; and we scarce enjoy a social hour, because we think it unjustly stolen from the main business of life. Shenstone.

8885. FRIENDSHIP, Lasting. Zeuxis replied to some who blamed the slowness of his pencil, that he therefore spent a long time in painting, because he designed his work should last for a long eternity. So he that would secure a lasting friendship and acquaintance must first deliberately judge and thoroughly try its worth before he settles it.

Plutarch.

8886. FRIENDSHIP, Love Kills. At the best, love is fatal to friendship. The most that friendship can do is to listen to love's talk of itself, and be the confidante of its rapturous joys, its transports of despair. The lover fancies himself all the fonder of his friend because of his passion for his mistress, but in reality he has no longer any need of the old comrade. They cannot talk sanely and frankly together any more; there is something now that they cannot share. Even if the lover desired to maintain the old affectionate relation, the mistress could not suffer it. The spectre of friendship is sometimes invited to haunt the home of the lovers after marriage: but when their happiness is flaunted in its face, when it has been shown the new house, the new china, the new carpets, the new garden, it is tacitly exorcised, and is not always called back again, except to be shown the new baby. The young spouses are willing to have the poor ghost remain; the wife learns whether it takes two or three lumps of sugar in its tea; the husband bids it smoke anywhere it likes, and the wife smiles a menacing acquiescence; but all the same they turn it out of doors. They praise it when it is gone, and they feel so much more comfortable to be alone.

D. W. Howells.

8887. FRIENDSHIP, Obligations of. Whoever employs many assistants in his affairs must in gratitude repay his service to as many when they need it; and as Briareus, who, with his hundred hands, was daily obliged for his bare subsistence to feed fifty stomachs, could thrive no better than ourselves, who supply a single one with two hands, so a man of many friends cannot boast any other privilege but that of being a slave to many, and of sharing in all the business cares and disquiet that may befall them.

Plutarch.

8888. FRIENDSHIP, Occasions of. There is such a natural principle of attraction in man towards man, that having trod the same tract of land, having breathed in the same climate, barely having been born in the same artificial district or division, becomes the occasion of contracting acquaintances and familiarities many years after: for any thing may serve the purpose. Thus, relations merely nominal are sought and invented, not by governors, but by the lowest of the people, which are found sufficient to hold mankind together in little fraternities and copartnerships; weak ties, indeed, and what may afford fund enough for ridicule, if they are absurdly considered, as the real principles of that union; but they are, in truth, merely the occasions, as anything may be, of any thing to which our nature carries us on, according to its own previous bent and bias; which occasion, therefore, would be nothing at all, were there not this prior bias or disposition of nature.

Butler

8889. FRIENDSHIP, Perscrifed. The ancients pictured friendship as a young man, very fair, bareheaded, and meanly attired. On the outside of his garment was written, "Vivere et mori" (To live and die), and on his forehead, "Æstate et Hieme" (In summer and winter). His breast was open so that his heart might be seen. With his finger he pointed to his heart, upon which was written, "Prope, Longe" (Far and near").

8890. FRIENDSHIP, Sympathy of. Friendship is one of the greatest boons God can bestow on man. It is a union of our finest feelings; an uninterested binding of hearts, and a sympathy between two souls. It is an indefinable trust we repose in one another, a constant communication between two minds, and an unremitting anxiety for each other's souls. What, then, is the root, the cause, of friendship? Sympathy. Sympathy conceives friendship; friendship, love. Love is friendship. The tree that bears love, bears also friendship. Where friendship exists between two persons, there is also, always, hope; in adversity there is always a support, a refuge, a knowledge of there still remaining some succor; and as a babe cries for its mother for nourishment, so do we in adversity run to friendship for advice, fully relying on some means by which it may release us from the troubles of the world. And in true friendship there is cultivated such a love of God, such a devotion for the Creator of the world, that the chains become adamant. Friendship having thus a righteous appreciation of the Almighty's goodness and power, and a knowledge of his injunctions to the righteous, and the reward they may expect hereafter, it spreads around, everywhere, joy and happiness, causing not only fresh unions, but, with praiseworthy Christian exertion and love, rendering them inflexible.

J. Hall.

8891. FRIENDSHIP, Visit of. To a lady who called on Dr. Watts, he said, "Madam, your ladyship is come to see me on a very remarkable day." "Why is this day so remarkable?" asked she. "This very day thirty years," replied the doctor, "I came to the house of my good friend Sir Thomas Abney, intending to spend but one single week under his friendly roof, and I have extended my visit to his family to the length of exactly thirty years." Lady Abney, who was present, immediately said to the doctor, "Sir, what you term a long thirty years' visit, I consider as the best visit my family ever received."

8892. FRIENDSHIP, Worldly. When I see leaves drop from their trees in the beginning of autumn, just such, think I, is the friendship of the world. Whilst the sap of maintenance lasts, my friends swarm in abundance; but in the winter of my need they leave me naked. He is a happy man that hath a true friend at his need; but he is more truly happy that hath no need of his friend.

Warwick.

8893. FRUGALITY, Necessity of. It appears evident that frugality is necessary even to complete the pleasure of expense; for it may be generally remarked of those who squander what they know their fortune not sufficient to allow, that in their most jovial expense there always breaks out some proof of discontent and impatience; they either scatter with a kind of wild desperation and affected lavishness, as criminals brave the gallows when they cannot escape it, or pay their money with a peevish anxiety, and endeavor at once to spend idly and to save meanly: having neither firmness to deny their passions, nor courage to gratify them, they murmur at their own enjoyments, and poison the bowl of pleasure by reflection on the cost.

Johnson.

8894. FRUGALITY, Pedigree of. Frugality may be termed the daughter of prudence, the sister of temperance, and the parent of liberty. He that is extravagant will quickly become poor, and poverty will enforce dependence, and invite corruption.

Johnson.

8895. FRUGALITY, Roman. Marcus Cato, the Elder, never wore a garment that cost him more than an hundred pence. During his Praetor and Consulship, he drank the same wine his laborers did, and if he treated himself he brought his supper from market that cost him not more than thirty halfpence. A Babylonian garment that he inherited he disposed of. He used to say, "Nothing which is superfluous can be had at a small rate, and for my part I account that dear at a half-penny, of which I have no need."

8896. FRUGALITY, Royal. Cyrus, king of Persia, accepted the invitation of one of his friends to dine with him, and was desired to name the viands and where he would have the table spread. Cyrus replied, "It is my pleasure that you prepare this banquet on the side of the river, and that one loaf of bread be the only dish."

8897. FRUITFULNESS, Biblical Types of. A vineyard.—The Church is compared to a vineyard, where both the vineyard and the vine are types of fruitfulness, Ps. 80: 15; Isa. 5: 1-7; Hosea 14: 7; John 15: 1-8. A garden, Cant. 4: 12-15; Isa. 58: 11.—"A garden enclosed"—"a little spot enclosed by grace"—the emblem of beauty—fragrance—fruitfulness. Trees of righteousness. Believers are compared to fruitful trees:—The apple (or citron) for beauty and variety, Cant. 2: 3; the vine for luxuriance and richness of fruit, Ps. 80: 8-11; Cant. 2: 15; Jer. 2: 21; Hosea 14: 7; the fig for sweetness, Cant. 2: 13; Luke 13: 6; the olive for fatness, Hosea 14: 6; Rom. 11: 24; the palm for usefulness, Ps. 92: 12. Fruits in their season.—It is interesting to mark in the Canticles, how the rich variety of the Church's fruitfulness is set forth by the trees of the garden, each ripe in its own season. Here are "tender grapes" for the spring, 2: 13; spices and pleasant fruits for summer, 4: 13, 14; and nuts for autumn, 6: 11. The fruits Christians bear are not in every case, and at all times, the same. The plant of prosperity stands in the garden, and yields the rich fruit of thankfulness, whilst adversity brings forth sweet patience—suspense gently blossoms into hope—and service gradually ripens happiness. But every kind is beautiful in its season. Bowes

8898. FRUITFULNESS, Christian. A New England chemist has learned the art of planting grape vines in his laboratory, out of sight of the passing observer, and applying chemicals to their roots, which make the vines luxuriant and the fruit prolific in its season. The root is concealed, but the vines climb out and the fruit spreads itself before men. Emblem of the Christian life. The Christian is "rooted and built up in Christ," out of sight of the world's gaze, but his fruit will reveal him.

8899. FRUITFULNESS, False and True. Among the cocoa groves of Ceylon the traveler will find old trees one hundred feet high, with perhaps a hundred cocoa nuts far up among its top branches. He will find others, four in a place, planted one in each corner of a square covered with foliage and loaded with nuts. The stranger will prefer these trees for their apparent thriftiness, fruitfulness and accessibility, being not more than one-fourth as tall as the other trees. They mark the grave of a dead man, and their fruit and foliage are all false, put on as a religious service for the dead. Their similars are the moralist or legalist and the true Christian. In one case they are a natural growth; in the other, are put on, and there is a dead man beneath them.

8900. FUNERAL, A Hypocritical. A few days ago we were at the funeral of a dissolute creature, who, after fifty years' soaking in the wine-cask, had at last oozed away. The chancel was a floral exhibition; the coffin hidden under harps and crowns; and above the whole rose a colossal anchor of camellias, the emblem of the hope that maketh not ashamed, safely fixed beyond the vail! What a mockery of Christian faith! What a contrast as the solemn services went forward, the Lesson answering, "Be not deceived," to the Epicurean proverb, "Let us eat and drink;" and the Collect praying that we may "rise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness!" Yet this is only one among many instances. Nothing is fairer than such decoration in itself. Bring white flowers for the dead child, or for the pure of heart, lying in the white garments of a holy life; but when the emblem is so changed to an elaborate, gross, painful sham, it is an affront to the truth. The Churchman.

8901. FUNERALS, Impressiveness of. Few pageants can be more stately and frigid than an English funeral in town. It is made up of show and gloomy parade—mourning carriages—mourning horses, mourning plumes, and hireling mourners, who make a mockery of grief. "There is a grave digged," says Jeremy Taylor, "and a solemn mourning, and a great talk in the neighborhood, and when the rites are finished, they shall be, and they shall be remembered no more." The associate in the gay and crowded city is soon forgotten; the hurrying succession of new inmates and new pleasures effaces him from our minds, and the very scenes and circles in which he moved are incessantly fluctuating. But funerals in the country are solemnly impressive. The stroke of death makes a wider space in the village circle, and is an awful event in the tranquil uniformity of rural life. The passing bell tolls its knell in every ear; it steals with its pervading melancholy over hill and vale, and saddens all the landscape.

W. Irving.

8902. FUNERALS, Lessons of. It would not, indeed, be reasonable to expect, did we not know the inattention and perverseness of mankind, that any one who had followed a funeral could fail to return home with new resolutions of a holy life; for who can see the final period of all human schemes and undertakings without conviction of the vanity of all that terminates in the present state? For who can see the wise, the brave, the powerful, or the beautiful, carried to the grave, without reflection on the emptiness of all those distinctions which set us here in opposition to each other? And who, when he sees the vanity of all terrestrial advantages, can forbear to wish for a more permanent and certain happiness? Such wishes, perhaps, often arise, and such resolutions are often formed; but, before the resolution can be exerted—before the wish can regulate the conduct—new prospects open before us, new impressions are received; the temptations of the world solicit, the passions of the heart are put into commotion; we plunge again into the tumult, engage again in the contest, and forget that what we gain cannot be kept, and that the life for which we are thus busy to provide must be quickly at an end.

Johnson.

8903. FUTURE, Anxiety about the. The soul of man can never divest itself wholly of anxiety about its fate hereafter: there are hours when, even to the prosperous, in the midst of their pleasures, eternity is an awful thought; but how much more when those pleasures, one after another, begin to withdraw; when life alters its forms, and becomes dark and cheerless—when its changes warn the most inconsiderate that what is so mutable will soon pass entirely away. Then with pungent earnestness comes home that question to the heart, "Into what world are we next to go?" How miserable the man who, under the distractions of calamity, hangs doubtful about an event which so nearly concerns him; who, in the midst of doubts and anxieties, approaching to that awful boundary which separates this world from the next, shudders at the dark prospect before him, wishing to exist after death, and yet afraid of that existence; catching at every feeble hope which superstition can afford him, and trembling in the same moment from reflection upon his crimes!

Blair.

8904. FUTURE, Consideration of the. Planters of trees ought to encourage themselves, by considering all future time as present; indeed, such consideration would be a useful principle to all men in their conduct of life, as it respects both this world and the next.

Bp. Watson.

8905. FUTURE, Course of the. The future does not come from before to meet us, but comes up from behind over our heads.

Rahel.

8906. FUTURE, Description of the. The future, the last evangel, which has included all others. Its cathedral the dome of immensity—hast thou seen it? Coped with the star-galaxies; paved with the green mosaic of land and ocean; and for altar, verily, the star-throne of the eternal! Its litany and psalmody, the noble arts, the heroic work and suffering, and true heart-utterance of all the valiant of the sons of men. Its choir-music, the ancient winds and oceans, and deep-toned, inarticulate, but most speaking voices of destiny and history, supernal ever as of old, between two great Silences: "Stars silent rest o'er us, graves under us silent."

Carlyle.

8907. FUTURE, Hidden. God will not suffer man to have the knowledge of things to come: for if he had prescience of his prosperity, he would be careless: and understanding of his adversity, he would be senseless.

Augustine.

8908. FUTURE, Judgment of the. Cicero was about to be offered a mission to Egypt by his political opponents, but self-respect would not allow him to accept it. He knew it would be regarded by the public as a bribe. Concerning this decision he wrote to his friend Atticus, "What will history say of me six hundred years hence? That is a judgment which I reverence much more than the small talk of such men as are now alive."

8909. FUTURE, Prospects of the. Interesting as has been the past history of our race, engrossing as must ever be the present—the future, more exciting still, mingles itself with every thought and sentiment, and casts its beams of hope, or its shadows of fear, over the stage both of active and contemplative life. In youth, we scarcely descry it in the distance. To the stripling and the man, it appears and disappears like a variable star, showing in painful succession its spots of light and of shade. In age, it looms gigantic to the eye, full of chastened hope and glorious anticipation; and at the great transition, when the outward eye is dim, the image of the future is the last picture which is effaced from the retina of the mind.

Sir David Brewster.

8910. FUTURE, Question of the. There is one question which combines with the interest of speculation and curiosity an interest incomparably greater, nearer, more affecting, more solemn. It is the simple question—"What shall we be?" How soon it is spoken! but who shall reply? Think how profoundly this question, this mystery, concerns us—and in comparison with this, what are to us all questions of all sciences? What to us all researches into the constitution and laws of material nature? What—all investigations into the history of past ages? What to us—the future career of events in the progress of states and empires? What to us—what shall become of this globe itself, or all the mundane system? What we shall be, we ourselves, is the matter of surpassing interest.

John Foster.

8911. FUTURE, Unalterableness of the. Our life is like the wax melting in the flame. Death puts his stamp on it, and then it cools, and the impress never can be changed. Or like the burning metal, running forth from the cauldron into the mould. Death cools us in that mould, and we are cast into that shape throughout eternity.

Spurgeon.
8912. FUTURITY, Compensation of. Futurity is the greatness of man, and that hereafter is the grand scene for the attainment of the fullness of his existence. When depressed and mortified by a conscious littleness of being, yet feeling emotions and intimations which seem to signify that he should not be little, he may look to futurity and exclaim—"I shall be great yonder!" When feeling how little belongs to him, how diminutive and poor his sphere of possession here, he may say, "The immense futurity is mine! I may be content to be poor awhile in the prospect of that!" If here obscure, and even despised, he may reflect, "Well, it is not here that I expect or want to verify my importance!" If forcibly admonished of the brevity of life, the thought may arise—"Well, the sooner my entrance on a life that shall have no end."

John Foster.
8913. FUTURITY, Prospects of. I must confess, I take a particular delight in these prospects of futurity, whether grounded upon the probable suggestions of a fine imagination, or the more severe conclusions of philosophy; as a man loves to hear all the discoveries or conjectures relating to a foreign country which he is at some time to inhabit. Prospects of this nature lighten the burden of any present evil, and refresh us under the worst and lowest circumstances of mortality. They extinguish in us both the fear and envy of human grandeur. Insolence shrinks its head, power disappears; pain, poverty, and death fly before them. In short, the mind that is habituated to the lively sense of an hereafter can hope for what is the most terrifying to the generality of mankind, and rejoice in what is the most afflicting.

Addison.
8914. GAIN, Dishonest. Such gain is a hoard of sorrows, a heap of miseries, a mass of corruption, a consuming rust and canker, a devouring fire, a condemning witness; and if this be not enough, a treasure of wrath.

Clarkson.
8915. GAIN, Immortal. Philip inquired of Demosthenes, whether he was afraid to lose his head. He answered, "No; for if I do lose it, the Athenians will bestow an immortal one upon me."

8916. GAMBLING, Evil Effects of. No passion can lead to such extremities, nor involve a man in such a complicated train of crimes and vices, and ruin whole families so completely, as the baneful rage for gambling. It produces and nourishes all imaginable disgraceful sensations; it is the most fertile nursery of covetousness, envy, rage, malice, dissimulation, falsehood, and foolish reliance on blind fortune; it frequently leads to fraud, quarrels, murder, forgery, meanness, and despair; and robs us in the most unpardonable manner of the greatest and most irrecoverable treasure—time.

Knigge.

8917. GAMBLING, Inhumanity of. Dr. Nott said, "The finished gambler has no heart; he would play at his brother's funeral; he would gamble upon his mother's coffin." Horace Walpole tells of a man having dropped dead at the door of White's club house, in London, into which he was carried. The members of the club immediately made bets whether he was dead or not; and, upon its being proposed to bleed him, the wagers for his death objected, that it would affect the fairness of the bet.

8918. GAMBLING, Prevalence of. In Southern Germany men have been known to stake their all upon the turn of a single card, who, one month previously, had been worth not less than half a million florins. Not less reckless have been men in Hamburg and Lombardy. In Mexico, ventures of from twenty-five to one hundred thousand doubloons have been lost at only three different sittings at the same table. In France, the game of courting the smiles of fortune has often cost the player 5,000 francs an hour—a risk of $950 per hour. In Rome, that most ancient of all cities, men have ventured and lost, during one or two nights, not less than 10,000 ten-saudi gold pieces—a sum equal to about $100,000. In Spain, from the days of Columbus to the present time, many a don is recorded to have lost within twenty-four hours 800,000 doubloons—that is, $12,000,000 of our American gold coin. In England, where the spirit of gambling is not so conspicuous as in more southern countries, £10,000 is sometimes considered low play with certain aristocrats, but then it ranges upward occasionally to the round number of £50,000. In the United States, in one city alone, it is estimated from $50,000 to $500,000 will change hands through gambling means during one day and night. But, then, even these enumerations only apply to a certain class denominated the "bon ton, or aristocracy," of the world—hence do not take into consideration the class of gamblers lower down in the scale of life—yet, making a rough estimate from instances cited, we can honestly assert that the average gambling exchange of money throughout Christendom during but twenty-four hours may exceed, though it is not less than $80,000,000, or somewhere about $123,100,000,000 worth of specie in a year of 365 days.

The Globe.

8919. GAMBLING, Results of. In our large cities there is a sort of gambling which does not look particularly repulsive; for it is not carried on in "hells," and it pleads the sanction of titled names; and yet its results are hanging like a mill-stone round the neck of many a promising young man, and numbers of its victims must be sought in the Portland hulks or Dartmoor prison.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

8920. GAMESTER, A Female. Could we look into the mind of a female gamester, we should see it full of nothing but trumps and matadores. Her slumbers are haunted with kings, queens, and knaves. The day lies heavy upon her till the play-season returns, when for half a dozen hours together all her faculties are employed in shuffling, cutting, dealing, and sorting out a pack of cards, and no ideas to be discovered in a soul which calls itself rational, excepting little square figures of painted and spotted paper.

8921. GARMENT, Import of the Wedding. The wedding garment is righteousness in its largest sense, the whole adornment of the new and spiritual man—including the faith without which it is impossible to please God, and the holiness without which no man shall see him, or, like the speechless guest, shall only see him to perish at his presence:—it is the faith which is the root of all graces, the mother of all virtues, and it is likewise those virtues and those graces themselves.

8922. GARMENT, Wedding. At the royal marriage of the Sultan Mahmoud, a few years ago, every guest was presented with a wedding garment. They were prepared by royal command, and paid for from the Sultan's exchequer. All were expected to array themselves in the garments provided. If any should neglect or refuse to do this it would be considered an insult to the Sultan. This custom was formerly general in the east.

8923. GARMENTS, Provisions of. Olearius gives an account of himself, with the ambassadors whom he accompanied, being invited to the table of the Persian king. He goes on to say, "It was told us by the mehmandar, that we, according to their usage, must hang the splendid vestments that were sent us from the king over our dresses, and so appear in his presence. The ambassadors at first refused; but the mehmandar urged it so earnestly, alleging, as also did others, that the omission would greatly displease the king, since all other envoys observed such a custom, that at last they consented, and hanged, as did we also, the splendid vests over their shoulders, and so the cavalcade proceeded."

8924. GARMENTS, Rending. The Jews mingled a great deal of ceremony with the tearing of garments, when any misfortune befell them. Sometimes they made the rent from the top downwards; sometimes from the skirt upwards. The requisite length was a hand's breadth. When made on the occasion of the death of parents, it was not sewed up again; when for the loss of other persons, it was sewed up at the end of thirty days. It is in reference to this practice that Solomon has said, there is "a time to rend, and a time to sew;" that is to say, a time to be afflicted, and a time to admit of consolation.—Constable.—They take a knife, and, holding the blade downwards, do give the upper garment a cut on the right side, and then rend it an hand's breadth. This is done for the five following relations, brother, sister, son, daughter, or wife; but for father or mother, the rent is on the left side, and in all the garments, as coat, waistcoat, etc. Levi.

8925. GATE, Entering the Strait. A missionary to the Hindus at Benares, said: "I spoke on the words, 'Enter ye in at the strait gate.' I explained to them the signification of the strait gate, and what they must do in order to get through. First, I represented, according to Hindu ideas, a worldly-minded person, who cares nothing about religion, and who hopes, nevertheless, at the end, to get to heaven. 'There,' I said, 'is one coming along, riding on an elephant; he appears in grand style; he cares nothing for God and eternity; he wants to enjoy the world; and yet he hopes to get to heaven in the end. Thus he is riding on towards the strait gate, hoping he may get through.' While speaking thus, one of my hearers called out, 'He must come down from his elephant, or he will never get through.' 'You are right,' I replied; 'yes, he must forsake his worldly mind, and descend from his height, and humble himself, or else he will never enter heaven.' Then I described another character, belonging to those of whom our Saviour said, 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon.' 'Here, my friends,' said I, 'comes a man who appears desirous to go to heaven; he has his eyes fixed on the strait gate, and is walking up to it; but on his back he carries a large bundle of various things: see how he groans under it! Will he succeed?' 'No,' said another man, 'he must leave his bundle behind, or else he will never get through.' 'You are perfectly right: if we wish to get through the strait gate into heaven the heart must be wholly given up to it: a divided heart God will not accept; he will either drive sin out of the heart of man, or sin will drive him out.' The people understood this very well, and applauded. The third class I wished to represent were the proud and self-righteous. Here I had nothing to do but to allude to a certain class of people who are constantly seen at Benares,—I mean the haughty Mohammedans. Without mentioning names, however, I continued, 'There comes another! You see he gives himself the air of a great and holy man. He says, I do no man any wrong; I repeat my prayers daily; I fast often; and give every one his due. Thus, conscious of his righteousness, he lifts up his head, and with firm step you see him walking up to the gate.' A man called out, 'He must stoop down, he must bow down, or else he will break his head,' I replied, 'Do you understand what you say?' 'Yes,' said he: 'he must leave his pride behind, and come as a poor sinner. Stooping signifies humility; and if he is not humbling himself, he will never enter through the strait gate.'"

8926. GATE, Vision of the Strait. I saw as if they were on the sunny side of some high mountain, there refreshing themselves with the pleasant beams of the sun, while I was shivering and shrinking in the cold, afflicted with frost, snow and dark clouds. Methought also betwixt me and them I saw a wall that did compass about this mountain. Now through this wall my soul did greatly desire to pass; concluding that if could, I would even go into the very midst of them, and there also comfort myself with the heat of their sun. About this wall I thought myself to go again and again, still prying as I went, to see if I could find some gap or passage to enter therein. But none could I find for some time. After much turning and moving about, at the last I saw, as it were, a narrow gap like a doorway in the wall through which I attempted to pass. Now, the passage being very strait and narrow, I made many offers to get in, but all in vain, even until I was well-nigh beat out by striving to get in. At last, with great striving, methought I at first did get in my head, and after that, by a sideling motion, my shoulders and my whole body. Then I was exceeding glad, went and sat down in the midst of them, and so was comforted with the light and heat of their sun. Now, this mountain and wall were thus made out to me. The mountain signified the Church of the living God; the sun that shone thereon, the comfortable shining of his merciful face on them that were therein; the wall, I thought was the world, that did make separation between the Christians and the world; and the gap that was in the wall, I thought, was Jesus Christ, who is the way to God the Father. But forasmuch as the passage was wonderful narrow, even so narrow that I could not but with great difficulty enter in thereat, it showed me that none could enter into life but those that were in downright earnest, and unless they left that wicked world behind them; for here was only room for body and soul, and not for body and soul and sin.

8927. GAYETY, Motives to. All assemblies of gayety are brought together by motives of the same kind. The theatre is not filled with those that know or regard the skill of the actor, nor the ball-room by those who dance, or attend to the dancers. To all places of general resort, where the standard of pleasure is erected, we run with equal eagerness, or appearance of eagerness, for very different reasons. One goes that he may say he has been there; another, because he never misses. This man goes to try what he can find, and that to discover what others find. Whatever diversion is costly will be frequented by those who desire to be thought rich; and whatever has, by any accident, become fashionable, easily continues its reputation, because every one is ashamed of not partaking it.

8928. GENEROSITY, Arabian. Three men were disputing in the court of Caaba, who was the most liberal person among the Arabs. One gave the preference to Abdallah, the son of Jaafan, the uncle of Mohammed; another to Kais Ebn Saad Obadah; and the third to Arabah, of the tribe of Aros. After much debate, one that was present, to end the dispute, proposed that each of them should go to his friend, and ask his assistance; that they might see what every one gave, and form a judgment accordingly. This was agreed to; and Abdallah's friend going to him, found him with his foot in the stirrup, just mounting his camel for a journey, and thus accosted him; "Son of the uncle of the apostle of God, I am traveling, and in necessity." Upon which Abdallah alighted and bid him take the camel with all that was upon her; but desired him not to part with a sword, which happened to be fixed in the saddle, because it belonged to Ali, the son of Abutaleb. So he took the camel, and found on her some vests of silk, and 4,000 pieces of gold; but the thing of greatest value was the sword. The second went to Kais Ebn Saad, whose servant told him that his master was asleep, and desired to know his business. The friend answered that he came to ask Kais's assistance, being in want on the road. Whereupon the servant said that he had rather supply his necessity than wake his master; and gave him a purse of 7000 pieces of gold, assuring him that it was all the money then in the house. He also directed him to go to those who had the charge of the camels, with a certain token, and take a camel, and a slave, and return home with them. When Kais awoke, and his servant informed him what he had done, he gave him his freedom, and asked him why he did not call him, "for," said he, "I would have given him more." The third man went to Arabah, and met him coming out of his house, in order to go to prayers, and leaning on two slaves, because his eyesight failed him. The friend no sooner made known his case than Arabah let go the slaves, and, clapping his hands together, loudly lamented his misfortune in having no money, but desired him to take the two slaves, which the man refused to do, till Arabah protested that, if he would not accept them, he gave them their liberty, and, leaving the slaves, groped his way along by the wall. On the return of the adventurers, judgment was unanimously, and with great justness, given by all who were present, that Arabah was the most generous of the three.

8929. GENEROSITY, Emblem of. Alexander Von Humboldt says of the cow-tree: "On the barren flank of a rock grows a tree with coriaceous and dry leaves. Its large woody roots can scarcely penetrate into the stone. For several months of the year not a single shower moistens its foliage. Its branches appear dead and dried; but when the trunk is pierced there flows from it a sweet and nourishing milk. It is at the rising of the sun that this vegetable fountain is most abundant. The negroes and natives are then seen hastening from all quarters, furnished with large bowls to receive the milk, which grows yellow, and thickens at its surface. Some empty their bowls under the tree itself, others carry the juice home to their children."

8931. GENEROSITY, Miracle of. Peter Damiani tells of a man confined in a monastery, whose eyes had been treacherously put out. Here he devoted himself to offices of charity, as far as his feeble body would permit. The man who had so cruelly put out his eyes, was brought in one day with a languishing malady. His conscience made him fear the man whom he had treated so, dreading that in revenge he might also put out his. But the blind man plead that he might be his nurse, and there devoted himself to him, giving him all the consideration and affection as was due a brother. Though blind, it was said he was all eyes, all arms, all hands, all heart to attend on him who had been so great an enemy.

8932. GENEROSITY Rewarded. During the siege of the Protestant city of Rochelle, some charitable individuals, who had previously formed secret magazines, relieved their starving brethren without blazoning their good deed. The relic of a merchant, named Prosné, who was left in charge of four orphan children, had liberally distributed her stores, while anything remained, among her less fortunate neighbors; and whenever she was reproached with profusion and want of foresight, she was in the habit of replying, "The Lord will provide for us." At length, when her stock of food was utterly exhausted, and she was spurned with taunts from the door of a relative, she returned home destitute, broken-hearted, and prepared to die, together with her children. But there was still a barrel and a cuse in reserve for the widow, who, humbly confident in the bounty of heaven, had shared her last morsel with her fellow-sufferers. Her little ones met her at the threshold with cries of joy. During her short absence, a stranger, visiting the house, had deposited in it a sack of flour; and the single bushel which it contained was so husbanded as to preserve their lives till the close of the siege.

8933. GENIUS, Alchemy of. The alchemy of genius can convert the commonest paths of life, the most commonplace and vulgar regions of society, into a perfect kingdom of romance.

Dufferin.

8934. GENIUS, Fruitfulness of. Almost all poets of a first-rate excellence, dramatic poets above all, have been nearly as remarkable for the quantity as the quality of their compositions, nor has the first injuriously affected the second. Witness the seventy dramas of Æschylus, the more than ninety of Euripides, the hundred and thirteen of Sophocles. And if we consider the few years during which Shakspeare wrote, his fruitfulness is not less extraordinary. The vein has been a large and a copious one, and has flowed freely forth, keeping itself free and clear by the very act of its constant ebullition. And the fact is very explicable; it is not so much they that have spoken, as their nation that has spoken by them.

Trench.

8935. GENIUS, Industry and. We would say of legal education, as we would say of all other education—that perseverance and a habit of attention are of more value than that sort of natural talent which consists in quickness of apprehension. A celebrated ambassador of the last age, when told what a clever boy his son was, exclaimed, "I would rather you had told me how industrious he was." Sir Henry Wotton, the famous provost of Eton College, we are told by Aubrey, could not abide wits. When any young scholar was commended to him as a wit, he would say, "Out upon him! I will have nothing to do with him; give me the plodding student; if I would look for wits I would go to Newgate for them; there be the wits." Something similar was the opinion of Hogarth: "I know of no such thing as genius," said he to Mr. Gilbert Cooper; "genius is nothing but labor and diligence." The well-known Judge Doddrige declares that he found by experience that "among a number of quick wits in youth, few are found in the end very fortunate for themselves, or very profitable to the commonwealth."

Law and Lawyers.

8936. GENIUS, Influence of. It is the prerogative of genius to confer a measure of itself upon inferior intelligences. In reading the works of Milton, Bacon, and Newton, thoughts greater than the growth of our own minds are transplanted into them; and feelings more profound, sublime, or comprehensive, are insinuated amidst our ordinary train; while, in the eloquence with which they are clothed, we learn a new language, worthy of the new ideas created in us. By habitual communion with superior spirits, we are not only enabled to think their thoughts, speak their dialect, feel their emotions, but our own thoughts are refined, our scanty language is enriched, our common feelings are elevated; and though we may never attain their standard, yet by keeping company with them, we shall rise above our own; as trees growing in the society of a forest are said to draw each other up into shapely and stately proportion, while field and hedge-row stragglers, exposed to all weathers, never reach their full stature, luxuriance, or beauty.

James Montgomery.

8937. GENIUS, Labor and. The greatest genius of his time, Alexander Hamilton, once said, "Men give me credit for genius. All the genius I have lies just in this: when I have a subject in hand, I study it profoundly. Day and night it is before me. I explore it in all its bearings. My mind becomes pervaded with it. Then the effect which I make, the people are pleased to call the fruit of genius. It is the fruit of labor and thought." Dr. Bethune said, respecting his own oratorical reputation, "People say it is genius. But I tell you it is hard sweat! That is the secret."

8938. GENIUS, Rarity of. The proportion of genius to the vulgar, is like one to a million; but genius without tyranny, without pretension, that judges the weak with equity, the superior with humanity, and equals with justice, is like one to ten millions.

Lavater.

8939. GENIUS to be Respected. Genius, strictly speaking, is only entitled to respect when it promotes the peace and improves the happiness of mankind. What should we think of the gardener who planted his flower-bed with henbane and deadly night-shade? What should we think of the general who, being intrusted with an army and a plentiful supply of military stores, applied these powers to degrading and enslaving his own country? He would be visited with scorn, and punished as a traitor. And why should the man who directs the artillery of his genius, delegated to him for high and holy purposes, to shaking those foundations on which the happiness of his species rests, and who applies the divine spark within him to the kindling of low and debasing passions, be allowed to hear his plaudits swelled in proportion as his powers of doing mischief become apparent. Talent is always accompanied with the responsibility of using it rightly; and the neglect or pity of the virtuous is the penalty which the child of genius pays, or ought to pay, for its abuse. However splendid talents may compel our admiration, they have no right to claim the general esteem of mankind when their possessor exercises them without regard of what is due to the well-being of society and himself.

Lit. Gazette.

8940. GENIUS, Unknown. A man's genius is always, in the beginning of life, as much unknown to himself as to others; and it is only after frequent trials, attended with success, that he dares think himself equal to those undertakings in which those who have succeeded have fixed the admiration of mankind. Hume.

8941. GENIUS, Wife of a. Oftentimes as I have lain swinging on the water, in the swell of the Chelsea ferryboats, in that long, sharp-pointed black cradle in which I love to let the great mother rock me, I have seen a tall ship glide by against the tide, as if drawn by some invisible tow-line, with a hundred strong arms pulling it. Her sails hung unfilled, her streamers were drooping, she had neither side-wheel nor stern-wheel; still she moved on, stately, in serene triumph, as if with her own life. But I knew that on the other side of the ship, hidden beneath the great bulk that swam so majestically, there was a little toiling steam tug, with heart of fire and arms of iron, that was hugging it close, and dragging it bravely on; and I knew that if the little steam tug untwined her arms and left the tall ship, it would wallow and roll about and drift hither and thither, and go off with the reluctant tide, no man knows whither. And so I have known more than one genius, high-decked, full-freighted, wide-sailed, gay-pennoned, that, but for the bare toiling arms, and brave, warm, beating heart of the faithful little wife that nestled close in his shadow, and clung to him, so that no wind nor wave could part them, and dragged him on against all the tide of circumstance, would soon have gone down the stream and been heard of no more. Holmes.

bles, as the transfer of the Jewish vineyard, Mark 12: 9. (b) Peter's vision, Acts 10: 10-16, 28. (c) "The middle wall of partition" broken down, Eph. 2: 14, referring probably to the partition wall in the Jewish temple, on which notices were put up forbidding Gentiles to enter; which parting-wall is done away in Christ. THE ABRAHAMIC COVENANT was designed to include all true believers, from the very first, especially as enlarged to Jacob, Gen. 35: 11; Rom. 4: 11, 12, 16, 17. THE TABERNACLE AND TEMPLE—It is well worthy of note how the materials of the tabernacle and temple were obtained from Gentile sources—the gold and silver and fine linen from Egypt; the cedars of Lebanon from Hiram; the brass from Syria, etc. THE LORD JESUS—The Lord's favor towards the Gentiles, and his tender dealings with them, were marked in many ways—(1) Some of Christ's most expressive titles exhibit this—"The light of the world" ("not of the Jews only"), Luke 2: 32; John 8: 12; cf. Isa. 42: 6, 7; so also the title of "the corner-stone," Eph. 2: 20; "the desire (or desideratum) of all nations," Haggaï 2: 7. (2) Some of Christ's miracles—Matt. 8: 5-13 (the centurion's servant); Matt. 15: 21-28 (the Syrophenician's daughter); Mark 5: 1-20 (the Gadarene—most probably a Gentile). (3) Some of Christ's parables. (4) His commendation of the faith of a Gentile, Matt. 8: 10; and of the good Samaritan, Luke 10: 30-37. Christ was honored at his birth by Gentiles from the East, Matt. 2: 1-11; and, near his death, by Gentiles from the West, John 12: 20-21. The first acknowledgment of the righteousness of Christ at his death was made, not by a priest nor by a Jew, but by a Gentile and a soldier, Mark 15: 39. THE GOSPELS of St. Mark and St. Luke were written especially for Gentile Christians. FOUR PRECIOUS WORDS, properly Jewish, have gained a common usage alike by Jew and Gentile—Abba—Hosanna—Hallelujah—Amen.

8943. GENTILES, Manifestation of Christ to the A festival called the Epiphany, which signifies "an appearance of light, a manifestation," is kept on the 6th of January, to celebrate the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, and especially to the magi. His Majesty offers annually by proxy at the Chapel Royal, St. James', gold, frankincense and myrrh. In the eastern nations, when they did homage to their kings, they made them a present. Thus the subjection of the kings of Sheba to Christ is spoken of (Psalm 72: 10). What the wise men presented, were intended by Providence as a seasonable relief to Joseph and Mary in their poor condition. "These," says Mr. Henry, "were the products of their own country." What God favors us with, we must honor him with.

8944. GENTLEMAN, Qualities of a. What is it to be a gentleman? It is to be honest, to be gentle, to be generous, to be brave, to be wise, and, possessing all these qualities, to exercise them in the most graceful outward manner. Ought a gentleman to be a loyal son, a true husband, an honest father? Ought his life to be decent, his bills to be paid, his tastes to be high and elegant, his aims in life lofty and noble?

Thackeray.
8945. GENTLEMAN, The True. The true gentleman is one whose nature has been fashioned after the highest models. It is a grand old name, that of gentleman, and has been recognized as a rank and power in all stages of society. To possess this character is a dignity of itself, commanding the instinctive homage of every generous mind, and those who will not bow to titular rank, will yet do homage to the gentleman. His qualities depend not upon fashion or manners, but upon moral worth—not on personal possessions, but on personal qualities. The Psalmist briefly describes him as one "that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."

Smiles.
8946. GENTLEMAN, True Basis of the. Religion is the most gentlemanly thing of the world. It alone will gentelize, if unmixed with cant.

Coleridge.
8947. GENTLEMEN, Rarity of. Perhaps a gentleman is a rarer man than some of us think for. Which of us can point out many such in his circle—men whose aims are generous, whose truth is constant, and not only constant in its kind, but elevated in its degree; whose want of meanness makes them simple, who can look the world honestly in the face, with an equal manly sympathy for the great and small? We all know a hundred whose coats are very well made, and a score who have excellent manners, and one or two happy beings who are what they call in the inner circles, and have shot into the very centre and bull's-eye of fashion; but of gentlemen, how many? Let us take a little scrap of paper, and each make out his list.

Thackeray.
8948. GENTLENESS, Advised. "I cannot forbear pointing out to you, my dearest child," said Lord Collingwood to his daughter, "the great advantage that will result from a temperate conduct and sweetness of manner to all people on all occasions. Never forget that you are a gentlewoman, and all your words and actions should make you gentle. I never heard your mother—your dear, good mother—say a harsh or hasty thing to any person in my life. Endeavor to imitate her. I am quick and hasty in my temper; but, my darling, it is a misfortune which, not having been sufficiently restrained in my youth, has caused me inexpressible pain. It has given me more trouble to subdue this impetuosity than anything I ever undertook."

8949. GENTLENESS, Definition of. Gentleness, which belongs to virtue, is to be carefully distinguished from the mean spirit of cowards, and the fawning assent of sycophants. It removes no just right from fear; it gives up no important truth from flattery; it is, indeed, not only consistent with a firm mind, but it necessarily requires a manly spirit and a fixed principle, in order to give it any real value. Blair.

8950. GEOLOGY, Facts of. So long as phenomena are simply recorded, and only the natural and obvious causes drawn from them there can be no fear that the results of the study may prove hostile to religion. How much wiser was the counsel of Gamaliel, and how applicable to those who impugned these pursuits—"Refrain from these men and let them alone; for if the work be of men it will fall to nothing; but if of God ye are not able to destroy it." If the representations they have given of nature are the fictions of men, they cannot stand against the progress of science; if they truly picture the works of God, they must be easily reconcilable with his revealed manifestations. Cardinal Wiseman.

8951. GETTING ON, The Goddess of. Speaking of the real, active, continual, national worship, that by which men act while they live; not that which they talk of when they die. Now, we have indeed a nominal religion, to which we pay tithes of property and sevenths of time; but we have also a practical and earnest religion, to which we devote nine-tenths of our property and six-sevenths of our time; and we dispute a great deal about the nominal religion; but we are all unanimous about this practical one, of which I think you will admit that the ruling goddess may be best generally described as the "Goddess of Getting-on," or, "Britannia of the Market." The Athenians had an "Athena Agoraia," or Minerva of the market; but she was a subordinate type of their goddess, while our Britannia Agoraia is the principal type of ours. And all your great architectural works are, of course, built to her. It is long since you built a great cathedral; and how you would laugh at me, if I proposed building a cathedral on the top of one of those hills of yours, taking it for an Acropolis! But your railroad mounds—prolonged masses of Acropolis; your railroad stations—vaster than the Parthenon and innumerable; your chimneys—how much more mighty and costly than cathedral spires! your harbor piers; your warehouses; your exchanges!—all these are built to your great goddess of "Getting-on;" and she has formed, and will continue to form your architecture, as long as you worship her; and it is quite vain to ask me to tell you how to build to her; you know far better than I.

Ruskin.

8952. GHOSTS, Belief in. Our forefathers looked upon nature with more reverence and horror, before the world was enlightened by learning and philosophy; and loved to astonish themselves with the apprehensions of witchcraft, prodigies, charms and enchantments. There was not a village in England that had not a ghost in it; the church-yards were all haunted; every large common had a circle of fairies belonging to it; and there was not a shepherd to be met with who had not seen a spirit.

Addison.

8953. GIFT, Graceful. Arcesilaus visited Apelles in his sickness, and finding him extremely poor, repeated his visit with twenty drachms in his pocket. Sitting by his bedside, he said, "You have got nothing here but Em pedocles's elements, fire, water, earth, and the surrounding air; neither, methinks, do you lie easily." And stirring up his pillow, he put the money privately under his head. When the good old woman, his nurse, found it, and, in great wonder, acquainted Apelles with it, "Aye," said he, smiling, "this is a piece of Arcesilaus's thievery."

8954. GIFT of Tongues. The gift of tongues, and other supernatural faculties, were signs and seals of the spiritual power which had now visited the church, audible and visible attestations to the world of the divine energy which was now working in men's souls; these outward manifestations were intended to draw attention to the inward gift, to arouse carnal natures to the sense of what eye could not see and ear could not hear; but they were only as the thunder and lightning of the new spiritual world, occasional and impressive incidents and powers and processes, whose constant silent operation is the very life of men; were only, to quote Foster's expressive words, as "the ringing of the great bell of the universe," intimating that "the sermon to follow must be extraordinary."

Morris.

8955. GIFTS, All Have. Every one hath some excellency or other in him, can we but find and improve it. God hath dispensed his gifts diversely, for the common benefit. And as, in the same pasture, the ox can find fodder, the hound a hare, the stork a lizard, the fair maid flowers: so there is none so worthless, but something may be made of him; some good extracted out of the unlikeliest. Yea, wisdom is such an elixir, as by contact (if there be any disposition of goodness in the same metal) it will render it of the property.

Trapp.

8956. GIFTS, Angry. One day a native brought a hog to Hautia, the treasurer of the South Sea Islands Missionary Association, and throwing down the animal at his feet, said, in an angry tone, "Here's a pig for your Society." "Take it back again," replied Hautia, calmly; "God does not accept angry pigs." He then explained to the man the objects of missionary institutions, and the necessity of those who supported them doing so from right motives, especially enforcing the Scripture words, "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." The man, exceedingly chagrined, was obliged to take his hog home again.

8957. GIFTS, Best. The best thing to give to your enemy is forgiveness; to an opponent, tolerance; to a friend, your heart; to your child, a good example; to a father, deference; to your mother, conduct that will make her proud of you; to yourself, respect; to all men, charity.

Mrs. Balfour.

8958. GIFTS, Biblical. Luke 10: 17-20—The abundance of gifts, however great, can never be compared with the blessedness of saving grace. 1 Cor. 12: 4-11. (1) All our gifts are bestowed by God. (2) Our gifts are various—the blessed Spirit "dividing to every man severally as he will." (3) All are given for "profit," and not for pride. 1 Cor. 12: 31; 13—The greatest gifts are nothing in comparison with love. Eph. 4: 7. (1) Every one has some gifts; therefore all should be useful. (2) No one has all gifts; therefore none should be proud. (3) Every one has his gifts, according to the gift of Christ; therefore all should be content. (4) Every one's gift is for the general good; therefore we should seek the union of the Church. (5) All gifts are out of Christ's fullness (ver. 8); therefore all should seek close union and fellowship with him.

Bowes.

8959. GIFTS, Diversity of. In the Christian church the gifts and graces of men differ widely: some are adapted to adorn one station of life, and some another; these to flourish best in the humble valley of life, and others to bear the rough blasts of the mountain. The soil of poverty is best suited to unfold the qualities of some, and others flourish well amidst the strong sunshine of prosperity and the fertile soil in which their lot has been planted. All, however, are alike nourished by the same general means of grace, though the Spirit "divideth to every man severally as he will;" but prayer, the breath of heaven, is the atmosphere in which all must live. All must be baptized and watered by the same Spirit, and be fed with a due portion of the wholesome food of God's word. Thus nurtured and strengthened, every member of the church, in his proper season and place, like the flowers of the garden, adorns the situation which he fills, becomes a bright and beautiful example of godliness in his particular sphere of duty, and abundantly proclaims the wisdom and goodness of him who transplanted him from the wilderness of this world, to a place where he may adorn and magnify the riches of divine grace.

Salter.

8960. GIFTS, Estimate of. Artexerxes, King of Persia, received a gift from a country laborer of two handfuls of water from the river. He prized it highly, because the poor man had nothing else to give, and gave it with evident affection.

8961. GIFTS, Grace Preferable to. The meanest grace is above the highest intellectual parts, as the smile of a sunbeam is more powerful to chase away the grim darkness of the night than the sparkling of a diamond. S. T. Treasury.

8962. GIFTS without Hearts. It is said of the Lacedæmonians, who were a poor and homely people, that they offered lean sacrifices to their gods; and that the Athenians, who were a wise and wealthy people, offered fat and costly sacrifices; and yet in their wars the former had always mastery over the latter. Whereupon they went to the oracle to know the reason why those should speed worst who gave most. The oracle returned this answer to them: "The Lacedæmonians are a people who give their hearts to their gods, but the Athenians only give their gifts to their gods." Thus, hearts without gifts are better than gifts without hearts.

W. Secker.

8963. GIFTS, Unacceptable. On the occasion of a missionary collection taken in native products, in Tahiti, a person brought a quantity of cocoa-nut oil to Pomare in a bad spirit, exclaiming, "Here are five bamboos of oil; take them for your society." "No," said the King, "I will not mix your angry bamboos with the missionary oil; take them away."

8964. GIVING, Beauty of. The moon is a great giver, and she owes all her beauty to this habit of giving. Suppose the moon should swallow up, and keep to itself all the rays of light which the sun gives it, and should refuse to give them to us, what would the effect be? It would stop shining. And the moment it stopped shining it would lose all its beauty. All the beauty of the brilliancy of the diamond is owing to its reflecting, or giving away, the light which it receives from the sun. And this is the way with the moon. If it should stop shining, or giving away the light it gets from the sun, it would hang up in the sky a great black, ugly-looking ball. All its brightness and beauty would be gone.

Dr. Newton.

8965. GIVING our Best to God. An illustration may be taken from some of the old sacred buildings. You will find them "finished with the most circumstantial elegance and minuteness in those concealed portions which are excluded from public view, and which can only be inspected by laborious climbing or groping," a fact explained by saying, "that the whole carving and execution was considered as an act of solemn worship and adoration, in which the artist offered up his best faculties to the praise of the Creator." These men of the "dark ages," as we love in the pride of our compassion to call them, had in this a true and grand idea: what would they say of our venerated and gilded modern life, in which everything is for show and nothing from reality, everything for a purpose and nothing from a principle? As these men builded, so David sacrificed. They builded not for man, and hence the secret and distant parts of the work were just as accurately conceived and finely finished as those exposed to the public gaze; their object was not to do something as cheaply and easily as possible, but something as well as possible; they wished to raise structures worthy of the Lord; they had a zeal for his glory and the glory of his worship which spurned meanness and imperfection, however hidden; and the same spirit in David rendered needful to him what was needless in itself, and made it "more blessed to give" an offering of his own, than one received from Araunah. (2 Sam. 24: 24.) Morris.

8966. GIVING, Cheerful. As the Giver of all things, so each receiver loveth a cheerful giver. For a bargain is valued by the worth of the thing bought, but a gift by the party giving, which made the widow's mite of more worth than the riches of superfluity. I see then he gives not best that gives most, but he gives most that gives best. If then I cannot give bountifully, yet I will give freely, and what I want in my hand supply by my heart. He gives well that gives willingly.

Warwick.

8967. GIVING to God. Behold, "I am a great King," saith God (Mal. 1: 8, 14). He stands upon his seniority, and looks to be honored with the best of our substance. Mary that loved much, thought nothing too much for her Saviour. She brought an alabaster box of ointment of great price, and poured it upon him, and he defends her in it against those that held it waste (John 12: 7). Among the Papists, their Lady of Loretto hath her churches so stuffed with vowed presents of the best, as they are fain to hang their cloisters and churchyards with them. Shall not their superstition rise up and condemn our irreligion, our slumbering service, and dough-baked duties? The Turks build their private houses low and homely, but their mosques or temples stately and magnificent.

Trapp.

8968. GIVING, Means of. "A few days ago," says Dr. Schwartz, the editor of the Scattered Nation, and founder of a Christian Jewish home, "I received a letter, and on the inside of the envelope, which contained six penny stamps and nothing else, these words were written: 'Fasted a meal to give a meal.'"

8969. GIVING, Necessity for. Said a good man to me when I asked him, "How do you manage to give so much?" "The Lord is all the time shoveling it on me, and I would be overwhelmed if I did not give." God shovels wealth upon us, and if we do not shovel it back, we will be buried beneath it as by an avalanche of ruin.

Dr. Dashiell.

8970. GIVING, the Only Saving. A gentleman of wealth in the city of New York once gave $25,000 for the erection of a church, where the congregation were too poor to build themselves. It became a church noted for the piety and evangelical character of its pastor and people. In a few years its liberal patron lost all his earthly fortune, and being approached by a friend, who has eyes only for this world, who said to him, "Now if you had the money you gave to — church, it would set you up in business." "Sir," said he, "that is the only money I have saved; if it had not been there it would have gone with the other; as it is, I have it yielding me an interest which will only cease to accumulate when the knell of time is sounded, and during the ages of eternity will be poured into my bosom, in the blessed consolation that hundreds have bowed at the altar erected with that money, and acknowledged their Saviour."

8971. GIVING, Parsimonious. We give God the worst of all things, that hath given us the best. We cull out the bad sheep for his tithe, the sleepest hours for his prayers, the clippings of our wealth for his poor, a corner of the heart for his ark, when Dagon sits uppermost in his temple. We give God measure for measure, but after an ill sort. For his blessings heapeen, and shaken, and thrust together, iniquities pressed down and yet running over. He hath bowels of brass and a heart of iron, that cannot mourn at this our requital. Adams.

8972. GIVING, Receiving and. There is nothing made for itself—nothing whose powers and influences are entirely circumscribed to self. Whatever a creature receives it gives out, with the modification and increase of its own force. The clouds borrow water of the ocean but they pour it forth again in refreshing showers upon the thirsty hills, which in their turn send them amongst the valleys. Planets borrow light of their centres, and forthwith fling their rays abroad upon the dark regions of space through which they roll. The tree borrows from every part of the world in order to build up itself; but it gives out, in return, beauty, fragrance, and fruit. Thus, all things give what they appropriate. The material is but the emblem of the spiritual; and thus all nature typifies man's distributive function. Truly, he who appropriates and gives not is an anomaly in the universe. A miser is a monster that no heart can love. Dr. Thomas.

8973. GIVING, Rule for. Before a collection in Surrey Chapel, a gentleman on the platform said, "I hope every one will give a little." Upon this Rowland Hill arose and exclaimed in a loud voice, "I hope every one will give a deal."

8974. GIVING, the Tenth. Jay Cooke, of Philadelphia, early in his life read "Gold and the Gospel," and resolved to take Jacob's pledge, "Of all that thou shalt give me, I will surely give the tenth unto thee." He directed his clerk to open an account with O. P. J. (Old Patriarch Jacob), and to credit to it one-tenth of all the commissions that came into the office. Some of the largest financial transactions of the country were trusted to the firm of which he was a member, and its success was one of the wonders of the land. O. P. J. account amounted to a sum that would take the figures of five places to express. When asked how he could afford to give such large contributions, he said, "It don't cost me anything; it's the Lord's money I give."

8975. GLORY, Dawn of. Some years ago, in the city of Brooklyn, it was my great privilege to pay frequent pastoral visits to a saint on the eve of her translation. Her room was always an open gate of heaven. One day I received a message from her that she was in trouble, and wished to see me. Wondering what final art the arch enemy might be using against her, I hastened to her bedside. She said, "I cannot pray any more. As soon as I begin, my prayers are all turned into hallelujahs. I would have esteemed it a privilege if God would have permitted me to spend my remaining days in supplications for my friends; but as soon as I open my mouth, it is all glory, glory, glory!" I congratulated her on being drafted into the employment of the celestial choir before the time. She lived for two weeks in a gust of praise, and so she died. It seemed as though the "light which no man can approach unto" had streamed out over the walls of jasper, and come down to earth to linger about that humble cot. "Let me die the death of the righteous." Dr. Foss.

8976. GLORY, Death in Spite of. Constantine showed all the glories of Rome to a Persian king. The Persian said, "These are wonderful things, but yet I see that men die at Rome as well as in Persia."

8977. GLORY, Degrees of. Though the angels and saints have different degrees of glory, yet every one is perfectly happy and pleased. As the strings of an instrument differ in the size and sound; some are sharp and high, some grave and deep, others a mean, so that if every string had judgment and election, it would choose to be what it is: so from the different degrees of glory in heaven, the most amiable and equal order appears that satisfies every one. Dr. Bates.

8978. GLORY, Divine. God's glory is seen when he works by means; it is more seen when he works without means; it is seen, above all, when he works contrary to means. It was a great work to open the eyes of the blind; it was a greater still to do it by applying clay and spittle. He sent a horror of great darkness on Abraham, when he was preparing to give him the best light. He touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh, and lamed him, when he was going to bless him. He smote Paul with blindness, when he was intending to open the eyes of his mind. He refused the request of the woman of Canaan for a while, but afterwards she obtained her desire. See, therefore, that all the paths of the Lord are mercy, and that all things work together for good to them that love him. Daniel Rowlands.

8979. GLORY, End of. Cyrus the Great, after all his conquests and renown, ordered the following inscription to be engraved upon his tomb: "O man! whatsoever thou art, and whencesoever thou comest, I know that thou wilt come to the same condition in which I now am. I am Cyrus, who brought empire to the Persians. Do not envy me, I beseech thee, this little piece of ground which covereth my body."

8980. GLORY, Fickleness of. Heliogabalus sometimes had his courtiers tied fast to a great wheel, and then had it revolved swiftly, partly in the water. Sometimes they were in the air and sometimes deeply plunged in the water. Ambitious men are daily acting the same play. One of the Kings of France, seeing his likeness on a piece of money, and representing him upon the uppermost part of fortune's wheel, said to his Chancellor, "You would do well to pin it fast there, lest the wheel should turn again."

8981. GLORY, Foretaste and Consummation of. If there be so much delight in believing, oh, how much more is there in beholding! What is the wooing day to the wedding day? What is the sealing of the conveyance, to the enjoyment of the inheritance? or the foretaste of glory to the fullness of glory? The good things of that life are so great, as not to be measured; so many, as not to be enumerated; and so precious as not to be estimated. If the picture of holiness be so comely in its rough drafts, how lovely a piece will it be in all its perfections! Every grace which is here seen in its minority, shall be seen there in its maturity. Secker.

- 8982. GLORY, Heavenly. All that awaits us is glorious. There is "a rest," a Sabbath-keeping in store for us, Heb. 4: 6; and this "rest shall be glorious." Isa. 11: 10. The king nom that we claim is a glorious kingdom, the crown which we are to wear is a glorious crown. The city of our habitation is a glorious city. The garments which shall clothe us are garments "for glory and beauty." Our bodies shall be glorious bodies, fashioned after the likeness of Christ's "glorious body." Phil. 3, 21. Our society shall be that of the glorified. Our songs shall be songs of glory. And of the region which we are to inhabit it is said, the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. Rev. 21: 23. "That they may behold my glory," the Lord pleaded for his own. This is the sum of all. Other glories there will be, as we shall see; but this is the sum of all. It is the very utmost that even "the Lord of glory" could ask for them. H. Bonar.

8983. GLORY, Greed of. Darius sought to rescue his family from Alexander, and save a part of his kingdom, by offering him his daughter for his wife, and the largest part of his empire for her dower, and ten thousand talents. Alexander answered that he would not receive what he could command. Darius renewed his previous offer, only adding more gold. Alexander replied, "As the world would not endure two suns, neither could the earth endure two sovereign Emperors, without permutation of the state of all things. Yield today, or prepare for war to-morrow."

8984. GLORY, Passion for. One of the strongest incitements to excel in such arts and accomplishments as are in the highest esteem among men, is the natural passion which the mind of man has for glory; which though it may be faulty in the excess of it, ought by no means to be discouraged. Perhaps some moralists are too severe in beating down this principle, which seems to be a spring implanted by nature to give motion to all the latent powers of the soul, and is always observed to exert itself with the greatest force in the most generous dispositions. The men whose characters shone brightest among the ancient Romans were strongly animated by this passion. Hughes.

8985. GLORY, Preservation of. As those workmen on whom was incumbent the charge of keeping in repair the Delian ship, by supplying and putting into the place of the decayed planks and timber others that were new and sound, seem to have preserved it from ancient times, as if it were eternal and incorruptible; so the preserving and upholding of one's glory is as the keeping in of a fire, a work of no difficulty, requiring only to be supplied with a little fuel; but when either of them is wholly extinct and suppressed, one cannot without labor rekindle it again. Lampis, the sea commander, being asked how he got his wealth, answered, "My greatest estate I gained easily enough, but the smaller slowly and with much labor." Plutarch.

8986. GLORY, Road to. The road to glory would cease to be arduous, if it were trite and trodden; and great minds must be ready not only to take opportunities, but to make them. Alexander dragged the Pythian priestess to the temple on a forbidden day. She exclaimed "My son, thou art invincible!" which was oracle enough for him. On a second occasion he cut the Gordian knot, which others had in vain attempted to untie. Those who start for human glory, like the mettled hounds of Actæon, must pursue the game not only where there is a path, but where there is none. They must be able to simulate and dissimulate, to leap and to creep; to conquer the earth like Cæsar, or to fall down and kiss it like Brutus; to throw their sword like Brennus into the trembling scale; or, like Nelson, to snatch the laurels from the doubtful hand of victory, while she is hesitating where to bestow them. That policy that can strike only while the iron is hot, will be overcome by that perseverance which, like Cromwell's, can make the iron hot by striking; and he that can only rule the storm must yield to him who can both raise and rule it. Colton.

8987. GLORY, Universal Desire for. Pliny finding fire everywhere, in every house, in the pebbles under his feet, in fiery meteors, and subterranean passages, and considering what a destructive element it is, marveled that the whole world was not consumed. Wanley applies this simile to a universal desire for earthly glory, and expresses his wonder that it has done no more harm than it has. Tacitus says that it is the last garment a man strips himself of.

8988. GLORY, Vision of. Thomas Aquinas, the Angelical doctor, the most famous preacher and extensive writer of his time, was engaged upon his Summa Theologiæ. He left off to celebrate the sacrament, when he was overwhelmed with glory and filled with a marvelous rapture. After this he could not be induced to sit down to his writing desk, nor would he dictate anything. His attendant, Rainald, urged him to finish the "Summa," then nearly completed. He replied "I cannot, for everything that I have written seems to me worthless compared with what I have seen, and what has been revealed to me." This occurred not long before his death. In its effulgence he finished his course, March 7th, 1274.

8989. GOD, Access to. During the war, President Lincoln was so besieged with applicants on various errands that he could not give audience to all, and men of influence could not see him when they wished. Many went away from the White House disappointed, unable to see the President. But there was a loved son of the President, little "Tad," who came and went when he pleased. Such is the privilege of the sons of God.

8990. GOD, Activity of. He works every moment in every part of this vast whole; moves every atom, expands every leaf, finishes every blade of grass, erects every tree, conducts every particle of vapor, every drop of rain, and every flake of snow; guides every ray of light, breathes in every wind, thunders in every storm, wings the lightning, pours the streams and rivers, empties the volcano, heaves the ocean, and shakes the globe. In the universe of minds, he formed, he preserves, he animates, and he directs, all the mysterious and wonderful powers of knowledge, virtue, and moral action, which fill up the infinite extent of his immense and eternal empire.

Dr. Dwight.

8991. GOD, All for. The Rev. John Leggoe, writing from Lakemba, on the Fiji Islands, gives an account of a missionary meeting held there in March, 1871. Each tribe came singing, led by their chiefs to the chapel, and passed up to the table, whereon they laid their gifts. "An old chief was leading his tribe to the chapel; and as soon as he reached the door, he was deeply moved and greatly excited, and with the tears streaming from his eyes, he cried out, 'What shall I give unto the Lord? Oh! that I had something to give him in return for all he has given me. Oh! that I were rich, that I had gold or land to give. I have only this mite (holding up a sovereign). No! this is not all. I will give myself—my body, my soul, my all.' Who can doubt, that the Lord accepted the offering?"

8992. GOD, All-Seeing. When spiders stretched their webs across the eyelids of Jupiter, notwithstanding all the efforts that Greek sculpture had put forth to make the image awful, the human worshiper would hide, without scruple, in his heart, the thoughts which he did not wish his deity to know. It was even an express tenet of the heathen superstitions that the authority of the gods was partial and local. One who was dreadful on the hills might be safely despised in the valleys. In this feature, as in all others, the popish idolatry, imitative rather than inventive, follows the rut in which the ancient current ran. A god or a saint that should really cast the glance of a pure eye into the conscience of the worshiper would not long be held in repute. The grass would grow again round that idol's shrine. A seeing god would not do: the idolater wants a blind god. The first cause of idolatry is a desire in an impure heart to escape from the look of the living God, and none but a dead image would serve the turn.

Arnol.

8993. GOD Always with us. Old Rome had (as every city amongst the heathen had) certain gods which they called their tutelary gods, gods that were affected to the preservation of that place; but they durst never call upon those gods by their proper names, for fear of losing them; lest if their names should be known by their enemies, their enemies should win away their gods from them, by bestowing more cost, or more devotion towards them than they themselves used. So also it is said of them, that when they had brought to Rome a foreign god, which they had taken in a conquered place, Victory, they cut the wings of their new god Victory, lest he should fly from them again. This was a misery, that they were not sure of their gods when they had them. We are; if he once come to us, he never goes from us, out of any variableness in himself, but in us only; that promise reaches to the whole church, and to every particular soul, "Thy teacher shall not be removed into a corner any more, but thine eye shall see thy teachers," which in the original (as is applicable to our present purpose, noted by Rabbi Moses) is, Non erunt doctores tui alati, "Thy teachers shall have no wings, they shall never fly from thee; and so the great translation reads it, non avolabunt." As their great god Victory could not fly from Rome, so after this victory which God hath given his church in the Reformation, none of her teachers should fly to, or towards Rome. Every way that God comes to us, he comes with a purpose to stay, and would imprint in us an assurance that he doth so, and that impression is this compassing of thy soul "with songs of deliverance," in the signification of which word, we shall in one word conclude all.

Dr. Donne.

8994. GOD, Angry with. Montaigne tells of a neighboring king, who having received a blow from the hand of God, swore he would be revenged. In order to do so, he made a proclamation, that for ten years to come no one should pray to God, or so much as mention him throughout his dominions.

8995. GOD, Argument for. He who can imagine the universe fortuitous or self-created is not a subject for argument, provided he has the power of thinking, or even the faculty of seeing. He who sees no design cannot claim the character of a philosopher; for philosophy traces means and ends. He who traces no causes must not assume to be a metaphysician; and if he does trace them, he must arrive at a first cause. And he who perceives no final causes is equally deficient in metaphysics and in natural philosophy; since, without this, he cannot generalize—can discover no plan where there is no purpose. But if he who can see a creation without seeing a creator has made small advances in knowledge, so he who can philosophize on it, and not feel the eternal presence of its Great Author, is little to be envied, even as a mere philosopher; since he deprives the universe of all its grandeur, and himself of the pleasures springing from those exalted views which soar beyond the details of tangible forms and common events. And if with that presence around him he can be evil, he is an object of compassion; for he will be rejected by him whom he opposes or rejects.

Dr. Macculloch.

8996. GOD Armed. The Spartans always represented their gods in statues or images as fully armed. Charillus was asked the reason of this, and answered, "That those reproaches we cast upon men for their cowardice may not reflect upon the gods, and that our youths may not supplicate the deities unarmed."

8997. GOD, Assistance of. God and one man constitute a majority.—Anon.—God is multitudinous above all the nations of the earth.—Beecher.—"A penny and Theresa are nothing, but a penny and God are everything," was St. Theresa's motto on founding a grand monastery.

8998. GOD, Benevolence of. The benevolence of our Great Creator is chanted even by things unpleasant to the ear. "The nuptial song of reptiles," says Kirby, "is not, like that of birds, the delight of every heart; but it is rather calculated to disturb and horrify than to still the soul. The hiss of serpents, the croakings of frogs and toads, the moanings of turtles, the bellowing of crocodiles and alligators, form their gamut of discords." Here, also, we may read beneficent design. Birds are the companions of man in the lawn and forest, in his solitary walks, amidst his rural labors, and around the home of his domestic enjoyments. They are, therefore, framed beautiful to the eye, and pleasing to the ear; but of the reptile tribes, some are his formidable enemies, and none were ever intended to be his associates. They shun cultivation, and inhabit unfrequented marshes or gloomy wilds. Their harsh notes and ungainly or disgusting forms, serve, therefore, to warn him of danger, or to turn his steps to places more fit for his habitation.

H. Duncan.

8999. GOD, Blessing or Curse of. A little, with the blessing of God upon it, is better than a great deal, with the encumbrance of his curse; his blessing can multiply a mite into a talent, but his curse will shrink a talent into a mite; by him the arms of the wicked are broken, and by him the righteous are upheld: so that the great question is, whether he be with or against us, and the great misfortune is, that this question is seldom asked. The favor of God is to them that obtain it a better and enduring substance, which, like the widow's barrel of oil, wasted not in the evil days of famine, nor will fail.

Bp. Horne.

9000. GOD, Care of. God is a perpetual refuge and security to his people. His providence is not confined to one generation; it is not one age only that tastes of his bounty and compassion. His eye never yet slept, nor hath he suffered the little ship of his church to be swallowed up, though it hath been tossed upon the waves; he hath always been a haven to preserve us, a house to secure us; he hath always had compassion to pity us, and power to protect us; he hath had a face to shine, when the world hath had an angry countenance to frown. He brought Enoch home by an extraordinary translation from a brutish world; and when he was resolved to reckon with men for their brutish lives, he lodged Noah, the phoenix of the world, in an ark, and kept him alive as a spark in the midst of many waters, whereby to rekindle a church in the world; in all generations he is a dwelling-place to secure his people here or entertain them above.

Charnock.

9001. GOD the Christian's Banker. We will suppose that some opulent person makes the tour of Europe. If his money fall short, he comforts himself with reflecting that he has a sufficient stock in the bank, which he can draw out at any time by writing to his cashiers. This is just the case, spiritually, with God's elect. They are travelers in a foreign land, remote from home. Their treasure is in heaven, and God himself is their banker: when their graces seem to be almost spent and exhausted, when the barrel of meal and cruse of oil appear to be failing, they need but draw upon God by prayer and faith, and humble waiting. The Holy Spirit will honor their bill at sight; and issue to them, from time to time, sufficient remittances to carry them to their journey's end.

Salter.

9002. GOD, Conception of. How mean and paltry are any words of ours to convey any idea of him who made this mighty world out of nothing, and with whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day! How weak and inadequate are our poor, feeble intellects to conceive of him who is perfect in all his works—perfect in the greatest as well as in the smallest; perfect in appointing the days and hours in which Jupiter, with all its satellites, shall travel round the sun; perfect in forming the smallest insect that creeps over a few feet of our little globe! How little can our busy helplessness comprehend a Being who is ever ordering all things in heaven and earth by universal Providence—ordering the rise and fall of nations and dynasties, like Nineveh and Carthage; ordering the exact length to which men like Alexander, and Tamerlane, and Napoleon shall extend their conquests, ordering the least step in the life of the humblest believer among his people, all at the same time, all unceasingly, all perfectly, all for his own glory! The blind man is no judge of the paintings of Rubens or Titian. The deaf man is insensible to the beauty of Handel's music. The Greenlander can have but a faint notion of the climate of the tropics. The Australian savage can form but a remote conception of a locomotive engine, however well you may describe it. There is no place in their minds to take in these things. They have no set of thoughts which can comprehend them. They have no mental fingers which can grasp them. And just in the same way the best and brightest ideas that man can form of God, compared to the reality which we shall see one day, are weak and faint indeed.

Ryle.

9003. GOD, Conscience and. The accusations of conscience evidence the omniscience and the holiness of God; the terrors of conscience, the justice of God; the approbations of conscience, the goodness of God. All the order in the world owes itself, next to the providence of God, to conscience; without it the world would be a Golgotha. As the creatures witness there was a first cause that produced them, so this principle in man evidenceth itself to be set by the same hand for the good of that which it had so framed. There could be no conscience if there was no God, and man could not be a rational creature if there were no conscience.

Charnock.

9004. GOD, Creation Glorifies. Every created thing glorifies God in its place, by fulfilling his will, and the great purpose of his providence: but man alone can give tongue to every creature, and pronounce for all a general doxology.

Kirby.

9005. GOD, Denial of. I question whether there ever was, or can be in the world, an interrupted and internal denial of the being of God, or that men (unless we can suppose conscience utterly dead) can arrive to such a degree of impiety; for before they can stifle such sentiments in them (whatsoever they may assert) they must be utter strangers to the common conceptions of reason, and despoil themselves of their own humanity. He that dares to deny a God with his lips, yet sets up something or other as a God in his heart. Is it not lamentable that this sacred truth, consented to by all nations, which is the band of civil societies, the source of all order in the world, should be denied with a bare face, and disputed against, in companies, and the glory of a wise Creator ascribed to an unintelligent nature, to blind chance? Are not such worse than heathens?

Charnock.

9006. GOD, Derivation of. The very name God is a wonderful treasure-house, full of most precious love-thoughts, when we understand its meaning and history. When the old Anglo-Saxons were converted to Christianity, they sought for some word in their own language which would express the character of the divine Being as revealed to them in the Bible. They thought of his kindness, his mercy, his forgiveness, his patience, his love, and asked, "What name will best express these attributes?" And so they called him Good; and that is the origin of the name we use to-day. It is simply good shortened into God. What a wondrous treasure-mine it is!

Anon.

9007. GOD, Difference between Man and. A missionary in India was catechising the children of one of the schools. A Brahmin interrupted him, saying that the spirit of man and the spirit of God were one. The missionary called on the boys to refute it, by stating the difference between the spirit of man and God. They gave the following answers: "The spirit of man is created—God is its creator; the spirit of man is full of sin—God is a pure spirit; the spirit of man is subject to grief—God is infinitely blessed, and incapable of suffering. These two spirits can never be one."

9008. GOD, Disregard to. Is God a being less to be regarded than man, and more worthy of contempt than a creature? It would be strange if a benefactor should live in the same town, in the same house, with us, and we never exchange a word with him; yet this is our case, who have the works of God in our eyes, the goodness of God in our being, the mercy of God in our daily food, yet think so little of him, converse so little with him, serve everything before him, and prefer everything above him. Whence have we our mercies but from his hand? Who, beside him, maintains our breath at this moment? Would he call for our spirits this moment, they must depart from us to attend to his command. There is not a moment wherein our unworthy carriage is not aggravated, because there is not a moment wherein he is not our guardian and gives us not tastes of a fresh bounty.

Charnock.

9009. GOD, Enjoying. The devil told Bonaventura that he was a reprobate and should, therefore, seek to enjoy the pleasures of this world. The saint answered, "No, not so, Satan; if I must not enjoy God after this life, let me enjoy him as much as I can in it."

9010. GOD, Eternity of. When creation began, we know not. There were angels and there was a place of angelic habitation, before the creation of man, and of the world destined for his residence; and even among these pure, spiritual essences, there had been a rebellion and fall. How long these spirits had existed, and how many other orders of things besides, it is vain to conjecture; for conjecture could lead to nothing surer than itself. But of one thing we are certain; that how far back soever we suppose the commencement of creation carried, led it be not only beyond the actual range (if a definite range it may be said to have,) of the human imagination, but even beyond the greatest amount of ages and figures, in any way combined, could be made to express; still there was an eternity preceding, an eternity from which this unimaginable and incomputable duration has not made the minutest deduction; for it is the property of eternity, that it can be neither lengthened by additions, nor shortened by subtraction of the longest possible periods of time. Before the commencement of creation, therefore, before the fiat of Omnipotence, which gave being to the first dependent existence and dated the beginning of time, in infinite and incomprehensible solitude, yet in the boundless self-sufficiency of his blessed nature, feeling no want and no dreariness, Jehovah had, from eternity, existed alone. There is something awfully sublime in this conception of Deity. Our minds are overwhelmed when we attempt to think of infinite space, even as it is replenished with its millions of suns and systems of inhabited worlds; but still more are they baffled and put to a stand when we try to form a conception of immensity before sun or star existed, before any creature had a being, of immensity filled with nothing but the pure, etherial essence of the great uncreated Spirit. When we think of the millions of worlds, with all their interminable varieties of spiritual and material, animate and inanimate, brute and intelligent, tribes of beings, there is unavoidably in our minds the conception of deity, as having, in the superintendence of all his works of power, wisdom, and goodness, both incessant occupation and exhaustless sources of enjoyment.

Dr. Wardlaw.

9011. GOD, Eternity of, Defined. A mute was asked to give his idea of the eternity of God, and replied, "It is duration without beginning or end; existence without bound or dimension; present without past or future. His eternity is youth without infancy or old age; life without birth or death; to-day without yesterday or to-morrow."

9012. GOD, Evidence of a. "In the corner of a little garden," said Dr. Beattie of Aberdeen, "without informing any one of the circumstance, I wrote in the mould with my finger the three initial letters of my son's name, and sowed garden-cress in the furrows, covered up the seed, and smoothed the ground. Ten days after this he came running up to me, and with astonishment in his countenance told me his name was growing in the garden. I laughed at the report, and seemed to disregard it, but he insisted on my going to see what had happened. 'Yes,' said I carelessly, 'I see it is so, but what is there in this worth notice? Is it not mere chance?' 'It cannot be so,' he said; 'somebody must have contrived matters so as to produce it.' 'Look at yourself,' I replied, 'and consider your hands and fingers, your legs and feet; came you hither by chance?' 'No,' he answered, 'something must have made me.' 'And who is that something?' I asked. He said, 'I don't know.' I told him the name of that Great Being who had made him and all the world. This lesson affected him greatly, and he never forgot either it or the circumstance that introduced it."

9013. GOD, Existence of. The existence of God is the foundation of all religion. The whole building totters if the foundation be out of course: if we have not deliberate and right notions of it, we shall perform no worship, no service, yield no affection to him. If there be not a God, it is impossible there can be one; eternity is essential to the notion of a God; so all religion would be vain and unreasonable, to pay homage to that which is not in being, nor ever can be. Charnock.

9014. GOD, Eye of. When we perceive that a vast number of objects enter in at our eye by a very small passage, and yet are so little jumbled in that crowd, that they open themselves regularly, though there is no great space for that either; and that they give us a distinct apprehension of many objects that lie before us, some even at a vast distance from us, both of their nature, color, and size; and by a secret geometry, from the angles that they make in our eye, we judge of the distance of all objects, both from us and from one another; if to this we add the vast number of figures that we receive and retain long and with great order in our brains, which we easily fetch up either in our thoughts or in our discourses, we shall find it less difficult to apprehend how an infinite mind should have the universal view of all things ever present before it. Bp. Burnet.

9015. GOD, Faithfulness of. We ask Nature to say—whether her God, who is our God, is true to his word? whether he ever says, and fails to do? By the voices of the sun, the stars, the hills, the valleys, the streams, the cataracts, the rolling thunders, and the roaring sea, she returns a majestic answer. Spring comes with infant Nature waking in her arms; Summer comes bedecked with a robe of flowers; Autumn comes with her swarthy brow, crowned with vines, and on her back the sheaves of corn; Old Winter comes with his shivering limbs, and frozen locks, and hoary head; and these four witnesses—each laying one hand on the broad table of Nature, and lifting the other to heaven—swear by him that liveth for ever and ever, that all which God hath said, God shall do. Dr. Guthrie.

9016. GOD our Father. A peasant in Switzerland was at work in his garden very early in the spring. A lady passing, said, "I fear the plants which have come forward rapidly will yet be destroyed by frost." "God has been our Father a great while," the confiding peasant replied.

9017. GOD, Favor of. It was the saying of a wise Roman, "I had rather have the esteem of the Emperor Augustus than his gifts:" for he was an understanding prince, and his favor very honorable. When Cyrus gave one of his friends a kiss, and another a wedge of gold, he that had the gold envied him that had the kiss as a greater expression of his favor. So the true Christian prefers the privilege of acceptance with God to the possession of any earthly comfort, for in the light of his countenance is life, and his favor is as the cloud of the latter rain. Buck.

9018. GOD, General Worship of. Kircher lays it down as a certain principle, that there never was any people so rude which did not acknowledge and worship one supreme Deity. Stillingfleet.

9019. GOD, Geometrizing. A magazine writer tells of a gentleman who had the misfortune to be an unbeliever. One day he was walking in the woods reading the writings of Plato. He came to where the great writer uses the phrase "geometrizing." He thought to himself, "If I could see a plan and order in God's works, I could be a believer." Just then he saw a little "Texas star" at his feet. He picked it up, and thoughtlessly began to count its petals. He found there were five. He counted the stamens, and there were five of them. He counted the divisions at the base of the flower; there were five of them. He then set about multiplying these three fives to see how many chances there were of a flower being brought into existence without the aid of mind, and having in it these three fives. The chances against it were one hundred and twenty-five to one. He thought that was very strange. He examined another flower, and found it the same. He multiplied one hundred and twenty-five by itself to see how many chances there were against there being two flowers, each having these exact relations of numbers. He found the chances against it were fifteen thousand six hundred and twenty-five to one. But all around him were multitudes of these little flowers; they had been growing and blooming there for years. He thought this showed the order of intelligence, and that the mind that ordained it was God. And so he shut up his book, and picked up the little flower, and kissed it, and exclaimed, "Bloom on, little flower; sing on, little birds; you have a God, and I have a God; that God that made these little flowers made me."

9020. GOD, Glorifying. The battle of Pavia, in Italy, was fought between the French and the Imperialists, when the former were defeated, and their king, Francis I., taken prisoner. The unfortunate monarch wrote to his mother the melancholy news of his captivity, couched in these dignified and expressive terms,

"Tout est perdu, Madam; hormis l'honneur." All is lost but our honor. Let us sanctify this idea by applying it to the Christian. He is ever to remember that whatever loss he sustains, it is incumbent on him to keep up the dignity of his character. Even trifling things, as they are called by some, he must watch against; what may be winked at in others will not be suffered to pass in him. Buck.

9021. GOD, Government without. The being of a God is the guard of the world; the sense of a God is the foundation of civil order; without this there is no tie upon the consciences of men. What force would there be in oaths for the decision of controversies, what right could there be in appeals made to one that had no being? A city of atheists would be a heap of confusion; there could be no ground of any commerce, when all the sacred bonds of it in the consciences of men were snapt asunder, which are torn to pieces and utterly destroyed by denying the existence of God. What magistrate could be secure in his standing? What private person could be secure in his right? Can that, then, be a truth that is destructive of all public good? Charnock.

9022. GOD, Gratitude Due to. Manlius successfully defended the Capitol of Rome against assault and thereby won the gratitude of the citizens. Afterward he was condemned to death for some misdemeanor. The people remembered the favor which he had done them in saving their Capitol, and would not allow him to be slain anywhere in sight of it. They found a place in a grove by the river side, where no spire of the Capitol reminded them of their ingratitude, and there they executed him. Men who can find no place where God's mercy reaches not, do not scruple to crucify his Son afresh.

9023. GOD, Greatness of. And you, ye storms howl out his greatness? Let your thunders roll like drums in the march of God's armies! Let your lightnings write his name in fire on the midnight darkness; let the illimitable void of space become one mouth for song; and let the unnavigated ether, through its shoreless depths, bear through the infinite remote, the name of him whose goodness endureth forever! Spurgeon.

9024. GOD, Heathen Ideas of. A converted Greenlander, said, "It is true, we were ignorant heathens, and knew nothing of God or a Saviour; and, indeed, who should tell us of him till you came? but thou must not imagine that no Greenlander thinks about these things. I myself have often thought a boat, with all its tackle and implements, does not grow into existence of itself, but must be made by the labor and ingenuity of man; and one that does not understand it would directly spoil it. Now the meanest bird has far more skill displayed in its structure than the best boat; and no man can make a bird. But there is still a far greater art shown in the formation of a man than of any other creature. Who was it that made him? I bethought me that he proceeded from his parents, and they from their parents; but some must have been the first parents; whence did they come? Common report informs me they grew out of the earth; but if so, why does it not still happen that men grow out of the earth? And from whence did this same earth itself, the sea, the sun, the moon, the stars, arise into existence? Certainly there must be some being who made all these things; a being that always was, and can never cease to be. He must be inexpressibly more mighty, knowing, and wise, than the wisest man. He must be very good, too; because everything that he has made is good, useful, and necessary for us."

9025. GOD, Heathen Notions of. Sir John Franklin, in his account of his second visit to the Polar seas, gives the following as the ideas of the elderly Esquimaux concerning God: "We believe that there is a Great Spirit, who created everything, both us and the world for our use. We suppose that he dwells in the land from whence the white people come, that he is kind to the inhabitants of those lands, and that there are people who never die; the winds that blow from that quarter (the south) are always warm. He does not know of the wicked state of our country, nor the pitiful condition in which we are.' To the question, 'Whom do your medicine-men address when they conjure?' they answered, 'We do not think they speak to the master of life; for if they did, we should fare better than we do, and should not die. He does not inhabit our lands'."

9026. GOD, Humility before. A friend made some remarks upon Rev. Chas. Simeon's habit of giving expression to his religious feeling in sighs and groans, "as if it indicated that all was not right in his experience." He drew up a paper in which occurred the following passage: "With this sweet hope of ultimate acceptance with God, I have always enjoyed much cheerfulness before man; but I have at the same time labored incessantly to cultivate the deepest humility before God. I have never thought that the circumstances of God's having forgiven me, was any reason why I should forgive myself; on the contrary I have always judged it better to loathe myself the more, in proportion as I was assured that God was pacified towards me. There are but two objects that I have desired for these forty years to behold; the one is, my own vileness; and the other is, the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ; and I have always thought that they should be viewed together, just as Aaron confessed all the sins of all Israel whilst he put them on the head of the scapegoat. The disease did not keep him from applying to the remedy, nor did the remedy keep him from feeling the disease."

F. F. Trench.

9027. GOD, Ideas of. In 1853 Sir David Brewster was in Paris, and was taken to see the astronomer Arago, who was then in deep suffering, and was soon to die. He thus describes the interview: "We conversed upon the marvels of creation, and the name of God was inroduced. This led Arago to complain of the difficulties which his reason experienced in understanding God. 'But,' said I, 'it is still more difficult not to comprehend God.' He did not deny it. 'Only,' added he, 'in this case I abstain, for it is impossible for me to understand the God of you philosophers.' 'It is not with them we are dealing,' replied I, 'although I believe that true philosophy necessarily conducts us to belief in God: it is of the God of the Christian that I wish to speak.' 'Ah!' he exclaimed, 'he was the God of my mother, before whom she always experienced so much comfort in kneeling.' 'Doubtless,' I answered. He said no more; his heart had spoken; this he had understood."

9028. GOD, Immutability of. What encouragement could there be to lift up our eyes to one that were of one mind this day and of another mind to-morrow? Who would put up a petition to an earthly prince that were so mutable as to grant a petition one day and deny it another, and change his own act? But if a prince promise this or that thing upon such or such a condition, and you know his promise to be as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, would any man reason thus: Because it is unchangeable we will not seek to him, we will not perform the condition upon which the fruit of the proclamation is to be enjoyed. Who would not count such an inference ridiculous? What blessings hath not God promised upon the condition of seeking him? Charnock.

9030. GOD, Indwelling of. You go past the dwelling of your neighbor. The door is closed that is wont hospitably to be opened. The windows are all shut. The curtains are down. There is no sound of pleasure in the yard. There is no coming or going of industrious feet. And you say, "The master is gone." Did you see him go? You did not. Have you searched the house? You have not. But there were certain tokens when he was present by which you judged he was there. To-morrow you go past the same dwelling again, and the door stands open, the windows are no longer closed, the curtains are rolled up, there are merry sounds ringing in the house and in the yard, and there is smoke rising from the chimney. Now there is quite a different state of things; and you say, "Ah! the father has got home?" Because there are so many things that indicate it. These effects are evidences to you that he is present. Now, the same thing is true of the chamber, the dwelling of a man's soul. When God is present, certain things bear witness, and the witnessing of these things is evidence of God present with us, and it is to be taken as a manifestation of that presence. Beecher.

9031. GOD, Inexhaustible. I have read of a Spanish ambassador that, coming to see the treasury of St. Mark, in Venice, that is so much cried up in the world, he fell a groping at the bottom of the chests and trunks to see whether they had any bottom, and being asked the reason why he did so, answered, "My master's treasure differs from yours, and excels yours, in that his hath no bottom as yours have," alluding to the mines in Mexico, Peru, and other parts of the Western India. All men's mints, bags, purses, and coffers may be quickly exhausted and drawn dry; but God is such an inexhaustible portion that he can never be drawn dry. All God's treasures are bottomless, and all his mints are bottomless, and all his bags are bottomless. Millions of thousands in heaven and earth feed every day upon him, and yet he feels it not; he is still giving away, and yet his purse is never empty; he is still filling all the court of heaven, and all the creatures on the earth, and yet he is a fountain that still overflows. Brooks.

9032. GOD, Invisible. A poor dumb boy, in whom I was interested, and whom I had been seeking to impress with the fact of the being of a God, told me that he had been looking everywhere for God, but could not find him; "there was God—no." I seized a pair of bellows, and blew a puff at his hand, which was red with cold on a winter's day. He showed signs of displeasure; told me it made his hands cold, while I, looking at the pipe of the bellows, told him I could see nothing; "there was wind—no!" He opened his eyes very wide, stared at me, and panted; a deep crimson suffused his whole face, and a soul, a real soul, shone in his strangely altered countenance, while he triumphantly repeated—"God like wind! God like wind!" C. Elizabeth.

9033. GOD, The Knowledge of. What must be the knowledge of him, from whom all created minds have derived both their power of knowing, and the innumerable objects of their knowledge! What must be the wisdom of him, from whom all beings derive their wisdom; from whom the emmet, the bee, and the stork, receive the skill to provide, without an error, their food, habitation, and safety; and the prophet and the seraph imbibe their exalted views of the innumerable, vast, and sublime wonders of creation, and of creating glory and greatness!

Dr. Dwight.

9034. GOD, Letter to. Recently a letter came to the New York Post-office directed simply to "God." When opened it was found to be from a little girl, and ran thus: "Dear God, we are very poor. My brother needs a new coat very much. Won't you please to send him one, and then I shall worry no more about it." The letter was put into the hands of certain good ladies, who sent to the town in Massachusetts whence the letter came, and found the case genuine. The little girl's prayer was answered in due time.

9035. GOD is Light. Suppose the case of a cripple who had spent his life in a room where the sun was never seen. He has heard of its existence, he believes in it, and indeed, has seen enough of its light to give him high ideas of its glory. Wishing to see the sun, he is taken out at night into the streets of an illuminated city. At first he is delighted, dazzled; but after he has had time to reflect, he finds darkness spread amid the lights, and he asks, "Is this the sun?" He is taken out under the starry sky, and he is enraptured; but, on reflection, finds that night covers the earth, and again asks, "Is this the sun?" He is carried out some bright day at noontide, and no sooner does his eye open on the sky than all question is at an end. There is but one sun. His eye is content: it has seen its highest object, and feels there is nothing brighter. So with the soul: it enjoys all lights, yet amid those of art and nature, is still enquiring for something greater. But when it is led by the reconciling Christ into the presence of the Father, and he lifts up upon it the light of his countenance, all thought of anything greater disappears. As there is but one sun, so there is but one God. The soul which once discerns and knows him, feels that greater or brighter there is none, and that the only possibility of ever beholding more glory is by drawing nearer.

Dr. W. Arthur.

9036. GOD, Likeness to. An old fable says, that a hungry harpy, a gigantic bird having a human face, seized a man, killed and devoured him, and afterward went to the water to drink. Therein she saw her own face reflected, and that it was like the man whom she had killed. Overcome with grief, she fell down and died. God made man in his own image. A discovery of this likeness should lead us to repentance and love.

9037. GOD, Living without. The high and the low, the young and the old, the busy and the idle, alike shun acquaintance with God, as if his very name brought uneasiness, and disturbed our comfort and repose. If we mention God to the young, we too often seem to be troubling them with what they had rather forget in such early days; while the aged dislike to be reminded of their misfortune, that their time on earth is drawing near to an end. If we mention God to the gay and happy, we appear to be interfering with their pleasures. If we mention him to the great and to the learned, they will intimate that such subjects belong rather to a humbler class and station. But the poor and laborious, on their part, refer us to those who have more information and more leisure. Thus, a large portion of mankind, in all classes, strive to keep God out of their thoughts, and to live, so far as in them lies, without him in the world. Yes, without him, who, as the Apostle says, "is not far from any one of us; for in him we live, and move, and have our being." Why should they act so strangely and unreasonably, if they believed that acquaintance with God would give them peace.

Bishop Sumner.

9038. GOD, Love for. A little boy had a canary bird which he loved very much. His mother was taken ill, and the singing of the bird gave her great annoyance. The boy was told by the mother that his little bird gave her pain by its singing. He went at once and gave the bird away to his cousin, and then came home and told his mother that the canary would not disturb her any more, for he had given it to his cousin. "But did you not love it very much?" said the mother to him; "how could you part with it?" "It is true, I loved the bird, mother," he replied, "but I love you much more. I could not really love anything that gave you pain." We must love God as this boy loved his mother, more than we love anything else, and also everything that grieves him we must give up, however much we may like it. "You love me," said a mother to her little child, as she leaned over her in bed, "don't you?" "Yes," said the half-asleep child, "but I love God much more."

9039. GOD is Love. It is God's true name. Why not indeed change the name of our Deity? Why not teach children to say, when asked—Who made you?—Love, the Father. Who redeems you?—Love, the Son. Who sanctifies you?—Love, the Holy Ghost. Why is this dear name not sown in our gardens in living green, hung on the walls of nurseries and on the portals of churches? Surely on some day of balm did this golden word pass across the mind of the Apostle, when, perhaps, pondering on the character of Jesus, and feeling his own heart burning within him, he spread out the spark in his bosom, till it became a flame, encompassing the universe, and the great generalization leaped from his lips—"God is Love." Complete as an epic, and immortal as complete, stands this poem-sentence, insulated in its own mild glory, and the cross of Jesus is below.

G. Gilfillan.

9040. GOD, Love of. It breaks our hearts to behold our children struggling in the pangs of death; but the Lord beheld his Son struggling under agonies that never any felt before him. He saw him falling to the ground, groveling in the dust, sweating blood, and amidst those agonies, turning himself to his Father, and, with a heart-rending cry, beseeching him, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass." Luke 22: 42. That love must needs want a name, which made the Father of mercies deliver this only Son to such miseries for us.

John Flavel.

9041. GOD, Manifestations of. There is a beautiful story in ancient poetry. A great warrior, the hero of Troy, clad in fierce armor, stretches out his arms to embrace his child before he goes to the field of battle. The child is afraid of the dazzling helmet and nodding crest, and stern, warlike aspect of his father, and shrinks back in terror and alarm. But there is a loving, tender heart beating within that panoply of steel. The father unbinds his glittering helmet, lays aside his fierce armor, and comes to his child with outstretched arms and tender words of love. And the child shrinks from him no longer, but runs to his arms, pillows its head upon his bosom, and receives his parting embrace and kiss. So men are afraid of God when he appears in his majesty and terribleness. They think of his omnipotence, his glory, the awfulness of his throne, the terrors of his justice, and shrink back from him. But as this father laid aside his fierce armor and came to his child in all the tenderness of paternal affection, so God veils his glory and splendor and awfulness, and reveals himself to his children in the sweetest aspect of love. Anon.

9042. GOD, Manifested in Christ. A traveler writes, "I saw a flaming globe of fire, magnificent indeed, but too terrible for the eye to rest upon, if its beams had been naked and exposed; but it was suspended in a vase of crystal so transparent that while it softened the intensity of its rays, it shrouded nothing of its beauty. On the contrary, that which before would have been a mass of undistinguishable light, now emitted through the vase many beautiful and various colored rays, which riveted the beholder with wonder and astonishment." Such is God manifested in Christ. Out of Christ he meets the affrighted sinner's eye as a "consuming fire." Salter.

9043. GOD, Man Trying to Forget. Apart from clear acts of great and grievous sin, how is God forgotten, clean forgotten, by the greatest part of mankind. They live as if there were no God. It is not as if they openly rebelled against him. They pass him over and ignore him. He is an inconvenience in his own world, an impertinence in his own creation. So he has been quietly set on one side, as if he were an idol out of fashion, and in the way. Men of science, and politicians, have agreed on this, and men of business and wealth think it altogether the most decent thing to be silent about God; for it is difficult to speak of him, or have a view of him, without allowing too much to him.

F. W. Faber.

9044. GOD, Name of. Josephus relates that Alexander the Great, while engaged at the siege of Tyre, sent a demand for tribute and auxiliaries to the High Priest at Jerusalem. He refused because he was under treaty obligations to Darius. At this Alexander was enraged and vowed vengeance upon the Jews. After the reduction of Gaza, Alexander, with his army thirsting for plunder, hastened to Jerusalem. As they drew near the city they met a great procession of the people in white robes, headed by the priests in fine linen, and lead by the high priest in purple and scarlet clothing, his mitre on his head, and on his breast the golden breast-plate, upon which the name of God was engraved. Alexander, alone, in advance of his army, adored that name and saluted the high priest. The great captain's friends were astonished at him, and supposed he had become insane. A more effectual victory had been gained than if the city had withstood a siege. Years before, Alexander had a dream in which he saw the high-priest in this very dress. Now he recognized the hand of God. The high-priest, himself, was instructed in a dream how to receive him.

9045. GOD, Nature of. We are not to consider the world as the body of God: he is an uniform being, void of organs, members, or parts; and they are his creatures, subordinate to him, and subservient to his will. Sir Isaac Newton.

9046. GOD, Obscuration of. When the sun shines bright and warm, all the flowers of the field open and display their leaves, to receive him into their bosoms; but, when night comes, they fold together, and shut up all their glories: and, though they were like so many little suns shining here below, able, one would think, to force a day for themselves; yet, when the sun withdraws his beams, they droop, and hang the head, and stand neglected, dull and obscure things. So hath it fared with us: while God hath shone upon us with warm and cherishing influences, we opened, and spread, and flourished into a great pomp and glory; but he only hides his face, draws in his beams, and all our beautiful leaves shut up or fall to the ground, and leave us a bare stalk, poor and contemptible. Bp. Hopkins.

9047. GOD, Omnipotence of. One of the early Christians was much perplexed over the passage which represents the earth as founded upon the waters. Then he thought upon the omnipotence of God, and said, "I forgot God when I said, How can this be?" Many doubts are silenced in the same way. The power of God makes the yielding waters firm as adamant, or the airy nothing, upon which he is said to hang the world, stronger than pillars of brass.

9048. GOD, Omnipresence of. A teacher asked, "Where is God?" One boy replied, "In heaven;" another, "Everywhere," and another, "God is here."

9049. GOD, Omniscience of. There is a recent application of electricity by which, under the influence of its powerful light, the body can be illuminated so that the workings beneath the surface of the skin can be seen. Lift up the hand, and it will appear almost translucent, the bones and veins clearly appearing. It is so in some sort with God's introspection of the human heart. His eye, which shines brighter than the sun, searches us and discovers all our weakness and infirmity. Pilkington.

9050. GOD, Omniscient. There is not a city, there is not a village, not a house, on which the eye of God is not fixed. He notices the actions, words, and thoughts of every member of every family, in this and in every place. He observes every family in which no prayer is offered, and marks that as a house on which his blessing cannot rest. If they acknowledge not God, neither can God acknowledge them as his: for "them that honor me," saith God, "I will honor; and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed." He sees the knavery and dishonesty which are practiced in some houses, and which the inhabitants of the houses think to shut in with the walls which enclose them. He notices the vain and unprofitable conversation of many who forget that for "every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment;" and the wicked thoughts and desires which are indulged in privacy, by some who would blush to think that their imaginations were exposed to any human eye. He knows all the hypocrisy which sometimes lurks under fair words and specious performances. He knows and observes all and forgets nothing. He records all in his book of remembrance. Let the consideration that all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do, have its proper influence upon us.

9051. GOD, Oversight of. A man in the full strength of his years, but most helpless, being very deaf and almost totally blind, is an occasional visitor at our house. We take turns in talking to him, for the talk must be carried on in a key that soon tires ordinary lungs. The other day I was "the relief," and as I talked with the poor man I learned a lesson myself, for the man has wonderful faith. He cannot work, though willing enough, and he will not beg, but from day to day God feeds him. "Have you no fears in going about as you do," I said to him, "in cars and boats, and on the crowded streets?" "I used to have," he said, in the soft, low voice, which contrasts with the way people must shout at him, "but I never have now. God sees to me. I am always taken care of. Somebody finds me a seat, or helps me in and out, and I get along." "Do you ever hear anything in church?" is another question. "Well, not much; but I always go. I like to be there, and I find a blessing."

Christian Weekly.

9052. GOD, Portion in. He that hath God for his portion shall have all other things cast into his store, as paper and packthread is cast into the bargain, or as a handful of corn is cast into the corn you try, or as hucksters cast in an over-cast among the fruit you try, or as an inch of measure is given unto an ell of cloth. Matt. 6: 25, 31-33. O sirs, how can that man be poor, how can that man want, that hath the Lord of heaven and earth for his portion? Surely he cannot want light that enjoys the sun, nor he cannot want bread that hath all sorts of grain in his barns, nor he cannot want water that hath the fountain at his door; no more can he want anything that hath God for his portion, who is everything, and who will be everything to every gracious soul. O sirs! the thought, the tongue, the desire, the wish, the conception, all fall short of God, and of that great goodness that he hath laid up for them that fear him, and why then should they be afraid of wants? Brooks.

9053. GOD, Power of. The power which gave existence, is power which can know no limits. But to all beings, in heaven, and earth, and hell, he gave existence, and is therefore seen to possess powers which transcend every bound. The power which upholds, moves, and rules the universe, is also clearly illimitable. The power which is necessary to move a single world transcends all finite understanding. No definite number of finite beings possess sufficient power to move a single world a hair's breadth; yet God moves the great world which we inhabit sixty-eight thousand miles in an hour; two hundred and sixty times faster than the swiftest motion of a cannon ball. Nor does he move this world only, but the whole system, of which it is a part; and all the worlds which replenish the immense stellary system, formed of suns innumerable, and of the planets which surround them. All these he has also moved from the beginning to the present moment; and yet "He fainteth not, neither is weary!"

Dr. Dwight.

9054. GOD, Protection of. Luther, when making his way into the presence of Cardinal Cajetan, who had summoned him to answer for his heretical opinions at Augsburg, was asked by one of the Cardinal's minions where he should find a shelter if his patron, the Elector of Saxony, should desert him. "Under the shield of heaven!" was his reply.

9055. GOD, Providence of. Must not the conduct of a parent seem very unaccountable to a child when its inclinations are thwarted; when it is put to learn letters; when it is obliged to swallow bitter physic; to part with what it likes, and to suffer and do, and see many things done, contrary to its own judgment? Will it not, therefore, follow from hence, by a parity of reason, that the little child man, when it takes upon itself to judge of parental providence—a thing of yesterday to criticise the economy of the Ancient of Days—will it not follow, I say, that such a judge of such matters must be apt to make very erroneous judgments, esteeming those things in themselves unaccountable which he cannot account for; and concluding of some things, from an appearance of arbitrary carriage towards him, which is suited to his infancy and ignorance, that they are in themselves capricious or absurd, and cannot proceed from a wise, just, and benevolent God?

Berkeley.

9056. GOD, Recognizing. A woman who had an idiotic child said she would be satisfied if she could only get one look of recognition. And so it is with God. He wants us to look to him; yet there are some Christians who never look up even so much as to say "Thank you."

Moody.

9057. GOD, Recognition of. In the opening sentence of the Declaration of Independence there is a recognition of God. It closes with the sentence "And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge," etc. In Article 13 of the Articles of Confederation can be found the following: "And whereas it hath pleased the Great Governor of the world to incline the hearts of the Legislatures," etc. And the articles end with the words, "Done at," etc., "in the year of our Lord," etc. The Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, 1783, begins with, "It having pleased the Divine Providence to dispose the hearts," etc. Finally the views of the President of the Convention which framed the Constitution: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle." Washington's Farewell Address.

9058. GOD, a Refuge. Travelers tell us that they who are at the top of the Alps can see great showers of rain fall under them, but not one drop of it falls on them. They who have God for their portion are in a high tower, and thereby safe from all troubles and showers. A drift-rain of evil will beat in at the creature's windows, be they never so well pointed; all the garments this world can make up cannot keep them that travel in such weather from being wet to the skin. No creature is able to bear the weight of its fellow-creature, but as reeds, break under, and as thorns, run into the sides that lean on them. The bow drawn beyond its compass breaks in sunder, and the string wound above its strength snaps in pieces. Such are outward helps to all that trust to them in hardships. Swinnock.

9059. GOD, Resemblance to. Resemblance to God results from our intimacy with him. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." But while a "companion of fools shall be destroyed, he that walketh with wise men shall be wise." We soon assume the manners of those with whom we are familiar, especially if the individual be a distinguished personage, and we pre-eminently revere and love him. Upon this principle, the more we have to do with God the more we shall grow into his likeness and "be followers of him as dear children." Jay.

9060. GOD, Resisting. As God is incapable of changing his resolves, because of his infinite wisdom, so he is incapable of being forced to any change, because of his infinite power. Being almighty, he can be no more changed from power to weakness, than, being all-wise, he can be changed from wisdom to folly, or, being omniscient, from knowledge to ignorance. He cannot be altered in his purposes, because of his wisdom; nor in the manner and method of his actions, because of his infinite strength. Men, indeed, when their designs are laid deepest and their purposes stand firmest, yet are forced to stand still, or change the manner of the execution of their resolves, by reason of some outward accidents that obstruct them in their course: for, having not wisdom to foresee future hindrances, they have not power to prevent them, or strength to remove them, when they unexpectedly interpose themselves between their desire and performance; but no created power has strength enough to be a bar against God. By the same act of his will that he resolves a thing, he can puff away any impediments that seem to rise up against him. He that wants no means to effect his purposes cannot be checked by anything that riseth up to stand in his way; heaven, earth, sea, the deepest places are too weak to resist his will. Charnock.

9061. GOD, Robbing. The Arabians offered sacrifices and other offerings to idols as well as to God, who was also often put off with the least portion, as Mohammed upbraids them. Thus when they planted fruit trees, or sowed a field, they divided it by a line into two parts, setting one apart for their idols, and the other for God; if any of the fruits happened to fall from the idol's into God's, they made restitution; but if from God's part into the idol's, they made no restitution. So when they watered the idol's grounds, if the water broke over the channels made for that purpose, and run on God's part, they dammed it up again; but if the contrary, they let it run on, saying, they wanted what was God's, but he wanted nothing. In the same manner, if the offering designed for God happened to be better than that designed for the idol, they made an exchange, but not otherwise. George Sale.

9062. GOD, Serving. When the son of Fluvius was found in the conspiracy of Catiline, the displeased father reprehended him sharply, saying, Non ego te Catilini genui, sed patriæ—"I did not beget you for Catiline, but for your country." This is the language of God to his children: I gave you not bodies and souls to serve sin with, but to serve me with. Our bodies were not formed to be instruments of unrighteous action, nor our souls the gloomy abodes of foul spirits. Secker.

9063. GOD, Strife with. It is observable how God's goodness strives with man's refractoriness. Man would sit down at this world, God bids him sell it and purchase a better; just as a father, who hath in his hand an apple and a piece of gold under it: the child comes, and with pulling gets the apple out of his father's hand; his father bids him throw it away, and he will give him the gold for it, which the child utterly refusing, eats it and is troubled with worms; so is the carnal and wilful man with the worm of the grave in this world, and the worm of conscience in the next. Herbert.

9064. GOD, Talking with. Never shall we be lonely, never have to complain of want of companionship, if we acquire this blessed habit of talking with God. There was an old Scotchman sitting by his humble fire, and a visitor asked him if he was not lonesome sitting there all day, and he said, "Nae, nae, I just sit here clacking wi' Jesus." When we say that "clacking" is with the Scotch the word for friendly talking, our readers will not suppose there was irreverence in the old man's words; perhaps they may see something to be envied as well as admired.

Power.

9065. GOD, Taking Hold of. It makes a good deal of difference whether you take hold of God or whether he takes hold of you. My little girl to-day refused to let me take hold of her hand when we were walking together. She thought she could go alone. But when we came to a place that was slippery, she took hold, first of my little finger, and then, as it grew more icy, of my whole hand. As we went on, and it was growing worse, she let go entirely, and said, "Papa, take hold of me." She knew I was strong, and that she could not fall unless I fell. "Now," said he, "I have been slipping, slipping, for the last eleven years, and the reason is, that I have not put my hand into the hand of God. I have been trying to take hold of him, but not asking him to take hold of me. As long as he has hold of my hand I can't fall. He would have to be disenthroned first. If our hands are placed in his, whose throne is in heaven, we never can fall down into hell."

Moody.

9066. GOD a Thief. The Sanhedrim Talmud gives the following legend: A prince once said to Rabbi Gamaliel, Your God is a thief; he surprised Adam in his sleep and stole a rib from him. The Rabbi's daughter overheard this speech, and whispered a word or two in her father's ear, asking his permission to answer this singular opinion of herself. He gave his consent. The girl stepped forward, and, feigning terror and dismay, threw her hands aloft in supplication, and cried out, "My liege, my liege, justice! revenge!" "What has happened?" asked the prince. "A wicked theft has taken place," she replied. "A robber has crept secretly into our house, carried away a silver goblet, and left a golden one in its stead." "What an upright thief!" exclaimed the prince; "would that such robbers were of more frequent occurrence!" "Behold, then, sire, the kind of thief our Creator was; he stole a rib from Adam, and gave him a beautiful wife instead." "Well said!" replied the prince.

9067. GOD, Threatening. Rev. G. S. Owen, missionary in China, says: "The wife of a man living at Chuen-sha, a city near Shanghai, had a severe attack of madness. At night she became especially wild, foaming and raging terribly. The husband went at once to the temple of the city god, presented various sacrifices and made vows; but his wife remained mad as ever. He went again and again; but to no purpose, the woman grew worse. The man got furious; he had half beggared himself by making offerings to the city god, yet his wife was no better. He would have his revenge. Away he went to the temple, and thus addressed the city god—'You call yourself the city god, while in reality you are an evil, money-loving, unjust demon. It was my ancestors who built you this fine temple, and I have been most regular and devout in my worship; in return you have made my wife mad, and refuse to cure her. Well, now mark what I say: if she is not better within three days, I will pull you down from that pedestal, and throw you into the first ditch I can find, and there you shall rot.' The woman got better within the prescribed time, and thus the god escaped the threatened punishment." Others than heathen first attempt to bribe and then to terrify their God into compliance with their schemes.

9068. GOD, Title of. Nothing is easier than to say the word universe, and yet it would take us millions of millions of years to bestow one hasty glance upon the surface of that small portion of it which lies within the range of our glasses. But what are all suns, comets, earths, moons, atmospheres, seas, rivers, mountains, valleys, plains, woods, cattle, wild beasts, fish, fowl, grasses, plants, shrubs, minerals, and metals, compared with the meaning of the one name—God!

Pulsford.

9069. GOD, Trust in. William Rufus, having seen the coast of Ireland from some rocks in North Wales, said, "I will summon hither all the ships of my realm, and with them make a bridge to attack that country." This threatening being reported to Murchard, Prince of Leinster, he paused a moment, and then said, "Did the king add to this mighty threat, if God please?" On being assured he made no mention of God in his speech, he replied, "Sure that man puts his trust in human, not in divine power, I fear not his coming." Buck.

9070. GOD, Truth of. There is no truth which a man may more evidently make out to himself than the existence of a God; yet he that shall content himself with things as they minister to our pleasures and passions, and not make enquiry a little further into their causes and ends, may live long without any notion of such a being.

Locke.

9071. GOD Unchangeable. There are many Christians, like young sailors, who think the shore and the whole land moves, when the ship and they themselves are moved; just so, not a few imagine that God is moved, and changes places, because their souls are subject to alteration; but the foundation of the Lord abideth sure.

9072. GOD, Unity of. Rev. W. Arthur narrates an interview with an aged Hindoo. The latter said, "Some time ago one of our people went to your house, you took him into your room and said a great deal of sense to him, and gave him a book. It was the first that had ever been in our town. We assembled and read it together. It certainly was a very wise book, but had one fault that very much surprised us all." What this grave fault was he refused to tell till he had been repeatedly urged to do so. He at length said, "The fault was this: it would not allow of any God but one!

Now what do you say to that?" He had rightly apprehended the unity of the God of the Bible. It leaves no place for his polytheistic faith.

9073. GOD Unsearchable. What is man? It seems an easy thing to answer that question; yet I am not sure that, even at this day, we have any correct definition which, distinguishing him on the one hand from the angelic race, and on the other hand from the higher orders of inferior creatures, is at once brief and comprehensive. Now, if we have such difficulty in defining even ourselves, or those objects that being patent to the senses may be made the subject of searching and long experiment, is it wonderful that when we rise above his works to their maker, from things finite to things infinite, it should be found much easier to ask than to answer the question, What is God? The telescope by which we hold converse with the stars, the microscope which unveils the secrets of nature, the crucible of the chemist, the knife of the anatomist, the reflective faculties of the philosopher, all the common instruments of science, avail not there. On the threshold of that impenetrable mystery, a voice arrests our steps. From out the clouds and darkness that are round about God's throne, the question comes, Who can by searching find out God, who can find out the Almighty to perfection?

Dr. Guthrie.

9074. GOD, Veneration of. While earthly objects are exhausted by familiarity, the thought of God becomes to the devout man continually brighter, richer, vaster; derives fresh lustre from all that he observes of nature and Providence, and attracts to itself all the glories of the universe. The devout man, especially in moments of strong religious sensibility, feels distinctly that he has found the true happiness of man. He has found a being for his veneration and love, whose character is inexhaustible, who, after ages shall have passed, will still be uncomprehended in the extent of his perfections, and will still communicate to the pure mind stronger proofs of his excellence, and more intimate signs of his approval.

Channing.

9075. GOD, Wealth in. You cannot call God father till communion with Christ be enjoyed; and when this is enjoyed your privileges become wonderful. Now you may look on God and say, "Thou art my portion." Now you may go to God and say, "Thou art my Father." Now you may behold the love of God and say, "This is my treasure;" and the covenant of God, and say, "This is my storehouse;" and the providence of God, and say, "This is my shield." Now you may look on Christ and say, "This is my Redeemer; he is mine and I am his; he lives in me, and I live in him; he dwells with me, and I dwell with him; he sups with me, and I feed on him; his blood is my refuge, and my heart is his mansion. He doth graciously traffic in my heart by his Spirit, and I can as freely traffic with heaven by his intercession."

Sedgwick.

9076. GOD, Will of. He hath willed everything that may be for our good, if we perform the condition he hath required; and hath put it upon record, that we may know it and regulate our desires and supplications according to it. If we will not seek him, his immutability cannot be a bar, but our own folly is the cause, and by our neglect we despoil him of this perfection as to us, and either imply that he is not sincere, and means not as he speaks; or that he is as changeable as the wind, sometimes this thing, sometimes that, and not at all to be confided in. If we ask according to his revealed will, the unchangeableness of his nature will assure us of the grant; and what a presumption would it be in a creature dependent upon his sovereign, to ask that which he knows he has declared his will against; since there is no good we can want, but he hath promised to give, upon our sincere and ardent desire for it.

Charnock.

9077. GOD, Workmanship of. What an immense workman is God in miniature as well as in the great! With the one hand, perhaps, he is making a ring of one hundred thousand miles in diameter, to revolve round a planet like Saturn, and with the other is forming a tooth in the ray of the feather of a humming bird, or a point in the claw of the foot of a microscopic insect. When he works in miniature, everything is gilded, polished and perfect; but whatever is made by human art, as a needle, etc., when viewed by a microscope appears rough, and coarse, and bungling.

Bishop Law.

9078. GODLINESS, Advantage of. I think I could make it very plain, that even for the present life piety is the truest policy and the best possession. I believe, for instance, that the pious apprentice, who is prayerful and painstaking, will become a more accomplished artisan than his more infidel neighbor, who has nothing but self-interest to stimulate, and nothing but his own cleverness to help him. And when that Christian apprentice becomes a journeyman, however bitter the world's prejudice against piety may be, I have no fear but that his Master in heaven will find for his servant employment on earth. The king of Babylon had no liking to Daniel's religion, but he could not rule his 127 provinces without Daniel's help. And the king of Egypt would have been glad to have Joseph's finance and Joseph's forethought, without his piety; but, as he could not get the one without the other, he put up with the piety for the sake of the skillful policy. And so, sooner or later, the Christian workman will make himself indispensable. If he won't do a job on Sunday, neither will he be tipsy or stupefied with the previous day's debauch all Monday. If he will not tell a lie for his master, neither will he tell one to him; and, surely, that trade is bad where honesty is a bar to promotion.

Dr. Hamilton.

9079. GODLINESS, Basis of. True faith and a godly life cannot be separated one from another, any more than the foundation can be separated from the building, or the root from the branches, the fire from the heat, the water from the moisture, the sun from the light. In a word, they are as two twins, who are born together, live together, and die together. Howsoever, in the hour and power of darkness, and in the vehemency of temptation, we may and do fail very often. Therefore, where true faith is not, there can be no godly life.

9080. GODLINESS, Biblical. What is godliness? Conformity to the mind and will of God,—having the heart and eye turned towards God. See such expressions as, “a good conscience towards God,” 1 Pet. 3: 21; “faith to God-ward,” 1 Thess. 1: 8; “trust through Christ to God-ward,” 2 Cor. 3: 4; “alive unto God,” Rom. 6: 11. See how reference to God is interwoven with holy things. We read of “godly sorrow”—“godly fear”—“godly sincerity”—“godly zeal”—“godly men”—“godly edifying”—“the doctrine according to godliness”—“the godly seed”—“godly jealousy,” etc. In the New Testament the word “godliness” is used very frequently by St. Paul, and by him chiefly in 1 and 2 Timothy,—ten times in ten chapters. Was this because they were (with the Epistle to Titus) probably the last he wrote? as if the nearer he came to the end of his course, the more he viewed things with reference to God and godliness? Bowes.

9081. GODLINESS, Blessedness of. “O blessed be God that I was born,” said the pious Halyburton when dying. “I have a father and ten brethren and sisters in heaven, and I shall be the eleventh. O blessed be the day that I was ever born! O that I were where he is! And yet were God to withdraw from me, I should be weak as water. All that I enjoy, though it be miracle on miracle, would not support me without fresh supplies from God. The thing I rejoice in is this, that God is altogether full; and that in the Mediator Christ Jesus is all the fullness of the God-head, and it will never run out. Study the power of religion. ‘Tis the power of religion, and not a name, that will give the comfort I find. There is telling in this providence, and I shall be telling it to eternity. If there be such a glory in his conduct towards me now, what will it be to see the Lamb in the midst of the throne? My peace hath been like a river.” Soon after, one of those about him having said, “You are now putting your seal to that truth, that great is the gain of godliness,” he replied, “Yes, indeed.” Soon after he entered into the possession of eternal gain.

9082. GODLINESS for Gain. Worldlings, instead of looking upon godliness as their greatest gain, will look upon gain as their greatest godliness. They love religion, not for the beauty existing in it, but for the dowry annexed to it. They are like the fox, that follows the lion for the prey that is falling from him. If there be no honey in the pot, such wasps will hover no longer about it.

Secker.

9083. GODLINESS, Inspiration of. It is related of Lord Nelson, that at a critical moment a sudden glow of patriotism was kindled within him, and that from that time a radiant orb was suspended in his mind’s eye which urged him onwards to renown. But what is this in comparison with the object which fills the eye of the believer’s soul, when by faith he beholds the Saviour as the glory of the Lord, and follows on like the Israelites in the path of the fiery cloud pillar? Salter.

9084. GODLINESS, No Excess in. Every created thing has its bounds; but grace has none. In true godliness there is no excess. Those wells which are of God’s digging can never be too full of water. He delights to see the trees of righteousness laden with the fruits of righteousness. W. Secker.

9085. GODLINESS, Power of. The power of godliness, among other things, hath these three advantages. It makes a man do everything strongly and mightily; and whatever might take a man off from duty, or distract or disturb him in it, all falls to nothing before this power. It makes a man inflexible in the ways of God, that he shall neither turn to the right hand nor to the left, but take straight steps towards the mark set before him. It makes a man invincible from all evils and enemies, because all the power against him is but the power of the creature, but the power in him is the power of God. And the power of God easily overcomes the mightiest power of the creature, but is never overcome by it. To conclude: the power of godliness is the doer of every duty in God’s kingdom, the subduer of every sin, the conqueror of each tribulation and temptation, the life of every performance, the glory of each grace, the beauty and stability of a Christian’s life. W. Dell.

9086. GODLINESS, Sincere. The watch is naught that goes only at first winding up, and stands all the day after; and so is that heart that desires not always to keep in spiritual motion. I confess there may be a great difference in the standing of two watches; one from the very watch itself, because it hath not the right make, and this will ever do so till altered; another possibly is true work, only some dust clogs the wheels, or a fall hath a little battered it, which removed, it will go well again. And there is as great difference between the sincere soul and hypocrite in this case; the sincere soul may be interrupted in its spiritual motion and Christian course, but it is from some temptation that at present clogs him; but he hath a new nature which inclines to a constant motion in holiness, and doth, upon removing the present impediment, return to its natural exercise of godliness; but the hypocrite fails in the very constitution and frame of his spirit; he hath not a principle of grace in him to keep him moving. Like an ill-made watch, he must first be taken all to pieces.

Salter.

9087. GOLD, Danger of. A friend came to me one day who was about to start on a voyage during the troublous times of the war, with a large amount of gold belted around his waist. As I bade him good-by, I remarked, “Suppose the ship goes down, how about that gold around your waist? It will be very apt to interfere with the life-preserver and drag you to the bottom." O brethren! it is well enough to have gold, but sometimes it weighs heavier than the life-preserver. It sometimes is a mighty weight that crushes us down to hell. Hence, I say, we may covet large wealth and we may be glad when we find the church growing rich, but let us remember that with every dollar that comes into our pocket there comes a new responsibility for which we must give an account at God's judgment seat. Dr. Dashiell.

9088. GOLD, Death by. Tarpeia, the daughter of the governor of the fortress situated on the Capitoline Hill in Rome, was captivated with the golden bracelets of the Sabine soldiers, and stipulated to let them into the fortress if they would give her what they wore upon their left arms. The contract was made; the Sabines kept their promise. Tatius, their commander, was the first to deliver his bracelets and shield. The coveted treasures were thrown upon the traitress by each of the soldiers, till she sank beneath their weight and expired. Gold in quantities, won by treason, plunder, or even in honest ways, is commonly fatal to its possessors.

9089. GOLD, Disregard for. It became apparent that the "Central America" must go down. The storm did not abate, and the water gained upon the pumps. Several hundred miners were on board, returning to their early homes and friends. They had made their fortunes, and expected much happiness in enjoying them. In the first of the horror gold lost its attraction to them. The miners took off their treasure-belts and threw them aside. Carpet bags full of shining gold-dust were emptied on the floor of the cabin. One of these poured out one hundred thousand dollars worth in the cabin and bade any one take it who would. Greed was over-mastered, and the gold found no takers. They had endured great labors and hardships to acquire it, and now saw that the more they carried of it the quicker they would sink to the ocean's bottom. "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life." Job 2: 4.

9090. GOLD, Encumbrance of. "When Cortez entered Mexico, he believed the conquest of the city easy. But on the night of July 7, 1520, he found it much too hot for him. A forced escape, sword in hand, through a narrow path, beset on either side by great numbers of infuriated natives, was the only one possible. Immense treasures, for which he had ventured into his perilous condition, lay about him. Notwithstanding the midnight trial of nimble feet and skillful sword-arms, some of his followers began to load themselves with gold and silver. 'He travels safest who travels lightest!' exclaimed the commander. But the Spaniards, being willing, as the majority of men of every age have been, to run great risks for gold, went forth to the conflict with the fatal encumbrance. About half of them perished by the way. Those who reached in safety the open country had at last been obliged to strip themselves for the flight." They who were most heavily laden with treasure were most fiercely attacked, and suffered most. Dangers and trials increase with riches. Some have been thankful when the burden was removed.

9091. GOLD, Load of. There were two brothers; one, rich in the love of a good wife and children, but sick and poor in this world's goods; the other, Franz, was rich in money, which he loved better than anything else. Franz lived all alone. One bitter cold night, the wife of the sick brother came to the miser Franz, and begged for help, but he refused her, and she went away saying, "I pray God that the gold which has so hardened your heart may never weigh so heavy on your soul, that you cannot mount to glory." This frightened Franz. By and by a fairy came to him, shaking bags of gold, and said, "Lie down, put your strong box on your chest, and I will give you gold so long as you can bear its weight; but take care you don't get too much, for though I can give, I cannot take away." So Franz lay down, but he was so greedy of the gold that he kept wanting more, till at last he was so weighed down he could not move. And there he lay for years and years. At last a bright light shone, and a crowd of people gathered around him. He remembered his neighbors, his brother with the wife and children, but he couldn't go near them, for he was weighed down by this pile of gold. "O, take it off! take it off!" he cried, "and let me go." Then came a voice, "Any of you, his family, his neighbors, or servants, any one whom he has helped, may remove the awful load that binds him down." But no one stirred, and a cry burst from Franz as his eye went from face to face, and only the memory of unkind and selfish words and actions came up before him. He saw in his sister's face that same sad look, as on that stormy night long, long ago, when he drove her from his door cold, hungry, and sorrowful. Then a wail was heard with these words, "The gold that hardened his heart, has bound him to the earth; he can never rise to glory." From the German.

9092. GOLD No Cure. Rev. Jeremiah Burroughs mentions a rich man, who on his sick bed, called for his bags of money; and having laid a bag of gold to his heart, after a little he bade them take it away, saying, "It will not do! it will not do!"

9093. GOLD, Overladen with. At the time of the wreck of the Central America, when gold was thrown away as worse than useless, and millions worth could have been had by taking it, an old colored stewardess took her opportunity and ran the risk. She selected the heaviest belt she could find, and attached it to her person. An attempt was made to lower her into the boats with the other women, but she fell into the sea and was nearly drowned. At length she was drawn into the boat, but when she reached the Marine, the rescuing ship, she was too far gone to be resuscitated. Her precious lading had dragged her down and proved her ruin. She was the only woman lost, though others fell into the sea. A father handed his little daughter a purse full of gold, but she handed it back saying, "It is too heavy." She was right. It has drowned many in luxury and perdition.

9094. GOLD, Place for. Andrew Fuller was taken to the bank, when one of the clerks, to whom he had occasion to speak, showed him some ingots of gold. Thoughtfully eying the gold, he said, as he laid it down, "How much better is it to have this in the hand than in the heart!"

9095. GOLD, Root of. When an ambassador of Spain was brought into the treasury of Venice, and shown great quantities of gold, he began to dig to the bottom of the gold, and being asked why he did so, answered, "I do it to see whether this golden treasure hath any root." Industry and charity are the roots of gold. The diligent hand maketh rich. "There is that scattereth yet increaseth."

9096. GOLD, Temptation of. To turn Antony the hermit from a religious life, the devil cast gold along his path in great profusion. He would not stop to pick it up, but ran on in haste. A great silver plate was also thrown in his way. He said, "This is a trick of the devil. Devil, thou shalt not hinder my determination by this. Thy silver go with thee to perdition." Such is the legend.

9097. GOLD, Tomb of. Under hills of gold many a spiritual giant lies buried.

9098. GOLD, Unsatisfying. Pythes, a king of Greece, cotemporary with Xerxes, discovered a gold mine in his dominions, and set his subjects digging it, to the neglect of all other labor. The wives of the citizens began to petition the wife of Pythes. She undertook their case, and bade them be of good cheer. She required the goldsmiths to imitate in gold all sorts of loaves, junkets, fruits, and all sorts of fish and meats, which were favorites with Pythes. Returning hungry from a journey, the queen set before him a golden supper. Pythes was delighted with the workmanship, but soon began to call in earnest for something to eat. She brought on more golden viands. He cried in anger, "I am hungry!" She replied, "Thou hast made no other provisions for us; every skillful science and art being laid aside, no man works in husbandry; but neglecting sowing, planting, and tilling the ground, we delve and search for useless things, neglecting ourselves and subjects." Thereafter he divided his subjects, and set a part of them to till the soil, and engage in manufactures. In spite of his gold, Pythes grew despondent, and desired death. He built himself a tomb, and lived in it alone till his death, having resigned the government to his wife.

9099. GOLD, Unused. An old miser stored large treasures of gold in several bags, which he guarded with the greatest care. A cunning thief came and stole his gold, but took care to refill the bags with pebbles. The miser was as happy as before, for he knew nothing of his loss, and the pebbles served to satisfy his greed as well as the gold.

9100. GOLD, Votaries of. Gold is the only power which receives universal homage. It is worshipped in all lands without a single temple, and by all classes without a single hypocrite; and often has it been able to boast of having armies for its priesthood, and hecatombs of human victims for its sacrifices. Where war has slain its thousands, gain has slaughtered its millions; for while the former operates only with the local and fitful terrors of an earthquake, the destructive influence of the latter is universal and increasing. Indeed, war itself—what has it often been but the art of gain practiced on a larger scale? the covetousness of a nation resolved on gain, impatient of delay, and leading on its subjects to deeds of rapine and blood? Its history is the history of slavery and oppression in all ages. For centuries, Africa, one quarter of the globe, has been set apart to supply the monster with victims, thousands at a meal. And, at this moment, what a populous and gigantic empire can it boast! the mine, with its unnatural drudgery; the manufactory, with its swarms of squalid misery; the plantation, with its inbruted gangs; and the market and the exchange, with their furrowed and care-worn countenances; these are only specimens of its more menial offices and subjects. Titles and honors are among its rewards, and thrones at its disposal. Among its counselors are kings, and many of the great and mighty of the earth enrolled among its subjects. Where are the waters not ploughed by its navies? What imperial element is not yoked to its car? Philosophy itself has become a mercenary in its pay; and Science, a votary at its shrine, brings all its noblest discoveries, as offerings, to its feet. What part of the globe's surface is not rapidly yielding up its lost stores of hidden treasure to the spirit of gain? Scorning the dream of the philosopher's stone, it aspires to turn the globe itself into gold. Harris.

9101. GOOD: Brevities. Ariston said, that neither a bath nor an oration doth any good, unless it purify, the one the skin, the other the heart. That is good which doth good.—Venning.—How indestructibly the good grows, and propagates itself, even among the weedy entanglements of evil!—Carlyle.—A very small page will serve for the number of our good works, when vast volumes will not contain our evil deeds. Bishop Wilson.

9102. GOOD BREEDING, Civility and. Civility and good-breeding are generally thought, and often used as, synonymous terms, but are by no means so. Good-breeding necessarily implies civility; but civility does not reciprocally imply good-breeding. The former has its intrinsic weight and value, which the latter always adorns and often doubles by its workmanship. To sacrifice one's own self-love to other people's is a short, but, I believe, a true, definition of civility; to do it with ease, propriety, and grace, is good-breeding. The one is the result of good-nature; the other, of good sense, joined to experience, observation, and attention. Lord Chesterfield 9103. GOOD DEEDS, Harvest from. A good deed is never lost: he who sows courtesy reaps friendship, and he who plants kindness gathers love: pleasure bestowed upon a grateful mind was never sterile, but generally gratitude begets reward. Basil.

9104. GOOD DEEDS, Height of. He is good that does good to others. If he suffers for the good he does, he is better still; and if he suffers from them to whom he did good, he is arrived to that height of goodness, that nothing but an increase of his sufferings can add to it; if it proves his death, his virtue is at its summit—it is heroism complete. La Bruyere.

9105. GOOD DEEDS, Memory of. Some men live in their good deeds, and, like a beautiful insect, or a delicate moss preserved in a mass of golden aromatic amber, they seem to lie embalmed in the memory of their worth. Teachers' Treasury.

9106. GOOD DEEDS, Neglect of. That which is good to be done cannot be done too soon; and if it is neglected to be done early, it will frequently happen that it will not be done at all. Bishop Mant.

9107. GOOD DEEDS, Passion for. He who diffuses the most happiness and mitigates the most distress within his own circle is undoubtedly the best friend to his country and the world, since nothing more is necessary than for all men to imitate his conduct, to make the greatest part of the misery of the world cease in a moment. While the passion, then, of some is to shine, of some to govern, and of others to accumulate, let one great passion alone influence our breasts, the passion which reason ratifies, which conscience approves, which heaven inspires,—that of being and doing good. Robert Hall.

9108. GOOD DEEDS, Prolificness of. As the acorn, because God has given it "a forming form," and life after its kind, bears within it, not only the builder's oak, but shade for many a herd, food for countless animals, and at last, the gallant ship itself, and the materials of every use to which nature or art can put it and its descendants after it throughout all time; so does every good deed contain within itself endless and unexpected possibilities of other good, which may and will grow and multiply forever, in the genial light of him whose eternal mind conceived it, and whose eternal Spirit will forever quicken it, with that life of which he is the giver and the Lord. Charles Kingsley.

9109. GOOD DEEDS, Relying on Our. As the phoenix in Arabia gathers sweet, odoriferous sticks together, and then blows them with her wings, and burns herself with them, so many a carnal professor burns himself with his own good works—that is, by his expecting and trusting to receive that by his works that is only to be received and expected from Jesus Christ. Though all that man can do towards the meriting of heaven is no more than the lifting up of a straw towards the meriting of a kingdom, yet such a proud piece man is, that he is ready enough to say, with proud Vega, Cælum gratis non accipiam, "I will not have heaven of free cost." A proud heart would fain have that of debt which is merely of grace, and desires that to be of purchase which God hath intended to be of free mercy; which made one to say, that he would swim through a sea of brimstone that he might come to heaven at last; but he that swims not thither through the sea of Christ's blood, shall never come there. Man must swim thither, not through brimstone, but through blood, or he miscarries forever. Brooks.

9110. GOOD NAME, Loss of a. Be wondrous wary of your first comportment. Get a good name, and be very tender of it afterwards, for it is like the Venice glass, quickly cracked, never to be mended, though patched it may be. Take along with you this fable: Fire, Water, and Fame went to travel together. They consulted that, if they lost one another, how they might meet again. Fire said, "Where you see smoke, there you will find me." Water said, "When you see marsh and low ground, there you shall find me." Fame said, "Take heed how you lose me; for, if you do, you will run a great hazard never to meet me again; there is no retrieving of me." Howell.

9111. GOOD NAME, Value of a. A youth was apprenticed to a Quaker to learn the tanner's trade. The condition of service expressed by the Quaker was "Thee shall do as well by me as I do by thee." The boy won his employer's confidence, was honest, good-natured and industrious. Before the expiration of his time, the Quaker said to him, "Henry, I think of making thee a nice present when thy time is out. I cannot tell thee what the present is to be but it shall be worth more than a hundred pounds." Great expectations and many questions in regard to the present were kindled in the young man's mind. When the time arrived, the Quaker took him to his father, saying, "I will give thy present to thy father." On meeting the father the Quaker said, "Thy son is the best boy I ever had." Then looking at the young man he said, "This is thy present, Henry—a good name." Henry's golden visions vanished, but his father answered, "I would rather hear you say that of my son than to see you give him all the money you are worth, for 'a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches.'"

9112. GOOD-NATURE, Advantages of. Good nature is more agreeable in conversation than wit, and gives a certain air to the countenance which is more amiable than beauty. It shows virtue in the fairest light, takes off in some measure from the deformity of vice, and makes even folly and impertinence supportable. There is no society or conversation to be kept up in the world without good-nature, or something which must bear its appearance and supply its place. For this reason mankind have been forced to invent a kind of artificial humanity, which is what we express by the word good-breeding. For if we examine thoroughly the idea of what we call so, we shall find it to be nothing else but an imitation and mimicry of good-nature, or, in other terms, affability, complaisance, and easiness of temper reduced into an art. These exterior shows and appearances of humanity render a man wonderfully popular and beloved, when they are founded upon a real good-nature; but without it, are like hypocrisy in religion, or a bare form of holiness, which, when it is discovered, makes a man more detestable than professed impiety. Good-nature is generally born with us; health, prosperity, and kind treatment from the world are great cherishers of it where they find it; but nothing is capable of forcing it up where it does not grow of itself. It is one of the blessings of a happy constitution, which education may improve, but not produce. Addison.

9113. GOOD-NATURE, Virtue of. An attribute so precious, that, in my consideration, it becomes a virtue, is a gentle and constant equality of temper. To sustain it, not only exacts a pure mind, but a vigor of understanding which resists the petty vexations and fleeting contrarieties which a multitude of objects and events are continually bringing. What an unutterable charm does it give to the society of the man who possesses it! How is it possible to avoid loving him whom we are certain always to find with serenity on his brow, and a smile on his countenance? Bp. E. Stanley.

9114. GOODNESS, Blessedness of. Who can estimate the blessedness of a pious soul? Can the state of that soul be unhappy that is full of the Holy Ghost; full of love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, those blessed fruits of that blessed Spirit? Blessedness is connaturalized unto this soul: everything doth its part, and all conspire to make it happy. This soul is a temple, a habitation of holiness. Here dwells a Deity in his glory. It is a paradise; a garden of God: here he walks and converses daily, delighted with its fragrant fruitfulness. He that hath those things, and aboundeth, is not barren or unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus: he is the Sun; and the knowledge of him, the quickening beams that cherish and ripen these fruits. But the soul that lacketh these things is a desert—a habitation of devils. Howe.

9115. GOODNESS, Emblem of. Goodness is a fountain whose stream flows forth in all seasons, spreading life along all its banks. It has no summer when its source is dried up, and no winter when its streams are congealed. It hastens to fulfill its work of beneficence, giving drink to the thirsty traveler here, turning the wheel of the miller there, and anon spreading itself through the meadows to bring forth corn for the farmer. It overcomes all obstructions, either finding some underground course, or accumulating force by which it removes and overleaps barriers. It pours its blessings alike upon the thoughtless and the thoughtful, upon the thankless and the thankful, scorning not the foot that tramples it, and blasting not the hand that smites it. It embraces "whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report." This fountain is God, and the good are its streams.

9116. GOODNESS, Festival of. Diogenes, seeing a man arranging himself to attend a great entertainment, asked him if every day was not a festival to a good man.

9117. GOODNESS, Hatred of. I happened once to be present in the room where a dying man could not leave the world until he lamented to a minister (whom he had sent for on his account), the unjust calumnies and injuries which he had often cast upon him. The minister asked the poor penitent what was the occasion of this abusive conduct; whether he had been imposed upon by any false report. The man made this answer, "No, sir, it was merely this. I thought you were a good man, and that you did much good in the world, and therefore I hated you. Is it possible," he added, "for such a wretch to find pardon?" Cotton Mather.

9118. GOODNESS, Immortality of. "The evil men do lives after them, the good is oft interred with their bones." This trite quotation enshrines a specious falsehood. Goodness does not die. It cannot be drowned in the depths of ocean. It cannot be consumed by fire. It cannot be buried, though mountains were heaped upon it. It lives among the decay of the body, survives crucifixion like the Master, and like him must have an everlasting and an ever-widening influence. Like the self-sowing seed, one harvest shall follow another. This seed thou art scattering for eternity with a careful or a careless hand.

9120. GOODNESS, Majesty of. Henry II., of France, was so daunted by the heavenly majesty of a poor tailor, who was burnt before him, that he went home sad, and vowed that he would never be present at the death of such men any more. When Valens, the emperor, came in person to apprehend Basil, he saw such majesty in his very countenance that he reeled at the sight, and would have fallen backward to the ground had not his servants supported him.

9121. GOODNESS, Manifestation of Divine. Divine goodness was in all ages sending letters of advice and counsel from heaven, till the canon of Scripture was closed. It was goodness that revealed anything of his will after the fall; it was a further degree of goodness that he would add more cubits to its stature; and before he would lay aside his pencil, it grew up into that bulk wherein we have it; and his goodness is further seen in its preservation. He hath triumphed over the powers that opposed it. He hath maintained it against the blasts of hell, and spread it in all languages against the obstruction of men and devils. Charnock.

9122. GOODNESS, Measure of. He has more goodness in his little finger than you have in your whole body.

9123. GOODNESS, Monument to. Dean Swift. Thousands of men breathe, move, and live, pass off the stage of life, and are heard of no more—Why? they do not partake of good in the world, and none were blessed by them; none could point to them as the means of their redemption; not a line they wrote, not a word they spoke, could be recalled; and so they perished; their light went out in darkness, and they were not remembered more than insects of yesterday. Will you thus live and die, O man immortal! Live for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storm of time can never destroy. Write your name, in kindness, love and mercy, on the hearts of the thousands you come in contact with year by year: you will never be forgotten. No, your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind as the stars on the brow of evening. Good deeds will shine as the stars of heaven.

Chalmers.

9124. GOOD WORKS, Lesson of. Theodulus, a prefect of Constantinople under Theodosius the Great, like Solon, early tested the pleasures of the world and found them all vanities. He resigned his office, and informed his beautiful young wife, to whom he had been two years married, of his resolution to renounce all, even her, and live for God alone. She pleaded her faithfulness and love, and implored him not to leave her. He repulsed her, and next morning she was found cold and dead from a broken heart, with the tears still on her cheeks. He went to Edessa, found a pillar, upon which he lived winter and summer, night and day, for forty-eight years, fasting, praying and watching. At the end of that time, he thought of the sacrifices he had made of wealth, office and wife, and what austerities he had borne for so many years, and concluding that he must be near perfection, asked the Lord to show him who, if any, should be his equal in heavenly glory. The Lord answered him in a dream saying, "Cornelius the Clown." Then the hermit descended from his pillar and went in quest of this man of superior sanctity, inquiring everywhere for "Cornelius the Clown." He came after a while upon a masked piper, who was greatly amusing the crowd. The hermit plucked him by the sleeve, and taking him aside asked in amazement, "What good thing hast thou done to inherit eternal life? I have given up house and land and a dear wife. I have spent forty-eight years on a pillar, exposed to the glaring sun by day and to the numbing frosts by night. I have worn out my body with fasting. I have eaten but a crust and a raw olive in the day. What hast thou done? I have become stiff in my joints, my feet are sore and swollen with long standing. I have prayed night and day some hundred prayers daily, and I have watched by night as the stars wheeled above me. What hast thou done?" "I have done nothing," answered the piper; "I cannot compare with thee." The hermit persisted. "Thou hast done something.

I know that thou wilt be accounted great in heaven. Tell me what thou hast done?" "I am as vile as dirt. I have not even served God purely and honestly," said he. "Bethink thee what good thing thou hast done," urged the hermit. Then the piper recalled a kindness which he did not think worth mentioning. "Some time ago there was a virtuous young wife in this town, who had been married only two years, when her husband was cast into the debtor's prison. She was compelled to beg for food to keep him and herself alive. She was very fair and modest, and feared lest she should attract rude eyes, and when she begged held out both hands and hung down her face, murmuring only inarticulate words. I saw her one day and was grieved, for I had piped and danced in the court of her house for a few coppers not long before. Then I went to her and asked how much her husband owed, and she said, 'Four hundred pieces of silver.' I ran home and turned out my money box and found therein two hundred and thirty pieces. Then I took a pair of gold bracelets and some brooches which had belonged to my dead wife, and they were worth seventy pieces of silver. That was not enough, so I got together some of my silk theatrical dresses, and rolled them all up in a piece of linen and took it to the woman, and I said to her, 'There, take all and release your husband from jail.' And then I ran away. This I believe is the only good thing I have ever done." Then the hermit saw how this man had sacrificed himself for a stranger, whereas he had cast away his own wife and broken her heart, seeking only self. The hermit blessed the piper and thanked God for the lesson, and went back to his pillar a wiser man.

9125. GOOD WORKS, No Confidence in. Martin Boos, a Catholic, visiting a sick woman, said to her, "I doubt not but you will die calm and happy." "Wherefore?" asked the sick woman. "Because your life has all been made up of a series of good works." She sighed and said, "If I die confiding in the good works which you call to my recollection, I know for certain that I shall be condemned; but what renders me calm at this solemn hour is, that I trust solely in Jesus Christ my Saviour." "These few words," said Boos, "from the mouth of a dying woman who was reputed a saint, opened my eyes for the first time. I learned what that was—'Christ for us.'"

9126. GOOD WORKS, Rejected Notwithstanding. Mohammed pronounced his imprecation upon his uncle, Al Abbas, because he trusted in good works, done to the Moslems, without accepting their religion. To Mohammed's nephew, Ali, he said, "You rip up our ill actions, but take no notice of our good ones. We visit the temple at Mecca and adorn the Caaba with hangings, and give drink to the pilgrims and free captives." Mohammed allowed him no part in Paradise.

9127. GOOD WORKS, Trusting to. Martin Luther says, "You think you will go to heaven for good works; you might as well try to sail to America in a paper boat. You will be swamped on the voyage, if you attempt it. Your works will never carry you safely; overboard with them!"

9128. GOSPEL, Appreciating the. Rev. J. M. Orsmond overheard some converted Polynesian chiefs talking together thus: "But for our teachers, our grass on the hill, our fences and houses, would have been ashes long ago." "But for the gospel we should now have been on the mountains, squeezing moss for a drop of water, and smothering the cries of our children by filling their mouths with grass, dirt, or cloth." "Under the reign of Messiah we stretch out our feet at ease, eat our food, keep our pig by the house." "We did not know more than our ancestors, our kings, and our parents, and were all blind, till the birds flew across the great expanse with good seeds in their mouths, and planted them among us. We now gather fruit, and have continual harvest. It was God who put it into the hearts of those strangers to come to us. We have nothing to give them. They are a people who seek our good; but we are a people of thorny hands, of pointed tongues, and we have no thoughts." "If God were to take our teachers from us, we should soon be savages again." "Our hearts delight in war; but our teachers love peace, and we now have peace."

9129. GOSPEL, Change by the. The change in Savage Island is thus described: Fifteen years ago the natives lived in the bush like brutes; now villages and neat plastered cottages evidence the progress of civilization. Fifteen years ago anarchy, war, and bloodshed prevailed throughout the island; now law, order, and peace. Fifteen years ago the people were all dark and degraded, strangers to prayer and praise; now, clothed and in their right mind, they surround their family altars night and morning to bow down to the God of heaven, while the air is vocal with their songs of praise. Fifteen years ago they had no written language; now they have the Gospels and other books, with two thousand readers. Fifteen years ago they were all, before God, dead in sin; now there are 360 in church fellowship, living to his glory, besides many who, we have reason to hope, are new creatures in Christ Jesus.

W. G. Lawes.

9130. GOSPEL, Delay of the. At Raiatea, one of the Society Islands, six hundred children were assembled at a feast. They marched through the settlement in procession, dressed in European garments, with little hats and bonnets made by those very parents who would have destroyed them, as was their cruel custom, had not the Gospel come to their rescue. They and their parents occupied the chapel. The appearance of the parents was most affecting. The eyes of some were beaming with delight, as the father said to the mother, "What a mercy it is that we spared our dear girl!" Bitter tears rolling down the saddened countenances of others, told the painful tale that all their children were destroyed. A venerable chief, gray with age, could bear the scene no longer; he arose, and, with an impassioned look and manner, exclaimed, "Let me speak; I must speak. Oh, that I had known that the Gospel was coming! my children would have been among this happy group; but, alas! I destroyed them all. I have not one left. I shall die childless, though I have been the father of nineteen children." Sitting down, he gave vent to his agonized feelings in a flood of tears.

Moister.

9131. GOSPEL, Divinity of the. It is remarkable that infidels themselves have been obligated to give their testimony in its favor. Cæsar Vaninus, a sworn enemy to the Christian religion, and one who was industrious in searching out objections against it, owned that he could find nothing in it that savored of a carnal and worldly design. What says Bolingbroke? "No religion has ever appeared in the world of which the natural tendency is so much directed as the Christian, to promote the peace and happiness of mankind; and the gospel is one continued lesson of the strictest morality of justice, charity, and universal benevolence." The testimony of Gibbon is remarkable: "While the Roman empire," says he, "was invaded by open violence, or undermined by slow decay, a pure and humble religion greatly insinuated itself into the minds of men, grew up in silence and sobriety, derived new vigor from opposition, and finally erected the banner of the cross on the ruins of the capital." Again he says, "The Christian religion is a religion which diffuses among the people a pure, benevolent, and universal system of ethics, adapted to every condition of life, and recommended as the will and reason of the Supreme Deity, and enforced by the sanction of eternal rewards and punishments." Such are the testimonies of infidels, and true it is, that this noble system allows of no evil, but promotes the greatest good.

9132. GOSPEL, Duty towards the. Every Christian hath his talent given him, his service enjoined him. The gospel is a depositum, a public treasure, committed to the keeping of every Christian; each man having, as it were, a several key of the church, a several trust for the honor of this kingdom delivered unto him. As, in the solemn coronation of the prince, every peer of the realm hath his station about the throne, and with the touch of his hand upon the royal crown, declareth the personal duty of that honor which he is called unto, namely, to hold the crown on the head of his sovereign; to make it the main end of his greatness, to study, and by all means endeavor the establishment of his prince's throne; so every Christian, as soon as he hath the honor to be called unto the kingdom, and presence of Christ, hath immediately no meaner a depositum committed to his care, than the very throne and crown of his Saviour, than the public honor, peace, victory and stability of his Master's kingdom.

Bp. Reynolds.

9133. GOSPEL, Faith in the. Paganism was never accepted as truth by the wise men of Greece, neither by Socrates, Pythagoras, Plato, Au-axagoras, nor Pericles. But, on the other side, the loftiest intellects, since the advent of Christianity have had faith, a living faith, a practical faith, in the mysteries and doctrines of the gospel.

Napoleon I.

9134. GOSPEL, Glories of the. France has caused pictures to be made of all the great events of her military history, by famous painters, and has gathered these battle scenes into the great halls of the palace of Versailles, on which is the inscription, "To all the glories of France." It is a place of great interest, but it commemorates earthly glory. There are other battles and victories than these, in which God's people have been engaged all through the ages. These may be delineated with absolute truthfulness and in all their minutiae upon the walls of the palace of God in the heavens. The pictures are daily made up and not to be revised. They will show Abraham, Peter, Luther, Wesley and all their subordinates, and portray their glorious victories. What a gallery of glorious mementos.

9135. GOSPEL, Go with the. If St. Paul had ever preached from "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," he would have laid great stress on the word "go." On your peril, do not substitute another word for "go." Preach is a good word. Direct is a good word. Collect is a good word. Give is a good word. They are all important in their places, and cannot be dispensed with. The Lord bless and prosper those who are so engaged; but still lay the stress on the word "go," for "how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach, except they be sent?" Six hundred millions of the human race are perishing; and there are perhaps thirty among all the Christians in Britain who are at this moment preparing to "go." Alas! my hand shakes and my heart trembles, "Is this thy kindness to thy friend!"

Knill.

9136. GOSPEL, Great Plan of the. It is said that the architect of the great Straasbourg minster, who died before his work was done, left his plans so that everybody could see on paper what his general design was. It was clear to many that he wished the building to go up a certain height, and the spires to be in certain places; but after the man's hand was still in death, and his lips were no more active to reveal the magnitude of his plan, nobody could understand it. His daughter looked at the papers and rolled them over and over again, and tried to enter into her father's wonderful undertaking; and though she did superintend the work for years after his death, and was supposed to be the only one who could approach him, yet she died without comprehending his plan, and the magnificent minster to-day has great architectural deformities. No one was found who could conceive and understand the plan which the great architect had in his mind. So in this great plan of Jesus to save the world from its bondage, to break its fetters, to give sunlight to the soul, in that wonderful undertaking nobody could understand its magnitude, and Christ stood alone. So it was all along that they were unable to conceive the wonderful character of his great mission, which was to save the world from its sins and redeem it from its bondage.

Dr. J. F. Hurst.

9137. GOSPEL, Hero of the. A speaker said in a missionary address, "It is nearly two generations since a boat's crew left their ship to reach the Hervey Islands. One of the passengers upon that boat desired to land, but the boat's crew feared to do so, as the cannibals were gathered together on the shore. Holding up the Bible in his hand, he said, 'Live or die, put me ashore.' They would not go near the land; he plunged into the surf, and held high the book. He reached the land. The cannibals did not kill him, but he won their favor and lived among them, and for aught I know he died among them. Thirty years afterwards another ship reached the same Hervey Islands, bringing literally a cargo of Bibles. They were all wanted, and were taken with the greatest eagerness and paid for by these people. This was the result of the labors of that heroic young man who said, 'Live or die, put me ashore.'"

9138. GOSPEL, Hindrances to the. What has prevented the gospel from fulfilling its promise, and completely taking effect? what has hindered it from filling every heart, every province, the whole world, the entire mass of humanity, with the one spirit of Divine benevolence? Why, on the contrary, has the gospel, the great instrument of Divine love, been threatened, age after age, with failure? Owing solely to the treachery of those who have had the administration of it; owing entirely to the selfishness of the church. No element essential to success has been left out of its arrangements; all these elements have always been in the possession of the church: no new form of evil has arisen in the world; no antagonist has appeared there which the gospel did not encounter and subdue in its first onset: yet at this advanced stage of its existence, when it ought to be reposing from the conquest of the world, the church listens to an account of its early triumphs, as if they were meant only for wonder, and not for imitation; as if they partook too much of the romance of benevolence to be again attempted; now, when it ought to be holding the world in fee, it is barely occupying a few scattered provinces as if by sufferance, and has to begin its conflicts again. And, we repeat, the only adequate explanation of this appalling fact is, that selfishness, the sin of the world, has become the prevailing sin of the church.

Dr. J. Harris.

9139. GOSPEL, Honoring the. We honor the gospel, when, in our greatest distress we make it our altar of refuge, our door of escape, the ground of all our hope and comfort, the only anchor to stay our souls in any spiritual tempest, the only staff to lean upon in our greatest darkness.

Bp. Reynolds.

9140. GOSPEL, Humanity of the. Its coming found the heathen world without a single house of mercy. Search the Byzantine Chronicles and the pages of Publius Victor; and though the one describes all the public edifices of ancient Constantinople, and the other of ancient Rome, not a word is to be found in either of a charitable institution. Search the ancient marbles in your museums; descend and ransack the graves of Herculaneum and Pompeii; and question the many travelers who have visited the ruined cities of Greece and Rome; and see if amid all the splendid remains of statues and amphitheatres, baths, and granaries, temples, aqueducts, and palaces, mausoleums, columns and triumphal arches, a single fragment or inscription can be found telling us that it belonged to a refuge for human want or for the alleviation of human misery.

Dr. John Harris.

9141. GOSPEL, Importance of the. The gospel is not only wonderful, but all-important. It is the gospel of our salvation. It is the bread, the water of life. For dying souls it is the only remedy. It has done more already for the public welfare of nations than all the civil institutions of men; and by this alone will the wilderness and solitary place be made glad, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose. Jay.

9142. GOSPEL, Improving the. In the South Sea Islands, on the Sunday morning, the natives meet together in classes of ten or twelve families each, and distribute among themselves the respective portions of the sermon each individual should bring away; one saying, "Mine shall be the text, and all that is said in immediate connection with it;" another, "I will take care of the first division;" and a third, "I will bring home the particulars under that head;" thus the sermon is appropriated before it is delivered. In some of the more advanced stations, where the New Testament is in the hands of the people, the missionaries are in the habit of naming passages of Scripture which are illustrative of the particulars under discussion. For instance, if the missionary is preaching upon the love of Christ, his first division may be to describe the nature and properties of that love, and under this head, if he refer to its greatness, after having illustrated his point, he will desire his hearers, without specifying the verse or verses, to read with attention the third chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, where they will find some sentiments applicable to that part of the subject. Opening their Testaments, the converted natives will find the chapter referred to, and make a mark against it. A second division may be the unchangeable nature of the Saviour's love; and the preacher having concluded his observations on this, he will desire the congregation to read carefully the eighth chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, where they will find some passages illustrative of that particular. Again opening their Testaments, the chapter is sought and marked as before. Thus they proceed through the entire discourse. At a convenient time, the respective classes meet, and after commencing their social service with singing and prayer, one of the most intelligent of the members, as leader, begins to inquire, "With whom is the text?" and proposes a variety of questions upon it. After this he asks for the divisions of the discourse; and when one has been given, he will say, "To what portion of Scripture were we referred?" The chapter having been named, they proceed to read it carefully over, and the verses thought to be most applicable are selected for observation. This is found to be a most excellent method of proceeding, as it not only induces the people to pay great attention to the sermon, but to search the Scriptures with interest, and also to exercise their minds on the meaning and application of what they hear and read. Moister.

9143. GOSPEL, Law and. An old writer says, "The law showeth us our sin, the gospel showeth us a remedy for it. The law showeth us our condemnation, the gospel showeth us our redemption. The law causeth wrath, the gospel is the word of grace. The law is the word of despair, the gospel is the word of comfort. The law says, Pay thy debt; the gospel says, Christ hath paid it. The law saith, Thou art a sinner, despair and thou shalt be damned; the gospel says, Thy sins are forgiven thee; be of good comfort, thou shalt be saved. The law saith, Make amends for thy sin; the gospel saith, Christ hath made it for thee. The law saith, Thy Father in heaven is angry with thee; the gospel saith, Christ hath pacified him with his blood. The law asks, Where is thy righteousness, goodness and satisfaction? The gospel saith, Christ is my righteousness, goodness, and satisfaction. The law saith, Thou art bound and indebted to me; the gospel saith, Christ hath delivered thee from them all. He that believeth not God's word believeth not God himself. The gospel is God's word; therefore he that believeth not the gospel believeth not God himself."

9144. GOSPEL, Living the. Martin Luther pronounced an expressive eulogy upon Nicholas Hausmann, pastor at Zwickau, in 1522, thus, "What we preach, he lives."

9145. GOSPEL, Message of the. A London city missionary whose success among fallen women had been remarkable, after a visit to the country, was returning through Yorkshire. He stopped at the inn, and after tea the matron went to a drawer and taking out the daguerreotype of a beautiful girl, handed it the missionary, saying, "It is my daughter, gone, lost, and yet—O sir, take with you this last memento of the one we loved so well, and if ever in your great city you see her face, go to her and tell her that her old home still waits for her, and her mother's heart still yearns for her." This is the message which is sent by Christ to every lost sinner.

9146. GOSPEL, Nature of the. The Gospel is the fulfillment of all hopes, the perfection of all philosophy, the interpretation of all revelations, the key to all the seeming contradictions of the physical and moral world.

Prof. Max Müller.

9147. GOSPEL, Need of a Plain. A sick Tennessee soldier signaled to a hospital visitor

Having gained his attention he said, "Stranger, the man that lay on that cot was taken out this morning, and I have got the same sickness. I don't know how soon my turn may come. I want you to tell me what I ought to do." The preacher began to explain the way of salvation. "Stranger," said the earnest soldier, "couldn't you make it very plain to a poor feller that never got no schooling." This brought the preacher to the plainest words and simple illustrations. Speaking to him of prayer, he quoted the 51st Psalm, 1-3. "That's it, preacher," said he, "my head is full of fever and I can't mind it. If it was writ down, now, and I was to read it, don't you think the Lord would hear me? I could spell it out, preacher, if you think he'd hear me." The preacher sought for a Bible that he might read it out of that, but could find none in camp. The anxious soldier being told of this, and promised a Bible on the morrow, asked, "What's to become of a poor feller if I should die to-night?"

9148. GOSPEL, Net of the. The draw-net was of immense length. On the coast of Cornwall, where it is now used, and bears the same name, seine or sean, it is sometimes half a mile in length, and scarcely could have been much smaller among the ancients, since it is spoken of as nearly taking in the compass of an entire bay. It is leaded below, that it may sweep the bottom of the sea, and supported with corks above, and, having been carried out so as to inclose a large space of sea, the ends are then brought together, and it is drawn up upon the beach with all that it contains. R. C. Trench.

9149. GOSPEL, Novelty of the. When Le Tourneau preached the last sermon at St. Benoit, at Paris, Louis XIV. inquired of Boileau, "If he knew anything of a preacher called Le Tourneau, whom everybody was running after?" "Sire," replied the poet, "your Majesty knows that people always run after novelties; this man preaches the Gospel." A Flemish preacher, in a sermon delivered before an audience wholly of the clergy, said, "We are worse than Judas; he sold and delivered his Master—we sell him, too, but deliver him not."

9150. GOSPEL, Objection to the. The first sermon preached by the Rev. Robert Hall at Cambridge, after he had become pastor of the congregation there, was on the doctrine of the Atonement. One of the congregation said to him, "Mr. Hall, this preaching won't do for us; it will only suit a congregation of old women." "Do you mean my sermon, sir, or the doctrine?" "Your doctrine." "Why is it that the doctrine is fit only for old women?" "Because it may suit the musings of people tottering upon the brink of the grave, and who are eagerly seeking comfort." "Thank you, sir, for your concession. The doctrine will not suit people of any age, unless it be true, and if it be true, it is not fitted for old women alone, but is equally important at every age."

9151. GOSPEL, Pardon and Holiness in the. The gospel runs in two golden streams—freedom from sin, purity of walking: they run undividedly all along, in one channel, yet without confusion one with another, as it is reported of some great rivers that run together between the same banks, and yet retain distinct colors and natures all the way, till they part. But these "streams that glad the city of God" never part from one another; the cleansing blood and the purifying light, these are the entire and perfect sum of the gospel; purification from sin, the guilt of sin, and the purity of walking in the light, flowing from that, make up the full complexion of Christianity, which are so nearly conjoined together, that if they be divided they cease to be, and cannot any of them subsist save in man's deluded imagination. Salter.

9152. GOSPEL, Philosophy of the. "Oh, Topsy, poor child, I love you," said Eva, with a sudden burst of feeling. "I love you because you haven't any father or mother or friends—because you have been a poor abused child! I love you, and I so want you to be good!" The keen round eyes of the black child were overcast with tears, large bright drops rolled heavily down one by one, and fell on the little white hand. In that moment, a ray of real belief, a ray of heavenly love, had penetrated the darkness of her heathen soul.

Mrs. H. B. Stowe.

9153. GOSPEL, Preaching the. Elliot, the Apostle to the Indians, once successfully preached the gospel to a solitary Indian woman. She came fifteen miles one day to hear him preach, but arrived just as the sermon closed. Seeing her disappointment and knowing her purpose, he approached her as she sat at the root of a tree, and with the aid of interpreters gave her the Gospel message, "that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." It resulted in her conversion, and through her in the conversion of many of her tribe.

9154. GOSPEL, Proclaiming the. The bee-hunter of the frontier, where wild bees make their homes in hollow trees, takes a box in which is a quantity of honey, and goes to a field where he is likely to find bees gathering their store. He places the box where the bees will find the honey it contains. When a bee has discovered it he will load himself, then go to his hive and tell his companions of the treasures he has found. Some of them will return with him, and help gather the honey. The hunter watches their course, for bees usually travel in straight lines, and traces them home. Having tasted the gospel honey, the redeemed soul hastens to tell that it has found more than golden store, and others are led to seek a like supply.

9155. GOSPEL, Progress of the. A returned missionary says: "It is demonstrable that the success of the gospel in the last hundred years is greater than that which it has achieved in any preceding hundred years. We look back on the first ages of Christianity, and sigh for the gift of tongues, and for Pentecostal blessing; and yet in the last century more has been done to give the Bible to the world, than was done in the first ten centuries of our era. Twenty versions at most were made in the first one thousand years; in the last one hundred years a hundred and twenty have been made—in languages spoken by more than half the globe. There are more conversions in heathen countries in the present day, in proportion to the number of preachers employed, than there are at home. Even when Constantine proclaimed Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire, the nominal Christians did not exceed one-hundredth part of the population of the entire globe. Nominal Christians now form one-fifth. Each new generation of the modern world consists of 30,000,000 of children, and they have to be Christianized one by one. Of these thirty millions 6,000,000 (one-fifth) become nominally Christians, and a considerable portion of them really Christians."

9156. GOSPEL, Providence and the. Soon after the missionaries began their work in Raiatea, an event occurred which deeply impressed the natives, and led many to accept the Gospel. Four men, two idolaters and two Christians, in a canoe were upset. The Christians began to pray earnestly. The idolaters said, "Why did you not pray sooner? It is of no use now, that we are in the water." Prayer continued, and all clung to the canoe, till a shark seized one of the idolaters. After a time the tide cast them upon a reef. Just as they struck it, a shark seized the only surviving idolater. The signal deliverance of the two who prayed, and death of the two who did not, strongly recommended the religion of prayer.

9157. GOSPEL, Receiving the. All human learning is of no avail. Reason must be put out of the question. I reasoned and debated and investigated, but I found no peace till I came to the gospel as a little child, till I received it as a babe. Then such a light was shed abroad in my heart, that I saw the whole scheme at once, and I found pleasure the most indescribable. I saw there was no good deed in myself. Though I had spent hours in examining my conduct, I found nothing I had done would give me real satisfaction. It was always mixed up with something selfish. But when I came to the gospel as a child, the Holy Spirit seemed to fill my heart. I then saw my selfishness in all its vivid deformity, and I found there was no acceptance with God, and no happiness, except through the blessed Redeemer. I stripped off all my own deeds—threw them aside—went to him naked—he received me as he promised he would, and presented me to the Father—then I felt joy unspeakable, and all fear of death at once vanished.

Dr. Gordon.

9158. GOSPEL, Release of the. I used to be a good deal troubled with my sins, and I thought of the day of judgment, when all the sins that I had committed in secret should blaze out before the assembled universe. But when a man comes to Christ the gospel tells him they are all gone, and in Jesus Christ he is a new creature. All I know is that out of the love which my Lord has for me he has taken all my sins and cast them behind his back. That is, behind God's back. How is Satan to get at it? If God has forgiven our sins, they won't be mentioned. In Ezekiel we are told not one of them shall be mentioned. Isn't it a glorious thing to have all our sins blotted out? And there is another thought, and that is the judgment. You know if a man has committed some great crime, when he is to be brought into judgment how he dreads it! How he dreads that day when he is to be brought into court, when he is put into a box and witnesses are to come up and testify against him, and he is there to be judged! But, my friends, the gospel tells us that if we come to Christ, we shall never come into judgment. Why? Because Christ was judged for us. He was wounded for our transgressions. If he has been wounded for us, we haven't got to be wounded. "Verily, verily,"—which means truly, truly—"I say unto you"—now just put your name in there—"He that heareth my words, and believeth on him that sent me, hath"—h-a-t-h, hath. It don't say you shall have when you die. It says, hath—"He that heareth my words and believeth on him that sent me hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation." That means into judgment. He shan't come into judgment, but is passed "from death into life." There is judgment out of the way. He shall never come into judgment. Why? Because God has forgiven us and given us eternal life. That is the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Moody.

9159. GOSPEL, Seeds of the. I have seen a waste of stones with scarcely anything of soil amongst them; yet even there were one or two solitary flowers in blossom. The wind had scattered there the seeds, the dews of heaven had fallen upon them, the little germs within had found something wherein to strike root, and the plants had sprung up and flowered unobserved. Those plants shall wither there, and decay, form a vegetable mould, the fit receptacle of other seeds that shall spring up into other flowers, till the stony waste be covered with soil, and the soil with verdure and bloom. Thus are the seeds of the gospel carried abroad into heathen lands; thus are they fostered by the blessed Spirit of God; thus do they find in one or two happy hearts a soil wherein to strike; and thus do they spring up into the beautiful flower of a holy life.

Salter.

9160. GOSPEL, Spreading the. Rev. Mr. Shaw, a missionary in Africa, was greatly surprised on finding an old slave Christian one hundred and sixty miles from any station, and it was thus explained to him: "My master, some time ago, hired one of your Namaquas to take care of the sheep. When he came amongst us we knew nothing of God or prayer, but he commenced singing hymns and praying with us every evening. He then read out of the Book and told us of Jesus Christ. The words which he preached were so good for me that I longed to read them for myself. He was willing to teach me, and gave me his books; but the hymn-book is old and shattered, so that I can scarcely read it. I long for another. Our teacher has gone away from us to the station, yet we still sing and pray together with our fellow-slaves every evening; and, whilst I am watching the sheep in the day, I try to improve myself. Others of the slaves have begun to pray, and long to be taught."

9161. GOSPEL, Tenderness of the. What then is the nature of this so marvelous transforming message of the gospel? It is a story, a simple story, such as a child will feel and weep over; such as a sage of seventy winters cannot fathom. It tells of a law holy as that eternal heart from which it springs; it paints the portrait of the righteousness consummate which images that law in the life; it celebrates the triumph of the moral conquest that makes the enfranchised conscience sovereign of man. Yet this were no more than others could in their measure rival. But, oh! a tale more touching than all this solemn strain is its exclusive privilege to unfold. It speaks,—it alone can speak of one whose purity, too perfect to brook one untoned sin in the vast universe of his creation, was accompanied by a love too tender to endure that one pang should continue to exist for which his own high wisdom could not provide a remedy; of a love which drew the living Author of the law from his transcendent abode into our narrow nature, that he might quench the lightnings of his own avenging justice in streams of his own human blood. It tells of that inexpressible attachment of which all human relationships (for it names them all) are too weak to be the faintest shadows of a Creator who is father, and brother, and husband of his redeemed; and by all the insults of his humiliated life: by his despised poverty and his accumulated wrongs, by a sight which made the angels tremble and weep, though—mystery of unfathomed ingratitude!—men, its objects, can slumber as they listen, or wake to scoff. By the groans of Gethsemane and its bloody sweat, by the nails and the thorns of Calvary, by the last dark tortures of an expiring God, it prays us to love him in return! This may fail to move, but it is certain that this appeal to the grateful affections is the legitimate path to the great object of a renovation, that it is a justifiable path, that it is a practicable path, that if it fail, no other that men have ever devised can offer a chance of success.

Butler.

9162. GOSPEL, Victories of the. Had it been published by a voice from heaven, that twelve poor men, taken out of boats and creeks, without any help of learning, should conquer the world to the cross, it might have been thought an illusion against all the reason of men; yet we know it was undertaken and accomplished by them. They published this doctrine in Jerusalem, and quickly spread it over the greatest part of the world. Folly outwitted wisdom, and weakness overpowered strength. The conquest of the East by Alexander was not so admirable as the enterprise of these poor men.

Charnock.

9163. GOSSIP, Classic. Ulysses, going into the region of departed souls, would not exchange so much as one word with his mother there till he had first obtained an answer from the oracle, and despatched the business he came about; and then, turning to her, he afforded some small time for a few impertinent questions about the other women upon the place, asking which was Tyro, and which was the fair Chloris, and concerning the unfortunate Epicasta.

Plutarch.

9164. GOSSIP, Malicious. There are a set of malicious, prating, prudent gossips, both male and female, who murder character to kill time, and will rob a young fellow of his good name before he has years to know the value of it.

Sheridan.

9165. GOVERNMENT, Best. The government which takes in the consent of the greatest number of people may justly be said to have the broadest bottom; and if it be terminated in the authority of one single person, it may be said to have the narrowest top, and so makes the firmest pyramid.

Temple.

9166. GOVERNMENT, Family. The eldest son of President Edwards congratulated a friend on having a family of sons, and said to him, "Remember, there is but one mode of family government. I have brought up and educated fourteen boys, two of whom I brought up, or suffered to grow up, without the rod. One of these was my youngest brother, and the other, Aaron Burr, my sister's only son, both of whom had lost their parents in their childhood; and from both my observation and experience, I tell you, sir, a maple-sugar government will never answer. Beware how you let the first act of disobedience in your little boys go unnoticed, and unless evidence of repentance be manifest, unpunished."

9167. GOVERNMENT, God's. How magnificent is this idea of God's government! That he inspects the whole and every part of his universe every moment, and orders it according to the counsels of his infinite wisdom and goodness, by his omnipotent will, whose thought is power, and his acts ten thousand times quicker than the light, unconfused in a multiplicity exceeding number, and unwearied through eternity!

Dr. Ogden.

9168. GOVERNMENT, Opinions on. With regard to the Greek sages, Solon was of opinion that the best government was that in which the collective body of citizens takes a part, when an injury is offered to the individual. Bion thought that was preferable in which good laws were despotic; Thales, that in which equality of property prevailed; Cleobulus, that in which fear of disgrace is stronger than the law. According to Chilo, that is the best in which the law speaks instead of the lawyer; and according to Periander, that in which power is confided to a small number of enlightened, disinterested and humane men.

Fitz-Raymond.

9169. GOVERNMENT, Reason for. The reason for which government exists is, that one man, if stronger than another, will take from him whatever that other possesses and he desires. But if one man will do this, so will several. And if powers are put into the hands of a comparatively small number, called an aristocracy—powers which make them stronger than the rest of the community—they will take from the rest of the community as much as they please of the objects of desire. They will thus defeat the very end for which government was instituted. The unfitness, therefore, of an aristocracy to be entrusted with the powers of government rests on demonstration.

James Mill.

9170. GOVERNMENT, Religion in. It seems to me a great truth, that human things cannot stand on selfishness, mechanical utilities, economics, and law courts; that if there be not a religious element in the relations of men, such relations are miserable, and doomed to ruin. Carlyle.

9171. GOVERNOR, A Good. Peter the Great frequently surprised the magistrates by his unexpected presence in the cities of the empire. Having arrived, without previous notice, at Olonez, he went first to the regency, and inquired of the governor how many suits there were depending in the court of chancery. "None, Sire," replied the governor. "None! how happens that?" "Why," replied the governor, "I endeavor to prevent law-suits, and, by conciliating the parties, I act in such a manner that no traces of difference remain in the archives. If I am wrong, your indulgence will excuse me." "I wish," replied the czar, "that all governors would act upon the same principles. Go on; God and your sovereign are equally satisfied." Buck.

9172. GRACE, Abounding. A debauchee recently found himself in extreme want in the city of St. Louis. His father, a gentleman of wealth, made every effort to save him from the demon of drink. He was well married, but those thus related to him felt themselves disgraced, and tried to secure a separation. His wife's father assured her that every want should be supplied if she would leave her drunken husband forever. Her heart clung to him, and her hope and faith longed and looked for his reformation. In St. Louis he went to the city prison to seek food, and a night's lodging. He was committed as a vagrant, and slept in the cells as a common prisoner. Here, he began to come to himself. The next morning in rags and filth he went and told a minister his story. He said his father was a banker and a Methodist in Indianapolis, where his wife also lived, and that he himself had been educated a Methodist. The minister said, "You are the meanest specimen of a Methodist I ever saw." The minister telegraphed to his father, his name and condition, and received the reply, "He is my poor boy; send him home." He called to himself the aids of religion, the demon was bound and cast out. His father now rejoices in a dutiful son, and his wife in an affectionate husband. Behold a living parable of another prodigal son, showing how grace abounds.

9173. GRACE, Accepting. At Basle I was the guest of a dear Christian, who had inherited a large house, at the entrance of which was a porter's lodge; but the owner did not go into that lodge and say it would be presumption to take possession of the house. When he received the title-deeds, he at once entered and occupied the whole mansion. There had been glorious things given to them in the name of Jesus Christ, and many had just gone into the porter's lodge, thinking that it would be presumption to enter further upon the wonderful gifts of God. This was wrong; the true humility was to acknowledge their own helplessness and take the place God gave them. Smith.

9174. GRACE, Adaptation of. Whenever the Lord sets his servants to do extraordinary work, he always gives them extraordinary strength; or if he puts them to unusual suffering, he gives them unusual patience. When we enter upon war with some petty New Zealand chief, our troops expect to have their charges defrayed, and accordingly we pay them gold by thousands, as their expenses may require; but when an army marches against a grim monarch, in an unknown country, who has insulted the British flag, we pay, as we know to our cost, not by thousands but by millions. And thus, if God calls us to common and ordinary trials, he will defray the charges of our warfare by thousands; but if he commands us to an unusual struggle with some tremendous foe, he will discharge the liabilities of our war by millions, according to the riches of his grace in which he has abounded towards us through Christ Jesus. Spurgeon.

9175. GRACE, Agents of. God is never tied to the use of means and instruments in dispensing his grace. He can work by little or by great means, by few or by many. He hath not limited himself to one way, or time, or manner of speaking, lest we should ascribe the glory to the means, to the tools, rather than to the blessed Workman and Author. Therefore he is pleased ever and anon to change the means, to break his tools, as it were, and throw them away, and make new ones. Hence, if men begin to think that a temple at Jerusalem hath any salvation in it, he will burn it up, and be worshiped in spirit and truth in every cottage. Samuel Mather.

9176. GRACE, Dishonoring. What would you think of one who was allowed to light his dwelling at night as brilliantly as he would, without cost, who should only kindle a solitary jet amid the darkness of his home, and sit down content in that somber twilight? Or of one who should have free access to a spacious garden filled with bloom, with leave to pluck and gather what he chose, who should only put one foot inside the gate, and take away a single flower? Or of one made welcome to draw from a bank account of millions, who should fill his check for only enough to keep him from absolute starvation? Would these men be any wiser, would they honor their benefactors more than we, to whom Jesus opens all his stores of grace, and who yet keep so faint a spark of spiritual life, and who experience so little of comfort and strength?

Dr. A. L. Stone

9178. GRACE, Experience of. A lady met an aged female groping her way along the street. The lady said "My friend, you seem to be aged and infirm, is your soul at peace with God." "Yes, I am old; next month I shall be ninety-two; but who asks about my soul? You are the first person who ever spoke to me about it." The lady thought she would not lose the opportunity of doing her good, and so accompanied her to her miserable home. She found her an inmate of a low, wretched family, who boarded her for the rent of the hovel they occupied, which belonged to a son in an adjacent city. She had been a wayward youth, with an ungovernable temper that had driven husband and children from her; she had led a life of infamy for twenty-five years, followed by wretchedness and poverty. Discarded by friends, and disowned by her own son, she was reaping the bitter wages of sin. She had retained her mind wonderfully for one so aged, and the instructions in childhood, of the blessed precepts of the Bible, were not altogether lost. Daily was she visited and labored with until God saw fit to bless her by sending the Holy Ghost to enlighten her darkened mind, and break the bondage of sin. A year from that time friends were called around her death-bed. Her last words were, "I am a great, great sinner, but Jesus is a great, great Saviour; glory be to his name."

9179. GRACE, Fountain of. All who ever have received grace have received it from the fullness of Jesus Christ. This is the common well of salvation, out of which all believers draw the water of life: there is no access to God but by him. Believers under the law received grace from this fountain, as well as those under the gospel: though the measure was different, yet the fountain was the same; as it is the same face which is veiled and at another time unveiled, as it is the same sum written in figures and at full length in plain words, so Christ and his grace was the same under the Old Testament and under the New. There is no difference in the substance of the promise and covenant of grace then and now. Christ is yesterday and to-day the same, the difference is only in circumstances—the manifestation under the Gospel is clearer, and the propagation of the Gospel is now of a larger extent to all nations.

Colwill.

9180. GRACE, Fullness of. The soul is the fullness of the body, actuating each part; God is the fullness of the soul; raising it, that there be nothing low; filling it up, that there be no painful want; filling it out, that there be no ugly wrinkles. The sea-plants lie flat, flabby and formless when the tide is out; but when that returns, they rise and stand, and beautifully wave themselves amid the vitalizing element; every stem full, every leaf full, every pore and vessel full. Thus it is with believers when flowed around and flowed into by the fullness of God. A heart enriched with this plenitude does more than occasionally advert to God, or draw near to him at times, as a duty or a necessity; God is its atmosphere, its abode. The apprehension of him is abiding; the reference to him habitual; the help from him unceasing. Into that soul Jehovah brings the court and kingdom of heaven, and makes it the wonder and admiration of the very angels."

Thomas Collins.

9181. GRACE, Gifts versus. There is many a learned head in hell. Gifts are the gold that beautifies the temple; but grace is as the temple which sanctifies the gold. One tear, one groan, one breathing of an upright heart is more than the tongues of angels. John Flavel.

9182. GRACE and Glory. Inherent grace below resembles silver in the ore, which, though genuine silver, is mingled with much earth and dross: glory above resembles silver refined to its proper standard, and wrought into vessels of the most exquisite workmanship. Salter.

9183. GRACE, God of All. Men talk about grace, but they don't know much about it. These bankers, they talk about grace. If you want to borrow a thousand dollars, if you can give good security, they will let you have it and take your note, and you give your note and say, "So many months after date I promise to pay a thousand dollars." Then they give you what they call three days' grace, but they make you pay interest for those three days. That ain't grace. Then when your note comes due, if you can't pay but $950, they would sell everything you have got and make you pay the $50. Grace is giving the interest, principal and all. I tell you, if you want to get any grace, you must know God. He is the God of all grace. He wants to deal in grace; he wants to deal with that unmerited mercy, undeserved favor, unmerited love; and if God don't love man until he is worthy of his love, he won't have time for very much love for him.

Moody.

9184. GRACE, Growth of. The growth of grace in the heart may be compared to the process of polishing metals. First, you have a dark opaque substance, neither possessing nor reflecting light. Presently, as the polisher plies his work, you will see here and there a spark darting out, then a strong light, till, by-and-by, it sends back a perfect image of the sun which shines upon it. So the work of grace, if begun in our hearts, must be gradually and continually going on; and it will not be completed till the image of God can be perfectly reflected in us.

Salter.

9185. GRACE, Increase of. So much of the spirit of grace and truth as we have here, is but the earnest and handsel of a greater sum, the seed and first fruits of a fuller harvest. Therefore the apostle mentions "a growing change from glory to glory by the Spirit of God." We must not expect a fullness till "the time of the restitution of all things," till that day of redemption and adoption, wherein the light which is here but sown for the righteous, shall grow up into a full harvest of holiness and of glory.

Bp. Reynolds.

9186. GRACE, Living with. Mr. Whitefield found it impossible to live peaceably with a person whom he admitted to be a Christian. Concerning this he said, "Grace can live where I cannot."

9187. GRACE, Maturity in. Maturity in grace makes us willing to part with worldly goods; the green apple needs a sharp twist to separate it from the bough; but the ripe fruit parts readily from the wood. Maturity in grace makes it easier to part with life itself; the unripe pear is scarcely beaten down with much labor, while its mellow companion drops readily into the hand with the slightest shake. Rest assured that love to the things of this life, and cleaving to this present state, are sure indications of immaturity in the divine life.

Spurgeon.

9188. GRACE, More. Rowland Hill tells a story of a rich man and a poor man of his congregation. The rich man came to Mr. Hill with a sum of money which he wished to give to the poor man, and asked Mr. Hill to give it to him as he thought best, either all at once or in small amounts. He sent the poor man a five pound note, with the indorsement—"More to follow." Every few months came the remittance with the same message—"More to follow." So it is with grace.

9189. GRACE, Moment by Moment. God does not give a reserve stock of grace which you can look at and say, "That is mine." He just gives you minute by minute, and moment by moment, what is needed. It is like this: suppose a man says to his friend, "I will give you an empty purse, and in it you shall find any money you want the very minute you want it. I shall never give you any to keep in your pocket, but you may go to your purse for anything." Would that man be a very rich man, or a very poor man? I think he would be both. If he wanted a penny to buy a newspaper, he must call on his friend, and go to his purse for it; if he wanted a shilling, he could go for that; if he wanted a hundred pounds, he could go for that; he could get anything he wanted, but there would be something he could not do—he could not put money on the table, and look at it and say, "What a rich man I am." He would get up with an empty purse, and go to bed with an empty purse, and yet he would have all he needed. That is the way God gives us his grace, never more than we need for the very minute—always quite enough.

A. Monod.

9190. GRACE, Mutiny against. It is true, indeed, grace, wherever it is, hath a principle in itself that makes it desire and endeavor to preserve itself according to its strength, but, being overpowered, must perish, except assisted by God, as fire in green wood (which deadens and damps the part kindled) will in time go out, except blown up, or more fire be put to that little; so will grace in the heart. God brings his grace into the heart by conquest. Now, as in a conquered city, though some yield and become true subjects to the conqueror, yet others plot how they may shake off this yoke, and therefore it requires the same power to keep as to win it at first. The Christian hath an unregenerate part, that is discontented at this new change in the heart, and disdains as much to come under the sweet government of Christ's sceptre as the Sodomites that Lot should judge them—"What! this fellow, a stranger, control us?"—and Satan heads this mutinous rout against Christians: so that if God should not continually reinforce this his new planted colony in the heart, the very natives—I mean, corruptions that are left—would come out of their dens and holes where they lie lurking, and eat up the little grace the holiest on earth hath: it would be as bread to these devourers.

Gurnall.

9191. GRACE, Necessity of. It is a remark, I think, of Archbishop Whateley, that in all European languages the words which express forgiveness imply a free gift. Wickliffe used quaintly to pray, "Lord save us gratis;" and until we truly recognize that we are "justified freely by his grace" we shall be shooting with arrows that are pointless and unfeathered, and cannot hope to receive the fruit of our labor. It was this doctrine that brought comfort to Luther's troubled heart when the poor simple monk, who had not the ability to solve his doubts, and to whom he turned in his wretchedness and despair, repeated to him his own ground of hope, "I believe in the forgiveness of sins."

Pilkington.

9192. GRACE, Oil of. Then I saw in my dream that the Interpreter took Christian by the hand, and led him into a place where was a fire burning against a wall, and one standing by it, always casting much water upon it, to quench it; yet did the fire burn higher and hotter. "Then," said Christian, "what means this?" The Interpreter answered, "This fire is the work of grace that is wrought in the heart; he that casts water upon it, to extinguish and put it out, is the devil; but, in that thou seest the fire, notwithstanding, burns higher and hotter, thou shalt also see the reason of that." So he had him about to the back side of the wall, where he saw a Man with a vessel of oil in his hand, of which he did also continually cast, but secretly, into the fire. "Then," said Christian, "what means this?" The Interpreter answered, "This is Christ, who continually, with the oil of his grace, maintains the work already begun in the heart; by means of which, notwithstanding what the devil can do, the souls of his people prove gracious still. And in that thou sawest that the Man stood behind the wall to maintain the fire, this is to teach thee that it is hard for the tempted to see how this work of grace is maintained in the soul." Bunyan.

9193. GRACE, Parable of. A friend of mine gave me this illustration of grace. Suppose, said he, that a man had a beautiful farm on the side of a mountain. Everything was in an enclosure. He had a great wall all around it. Everything within the walls was bright and green, while everything outside was hot and dried up. One day there came a messenger to the man that had the beautiful farm, and he said to him: "Sir, you have a beautiful, flourishing farm, but I want to make it better. I will increase its fertility; I will make it a thousand times better than it now is." "No," says the farmer, "my farm is good enough; you can do nothing to better it;" and drove him away. He wouldn't have his farm made better, and he built his walls still higher to keep all men out. Up in the mountain near the house was a fountain. Its stream was used to irrigate and beautify the farm, and from it the crystal waters came to the garden. And the man that sent to him said to himself, "This man won't let me make his garden more beautiful; he won't accept my kindness. I will build up a wall and cut the stream off." When the wall arose around the fountain's head the waters ceased to flow to the farm; the flowers began to fade and wither, and soon every thing presented the appearance of desolation and ruin. So the Lord of glory comes and wants to give us his grace, but we spurn it, refuse to accept his blessing, and we perish. Why, Christ had the hardest work of his ministration to teach this subject even to his apostles. When they were offered grace they wouldn't have it. They couldn't keep grace in the country. They built up a wall of unbelief, the stream of grace ceased to flow to them, and what was the result? The garden that once was there is now the only dried up and withered spot on the whole mountain round about. Grace has flowed out to the Gentiles and to all the nations, and what a blessing it has been! It was just because they built a wall of unbelief. That is just what the sinner is doing now. But if you'll only let the grace flow, nothing can hinder you from getting a blessing.

Moody.

9194. GRACE, Perquisites of. When the great bargain is concluded between God and the soul of man, God throws in the good and needful things of this life, as unworthy of mention in so great a transaction. Like the farmer who sells a large and valuable farm, he throws in certain second-hand implements of husbandry, or, like the importing merchant, who, in selling one of his ships, throws in any cordage or other shipstores that may be lying about the vessel; while he who seeks to get "all these things" without securing the kingdom of God, will be like the sailor, who, with ship-stores, finds when too late he has not the ship. In securing the greater, we get the less; but if we look only for the less, we shall fail to possess the greater, or enjoy the less.

Hopkins.

9195. GRACE, Power of. Fifty years ago, a young school-master in Georgia, commenced a prayer-meeting, with such success as to arouse a blatant infidel, who boasted that he would be present at the next meeting and show that all Christians were "fools and liars." The school-master was dismayed. The circuit preacher was sick, but God sent Rev. John O. Andrew there that night, and he led the meeting. The infidel took a seat at the place where the leader must stand, and by him stood the preacher. The hymn over, the preacher requested all to kneel. The skeptic knelt with the others, after the Southern custom, and was greatly surprised when the minister asked him to pray. He thought it better to brave it than back down, and began, not as he had intended, "Lord, thou knowest I never did pray; thou knowest I cannot pray." "That's right, brother," said the minister, "tell him the truth, and he will help you." A few more efforts by the sceptic to say something, and the spirit of conviction came upon him, and he began to cry, "O Lord, have mercy on me." The room resounded with sobs and responses to his prayer. This continued for a half hour, when the skeptic found himself wonderfully changed, and magnified the grace of God. He became as strong for God as he had been for Satan, and was faithful to the end. Many have found Christ who sought him not.

9196. GRACE, Prayer for. A poor man in England before eating asked a blessing in these words, which were found written on a slip of paper, "Lord, give me grace to feel my need of grace; and give me grace to ask for grace; and give me grace to receive grace; and, O Lord, when grace is given, give me grace to use it. Amen."

9197. GRACE, Preservation of. How shall a wooden vessel be kept water-tight, so that the precious supply of the household may not ooze through its joints into the ground? Keep it always full of water. It is by a similar method that grace may be preserved in the heart of a Christian. Keep the vessel full, and it will not leak.

Anon.

9198. GRACE, Receiving. When Dr. Arnold was in this country I heard him use in a sermon an illustration that impressed me. He said: "Haven't you ever been in a home where the family were at dinner, and haven't you seen the old family dog standing near and watching his master, and looking at every morsel of food as if he wished he had it? If his master drops a crumb he at once licks it up and devours it. But if he should set the dish of roast beef down and say, 'Come, come,' he wouldn't touch it—it's too much for him. So with God's children; they are willing to take a crumb, but refuse when God wants them to go for the platter." God wants you to come right to the throne of grace, and to come boldly. A while ago I learned from the Chicago papers that there had been a run on the banks there, and many of them were broken. What a good thing it would be to get up a run on the Bank of Heaven! What a glorious thing to get up a run on the throne of grace! God is able to help thee and deliver thee if you will only come to him. That's what grace is for. I want you to turn to the 8th verse of the 9th chapter of 2 Corinthians. I want you to mark that verse. If you have got your Bibles with you, draw a black mark right around that verse. Many want to know why Christians fail. It's because they don't come to God for grace. It's not because he hasn't got the ability. Men fail because they try to do too large a business on too small a capital. So with Christians; but God has got grace enough and capital enough. What would you think of a man who had $1,000,000 in the bank and only drew out a penny a day? That's you and I, and the sinner is blinder than we are. The throne of grace is established, and there we are to get all the grace we need. Sin is not so strong as the arm of God. He will help and deliver you if you will come and get the grace you need.

Moody.

919. GRACE, Reign of. Rom. 5: 21. The apostle represents grace as a mighty monarch triumphing over a cruel usurper. Sin and grace both have their kingdoms; but the grand and final victory must belong to grace. St. Paul has been, not without impropriety, called "the apostle of grace." No New Testament writer so exalts and dwells upon "the riches"—"the exceeding riches" of grace. How he magnifies it—in his own experience, 1 Cor. 15: 10; 1 Tim. 1: 12-16; Gal. 1: 15, 16; and in the calling of the Gentiles, Eph. 3: 2, 7, 8, where he multiplies words to make the strongest superlatives—"the gift of the grace given!" All his fourteen epistles close with the prayer for grace. It seems to have been his sign-manual, which no other apostle used during his life-time, though St. John used it after his death. The word χάρις, so common to St. Paul and to St. Luke, is seldom or never used by St. Matthew or St. Mark. Gen. 3: 15.—The first promise. It is a fact which should never be forgotten, how entirely the first promise speaks of grace. Our first parents sinned, but they showed no signs of repentance; they sought no pardon; they made no confession; they prayed no prayer; they fled from the Creator, and hid themselves amongst the trees of the garden! Truly, it was all of grace that the Lord came to them; it was his own free thought of love that gave the first acorn promise of redemption! Rev. 22: 17, 21. The last words of Revelation still speak of grace; the echo lingers. Despite all the accumulated guilt of man from Adam's days, and the attempts of thousands to poison the sweet waters, the river of the water of life still flows fresh and bright and full. As the first promise came by grace, so the last offer of a free salvation speaks of the same: only the river flows in a wider, broader channel.

9200. GRACE Seeking the Sinner. Abraham, of Mesopotamia, having sought in vain for happiness in the field of honor, wealth, and love, abandoned all—riches, friends, and wife—for a hermitage in the desert. While there, an orphan-girl, seven years of age, named Mary was brought to him, as his next of kin, to educate and care for. He had a cell built for her near his own, and loved her as a father. At the age of twenty she became enamored of a young man, who led her away from her uncle, and then abandoned her. She fell into the degradation of reckless women. Her uncle grieved greatly over her sad fate, and sent out inquiries in all directions that he might discover her whereabouts. He learned that she was at Assos, a city of the Troad. Then he broke down the door of his cell, cast off his sackcloth garment, and, disguising himself as a soldier, he went forth to recover his fallen niece. He hired a lodging next door to her house, but could get no opportunity to speak to her. Then he went to her house, ordered supper, and bade that Mary should eat with him. She came to the supper adorned with jewels and trinkets, and wantonly dressed, talking lightly and laughing loudly. Her uncle knew her, and was so overcome with grief that he could hardly restrain his emotions. Seeing this, the girl looked closely in his face, and discovered something which recalled other days. Her eyes met the tearful eyes of her uncle, and she cried, "Oh, God! would that I had died three years ago! This man recalls to me my dear old uncle, and days of innocence and joy." Then he threw back his hood, and caught her by the hands, saying, "Mary, my child!" She recognized him, and swooned away. He moaned over her, and said, "My dearest child, what has befallen thee? O, why didst thou not reveal to me thy first temptation, and I would have besieged heaven with tears and prayers to save thee? Why didst thou desert me, and bring this intolerable anguish upon me?" She was speechless before him. "My own Mary, wilt thou not speak to me?" he pleaded. His whole frame was shaken, and his tears flowed in streams. "Upon me be thy sin, my child," he said. "I will answer for it at the Judgment-day of God. I will suffer in expiation of thy crime. Only return, my child." Full of contrition, she answered, "I cannot look thee in the face, uncle, and how can I call on God, whom I have so outraged?" "I will bear the burden of thy sin. Let it weigh on me, Mary. Only return to the old place, and I will pray instantly for thee. Come, child, follow!" She fell at his feet, sobbing, kissed them, and said, "I will follow thee, uncle." He caught her up, and bade her fly at once. She desired to gather up her rich dresses and jewelry, but he said, "Leave them, leave them; they scent of evil." Then, says the legend, he took her on his back, as a shepherd carries his strayed sheep, and returned to his solitary life. She was truly reclaimed, and is commemorated in the calendar on March 16.

9201. GRACE, Sin and. These two, grace and sin, are like two buckets of a well; when one is up, the other is down. They are like the two laurels at Rome; when one flourishes, the other withers. The more grace thrives in the soul, the more sin dies in the soul. From naught they grow to be very naught, and from very naught to be stalk naught. Lactant said of Lucian, Nec Diis, nec hominibus pepercit, he spareth neither God nor man. Brooks.

9202. GRACE, Sovereign. Oh, how sovereign! Oh, how sovereign! Grace is the only thing that can make us like God. I might be dragged through heaven, earth, and hell, and I should be still the same sinful, polluted wretch, unless God himself should renew and cleanse me.

Dying words of Payson.

9203. GRACE, Symbol of. "As thy day so shall thy strength be." The woman who had lost her husband went to Elisha with a story that would move the heart of Elisha or any one else. Her husband had died a bankrupt and they would sell her boys into slavery. She came to Elisha and told her story. He asked her what she had to pay. She replied a pot of oil. Elisha told her to go home, "borrow vessels, not a few, take oil and pour into the empty vessels." Men in these times wouldn't believe in this. They would say, "What, take a pot of oil and pour into all these vessels—what good will that do?" Not so with this poor widow. She has faith and does as she is told. She goes to her neighbors and asks for vessels; they can lend her a few. She takes all they have and goes on. She clears out the next house, and the next, and the next. "Borrow," says the prophet, and she goes on until her house is filled with vessels. "Now close the doors," she says to her sons. And she pours oil into the first vessel and fills it full, and the next, and the next, and the next, in the same way. She pours it in, and pours it in, and the boys run and get more vessels, until the house is full of oil. Then she goes to Elisha and asks what she shall do. He tells her "Go sell the oil and pay the debt." Now, Christ pays the debt and gives us enough to live on besides. He doesn't merely pay our debt—he gives us enough to live on. He gives according to our need. Moody.

9204. GRACE, Throne of. There is no court in all God's dominions that a sinner can come to and find any mercy or grace but only at a throne of grace. If you talk of law, or justice, or equity, these are all frightful courts to sensible sinners. They know their cause and their case is bad, and that if they come to any bar but that of the throne of grace they must be cast. But at this throne of grace they that have nothing may get all things, they that deserve nothing may get everything, they that deserve wrath may obtain mercy, they that are cast and condemned at the court of justice may be acquitted and freed from all sentences, and be adjudged to eternal life by the grace of God in Christ Jesus. All that is needful for salvation is dispensed at this throne. Yet all that is given is old in the purpose of grace from eternity—old in the everlasting covenant, old in the purchase of Jesus Christ; only it is newly given according to the sinner's necessity. Robert Traill.

9205. GRACE, Tide of. There are seasons more favorable and full of grace than others. In this there is nothing surprising, but much that is in harmony with the common dispensations of Providence. Does not the success of the farmer, seaman, merchant—of men in many other circumstances—chiefly depend on their seizing opportunities which come and go like showers; which flow and ebb like the tides of the ocean? The sea is not always full. Twice a day she deserts her shores, and leave the vessels high and dry upon the beach; so that they who would sail must wait and watch, and take the tide; and larger ships can only get afloat, or, if afloat, get across the bar and into harbor, when, through a favorable conjunction of celestial influences, the sea swells in stream or spring tides beyond her common bounds. The seaman has his spring-tides; the husbandman has his spring-time; and those showers, and soft winds, and sunny hours, on the prompt and diligent improvement of which the state of the barn and granary depends. Guthrie.

9207. GRACEFULNESS, Traits of. Gracefulness is an idea not very different from beauty: it consists in much the same things. Gracefulness is an idea belonging to posture and motion. In both these, to be graceful, it is requisite that there be no appearance of difficulty; there is required a small inflexion of the body, and a composure of the parts in such a manner as not to encumber each other, not to appear divided by sharp and sudden angles. In this ease, this roundness, this delicacy of attitude and motion, it is that all the magic of grace consists, and what is called its je ne sais quoi, as will be obvious to any observer who considers attentively the Venus de Medici, the Antinous, or any statue generally allowed to be graceful in a high degree. Burke.

9208. GRACES, Chain of. It is most certain there is a chain of graces linked together, and they who have one have all in some good measure. They who have a lively hope have fervent love to God; and they who love God love their neighbors; and they who love God and neighbor hate sin; and they who hate sin sorrow for it; and they who sorrow for sin will avoid the occasion of it; and they that are thus watchful will pray fervently; and they who pray will meditate; and they who pray and meditate at home will join seriously in the public worship of God. Thus graces are combined and holy duties linked together, and no grace is alone. N. Parkhurst.

9209. GRACES, Development of the. Every man that has cultivated fruit knows that no tree can bear very richly the first year. The first year a tree bears, the fruit is of the lowest quality; the second year it is a little better; the third year it is still better; the fourth year it is better yet; and it continues to improve every year until the tenth; and then you begin to know what is the best thing that tree can do. Trees have to go through a maturing process of ten years' duration before they can bear fruit of the highest flavors. So it is with the Christian. Beecher.

9210. GRACES, Production of the. We go to God and say, "Lord, give me humility," and we should be glad if God would drop it right down to us. We ask him for faith, patience, and for spiritual joy and insight; we ask for willingness to live or to die; we ask for these higher developments. But, my friends, these are tropical plants; they never grow in any other climate than a climate as hot as love. You must have this fundamental quality, and you have to carry it to a high degree of development before it is possible to have these Christian graces. Suppose a man should plant orange and lemon trees in Canada, and pray that God would give him heavy crops. People would say, the climate of Canada is not able to produce oranges and lemons. If a man goes down to the southern part of Florida he need not pray much to have a large crop of oranges and lemons; but if he plants them in Kamtschatka, he would not get them by all the prayers he might offer. We cannot have right virtues without right conditions. Here are men who are selfish and worldly, full of bartering and trafficking affections—men who live in a low and chilled state, and yet praying for these higher graces, thinking that if they could once get those graces they would rise into a warmer state; but they must get into a warmer state where these graces will grow, before they can have them. Change the climate of the soul, and these will become spontaneous and fruitful. As selfishness is the bane and the curse of life, so this love that is disinterested, and that serves, is the bounty and the divinity of life. Beecher.

9212. GRAFTING, New Process of. If you should go over one of our large nurseries in the month of August, and look down through the long even rows of young trees, you would see in front of every row perhaps one man, perhaps several, sitting on the ground doing something to the trees. If you should go close up to one of them, you would see that he takes in his fingers a tiny bud, not so big as the end of your finger, makes a little slit with a sharp knife in the bark of the young tree, and slips in the bud. If it lives and grows, the tree will bear just such fruit as that one from which the bud was taken. But why does he not let the young trees alone? Some are apple-trees, some pears, some peaches. Why does he not let them grow up to bear just such fruit as they naturally would? Because, in most cases, the natural fruit would be worthless. The owner and master of the nursery wants his trees to bear the very best fruit; so he puts in buds of the very best kind, and the tree is changed, and bears different fruit from its own natural product. If you go into a Sunday-school, you will see exactly the same process going on. Anon.

9213. GRAFTING, Practice of. "Can the fig-tree, my brethren, bear olive berries?" This metaphor is one which the Roman gardeners endeavored to realize. Pliny says, "After that the fig-tree hath gotten some strength, and is grown to a sufficient highness to bear a graft, the branch or bough of the olive being well cleansed and made neat, and the head end thereof thwited (sic) and shaped sharp, howbeit not yet cut from the mother stock, must be set fast in the shank of the fig-tree, where it must be kept well and surely tied with bands. For the space of three years it is suffered to grow indifferently between two mothers, or rather by the means thereof two mother stocks are grown and united together; but in the fourth year it is cut wholly from the own mother, and is become altogether an adopted child to the fig-tree wherein it is incorporate. A pretty device, I assure you, to make a fig-tree bear olives, the secret whereof is not known to every man."

9214. GRAIL, Legend of the Holy. The Holy Grail, according to some legends of the middle ages, was the cup used by our Saviour in dispensing the wine at the last supper; and according to others, the platter on which the paschal lamb was served at the last Passover observed by our Lord. By some it was said to have been preserved by Joseph of Arimathea, who received into it the blood which flowed from the Redeemer's wounds as he hung on the cross. By others it was said to have been brought down from heaven by angels, and committed to the charge of a body of knights, who guarded it on the top of a lofty mountain. This cup, according to the legend if approached by any one but a perfectly pure and holy person, would be borne away and vanish from their sight. This led to the quest of the Holy Grail, which was to be sought for on every side by a knight who was perfectly chaste in thought, word, and act. Webster.

9215. GRATITUDE, Christian. Gratitude is a temper of mind which denotes a desire of acknowledging the receipt of a benefit. The mind which does not so feel is not as it ought to be. When the apostle Paul says of the heathen, "Neither were they thankful," he seems to stamp the sin of ingratitude as peculiarly odious. But, like every other grace which is required of us, virtuous gratitude depends, in part, on right views. A right view of benefits received, of the source from whence they flow, and of our own demerit, has a direct tendency to excite gratitude; and while the mind is influenced by sovereign grace, this will be the pleasing effect. The devout Christian surveys the sovereign benevolence of the Creator in every person, in every object, in every quality, and in every event. Sovereign benevolence forces itself on every sense, and pervades his grateful heart. And then, when he extends his views to a future state, and contemplates the operations of grace—sovereign, distinguishing efficacious grace—he is melted into reverential awe and grateful praise, and exclaims, "Why me, Lord?" Glory, everlasting glory to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb of God that was slain, who hath redeemed us to God by his blood, and hath given us the earnest of his own inheritance.

E. Williams.

9216. GRATITUDE, Effect of. A gentleman of fortune, but a stranger to personal religion, one evening took a solitary walk through part of his grounds. He happened to come near a mean hut, where a poor man lived with a numerous family, who earned their bread by daily labor. He heard a continued and pretty loud voice. Not knowing what it was, curiosity prompted him to listen. The man happened to be at prayer with his family. So soon as he could distinguish the words, he heard him giving thanks to God, for the goodness of his providence, in giving them food to eat and raiment to put on, and in supplying them with what was necessary and comfortable in the present life. He was immediately struck with astonishment and confusion, and said to himself, "Does this poor man, who has nothing but the meanest fare, and that purchased by severe labor, give thanks to God for his goodness to himself and family; and I, who enjoy ease and honor, and everything that is pleasant and desirable, have hardly ever bent my knee, or made any acknowledgment to my Maker and Preserver!" This occurrence was the means of bringing him to a real sense of religion.

9217. GRATITUDE, Example of. A ship was sailing in a very rough sea, when the cry was heard, "Man overboard." Volunteers only would be expected to attempt a rescue in such a sea. The mate and two sailors were lowered and rowed for the man. As they rose upon a mountain wave they saw the man in the distance and shouted "coming." After a heroic and perilous struggle they reached him as he was ready to sink. They then thought of their frightful distance from the ship, and struggled for life to regain it. They reached the vessel, and were drawn safely upon the deck. The mate says, "We were all exhausted, but the rescued man could neither speak nor walk; yet he had a full sense of his condition. He clasped our feet, and began to kiss them. We disengaged ourselves from his embrace. He then crawled after us, and, as we stepped back to avoid him, he followed us, looking up at one moment with smiles and tears, and then patting our wet foot-prints with his hand, he kissed them with an eager fondness. I never witnessed such a scene in my life. If he had been our greatest enemy, he would have been perfectly subdued by our kindness. The man was a passenger. During the whole remaining part of the voyage he showed the deepest gratitude, and when we reached the port he loaded us with presents." Christ did more than this for the soul of man. What a debt we owe him?

9218. GRATITUDE, Flow of. "The currents of grace run in circles as well as those of nature. The electric current does not go along the wire unless it comes back through the earth to complete the circle. A picture of it is seen in a well-known apparatus for ventilation. Two tubes joined together, stretch from the interior of a building through the roof into the air. The air flows up through one lobe of the tube out of the building, and down through the other lobe into the building. When the process is set agoing it continues. But if you stop the ascending current, you thereby also make the descending current to cease; and if you stop the descending current, the ascending one is arrested too." So, when the soul is united to God, it receives blessings and completes the circuit by constant returns of gratitude and thanksgiving.

9219. GRATITUDE, Humble. Two cardinals saw a shepherd in the field weeping, asked the cause, and endeavored to console him. At first he refused to tell, but finally acknowledged that it was gratitude to God, for making man so comely a creature, instead of so deformed as the little toad. The cardinals thought of the advantages they had over this poor man, and cried out, "O, St. Austin! how truly didst thou say, 'the unlearned rise and take heaven by force, and we, with all our learning, wallow in flesh and blood!'"

9220. GRATITUDE, Immoderate. Darius, before he was king, was on an expedition to Egypt. Here he saw Syloson walking in the marketplace in a glittering cloak. Darius went to him and desired to buy the cloak, but Syloson told him "he would not sell it, but would give it him on the condition, that he would never part with it." Darius received it and in process of time became king. Syloson then came to Susa the palace, saying he was one that deserved well of the king, and sought an audience. Darius seeing him exclaimed, "O thou most generous among men, art thou he, who, when I had no power, gavest me that cloak, which though small in itself, was yet as acceptable then as greater things would be to me now? I will reward thee with silver and gold."

But Syloson said, "Give me neither silver or gold, but give me the kingdom of my dead brother, which is now ruled over by a servant." And Darius rewarded him with a kingdom for a cloak.

9221. GRATITUDE, Lesson of. A well-to-do farmer who ridiculed Christianity, and never attended church, was led there by the fame of the preacher. He heard a sermon from the text: "The ox knoweth his owner," etc. At the time he was disgusted with all he saw and heard. Not long after, in a very irritable mood, he undertook to plough a field. One of his oxen stepped over the chain. He flew at it in a rage, and beat it mercilessly. After this, while passing in front of the abused ox, he looked up in his master's face and licked his arm. The text above came to his mind with power. He felt his own baseness, unyoked his oxen and gave up work, that he might get out of his trouble. He was led to a profession of Christianity, and over the stall of the abused ox, now his favorite, he placed the motto: "The ox knoweth his owner."

9222. GRATITUDE, Unchanging. When the Caliph Haroun al Raschid had put to death his Vizier, Jaffier Bermekee, he ordered that none should speak in praise of the latter under pain of death. One old Arab continued to declare the merits of the late minister. He was summoned into the monarch's presence, and asked how he dared to transgress. "I should have been a monster of ingratitude had I not," said the Arab, and then proceeded to relate how Jaffier had taken notice of him, and at length raised him from poverty and obscurity to position and affluence, "I owe all to him," he continued; "and was it possible for me to be deterred by death itself from doing justice to his memory?" Struck with the courage and fidelity of the man, the Caliph sought to gain his admiration by more splendid generosity than that of the Vizier, and presented him with his golden sceptre, studded with precious jewels. "I take it," cried the grateful but undaunted Arab; "but this also, Commander of the Faithful, is from Bermekee!"

9223. GRAVE, Distance to the. As a tract of country narrowed in the distance, expands itself when we approach, thus the way to our near grave appears to us as long as it did formerly when we were far off.

9224. GRAVE, Meditation at the. The grave of those we loved, what a place for meditation! There it is that we call up in long review the whole history of virtue and gentleness, and the thousand endearments, lavished upon us, almost unheeded, in the daily intercourse of intimacy; there it is that we dwell upon the tenderness, the solemn, awful tenderness, of the parting scene. The bed of death, with all its stifled griefs, its noiseless attendance, its mute, watchful assiduities; the last testimonies of expiring love! the feeble, fluttering, thrilling, oh, how thrilling, pressure of the hand; the last fond look of the glazing eye, turning upon us, even from the threshold of existence! the faint, faltering accents, struggling in death to give one more assurance of affection!

W. Irving.

9225. GRAVE, No Work in the. In the Peruvian collection at the Centennial Exhibition were mummies and relics of the Incas, supposed to be three thousand years old. These people had not heard the word, "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge in the grave." They buried the warrior and his bows and arrows together, beside the workman his tools were placed, and with the housewife long wooden needles and coarse yarn were laid, that she might go on with her work. Hunger and thirst were expected and provided for. In the hand of a baby mummy was found an ear of corn. Treasures were buried with their owners. Immense wardrobes are found encased with the body of some princess of fashion. The arms, the food, the ready material, the rich toilets, the wealth have remained unused since the day of burial. "Vanity of vanities."

9226. GRAVE, Peaceful Associations of the. It buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment. From its peaceful bosom spring none but fond regrets and tender recollections. Who can look down upon the grave of an enemy, and not feel a compunctious throb that he should have warred with the poor handful of dust that lies mouldering before him?

W. Irving.

9227. GRAVE, Perfumed by Christ. If I wear a rose in my bosom, it scents my whole person. Has the Saviour a place in my breast, he communicates the fragrance of his merits to my soul, and his spirit fills the atmosphere through which I move, as it were with the breath of heaven. Even in death the rose is sweet, passing sweet, and sweetens every place where it lies. Thus the rose of Sharon has given the fragrance of life to the very chambers of death and the grave, and to that wardrobe of the saints where their material garments are to be laid up till the morning of the resurrection, then to be brought forth beautiful and fresh, fit for the court of heaven.

East.

9228. GREAT, Exposure of the. Trees growing upon the tops of lofty mountains are constantly exposed to the winds and storms which are almost incessant there, while peace and calm reign in the vale below. Such is the condition of men high in office—always disturbed, and soon overthrown. One of the English kings had for his coat of arms, a crown upon a bed of thorns.

9229. GREAT, Fear of the. When Lord Brock lay on his death-bed, Rev. Samuel Hardy went to him and said, "My Lord, you of the nobility are the most unhappy men in the world: nobody dares to come near to you to tell you of your faults, or put you in the right way to heaven."

9230. GREAT, Impotence of the. There is none made so great but he may both need the help and service, and stand in fear of the power and unkindness, even of the meanest of mortals.

Seneca.

9231. GREAT, Pretensions of the. I look upon the great as a set of good-natured misguided people, who are indebted to us, and not to themselves, for all the happiness they enjoy. For our pleasure, and not their own, they sweat under a cumbrous heap of finery; for our pleasure the lackeyed train, the slow parading pageant, with all the gravity of grandeur, moves in review; a single coat, or a single footman, answers all the purposes of the most indolent refinement as well; and those who have twenty may be said to keep one for their own pleasure and the other nineteen merely for ours. So true is the observation of Confucius, that we take greater pains to persuade others that we are happy, than in endeavoring to think so ourselves. Goldsmith.

9232. GREAT, Salvation of the. Luther said of Elizabeth, a pious queen of Denmark, "Christ will sometimes carry a queen to heaven." The rich and great are so rarely seen at Christ's altars as to occasion the remark, "Rich men are choice dishes at God's table." Not many great, not many wise, not many noble hath God called.

9233. GREAT MEN, Classes of. Were we to distinguish the ranks of men by their genius and capacity, more than by their virtue and usefulness to the public, great philosophers would certainly challenge the first rank, and must be placed at the top of mankind. So rare is this character, that perhaps there have not as yet been above two in the world who can lay a just claim to it. At least Galileo and Newton seem to me so far to excel all the rest, that I cannot admit any other into the same place with them. Great poets may challenge the second place; and this species of genius, though rare, is yet much more frequent than the former. Of the Greek poets that remain, Homer alone seems to merit this character; of the Romans, Virgil, Horace, and Lucretius; of the English, Milton and Pope; Corneille, Racine, Boileau, and Voltaire of the French; Tasso and Ariosto of the Italians. David Hume.

9234. GREAT MEN, Early Training of. The discourses and rules of philosophy, being once deeply stamped and imprinted on the minds of great personages, will stick so close, that the prince shall seem no other than justice incarnate and animated law. This was the design of Plato's voyage into Sicily—he hoped that the lectures of his philosophy would serve for laws to Dionysius, and bring his affairs into a good posture. But the soul of that unfortunate prince was like paper scribbled all over with the characters of vice; its piercing and corroding quality had stained quite through, and sunk into the very substance of his soul. Whereas, if such persons are to profit by sage lessons, they must be taken when they are at full speed. Plutarch.

9235. GREAT MEN, Fewness of. In the development of any principle or cause, there is a tendency to having fewer conspicuously great men, because it tends to make all men great. One Columbus goes before, but a thousand follow after. One Faust develops printing, but ten thousand better printers live in every land.

One Washington draws his sword for liberty, but an army arises whose devotion, no privation can diminish, and whose ardor no winter can chill. So one Abraham pioneers in the realm of faith, and an army of occupation follows. So one Luther, Wesley, Asbury, explores the realms of power in spiritual life, and is followed, or ought to be, by ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands as heroic in devotion, as sublime in faith, as rich in experience, and in victories as grand.

Dr. H. W. Warren.
9236. GREAT MEN, Idea of. An old lady said that her idea of a great man was "a man who was careful of his clothes, didn't drink spirits, kin read the Bible without spelling the words, and kin eat a cold dinner on wash-day, to save the wimmin folks the trouble of cooking."

9237. GREAT MEN, Influencing. How are their hearts dilated with joy who are benefactors to whole cities, provinces, and kingdoms! And such benefactors are they who instill good principles into those upon whom so many millions do depend. On the other hand, those who debauch the minds of great men—as sycophants, false informers, and flatterers, worse than both, manifestly do—are the centre of all the curses of a nation, as men who do not only infuse deadly poison into the cistern of a private house, but into the public springs of which so many thousands are to drink. He who instructs an ordinary man makes him to pass his life decently and with comfort; but he who instructs a prince, by correcting his errors and clearing his understanding, is a philosopher for the public, by rectifying the very mould and model by which whole nations are formed and regulated. Plutarch.

9238. GREAT MEN, Spirit of. A great man is affable in his converse, generous in his temper, and immovable in what he has maturely resolved upon; and as prosperity does not make him haughty and imperious, so neither does adversity sink him into meanness and dejection; for if ever he shows more spirit than ordinary, it is when he is ill-used and the world frowns upon him; in short, he is equally removed from the extremes of servility and pride, and scorns either to trample upon a worm or sneak to an emperor. Jeremy Collier.

9239. GREAT MEN, Superiority of. Society indeed has its great men and its little men, as the earth has its mountains and its valleys. But the inequalities of intellect, like the inequalities of the surface of our globe, bear so small a proportion to the mass that in calculating its great revolutions they may safely be neglected. The sun illuminates the hills whilst it is still below the horizon, and truth is discovered by the highest minds a little before it becomes manifest to the multitude. This is the extent of their superiority. They are the first to catch and reflect a light which, without their assistance, must in a short time be visible to those who lie far beneath them. The same remark will apply equally to the fine arts. The laws on which depend the progress and decline of poetry, painting, and sculpture, operate with little less certainty than those which regulate the periodical returns of heat and cold, of fertility and barrenness. Those who seem to lead the public taste are, in general, merely outrunning it in the direction which it is spontaneously pursuing. Lord Macaulay.

9240. GREAT MEN, Weakness of. The first Napoleon had a cowardly dread of satire, and could endure any hardship rather than be made to appear ridiculous. This accounts for his enmity to the witty Madame De Stael, whose merciless tongue spared no one. He shrunk from her with morbid apprehension, and wrote autograph notes to Fouché, calling his attention to the placards and verses of the street corners. There is something more than ludicrous in the spectacle of this rude soldier with a million armed men under his command, and half Europe at his feet, sitting down in rage and afright to order Fouché to send a little woman over the frontiers lest she should say something about him for the drawing-rooms of Paris to laugh at. Yet history votes this man a hero. Anon.

9242. GREATNESS, Death and. The reign of Louis XV. of France was that of an oriental monarch. His power was unlimited, and his court presented a scene of luxurious splendor such as never was witnessed in any Christian land. He was depraved and sensual, and had but little regard for his subjects, or sympathy with mankind. The Bastille frowned on France, and the nation lay enchained at the feet of the king. Who that saw this powerful monarch in the glittering saloons of the Palace of Versailles ever dreamed that, in the trying hour of death, he would be left utterly alone? In the spring of 1774 he fell a victim to an infectious disease, contracted by his vices, that made him a spectacle terrible to behold. The sickness proved fatal. He was for a time deceived by court intrigue in respect to his danger, and his mind was filled with terror when he became conscious of his approaching end. "I would fain die as a Christian, and not as an infidel," he gloomily said to one of his profligate companions, as he began to fear for his life. He caused his repentance for his past scandals to be publicly proclaimed; his brain was haunted by the sins of the past, and his remorse in view of eternity was extreme. His courtiers, seeing no hope of his recovery, deserted him, and his guilty and conscience-smitten paramour fled. One domestic only was left to attend him, and she awaited his commands in an outer room. And thus, with no hope to dissipate the clouds that hung over the future, and with no one to soothe his pillow, the unhappy monarch approached his dissolution. It is the night of the 10th of May. He is dying. A lamp has been placed in the window of his chamber, and the domestic has been charged to extinguish the flame as soon as he shall expire; the courtiers flock together in a distant part of the palace, awaiting the signal of his demise. Are those the once smiling eyes that watched him in his revels, that now so eagerly watch for the light to be extinguished? Yes, those impatient watchers are the flatterers of old. So it is ever with the friendship won by the glitter of wealth and power. The old clock of Versailles announces the slow-paced hours. Still the light glimmers and burns. It is midnight. The old clock slowly tolls the hour of twelve. The light is extinguished, and the light-hearted and excited courtiers hurry away to announce to Louis XVI. that he is the king of France. So perishes worldly pomp, and to such an humiliating end comes wickedness in high places. The humblest peasant that dies in the arms of Jesus is more favored than such a king. Anon.

9243. GREATNESS, Empty. Charles V., Emperor of Germany, King of Spain and Lord of the Netherlands, was born at Ghent, in the year 1500. He fought sixty battles, in most of which he was victorious; obtained six triumphs, conquered four kingdoms, and added eight principalities to his dominions; an almost unparalleled instance of worldly prosperity and the greatness of human glory. But all these fruits of his ambition, and all the honors that attended him, could not yield him true and solid satisfaction. Reflecting on the evils and miseries which he had occasioned, and convinced of the emptiness of earthly magnificence, he became disgusted with all the splendor that surrounded him, and spent the rest of his days in retirement. Bib. Treasury.

9244. GREATNESS, Human. We cannot look, however imperfectly, upon a great man, without gaining something by him. He is the living light-fountain, which it is good and pleasant to be near; the light which enlightens, which has enlightened, the darkness of the world; and this, not as a kindled lamp only, but rather a natural luminary, shining by the gift of heaven; a flowing light-fountain, as I say, of native original insight, of manhood and heroic nobleness, in whose radiance all souls feel that it is well with them. Carlyle.

9246. GREATNESS, Immunities of. What right had Alexander over the great number of nations, which did not know even the name of Greece, and had never done him the least injury? The Scythian Ambassador spoke very judiciously when he addressed him in these words: "What have we to do with thee? We never once set our feet in thy country. Are not those who live in woods allowed to be ignorant of thee, and the place from whence thou comest? Thou boastest that the only design of thy marching is to extirpate robbers; thou thyself art the greatest robber in the world." This is Alexander's exact character, in which there is nothing to be rejected. A pirate spoke to him to the same effect, and in stronger terms. Alexander asked him, "What right he had to infest the seas?" "The same that thou hast," replied the pirate, with a generous liberty, "to infest the world; but because I do this in a small ship, I am called a robber, and because thou actest the same part with a great fleet, thou art styled a conqueror."

Rollin.

9247. GREATNESS, Meanness of. Alexander the Great both envied and hated Perdicas, because he was warlike; Lysimachus, because he was skillful in the arts of a general; and Seleucus, because he was of great courage. He was offended with the liberality of Antigonus, the imperial dignity and authority of Attalus, and the prosperous felicity and good fortune of Ptolemæus.

9248. GREATNESS, Mental. Greatness is not a teachable or gainable thing, but the expression of the mind of a God-made great man. Teach, or preach, or labor as you will, everlasting difference is set between one man's capacity and another's; and this God-given supremacy is the priceless thing, always just as rare in the world at one time as another. What you can manufacture or communicate, you can lower the price of, but this mental supremacy is incommunicable; you will never multiply its quantity, nor lower its price; and nearly the best thing that men can generally do is to set themselves, not to the attainment, but the discovery of this; learning to know gold, when we see it, from iron-glance, and diamond from flint-sand, being for most of us a more profitable employment than trying to make diamonds out of our own charcoal.

Ruskin.

9249. GREATNESS, Price of. There is but one method, and that is hard labor; and a man who will not pay that price for greatness, had better at once dedicate himself to the pursuit of the fox, or sport with the tangles of Neera's hair, or talk of bullocks, and glory in the goad!

S. Smith.

9250. GREATNESS, Religious. The greatness of all actions is measured by the worthiness of the subject from which they proceed, and the object whereabout they are conversant. We must of necessity, in both respects, acknowledge that this present world affordeth not anything comparable unto the duties of religion. Hooker.

9251. GREATNESS, Simplicity of. The Rev. J. Wesley once preached at Lincoln from Luke 10: 42: "One thing is needful." When the congregation were retiring from the church, a lady exclaimed, in a tone of great surprise, "Is this the great Mr. Wesley, of whom we hear so much in the present day? Why, the poorest might have understood him." The gentleman to whom this remark was made, replied, "In this, madam, he displays his greatness; that, while the poorest can understand him, the most learned are edified, and cannot be offended."

9252. GREATNESS, Title to. He alone is worthy of the appellation who does great things, or teaches how they may be done, or describes them with a suitable majesty when they have been done; but those only are great things which tend to render life more happy, which increase the innocent enjoyments and comforts of existence, or which pave the way to a state of future bliss more permanent and more pure. Milton.

9253. GREATNESS, True. Greatness lies not in being strong, but in the right using of strength; and strength is not used rightly when it only serves to carry a man above his fellows for his own solitary glory. He is greatest whose strength carries up the most hearts by the attraction of his own. Beecher.

9254. GREATNESS, Worth of. The great highway of human welfare lies along the highway of steadfast well-doing; and they who are the most persistent, and work in the truest spirit, will invariably be the most successful: success treads on the heels of every right effort. Smiles.

9255. GREED, Fable of. A man in the mint was told that he might take away one pocket-full of gold, if he would run right straight home with it and not stop by the way nor touch his pocket. So he filled his largest pocket full of gold and started for home. But as he was running down a little hill the gold hung heavy, tore off his pocket, and fell down in the road. When he had got home, and found his gold and his pocket gone together, "Alas!" said he, "had I taken less I should have more."

T. K. Beecher.

9256. GREEDINESS, Fatal. A certain man had the good fortune to possess a goose that laid him a golden egg every day. But dissatisfied with so slow an income, and thinking to seize the whole treasure at once, he killed the goose; and cutting her open, found her—just what any other goose would be! Much wants more and loses all. Aesop.

9257. GREGREE, Mohammedan. The Mohammedans of Western Africa wear amulets called gregrees for protection from danger, and as ornaments. One wears it as a protection from drowning, another as a shield from a musket shot, and so on. They consist of scraps of the Koran, in Arabic, encased in leather or colored cloth, and are variously worn upon the person. They are also hung up in their shops and houses. The gregrees are prepared by the priests and sold to the deluded people.

9258. GRIEF, Beneficial. Grief, like night, is salutary. It cools down the soul, by putting out its feverish fires; and if it oppresses her, it also compresses her energies. The load once gone, she will go forth with greater buoyancy to new pleasures. Pulsford.

9259. GRIEF, Brevity of. All grief for what cannot in the course of nature be helped, soon wears away; in some sooner indeed, in some later; but it never continues very long, unless where there is madness, such as will make a man have pride so fixed in his mind as to imagine himself a king; or any other passion in an unreasonable way: for all unnecessary grief is unwise, and therefore will not long be retained by a sound mind. If indeed, the cause of our grief is occasioned by our own misconduct, if grief is mingled with remorse of conscience, it should be lasting. Dr. Johnson.

9260. GRIEF, Consolation for. A steamer was sinking with hundreds of persons on board. Only one boat load was saved. As a man was leaping into the boat, a girl who could not be taken into the boat, and who knew that she must soon be drowned, handed him a note, saying, "Give this to my mother!" The man was saved; the girl, with hundreds of other persons, was drowned. The mother received the note, in which was written, "Dear mother, you must not grieve for me. I am going to Jesus."

9261. GRIEF, Effect of. Uvipertus was elected Bishop, and went to Rome to receive confirmation from the Pope. But he rejected him on account of his youthful appearance. From grief, the next night his hair turned entirely gray, and the Pope could do nothing else but confirm him.

9262. GRIEF, Excessive. A mother whose child God had taken to himself, locked herself in her room, grieved over her loss, and in her blindness charged God foolishly. After a time her husband induced her to walk with him in the garden. She stooped to pluck a flower but her husband interposed. "What! deny me a flower!" said she. He answered, "You have denied God your flower; and you ought not to think it hard in me to deny you mine." The lady felt and profited by the appropriate reproof.

9263. GRIEF, Healer of. Time heals all griefs, even the bitterest, and it is well that it should be so. A long-indulged sorrow for the dead, or for any other hopeless loss, would deaden our sympathies for those still left, and thus make a sinful apathy steal over the soul, absorbing all its powers, and causing the many blessings of life to be felt as curses. As the bosom of earth blooms again and again, having buried out of sight the dead leaves of autumn, and loosed the frosty bands of winter; so does the heart (in spite of all that melancholy poets write) feel many renewed springs and summers. It is a beautiful and a blessed world we live in, and whilst that life lasts, to lose the enjoyment of it is a sin. Chambers.

9264. GRIEF, Heathen View of. They say that an ancient philosopher came to Queen Arsinoe, who was then sorrowful for the death of her son, and discoursed to her after this manner: "At the time that Jupiter distributed honor amongst the under deities, it happened that Grief was absent; but he came at last when all dignities were disposed of, and then desired that he might have some share in the promotions. Jupiter, having no better vacancies left, bestowed upon him sorrow and funeral tears." He made this inference from the story: "Therefore," saith he, "as other demons love and frequent those who give them hospitable receptions, so sadness will never come near you, if you do not give it encouragement; but if you carest it with those particular honors which it challengeth as its due, which are sighs and tears, it will have an unlucky affection for you, and will always supply you with fresh occasion that the observance may be continued." This speech had its desired effect. Plutarch.

9266. GRIEF, Need of Relief for. It was said that Hippocrates drove away maladies, and almost snatched bodies out of the hands of death. Antiphan, of Greece, envious of Hippocrates' glory, promised to do for the soul what he did for the body, and proposed the "Art of curing grief." Wanley says "All ages are abundant in misery, and they should likewise produce great comforts to sweeten the acerbities of human life. Another Helena were needful to mingle the divine drug of Nepenthe in the meat of so many afflicted persons as the world affords."

9267. GRIEF, Personified. We have often dreamed of grief. She had the beauty of all truly great things—the sublimity of the infinite; she was an abyss, but the ocean too has abysses which reflect, while softening them, the azure and the smile of the sky. Grief advanced like a tragic queen; she held a dagger; tears were in her eyes; her melancholy form spoke of despair; and yet what majesty in her bearing, what an austere beauty in that face, all-indifferent to the impression it made! Grief walked with royal steps; the very folds of her robe fell with a stern grace; her voice, even through its sobs, raised noble emotions; and our spirit, thirsting and sighing after immensity, opened out with a thrill to receive the divine guest. Gasparin.

9268. GRIEF, Yielding to. When we suffer grief, like a canker, to eat into the soul, and, like a fire in the bones, to consume the marrow and drink up the spirits, we are accessory to the wrong done both to our bodies and souls; we waste our own candle, and put out our own light. Sibbes.

9269. GROWTH, Demand for. There is a generation of Christians in this age who grieve me to the heart. They make my blood run cold. I cannot understand them. For anything that man's eye can see, they make no progress. They never seem to get on. Years roll on, and they are just the same,—the same besetting sins, the same infirmities of disposition, the same weakness in trial, the same chilliness of heart, the same apathy, the same faint resemblance to Christ—but no new knowledge, no increased interest in the kingdom, no freshness, no new strength, no new fruits, as if they grew. Are they not forgetting that growth is a proof of life—that even the yew tree grows, and the snail and the sloth move? Are they not forgetting how awfully far a man may go, and yet not be a true Christian? He may be like a waxwork figure, the very image of a believer, and yet not have within him the breath of God: he may have a name to live, and be dead after all. We ought to have looked on this world as an inn, and we have settled down in it as if it were our home: it ought to have been counted our school of training for eternity, and we have been at ease in it as if it were our continuing city, or trifled away time in it, as if we were meant to play and not to learn. We ought to have been careful for nothing, and we have been careful and troubled about many things—we have allowed the affairs of this life to eat out the heart of our spirituality, and have been cumbered with much serving. Ryle.

9270. GROWTH, Fruitful. When he comes, he will turn up your leaves; and look that, like the tree of life (Rev. 22: 21), we bear fruit every month: or that we be like the lemon-tree, which ever and anon sendeth forth new lemons as soon as the former are fallen down with ripeness: or the Egyptian fig-tree, which, saith Solinus, beareth fruit seven times a year; pull off a fig, and another breaks forth in the place shortly after. Now if we be found like the barren fig-tree (Luke 13), that had leaves only; or the cypress-tree, which is said to be fair and tall, but altogether fruitless; or the cypariss-tree, of which Pliny affirmeth, that is natu morosa, fructu supervacanea, baccis parva, foliis amara, odore violenta, ac ne umbrâ quidem gratiosa; what can we expect, but that he should set down his basket, and taking up his axe, hew us down as fuel for the fire of hell? Spain is said to have nothing barren in it: or not some way useful; In Hispani nihil ignavum, nihil sterile. And why should Christ's orchard, the Church? He pares and prunes his leaves and luxuriances; yea, cuts and slashes where need requires; and all that we may bear more fruit. Trapp.

9271. GROWTH, Mementos of. We have the likenesses of our boys taken on every birthday, and twelve of the annual portraits are now framed in one picture, so that we see them at a glance from their babyhood to their youth. Suppose such photographic memorials of our own spiritual life had been taken and preserved, would there be a regular advance, as in these boys, or should we still have been exhibited in the perambulator? Have not some grown awhile, and then suddenly dwarfed? Have not others gone back to babyhood? Here is a wide field for reflection. Spurgeon.

9272. GROWTH, Plant. The creation of vegetables is placed by Moses subsequent to the production of light and of the atmosphere, immediately after the waters had receded from the land, and just before the creation and arrangement of the solar system. This position of vegetables in the series of creation exactly answers the demands of our present knowledge. Instead of requiring the sun's light to germinate, seeds and plants, in order to do so, must be sowed and placed in darkness before they begin to vegetate. A small heat and moisture first cause their living principle to begin its operations, but they cannot flower and fruit until they receive the solar beams; nor could they grow without light, air, and moisture. A portion of oxygen air is essential to vegetation. Hence the previous atmosphere, which contains in its composition that portion, was indispensable, as was also some water on the soil where they were to grow. This exact placing of the vegetable formation and first germination is another test of the authenticity of the Hebrew cosmogony, which random fiction could not have stood.

Sharon Turner.

9273. GROWTH, Religious. The law of growth is to be considered; and that law contemplates a regular series of unfoldings, the last and best of which cannot take place until after the intermediate ones have taken place. When a plant comes up, you may, as much as you please, try to force it instantly to its blossom and fruit; but it will be of no avail. That which you seek is the ideal of the plant; that is the state to which it is to come; but it cannot come to that state except by going through a great many intermediate ones, one after another. From the lowest state it constantly ascends to the highest. Imagine a tree, sprung from the ground, and grown a year, and then having in itself the conception of an oak-tree, and wishing, longing, and condemning itself because it is not an oak tree the first year. It tries to stretch out its branches and become an oak tree, and mourns because there are no acorns on its boughs. It can attain the proportions of the oak tree; but it will take time. Men living among Christians who are broad, large, free, well-developed in their religious life, form an ideal conception of what are the fruits of the higher forms, the later developments of Christian experience; and they enter upon a Christian life, and join the church; and they want to be, in intensity, in breadth, in scope, in fruitfulness, that which has been held up before them as an ideal. They will come to it by growth, but they will not come to it in any other way. There is no efficiency of the Spirit that works miracles, and that precedes those steady laws of the mind by which the mind progresses from stage to stage.

Beecher.

9274. GROWTH, Spiritual. Unless the gastric juice be healthy, the best food cannot nourish

That wonderful solvent which God has provided, must melt, separate, and dissolve the food, or else it will not assimilate; it will not be digested—"carried through" the system—repairing its waters, supply fresh elements of combination for its various parts; feeding the blood; keeping that current of life full, and so by it pouring into the furthest creeks of this wonderful body of ours, the tide of health. Faith is to the soul what that wonderful solvent is to the body; without faith, "the Word preached will not profit;" unless mixed with "faith in them that hear," it will be "the savor of death unto death," killing instead of nourishing. Without faith there is no assimilation of divine truth; it never passes into the system, never becomes part of the man, so as to "nourish him up by the words of sound doctrine." Without faith he is the sickly patient starving in sight of food, and lean and thin in the midst of plenty. Champney.

9275. GROWTH, True Christian. There are religious writers and speakers who represent the progress of man as consisting in the growth of something added to his nature, rather than in the development of his nature itself. Hence we have books on the subject whose very title propounds this notion; such, for example, as "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," as if the soul were a flower-bed, and religion some precious seed deposited in its soil. The transposition would be the true idea,—namely, The rise and progress of the soul in religion; that is, in all that is true, benevolent, and God-like. The Scripture speaks of the progress of a holy soul as the progress of "the shining light." It appears on the horizon, gradually ascends to the meridian, "shining brighter and brighter" in every stage. They speak of it as the progress of the racer pressing towards the mark. Every power of the man is brought into play. And they speak of it as the progress of the human body in passing from infancy to manhood. The whole body—every fibre, muscle, bone, limb, and organ, advances at the same time. Dr. Thomas.

9276. GRUMBLERS, Fable of. A heavy wagon was being dragged along a country lane by a team of oxen. The axle-tree groaned and creaked terribly, when the oxen turning round, thus addressed the wheels: "Halloa, there! why do you make so much noise? we bear all the labor, and we, not you, ought to cry out!" Those complain first in our churches who have least to do. The gift of grumbling is largely dispensed among those who have no other talents, or who keep what they have wrapped up in a napkin. Spurgeon.

9277. GUIDANCE, Lesson of. The patter of little feet on my office floor and a glad voice exclaiming, "Papa, I've come to 'scort you home!" made known to me the presence of my little six-year old darling, who often came at that hour "to take me home," as she said. Soon we were going hand in hand on the homeward way. "Now, papa, let's play I was a poor little blind girl, and you must let me hold your hand tight, and you lead me along and tell me where to step and how to go." So the merry blue eyes were shut tight and we began: Now step up, now step down, here we go round the corner, and so on, till we were safely arrived at home, and the darling was nestling in my arms, saying, "Wasn't it nice, papa? I never peeked once!" "But," said mamma, "didn't you feel afraid you would fall, dear?" With a look of trusting love came the answer: "Oh, no, mamma! I had a tight hold of papa's hand, and I knew he would take me safely over the hard places." Dear trusting childhood! What a lesson to our doubting, troubled hearts! Oh, that we might with just this loving trust clasp the heavenly Father's hand! up and down the steep paths, round the sharp corners, and over all the rough places of this troublous, changeful life, never letting go and never open our eyes to wonder or doubt as to his way—knowing that it will at last bring us, when the weary walk is done, to rest in his loving arms forever more. S. S. Teacher.

9278. GUIDES, Safe. A Christian, in all his ways, must have three guides—Truth, Charity, Wisdom: Truth to go before him, Charity and Wisdom on either hand. If any of the three be absent, he walks amiss. I have seen some do hurt, by following a truth uncharitably; and others, while they would salve up an error with love, have failed in their wisdom, and offended against justice. Bishop Hall.

9279. GUILT, Contrasts of. While I was occupying the Fulton-street pulpit in New York, the governor of the City Tombs prison said he would like to have me go down and talk to the prisoners. After the prisoners were all brought in I found there was no chapel in connection with that prison, and I had to talk to them in their cells. I talked from a little iron bridge running across the narrow passage-way, to some three or four hundred prisoners, and could not see a man. After I had done, I thought I would like to see who I had been talking to, and how they had received the gospel. I went to the first door and looked in the little window of a cell where the inmates could have best heard me. There were some men playing at cards. No doubt they had been playing all the while I had been preaching. They did not want to hear. I said, "My friends, what is your trouble?" "Well, stranger, false witnesses appeared against us. We are innocent." I said to myself, "Christ cannot save anybody here; there is nobody guilty." I went to the occupiers of the next cell, and asked why they were there. They said, "We got into bad company, and the man who did the deed got clear, and we got caught." I said, "Christ cannot save anybody here." I went to the next cell and asked how it was with them. They said, "False witnesses went into court and swore falsely." I said, "Christ cannot save anybody here." I went to the next cell and said, "How is it with you?" The reply was, "The fact is the man who did the deed is very much like me. I am perfectly innocent." I never found so many innocent men in a prison in my life. It seemed that the magistrates who sent them there were the only guilty ones. I began to get discouraged, but when I had got almost through I found one man with his elbows on his knees and two streams of tears running down his cheeks. I looked in at the little window, and I said, "My friend, what is the trouble?" He looked up with despair and remorse on his face, and said, "My sins are more than I can bear." I said, "Thank God for that." "Ain't you the man that has been talking to us? I thought you said you was a friend: and you say you are glad my sins are more than I can bear." "Yes." "I don't understand your friendship if you are glad my sins are more than I can bear." "I will explain it to you. If your sins are more than you can bear, you will cast them on one that will bear them for you." "Who is that?" "It is the Lord Jesus," and I stood there at that prison door and preached Christ, and held up Christ for that poor wounded man, who was believed to be the worst man in the whole prison of the city of New York. After telling him of Christ, I got down and prayed. After I prayed, I said, "Now you pray." He said he could not pray; it would be blasphemy. But the man put his head on the pavement, and, like the publican, without even lifting his eyes towards heaven, he cried, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" After prayer, when he got up, I took his hand, and he gave me a warm grasp of the hand; a hot tear fell on my hand, which burned down into my soul. I got so interested in the man that before I started for the hotel I said, "I will pray for you to-night, and I would have you join me in prayer at the same time." That night while I was praying in my hotel, as I told him I should pray for him at a certain hour, it seemed as if I knew that God was answering my prayer. I could not leave New York and go back to Chicago until I had seen that man. No sooner did I fix my eye on the man's countenance, than I saw that a great change had taken place. Remorse and gloom had fled away, and the face of the man was streaming with celestial light. He seized my hand, and tears of joy trickled over his cheeks. I said, "Tell me all about it;" and he said, "Last night, when in my cell praying—I do not know the exact time, because when I came to prison they took away my watch; but I think it was about midnight—the Lord Jesus took away the burden, and set me entirely free, and since then I am the happiest man in the whole city of New York."

D. L. Moody.

9280. GUILT, Degrees of. It is base to filch a purse, daring to embezzle a million, but it is great beyond measure to steal a crown. The sin lessens, in human estimation only, as the guilt increases.

Schiller.

9281. GUILT, Detection of. A rich pearl merchant, in ancient times, visited a distant country with a valuable stock of diamonds, taking with him his son and a young slave. He had made his intended sale to great profit, and was ready to return, when he died suddenly.

The slave at once declared himself to be the merchant's son and heir, and took possession of his property. In vain the son declared the truth: the slave being the most intelligent and prepossessing, and proof being absent. The case went into a court of law, and was thrown out for want of proof on either side. The case coming to the king's notice, he ordered both claimants to present their arguments to him, each to put his head through an opening in a curtain into the king's presence and tell his story, with the understanding that the head was to be cut off from the guilty one. An officer present stood ready for the execution. After each had spoken, furnishing still no decisive grounds for decision, the judge cried, "Enough, strike off the villain's head." The executioner sprang towards the witnesses with drawn scimitar. The true son stood firm in conscious innocence. The slave drew back his head in guilty fear. The decision was given for the son, and the slave suffered the threatened punishment for his crime.

9282. GUILT, Discovery of. A man called upon a minister and demanded to be shown a letter which he was satisfied some calumniator must have written to him before he prepared the sermon which he heard him preach on the day previous. No such letter, nor any other information, had been received by the preacher; but the Holy Spirit had so applied his words as to awaken the man's conscience, and he saw his own sins so clearly that he thought the preacher must have been informed all about them. He conceived the words, "Be sure your sin will find you out," addressed to himself, personally. The minister said, "Can you look me in the face as you must your Judge in the great day, and declare that you are innocent of the sin laid to your charge?" The man turned pale with rage and fear, and declared that he would make no man his confessor. The minister then showed him how God had given him a view of himself, that he intended by alarming him to save his soul from hell. The man left in tears, saying, "I never met anything like this. I am guilty, and hope this conversation will be of advantage to me."

9283. GUILT, Proclivity of. When once a man has involved himself deeply in guilt, he has no safe ground to stand upon. Every thing is unsound and rotten under his feet. The crimes he has already committed may have an unseen connection with others, of which he has not the slightest suspicion; and he may be hurried, when he least intends it, into enormities of which he once thought himself utterly incapable.

Bishop Porteus.

9284. GUILT, Self-Punishment of. Nothing is more common than for great thieves to ride in triumph when small ones are punished. But let wickedness escape as it may at the law, it never fails of doing itself justice; for every guilty person is his own hangman.

Seneca.

9285. GUILT in Sickness. Sickness and suffering come with double force upon guilt; anguish of mind lessens the strength, as well as increases the smart; 'tis like a wound in the sword hand, the man is disabled in that which should defend him; he drops his guard, and his heart lies open to the next pass. We ought to summon in all our force upon this occasion, and to fortify ourselves with recollection and good practice, to animate our courage from the topics of honor and interest, from all the weighty considerations of this world and the next, to take in the auxiliaries of religion, and implore the assistance of heaven, that pain may never force us to outlive our patience or our honesty, that we may stand firm against the last assault, of what kind soever, and meet death with resolution, as it lies in the order of Providence; in short, that we may die without being conquered, carry a good conscience along with us, and leave a useful precedent behind us.

Jeremy Collier.

9286. GUILT, Slavery of. The slave who digs in the mine or labors at the oar, can rejoice at the prospect of laying down his burden together with his life; but to the slave of guilt there arises no hope from death. On the contrary, he is obliged to look forward with constant terror to this most certain of all events, as the conclusion of all his hopes, and the commencement of his greatest miseries.

Blair.

9287. GUILT, Torment of. Think not that guilt requires the burning torches of the furies to agitate and torment it. Frauds, crimes, remembrances of the past, terrors of the future—these are the domestic furies that are ever present to the mind of the impious.

Cicero.

9288. GUILT, Transfer of. For a long time before the conversion of the Rev. C. Simeon, he had been in the deepest distress, envying even the dogs that passed under his window. In Passion-week he met with the expression in "Bishop Wilson on the Lord's Supper," "that the Jews knew what they did when they transferred their sins to the head of their offering." "The thought rushed into my mind," says he, "What! may I transfer all my guilt to another? Has God provided an offering for me, that I may lay my sins on his head? Then, God willing, I will not bear them one moment longer. Accordingly, I sought to lay my sins upon the sacred head of Jesus, and on the Wednesday began to have a hope of mercy; on the Thursday that hope increased, and on Friday and Saturday it became more strong; and on the Sunday morning (Easter Day) I awoke early, with these words upon my heart and lips:

"Jesus Christ is risen to-day!
Hallelujah! Hallelujah!"

From that hour he had peace.

9289. GUILT, Unhappiness of. Guilt, though it may attain temporal splendor, can never confer real happiness. The evident consequences of our crimes long survive their commission, and, like the ghosts of the murdered, forever haunt the steps of the malefactor. The paths of virtue, though seldom those of worldly greatness, are always those of pleasantness and peace.

Sir Walter Scott.

9290. HABIT, Beware of a Bad. Beware of a bad habit. It makes its first appearance as a tiny fay, and is so innocent, so playful, so minute, that none save a precisian would denounce it, and it seems hardly worth while to whisk it away. The trick is a good joke, the lie is white, the glass is harmless, the theft is only a few apples, the bet is only sixpence, the debt is only half a crown. But the tiny fay is capable of becoming a tremendous giant; and if you connive and harbor him, he will nourish himself at your expense, and then, springing on you as an armed man, will drag you down to destruction.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

9291. HABIT, Chains of. It is important to keep in mind that—as is evident from what is seen daily about us—habits are formed, not at one stroke, but gradually and insensibly; so that, unless vigilant care be employed, a great change may come over the character without our being conscious of any. For, as Dr. Johnson has well expressed it, "The diminutive chains of habit are seldom heavy enough to be felt, till they are too strong to be broken."

Whately.

9292. HABIT, Danger of. It is mentioned of a friend of Charles I. in the civil war of the Parliament, that he had made up his mind to take horse and join the royal party, but for one circumstance, that he could not reconcile himself to the thought of being an hour or two less in bed than he had been accustomed in his own quiet home; and he therefore, after duly reflecting on the impossibility of being both a good subject and a good sleeper, contented himself with remaining to enjoy his repose. Absurd as such an anecdote may seem, it states only what passes innumerable times through the silent hearts of those who are enslaved by their habits. In similar comparisons of the most important duties with the most paltry but habitual pleasures, how many more virtuous actions would have been performed on earth, if the performance of them had not been inconsistent with enjoyments, as insignificant in themselves as an hour of unnecessary and perhaps hurtful slumber!

Salter.

9293. HABIT, Destructive. I remember once riding from Buffalo to the Niagara Falls. I said to a gentleman, "What river is that, sir?" "That," said he, "is Niagara river." "Well, it is a beautiful stream," said I; "bright, and fair, and glassy. How far are the rapids?" "Only a mile or two," was the reply. "Is it possible that only a mile from us we shall find the water in the turbulence which it must show near the falls?" "You will find it so, sir." And so I found it; and the first sight of Niagara I shall never forget. Now launch your bark on that Niagara river; it is bright, smooth, beautiful and glassy. There is a ripple at the bow; the silver wake you leave behind adds to your enjoyment. Down the stream you glide, oars, sails and helm in proper trim, and you set out on your pleasure excursion. Suddenly some one cries out from the bank, "Young men, ahoy!" "What is it?" "The rapids are below you!" "Ha! ha! we have heard of the rapids; but we are not such fools as to get there. If we go too fast, then we shall up with the helm, and steer to the shore; we will set the mast in the socket, hoist the sail, and speed to the land. Then on, boys; don't be alarmed, there is no danger." "Young men, ahoy there!" "What is it?" "The rapids are below you." "Ha! ha! we laugh and quaff; all things delight us. What care we for the future! No man ever saw it, 'Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.' We will enjoy life while we may, will catch pleasure as it flies. This is enjoyment; time enough to steer out of danger when we are sailing swiftly with the current." "Young men, ahoy!" "What is it?" "Beware! beware! The rapids are below you!" "Now you see the water foaming all around. See how fast you pass that point! Up with the helm! Now turn! Pull hard! Quick! quick! quick! Pull for your lives! Pull till the blood starts from your nostrils, and the veins stand like whip-cords upon your brow! Set the mast in the socket! hoist the sail! Ah! ah! it is too late! Shrieking, howling, blaspheming, over they go." Thousands go over the rapids of intemperance every year through the power of habit, crying all the while, "When I find out that it is injuring me, I will give it up!"

J. B. Gough.

9294. HABIT, Fundamental Law of. Habit is the deepest law of human nature. It is our supreme strength, if also, in certain circumstances, our miserablest weakness. Let me go once, scanning my way with any earnestness of outlook, and successfully arriving, my footsteps are an invitation to me a second time to go by the same way; it is easier than any other way. Habit is our primal fundamental law; habit and imitation: there is nothing more perennial in us than these two. They are the source of all working and all apprenticeship, of all practice and all learning in this world.

Carlyle.

9295. HABIT, Groove of. In the old cities that have been exhumed, road-beds have been found in a great state of preservation, though they have been covered up two thousand years. Tracks of chariots, six inches deep, are there, worn in the solid stones. So evil habits cut their deep grooves into the human soul, which cannot be erased by the hand of death or the lapse of years.

9296. HABIT, Hardening Power of. The ploughman frequently comes upon a tough place, through which it is very difficult to drive the plough. He finds that it is an old road-bed, or hard-trodden path. Habitual sins make such tough spots in our natures. Ordinary influences will not break them up. The pick and crowbar must be applied. Extra spiritual aid must be sought that these hard places do not ruin the crop of grace.

9297. HABIT, Interrupted. Scott, in his autobiography, tells this story of himself. One boy was always above him in his class; do what he would he could not pass him, till, observing him always fumbling at a lower button of his waistcoat as he answered a question, it occurred to him to cut it off on the sly. He watched with some anxiety for the result. The ruse answered only too well. When the boy was again questioned, his fingers sought for the button; missing it, in his distress he looked down for it in vain. "He stood confounded," says the penitent aggressor, "I took his place, nor did he ever recover it, or suspect the author of his wrong." This story tells two ways. Doubtless some bodily habits establish associations favorable to the memory, and quieting to irritability; the mischief is, that the mind becomes dependent, and is stranded when cut off from the old moorings.

9298. HABIT, Prevalence of. Habit hath so vast a prevalence over the human mind that there is scarce anything too strange or too strong to be asserted of it. The story of the miser, who from long accustoming to cheat others, came at last to cheat himself, and with great delight and triumph picked his own pocket of a guinea to convey to his hoard, is not impossible or improbable.

Fielding.

9299. HABIT, Religious. Mr. and Mrs. Lovelless would have me live with them, but they charged me very little for my board, whereby I was enabled, with my salary, to support seven native schools. These were so situated that I could visit them all in one day. My horse and gig were seen constantly on the rounds; and my horse at last knew where to stop as well as I did. This nearly cost a Bengal officer his life. Captain Page, a godly man, who was staying with us until a ship was ready to take him to the Cape, one morning requested me to lend him my horse and gig to take him to the city. The captain was driving officer-like, when the horse stopped suddenly, and nearly threw him out. He inquired, "What place is this?" The answer was, "It's the Sailor's Hospital." They started again, and soon the horse stopped suddenly, and the captain was nearly out as before. "What's this?"—"A school, sir," was the reply. At last he finished his business, and resolved to return another way. By doing this he came near my schools, and again and again the horse stopped. When he got home, he said, "I am glad that I have returned without broken bones, but never will I drive a religious horse again."

Richard Kn:U.

9300. HABIT, Struggle against. A Moravian missionary, entering his hut in Guiana, South America, was attacked by a boa-constrictor. The huge serpent lowered itself from the rafters and coiled about him, as its method is to strangle its victims. He felt the increasing pressure of its tightening folds, and gave himself up in despair. Fearing that his death would be attributed to the treachery of the Indians, he took a piece of chalk and wrote upon the table, "A serpent has killed me." He was mistaken; he was not dead, but only despairing. Then the promise of Christ to his disciples, that they should have power to tread on serpents and scorpions and not be hurt thereby, came into his mind and renewed his courage and strength. He redoubled his exertions to free himself from the terrible coil, and succeeded. But it was a supreme effort, such as a man can make only in some great crisis of his life. This fact enshrines a vivid symbol of evil habit. The boa-constrictor is the contracting coil of evil habit, ever tightening, which will result inevitably in death. The power of Christ is the only means of deliverance. There is in this hope, for those who have written themselves dead. While there is life there is receptive power, and Christ will supply strength to overcome.

9301. HABITS, Accumulation of. Like flakes of snow, that fall unperceived upon the earth, the seemingly unimportant events of life succeed one another. As the snow gathers together, so are our habits formed. No single flake that is added to the pile produces a sensible change; no single action creates, however it may exhibit, a man's character; but as the tempest hurls the avalanche down the mountain, and overwhelms the inhabitant and his habitation, so passion, acting upon the elements of mischief which pernicious habits have brought together by imperceptible accumulation, may overthrow the edifice of truth and virtue.

Bentham.

9302. HABITS, Alteration of. A physical habit is like a tree that has grown crooked. You cannot go to the orchard, and take hold of a tree that has grown thus, and straighten it, and say, "Now keep straight!" and have it obey you. What can you do? You can drive down a stake, and bind it to the tree, bending it back a little, and scarifying the bark on one side. And if, after that, you bend it back a little more every month, keeping it taut through the season, and from season to season, at last you will succeed in making it permanently straight. You can straighten it, but you cannot do it immediately; you must take one or two years for it.

Beecher.

9303. HABITS, Cure for Bad. A minister said, "Suppose some cold morning you should go into a neighbor's house, and find him busy at work on his windows, scratching away, and should ask what he was up to, and he should reply, 'Why, I am trying to remove the frost; but as fast as I get it off one square, it comes on another,' would you not say, 'Why, man, let your windows alone, and kindle your fire, and the frost will soon come off?' And have you not seen people who try to break off their bad habits one after another without avail? Well, they are like the man who tried to scratch the frost from his windows. Let the fire of love to God and man, kindled at the altar of prayer, burn in their hearts, and the bad habits will soon melt away."

9304. HABITS, Destructive Power of Bad. The surgeon of a regiment in India relates the following incident: "A soldier rushed into the tent to inform me that one of his comrades was drowning in a pond close by, and nobody could attempt to save him in consequence of the dense weeds which covered the surface. On repairing to the spot, we found the poor fellow in his last struggle, manfully attempting to extricate himself from the meshes of rope-like grass that encircled his body; but, to all appearance, the more he labored to escape, the more firmly they became coiled round his limbs. At last he sank, and the floating plants closed in, and left not a trace of the disaster. After some delay, a raft was made, and we put off to the spot, and sinking a pole some twelve feet, a native dived, holding on by the stake, and brought the body to the surface. I shall never forget the expression of the dead man's face—the clenched teeth, and fearful distortion of the countenance, while coils of long trailing weeds clung round his body and limbs, the muscles of which stood out stiff and rigid, whilst his hands grasped thick masses, showing how bravely he had struggled for life."

9305. HABITS, Incurable. An old man showed his deformed fingers and said, "In these crooked fingers there is a good text for a talk to children. For over fifty years I used to drive a stage, and these bent fingers show the effect of holding the reins for so many years."

9306. HABITS, Legends of Good and Evil. When you look upon that familiar figure of Laocoön and his sons, bound every limb by the folds of the serpent, and hand, foot, head, all, you will see what the ancients mean by this dragon; you will see what was the conception of human sin to the most ancient people of this world. The power of a vice, the power of a habit, to bind and bind every faculty and every power, is shown in that dragon which the ancients called Archae, afterward Almas, the Sanskrit for sin, afterward the Latin word anguis, a serpent, and afterward our "anguish." This great legend of the binding serpent, with which the dragon stories begin, has been reproduced again and again in manifold forms, and it is turned into many little stories that the Germans tell their children; and on the confines of Austria, in Minor Russia, in parts of Poland, every child will tell them to you. There is the story, for instance, of a little boy and little girl who go about gathering strawberries, and after they have gathered a number of strawberries, they meet an old woman who asks for some berries. The little girl gives her freely, but the boy says he doesn't gather strawberries for old women. After the children pass on, the old woman calls them back, and gives to each of them a little box. The little girl opens her box and finds two little snow-white caterpillars, which, while she looks upon them, turn to butterflies, and then they grow and grow until they become angels, and bear her away to Paradise. The little boy opens his box and finds two tiny little black bugs, which swell until they become serpents, and bind all his limbs, and take him to a forest where he is wandering to this day. This is the story that the fathers and mothers tell their children, as showing the gradual growth of good and evil habits and principles, from the smallest to the largest forces, until they uplift the whole being, or bind it in all the powers of evil.

9307. HAND, Legend of a. An early English legend relates that a Cornish nobleman cut off the foot and hand of his nephew and heir, and

sout him thus maimed to a convent. A brazen foot and silver hand were provided him. When about fourteen years old the abbot took him out with him to gather nuts. There the boy used his silver hand to clasp the branches or pick the nuts as if it had been a living member, as the abbot saw to his great amazement. Christ can restore the withered hand, or make life animate the artificial hand.

9308. HAND, Mechanism of the. From the shoulder to the tips of the fingers there are thirty-two distinct bones, curiously articulated one with another, which could not be imitated with any expectation of success, viz.: one shoulder blade, one collar-bone, one arm-bone, two in the fore-arm, eight in the carpus or wrist, five in the palm of the hand, two in the thumb, and twelve in the fingers. Next, to move those thirty-two bones in all the directions they were designed to act, there is a perfect labyrinth of delicate cordage, which, when separated and distinctly displayed, shows that there are forty-six muscles—and some anatomists make more—to extend, bend, turn, clench, unclench, nip, squeeze, and make all the movements which we can give the arm and hand by simply willing to do so. But in order that the mind may hold positive control over those thirty differently formed bones by the forty-six muscles, of which no two are alike, there are long nerves running like telegraphic wires from the arm-pit to the smallest fibre of every muscle. From the plexus in the axilla, or arm-pit, the nerves hold communication, through the intervention of other nerve-threads, with the brain. One set of nerves, or rather telegraph cords, convey messages to the fingers, and another set send back word to the brain of the reception of the order, and how business is transpiring. Beside all these complications, to nourish and keep the several parts vitalized, there are arteries, veins, lymphatics, absorbents, exhalant tubes, and tissues almost beyond enumeration, to keep the whole in working order. And when in good condition what power it exerts! It conveys an ineffable language, which even brute animals understand. It menaces, invites, repels, or gives character and grandeur to the expressions of an orator. It is a hammer, a vice, a punch, wrench, a lever, a pry, a force, and a mighty power by which the pyramids were reared, cathedrals called into being from the hardest quarries; and all that is amazing, surprising, delicate or calculated to advance civilization in art, literature and science, is accomplished by those wonderful instruments—human hands. Anon.

9309. HAND, The Offending A young man, named Clitus, stirred up sedition in the city of Tiberias against Flavius Josephus, the governor. Being delivered over to punishment, Josephus sentenced him to have both his hands cut off. The young man pleaded to have one of them spared. To that Josephus consented. The young man then courageously took his sword and cut off his own left hand. This kind of punishment was common in those days, and explains Christ's reference to the offending hand.

9310. HAND, Power of the. The lion has powerful fangs and claws; the hare has swiftness of foot, but in other points is defenceless. But to man, the only animal that partakes of divine intelligence, the Creator has given, in lieu of every other natural weapon, or organ of defence, that instrument—the hand; an instrument applicable to every art and occasion, as well of peace as of war. Man, therefore, wants not a hoof, or horn, or any other natural weapon; inasmuch as he is able with his hand to grasp a much more effective weapon—the sword or spear. Besides which, natural weapons can be employed only in close conflict, while some of the weapons employed by man, as javelins or arrows, are even more effectual at a distance. And again, though man may be inferior to the lion in swiftness, yet, by his dexterity and skill, he breaks into his use a still swifter animal—the horse; mounted on whose back, he can escape from or pursue the lion, or attack him at every advantage. He is enabled, moreover, by means of this instrument, to clothe himself with armor of various kinds, or to intrench himself within camps or fenced cities. Whereas, were his hands encumbered with any natural armor, he would be unable to employ them for the fabrication of those instruments and means which give him such a decided advantage over all the other animals of creation. Nor have we yet enumerated the most important of those privileges which the hand imparts to man. With this he weaves the garment that protects him from the summer's heat or winter's cold; with this he forms the various furniture of nets and snares, which give him a dominion over the inhabitants as well of the water as of the air and earth; with his hand he constructs the lyre and lute, and the numerous instruments employed in the several arts of life; with his hand he erects altars and shrines to immortal gods; and lastly, by means of the same instrument, he bequeaths to posterity, in writings, the intellectual treasures of his own divine imagination. Galen.

9311. HAND, Shakes of the. There is nothing more characteristic than shakes of the hand. I have classified them. There is the high official,—the body erect, and a rapid, short shake, near the chin. There is the mortmain,—the flat hand introduced into your palm, and hardly conscious of its contiguity. The digital,—one finger held out, much used by the high clergy. There is the shakus rusticus, where your hand is siezed in an iron grasp, betokening rude health, warm heart, and distance from the metropolis, but producing a strong sense of relief on your part when you find your hand released and your fingers unbroken. The next to this is the retentive shake,—one which, beginning with vigor, pauses, as it were to take breath, but without relinquishing its prey, and before you are aware begins again, till you feel anxious as to the result, and have no shake left in you. There are other varieties, but this is enough for one lesson. S. Smith.

9312. HAND, Superiority of the. The organs of all other senses, even in their greatest perfection, are beholden to the hand for the enhancement and the exaltation of their powers. It constructs for the eye a copy of itself, and thus gives it a telescope with which to range among the stars; and by another copy, on a slightly different plan, furnishes it with a microscope, and introduces it into a new world of wonders. It constructs for the ear the instruments by which it is educated, and sounds them in its hearing till its powers are trained to the full. It plucks for the nostril the flower which it longs to smell, and distils for it the fragrance which it covets. As for the tongue, if it had not the hand to serve it, it might abdicate its throne as the lord of taste. In short, the organ of touch is the minister of its sister senses, and, without any play of words, is the handmaid of them all.

Prof. Wilson.

9313. HANDS, Joining. The joining of hands has, amongst Eastern nations, long been the method of binding an engagement, and has had all the force of an oath. The circumstance is alluded to by Mr. Bruce: "I was so enraged at the traitorous part which Hassan had acted, that at parting I could not help saying to Ibrahim, 'Now, sheikh, I have done everything you have desired without ever expecting fee or reward; the only thing I now ask you, and it is probably the last, is that you will avenge me upon this Hassan, who is every day in your power.' Upon this, he gave me his hand, saying, 'He shall not die in his bed, or I shall never see old age.'" The joining of hands naturally signifies contracting a friendship and making a covenant, 2 Kings 10: 15; Prov. 11: 21. The right hand was esteemed so sacred that Cicero calls it the witness of our faith.

Bib. Treasury.

9314. HANDS, Kissing. This custom is very ancient, and was once universal. The Greeks adored their gods by the simple compliment of kissing their hands; and the Romans were treated as atheists, if they would not perform the same act when they entered a temple. This custom, however, as a religious ceremony, declined with Paganism; but was continued as a salutation by inferiors to their superiors, or as a token of esteem among friends. At present, it is only practiced as a mark of obedience from the subject to the sovereign, and by lovers who are solicitous to preserve this ancient usage in its full power.

I. Disraeli.

9315. HAPPINESS, Child's Idea of. A little girl was asked what was the meaning of the word happy. Her beautiful answer was, "It is to feel as if you wanted to give all your things to your little sister."

9316. HAPPINESS, Christian. An old colored woman went to a Delegate of the Christian Commission at Vicksburg, who was very ill with fever and much depressed in spirit, and said, "Massa, does ye see de bright side dis mornin'?" "No, Nanny," said I, "it isn't so bright as I wish it was." "Well, massa, I allus sees de bright side." "You do?" said I; "maybe you havn't had much trouble?"

"Maybe not," she said; and then went on to tell me in her simple, broken way, of her life in Virginia, of the selling of her children one by one, of the auction sale of her husband, and then of herself. She was alone now in camp, without having heard from one of her kindred for years: "Maybe I ain't seen no trouble, massa?" "But, Nanny," said I, "have you seen the bright side all the time?" "Allus, massa, allus." "Well, how did you do it?" "Dis is de way, massa. When I see de brack cloud comin' over"—and she waved her dark hand inside the tent, as though one might be settling down there—"an' 'pears like it's comin' crushin' down on me, den I jist whips aroun' on de oder side, and I find de Lord Jesus dar; an' den it's all bright an' cl'ar. De bright side's allus whar Jesus is, massa." "Well, Nanny," said I, "if you can do that, I think I ought to." "'Pears like you ought to, massa, an' you's a preacher of de word of Jesus." She went away; I turned myself on my blanket and said in my heart, "'The Lord is my Shepherd.' It is all right and well. Now, come fever or health, come death or life, come burial on the Yazoo Bluff or in the churchyard at home—the Lord is my Shepherd." With this sweet peace of rest, God's care and love became very precious to me. I fell asleep. When I woke I was in a perspiration; my fever was broken. "Old Nanny's" faith had made me whole.

E. P. Smith.

9317. HAPPINESS, Coming of. President Nott, in his wise old age, once took a newly-married pair aside, and said: "I want to give you this advice, my children—don't try to be happy. Happiness is a shy nymph, and if you chase her you will never catch her. But just go quietly on and do your duty, and she will come to you."

9318. HAPPINESS, Desire for. If we ascend the thrones of princes, if we enter the palaces of the great, if we walk through the mansions of courtiers and statesmen, if we pry into the abodes of poverty and indigence, if we mingle with poets or philosophers, with manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, peasants, or beggars; if we survey the busy, bustling scene of a large city, the sequestered village, or the cot which stands in the lonely desert—we shall find in every situation, and among every class, beings animated with desires of happiness, which no present enjoyment can gratify, and which no object within the limits of time can fully satiate.

Dr. T. Dick.

9319. HAPPINESS, Diffusers of. Some men move through life as a band of music moves down the street, flinging out pleasures on every side through the air to every one, far and near, who can listen. Some men fill the air with their presence and sweetness, as orchards, in October days, fill the air with the perfume of ripe fruit. Some women cling to their own houses like the honeysuckle over the door, yet, like it, fill all the region with the subtle fragrance of their goodness. How great a bounty and a blessing is it so to hold the royal gifts of the soul that they shall be music to some, and fragrance to others, and life to all! It would be no unworthy thing to live for, to make the power which we have within us the breath of other men's joy: to fill the atmosphere which they must stand in with a brightness which they cannot create for themselves. Beecher.

9320. HAPPINESS, Disturbances of. In the constitution both of our mind and of our body everything must go on right, and harmonize well together, to make us happy; but should one thing go wrong, that is quite enough to make us miserable; and although the joys of this world are vain and short, yet its sorrows are real and lasting: for I will show you a ton of perfect pain with greater ease than one ounce of perfect pleasure; and he knows little of himself or of the world, who does not think it sufficient happiness to be free from sorrow: therefore, give a wise man health, and he will give himself every other thing. I say, give him health; for it often happens that the most ignorant empiric can do us the greatest harm, although the most skillful physician knows not how to do us the slightest good. Colton.

9321. HAPPINESS, Domestic. Think of this, my good friend, and as you have kind affections to make some good girl happy, settle yourself in life while you are young, and lay up, by so doing, a stock of domestic happiness against age or bodily decay. There are many good things in life, whatever satirists and misanthropes may say to the contrary; but probably the best of all, next to a conscience void of offence, (without which, by the bye, they can hardly exist,) are the quiet exercise and enjoyment of social feelings, in which we are at once happy ourselves, and the cause of happiness to those who are dearest to us.

Sir W. Scott.

9322. HAPPINESS, Empty. If you were to see a man endeavoring all his life to satisfy his thirst by holding up an empty cup to his lips, you would certainly despise his ignorance; but if you should see others of brighter parts, and finer understanding, ridicule the dull satisfaction of one cup and think to satisfy their own thirst by a variety of golden and gilt empty cups, would you think that these were the wiser or happier, or better employed for their parts? Now this is all the difference you can see in the happiness of this life. The dull and heavy soul may be content with one empty appearance of happiness. But then let the wit, the great scholar, the fine genius, the great statesmen, the polite gentleman, lay all their heads together, and they can only show you more and various empty appearances of happiness; give them all the world into their hands, let them cut and carve as they please, they can only make a greater variety of empty cups: for search as deep and look as far as you will, there is nothing here to be found that is nobler and greater than high eating and drinking, than rich dress and applause, and vanity; unless you look for it in the wisdom and laws of religion. Salter.

9323. Happiness, Enduring. No man thinks himself miserable till he hath lost his happiness. A godly man is blessed when afflicted and buffeted, because God is the proper orb in which he doth fix, and he hath his God still. (Job 5: 17.) When a few leaves blow off, his comfort is, he hath the fruit and the tree still. As a man worth millions, he can rejoice though he lose some mites. In the Salentine country there is mention made of a lake brimful; put in never so much, it runneth not over; draw out what you can, it is still full. Such is the condition of a Christian—he hath never too much; and take away what you will, having God, is still full. Swinmock.

9324. HAPPINESS, False. Reader let no man ever delude you into supposing that you can be happy in this world without repentance. Oh! no! You may laugh and dance, and go upon Sundays in excursion trains, and crack good jokes, and sing good songs, and say, "Cheer, boys, cheer!" and "There's a good time coming;"—but all this is no proof that you are happy. So long as you do not quarrel with sin, you will never be a truly happy man. Thousands go on for a time in this way, and seem merry before the eyes of men, and yet in their heart carry about a lurking sorrow.

Ryle.

9325. HAPPINESS, Foundation of. The foundation of domestic happiness is faith in the virtue of woman; the foundation of political happiness is confidence in the integrity of man; the foundation of all happiness, temporal and eternal, is reliance on the goodness of God.

Landor.

9326. HAPPINESS, Humility and. I fear I have not learned the secret of true happiness, a poor and contrite spirit.—Henry Martyn.—Truth and happiness inhabit a palace, into which none can enter but humble, sincere, and constant lovers.

Lucas.

9327. HAPPINESS, Key to. A little boy went to his mother and said, "I tried to make little sister happy. I couldn't make her happy no how I could fix it; but I made myself happy trying to make her happy."

9328. HAPPINESS, Land of. The French have an ideal happy land, called Cocaigne. It is full of men and women who are always happy. It is always day there; and there are no storms of rain or snow; no extreme of heat or cold; no dangers from lightning or whirlwind; no quarreling or war; no sickness or death. There is a fair abbey with white monks and gray nuns. The cloister is built of gems and spices. All about are birds merrily singing, ready roasted, flying into the hungry mouths, among them buttered larks. All down the streets go roasted geese. There is a river of wine. The ladies are all fair; every month one has new clothes. There bubbles up the fountain of perpetual youth, which will restore to bloom and vigor all who bathe in it, be they ever so ugly or old.

9329. HAPPINESS, National. An Oriental story says that a prince asked two of his wisest counselors, how he might make his people most happy; and allowed them two months to prepare their reply. At the required time, the two wise men stood before their master—the one bending beneath a great roll of papyrus-leaves containing two hundred written rules, the other walking empty-handed. The reading of the two hundred rules sadly wearied the prince, who then called upon the other counselor to produce his reply, which was given in two words: "Love God." "How?" said the prince. "Did I not require to know how I might render my people most happy? And thou only directest me to love God." "True," replied the wise man; "but thou canst not love God without loving thy people also."

9330. HAPPINESS, Negative. What is happiness? It ain't bein' idle, that's a fact—no idle man or woman ever was happy since the world began. Employment gives both appetite and digestion. Duty makes pleasure doubly sweet by contrast. When the harness is off, if the work ain't too hard, a critter likes to kick up his heels. When pleasure is the business of life, it ceases to be pleasure; and when it's all labor, and no play, work, like an unstuffed saddle, cuts into the very bone. Neither labor nor idleness has a road that leads to happiness—one has no room for the heart, and the other corrupts it. Hard work is the best of the two, for that has, at all events, sound sleep—the other has restless pillows and unrefreshing sleep; one is a misfortune, the other is a curse; and money ain't happiness, that's as clear as mud.

Haliburton.

9331. HAPPINESS, Non-essential. Happiness is not what we are to look for. Let us do right, and then, whether happiness comes or unhappiness, it is no very mighty matter. If it come, life will be sweet; if it do not come, life will be bitter—bitter, not sweet, and yet to be borne.

Froude.

9332. HAPPINESS, Promoting. Sydney Smith cut the following from a newspaper, and preserved it: "When you rise in the morning, form a resolution to make the day a happy one to a fellow-creature. It is easily done; a left-off garment to the man who needs it, a kind word to the sorrowful, an encouraging expression to the striving—trifles in themselves light as air—will do it at least for the twenty-four hours. And if you are young, depend upon it, it will tell when you are old; and if you are old, rest assured, it will send you gently and happily down the stream of time to eternity. By the most simple arithmetical sum, look at the result. If you send one person, only one, happily through each day, that is three hundred and sixty-five in the course of the year. And supposing you live forty years only after you commence that course of medicine, you have made 14,600 beings happy, at all events for a time."

9333. HAPPINESS, Pursuing. 'Tis to be happy that we run after pleasures. But we, alas! mistake our happiness, and foolishly seek it where it is not to be found; as silly children think to catch the sun, when they see it setting at so near a distance. They travel on and tire themselves in vain; for the thing they seek is in another world.

Bishop Hickeys.

9334. HAPPINESS, Quest of. When man was made in the image of God, Happiness, one of the attendant angels which stand before the throne of God, was deputed to wait upon man and be his constant companion. But when sin marred his beautiful image, and he lost his high nobility, Happiness, who could no longer behold her heavenly Father's image upon earth, sighed to return, and quitting man, ascended to her bright abode in heaven. Man, now wearied and distressed at the loss of his angelic companion, wandered about in quest of a friend to supply her place. He looked out anxiously on Nature, and saw her gay and cheerful; but Nature assured him in awful accents, she knew no bliss for man. He questioned Love, who appeared so bright and joyous in hope; but she timidly shrank from the inquiry, while her eyes dropped fast with tears. He sought of Friendship, but she sighed and answered, "Caprice, anxiety, and the fear of change are ever with me." He followed after Vice, who boasted loudly and promised great things; but before she left him the borrowed roses fell from her withered brow. He thought at last he should succeed if he found Virtue; but she assured him with tender sorrow that penitence was her rightful and proper name, and that the bliss he sought for was not in her power to bestow. Disappointed and wearied, he now in despair applied to Death, who, relaxing his forbidding aspect, smiled upon him and said, "No longer upon earth can Happiness be found: I am a friend of man and a guide to Happiness. Let the voice of him who died on Calvary bring man to me; and I am commissioned to conduct him into the presence of Happiness, who shall never leave nor forsake him through the countless ages of eternity."

Salter.

9335. HAPPINESS, Reciprocal. A poor man entered a merchant's office, and seeing large sums of money, exclaimed, "How happy a little of that money would make me!" The merchant heard him, and asked, "how much it would take to make him happy." He told the merchant how destitute his family were, and added that he thought five pounds would make them comfortable. The merchant ordered that sum to be paid him. At the close of the day, the clerk asked the merchant to what account he should charge the money given the poor man. He replied, "For making a poor man happy, five pounds."

9336. HAPPINESS, Risking Eternal. As to the eternal reward of grace, its distance is so short and uncertain, that if men were not infatuated, it is a wonder that it is not constantly observant to their minds, and that its glorious brightness does not dazzle their eyes. A good man is never sure that heaven is at an hour's distance from him. It looks like a choosing of misery when one takes the course that leads to it, though he is sure eternity is not far off, at the furthest he can possibly expect; when he knows not but the next moment may land him on that unknown shore, and plunge him in an abyss of wretchedness; when he runs that risk for pleasures which he is not sure whether he shall ever attain to, and which he is sure will vanish away like shadows.

9337. HAPPINESS, Sources of. God made the beasts looking down towards the earth to shew that their satisfaction might be brought from thence, and accordingly it does afford them what is suited to their appetite; but the erect figure of man's body, which looketh upward, shewed him that his happiness lay above him—in God—and that he was to expect it from heaven, and not from earth. Thomas Boston.

9338. HAPPINESS, True. Happiness consists in loving and being loved. There is enough to love in the world; but to be loved we must deserve it. We may be admired for our beauty or talent, courted for our influence or wealth, but we can only be loved as we are good. Therefore happiness consists in goodness. Anon.

9339. HAPPINESS, True Way to. A young gentleman was descending upon the pleasures of the chase as practiced in England, in a promiscuous company. A minister present could not see the fun of being unhorsed and bruised or immersed in a quagmire. He exclaimed, "Is this the way to happiness? Do you call this pleasure? I feel grateful I have discovered another way to happiness than the one you have mentioned." The young sportsman expressed a wish to know a better way. "I have," answered the minister, "a map in my pocket which will describe the way, and the only true way to bliss." Having raised his curiosity, and the company appearing as anxious as this youth, he took out a small pocket Testament, and pointing to these words, "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life," put the book into his hands. This broke up the conversation. Most people want happiness in some other way than through Christ.

9340. HAPPINESS, Trying to Work out. There are those that would hammer out their own happiness, like the spider climbing up by the thread of her own weaving. Of all the parts and abilities that be in you, you may well say as the young man did of his hatchet, "Alas, master! it was but borrowed." (2 Kings, 6: 6.)

Brooks.

9341. HAPPINESS, Where is. If the Scriptures are a delusion, where will we seek our happiness? In wealth? It is a splendid incubrance. In honor? It is a glittering bubble. In the pleasures of the world? They are like the brine of the ocean to a thirsty palate, will irritate rather than satisfy. In gay entertaining company? This is only a temporary opiate, not a lasting cure. But in the precious promises of the Gospel, and its renewing energy on our hearts; in the discoveries of God's love to poor sinners; in the displays of God's infinitely rich grace; and in the hope of his everlasting glory; in these grand specifics, for preparing and dispensing which revelation has the patent—true health, ease, and felicity are to be found.

9342. HAPPINESS, Within. This truth ought to be deeply printed in minds studious of wisdom and their own content, that they bear their happiness or unhappiness within their own breast; and that all outward things have a right and a wrong handle. He that takes them by the right handle finds them good; he that takes them by the wrong indiscreetly, finds them evil. Take a knife by the haft, it will serve you; take it by the edge, it will cut you. There is no good thing but is mingled with evil; there is no evil but some good enters into the composition. The same truth holds in all persons, actions, and events. Out of the worst, a well composed mind, endowed with the grace of God, may extract good, with no other chemistry than piety, wisdom and serenity. It lieth in us as we incline our minds to be pleased or displeased with most things in the world. One that hath fed his eyes with the rich prospect of delicate countries, as Lombardy, Anjou, where all the beauties and dainties of nature assembled, will another time take no less delight in a wild and rugged prospect of high bare mountains, and fifty stories of steep rocks, as about the Grande Chartreuse and the bottom of Ardennes, where the very horror contributes to the delectation. If I have been delighted to see the trees of my orchard, in the spring blossomed, in the summer shady, in autumn hung with fruit; I will delight again after the fall of the leaf, to see through my trees new prospects which the bushy boughs hid before; and will be pleased with the sight of the snow candied about the branches, as the flowers of the season.

Du Moulin.

9343. HAPPINESS, The World's. Oromazes had an enchanted egg, in which he boasted that he had enclosed all the happiness of the world. When the egg was broken it was found to contain nothing but wind.

9344. HARDNESS OF HEART, Biblical. A heart of stone. Ezek. 11: 19. A face harder than a rock. Jer. 5: 3. Stiff of forehead and hard of heart. Ezek. 3: 7. Hard as an adamant stone, probably a diamond. Torpid and benumbed, Rom. 11: 7, 8 (quoting Isa. 29: 10), according to the view of Hammond and others, is taken from the figure of one benumbed, through the stupefying draught given to condemned criminals before execution. Seared, cauterized, or branded, "as with a hot iron," 1 Tim. 4: 2; made callous; a terrible mark of the apostasy of "the latter times." "Past feeling, because of the blindness (marg., hardness) of their heart," Eph. 4: 18, 19. Isa. 6: 9, 10—It is a noteworthy fact that this solemn passage is quoted most frequently in the New Testament, of any Old Testament text. EXAMPLES. Pharaoh—the Old Testament type of incorrigible hardness of heart, defiant alike of mercy and of judgment. It is remarkable that Pharaoh "seems to have been more emboldened to sin, by those miracles of mercy which removed the plagues, than by those of judgment which inflicted them."—(Nicholls.) The Canaanites in the time of Joshua were a striking example of those who have had many warnings, and yet refuse all thought of submission. They had heard of the flood; of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain; the plagues of Egypt; the destruction of Pharaoh; the destruction of their neighbors the Amorites; the miraculous passage of the Jordan; the miraculous overthrow of Jericho; the faith and preservation of Rahab and her family; and yet they hardened their hearts against fear, and were justly destroyed, Joshua 10: 40. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, though so solemnly warned by what happened to him and to the prophet of Judah, was in no degree softened, 1 Kings 13: 4, 24, 33. Ahaziah's hardened impenitence, even upon his death-bed, 2 Kings 1: 4. Herod hardened his heart by putting his reprover into prison, and allowing a just man to be wantonly put to death, Mark 6: 17, 27.

9345. HARLOT, Conversion of a. The story of Eudocia, a beautiful woman of Heliopolis, though doubtless largely fable, illustrates the power of grace. She was in her own richly-furnished house at midnight, awakened by the voice of a priest in the next house discoursing of the coming of Christ to judgment. She became alarmed, and in the morning sent for the monk. He told her what she must do to be saved. She closed her house, put off her rich array, fasted for seven days, and felt deeply her sins. To a priest she said, "O, sir, I am a grievous sinner—a sea of guilt!" "Be of good cheer," he replied. "The sea of guilt may be changed into a port of salvation, and the waves tossing with passion sink into ineffable calm." After fasting, in her exhaustion, she fell into a trance. She says, "Lo! an angel took me by the hand, and led me into heaven, where was unspeakable light, and there I saw the blessed ones in white. All their countenances lit up as I approached, and they came running towards me, and greeted me, even me, as a sister. Then there came up a shadow horrible and black, and it shrieked, saying, 'This woman is mine. I have used her to destroy many, and shall she be saved? I, for one little disobedience, was cast out of heaven, and here is this beast, steeped from head to foot in pollution, admitted to the company of the elect. Take them all; scrape all the rascals and harlots on earth together, and admit them into your society. I will off to my hell, and grovel there in fire forever.' Then I heard a voice answer, 'God willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live.' After that the angel took me by the hand, and led me home again, saying, 'There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth,' and the vision vanished." She had great wealth, but gave it all away, devoted herself to the monastic life, resisted all temptation, and finally suffered martyrdom.

9346. HARLOTS, Labor for. In the seventh century there came to the city of Alexandria an old man of sixty in a monk's garb. He first secured the names of all the abandoned women of the city. He obtained work for himself, and at night, taking the wages of the day, went to one of these women, and after supping with her, gave her his day's earnings saying, "I give thee this that thou mayest spend one night without sin." Then he passed the night praying for the woman with many tears. Going forth he exacted the promise that his visit should not be revealed while he lived. Much scandal soon grew out of these visits. The monk refused to give any account of it saying, "There is one Judge and one day of judgment, wherein every man shall give account of his own works." He bore the reproach and suspicion without murmuring neither letting his benevolent work be known, lest the houses of ill-fame should be closed against him, nor desisting from it. At last, coming one morning from a harlot's door, a man saw him and struck him, saying, "How, rascal, do you outrage Christ by not mending your wicked ways?" The monk went to his chamber to die, and the man entered the harlot's house, and there learned of his noble work. He was struck with contrition and went into the streets proclaiming how he and the people had wronged the monk. A crowd followed the man as he went to beg the monk's pardon. They found him kneeling with hands clasped cold in death. Before him lay the text in writing, "Judge nothing before the time until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart." (1 Cor. 4: 5.) At his funeral great numbers who had been reformed by him, walked in procession before his body, bearing lamps and candles crying, "We have lost our deliverer and instructor," and narrating their rescue through his prayers and zeal for their souls. Thus was manifest how great a work he had done. This is the authentic story of St. Vitalis.

9347. HARMONY, Fable of. There was a feud; red and blue and yellow stood in open defiance, each of the other two. "Acknowledge me chief," said red, "I am ever the emblem of charity. All that is warm and redolent of comfort and kindness is arrayed in my tints. I rest on this rose and claim precedence." "Acknowledge me chief," said blue, "I am the emblem of truth. All that is high and pure and just wears my hue. I rise and shine from yonder sky, and claim precedence." "Acknowledge me chief," said yellow, "I am the emblem of light and glory. Kings are crowned, palaces glitter, with my lustrous color. Receive me, O sun; to thee I call, and claim precedence." "Ah! my children," said the sun, "the very heavens weep at your disunion. Be reconciled, I pray, and show your strength of beauty where it must ever lie—in harmony." And they arose at the entreaty, and embraced in tearful clouds; and the sun shone out on them, and glorious in loveliness was the rainbow they made.

9348. HARVEST, Rejoicing for the. On seeing the caravan, one of the laborers ran from his companions, and approaching us, stood on his hands, with his feet aloft in the air, and gave other demonstrations of joy, when he presented us with an ear of corn and a flower, as an offering of the first-fruits of the year. Another remnant also of another very ancient usage, in the wave offering of the sheaf and the ear of corn, commanded to the Israelites by Moses. We returned them for a handful of paras, or small tin coin, and answered the shout of joy which echoed from the field by acclamations from the caravan.

9349. HASTE and Dispatch. I knew a wise man that had it for a by-word, when he saw men hasten to a conclusion, "Stay a little, that we may make an end the sooner." On the other side, true dispatch is a rich thing; for time is the measure of business, as money is of wares; and business is bought at a dear hand where there is small dispatch. The Spartans and Spaniards have been noted to be of small dispatch. Mi venga la muerte de Spagna;—"Let my death come from Spain," for then it will be sure to be long in coming.

Bacon.

9350. HASTE, Sin of. Haste is the besetting sin of America. We do not run "with patience" the race that is set before us. There is not a day that goes by that we do not see in manuscript, book or paper, signs of the hurry that is the curse of American literature. Our artists are in a hurry; and good ideals are half drawn because they have not time to study their subject. Our engravers are in a hurry; and good blocks are spoilt by skillful workmen who have not time to be careful. Our editors are in a hurry; and their crude thoughts are embodied in editorials written at a dash, brilliant, but ineffective, because not matured. Our writers are in a hurry; and American books are slovenly in scholarship, and careless in execution, and marred by rhetorical and sometimes even grammatical blunders, that would disgrace a college composition. Our merchants are in a hurry; and they launch out in wild speculations that bring ninety-three out of every hundred into bankruptcy. Our ministers are in a hurry; and they sacrifice themselves without serving their parishes, by working under an unnatural excitement. We hear on every side exhortations to activity, industry, energy. We would fain exhort to calmness, sobriety, moderation, leisurely industry.

Christian Weekly.

9351. HATRED, Envy and. Hatred proceeds from an opinion that the person we hate is evil; if not generally so, at least in particular to us. For they who think themselves injured are apt to hate the author of their wrong; yea, even those who are reputed injurious or malicious to others than ourselves we usually nauseate and abhor. But envy has only one sort of object, the felicity of others. Whence it becomes infinite, and like an evil or diseased eye, is offended with everything that is bright.

Putarch.

9352. HATRED, Prevalence of. There is no faculty of the human soul so persistent and universal as that of hatred. There are hatreds of race; hatreds of sect; social and personal hatreds. If thoughts of hatred were thunder and lightning, there would be a storm over the whole earth all the year round. Twenty people cannot be together, but some one suffers from their conversation. Let a man come into the company who from some cause is obnoxious to them, and no sooner does he depart than the ill-smelling flowers of hatred swell their buds, and give forth their malign influences through the room.

Beecher.

9353. HATRED, Romish. The name of Calvin was an odious one to the Papists. In the Spanish expurgatorial index they gave directions that his name should be suppressed; while proselytes to the Romish faith would change the offensive name, if they possessed it.

9354. HEAD, The Human. The head has the most beautiful appearance, as well as the highest station, in a human figure. Nature has laid out all her art in beautifying the face; she has touched it with vermilion, planted in it a double row of ivory, made it the seat of smiles and blushes, lighted it up and enlivened it with the brightness of the eyes, hung it on each side with curious organs of sense, given it airs and graces that cannot be described, and surrounded it with such a flowing shade of hair as sets all its beauties in the most agreeable light. In short, she seems to have designed the head as the cupola to the most glorious of her works.

Addison.

9355. HEALING, Miracles of. Christ cured diseased minds and chronic or temporary diseases with equal success. A late writer says, "We find Christ curing natural defects, which no physician of the highest modern skill would hope to succeed with. Blindness was then, as now, common in the East; many were blind from birth, and others were afflicted with ophthalmia and other painful diseases of these organs. The deaf, and therefore either dumb, or capable only of imperfect utterance, become as others when Christ speaks. The lame or halt, suddenly acquiring the use of those limbs which had long been apparently dead, rejoice and can scarcely control themselves under the emotions of astonishment which they feel at the newly-found power."

9356. HEALTH, Benefit of. Health is the soul that animates all enjoyments of life, which fade, and are tasteless, if not dead, without it. A man starves at the best and the greatest tables, makes faces at the noblest and most delicate wines, is poor and wretched in the midst of the greatest treasures and fortunes, with common diseases; strength grows decrepit, youth loses all vigor, and beauty all charms; music grows harsh, and conversation disagreeable; palaces are prisons, or of equal confinement; riches are useless, honor and attendance are cumbersome, and crowns themselves are a burden: but if diseases are painful and violent, they equal all conditions of life, make no difference between a prince and a beggar; and a fit of the stone or the colic puts a king on the rack, and makes him as miserable as he can the meanest, the worst and most criminal of his subjects.

Temple.

9357. HEALTH, Lost. Among the manifold misfortunes that may befall humanity, the loss of health is one of the severest. All the joys that life can give cannot outweigh the sufferings of the sick. Give the sick man everything, and leave him his sufferings, and he will feel that half the world is lost to him. Lay him on a soft silken couch, he will nevertheless groan sleepless under the pressure of his sufferings; while the miserable beggar, blessed with health, sleeps sweetly on the hard ground. Spread his table with dainty meats and choice drinks, and he will thrust back the hand that proffers them, and envy the poor man who thoroughly enjoys his dry crust. Surround him with the pomp of kings; let his chair be a throne, and his crutch a world-swaying sceptre; he will look with contemptuous eye on marble, on gold, and on purple, and would deem himself happy could he enjoy, even were it under a thatched roof, the health of the meanest of his servants.

Zschokke.

9358. HEALTH, Restoration of. Who would not be covetous, and with reason, if health could be purchased with gold? Who not ambitious, if it were at the command of power, or restored by honor? But, alas! a white staff will not help gouty feet to walk better than a common cane; nor a blue ribbon bind up a wound so well as a fillet; the glitter of gold or diamonds will but hurt sore eyes, instead of curing them; and an aching head will be no more eased by wearing a crown instead of a common night-cap.

Temple.

9359. HEALTH, Value of. He that loses his conscience has nothing left that is worth keeping. Therefore, be sure you look to that. And in the next place look to your health; and if you have it, praise God, and value it next to a good conscience; for health is the second blessing that we mortals are capable of, a blessing that money cannot buy; therefore value it, and be thankful for it.

Izaak Walton.

9360. HEARERS, Choice of. John Wesley always preferred the middling and lower classes to the wealthy. He said, "If I might choose, I should still, as I have done hitherto, preach the gospel to the poor." Preaching in Monk-town church, a large, old, ruinous building, he says, "I suppose it has scarce had such a congregation during this century. Many of them were gay, genteel people, so I spoke on the first elements of the gospel, but I was still out of their depth. Oh, how hard it is to be shallow enough for a polite audience!"

Dr. J. B. Wakeley.

9361. HEARERS, Forgetful. Some hearers have bad memories. Their memories are like leaky vessels: all the precious wine of holy doctrine that is poured in runs out presently. Ministers cannot by study find a truth so fast as others lose it. If a truth delivered doth not stay in the memory, we can never be nourished up in the word of truth. If thieves steal away people's money, they tell every one, and make their complaints that they have been robbed; but there is a worse thief they are not aware of. How many sermons hath the devil stolen from them! How many truths have they been robbed of, which might have been so many death-bed cordials!

T. Watson.

9362. HEARERS Only. It pleaseth men to hear of speculative doctrines, and to be entertained with a luscious preaching of the gospel, made up all of promises, and these wholly unconditional. It gratifies them to hear what is done without them, rather than what is done within them, and the necessity of sincere and entire obedience to our Saviour's precepts urged upon them.

Dr. Worthington.

9363. HEARERS, Opinionated. Persons sitting under a stated ministry attach themselves to a particular pastor, and are so entirely absorbed in him and attached to his habits of thought and modes of illustration as not to be able to endure anything else, much less to profit by it. Like as a tree sheltered from some winds, and only exposed to one from a particular point of the compass, becomes bent in that direction, so the mind of these parties leans, bows, and only yields to the common current. These mental slaves seem to have lost the use of a part of their capacity—taste and feeling. Bring them to listen to a ministry at once plain, clear, and evangelical, but the idioms, tones, topics, and gestures of which are not in the mould of their own "dear minister," and they do not even understand it. The poor man cannot pronounce their "shibboleth," and that is quite enough; he is put down as a very dunce, and often as no gospel minister. It is a great misfortune for the soul not to have room for growth, to be pent up in some miserably narrow enclosure, or to be twisted out of the course of nature to one particular point of fanatical folly. This is proof, as clear as light, that they have been resting on the mannerism of the instrument, instead of the truth delivered.

Dr. Dixon.

9364. HEARERS, Sleepy. Rev. Mr. Fuller, of Kettering, perceived some of his hearers to be drowsy, as soon as he had read his text. He struck the Bible three times against the side of the pulpit, calling out, "What! asleep already! I am often afraid I should preach you asleep: but the fault cannot be mine today, for I have not yet begun!"

9365. HEARERS, Test of. I marked a house standing on the soft sandy cliff, on which the sea is continually making inroads. Already vast portions of the headlands, with the buildings that were upon them, have been washed away; and it is plain that the remaining mansion, however stately and strongly built, must soon follow. How much labor has been spent in vain! How unwise was the builder who raised so costly a structure on so unsafe a site. How grievous that what is so fair in appearance should be so insecure in reality! You may have often seen a far poorer structure set upon some rocky crag, that beats back upon the surges which break themselves upon it, and where it has for ages defied "the stormy wind and tempest." The builder knew what he was doing, when he built on a rock. He wanted it to last for ages, and to stand the utmost violence of the elements; and he chose a foundation which no force of wind and waves could undermine. As years pass by, the building seems only to become more like the rock on which it stands. A day is coming which will assuredly prove on what foundation we have built our house; in other words, whether we have been hearers only, or doers as well as hearers of the word; whether we have been truly or only seemingly religious. Our deeds are at best imperfect; but if done with a sincere and faithful heart, God will accept them, through the mediation of our blessed Saviour; and the flood that will sweep away the hypocrite and the formal professor, will leave us uninjured, and monuments forever of his saving mercy.

Bp. Trower.

9366. HEARERS, Too Generous. A colored preacher was descanting on the different ways in which men lose their souls. Under one head he said that men often lose their souls through excessive generosity. "What!" he exclaimed, "you tell me you never heard of that before? You say, ministers often tell us we lose our souls for our stinginess, and for being covetous—but who ever heard of a man that hurt himself by going too far t'other way? I tell you how they do it. They sit down under the sermon, and when the preacher touch upon this sin or that sin, they no take it to themselves, but give this part of the sermon to one brother, and that part to another brother. And so they give away the whole sermon, and it do them no good. And that's the way they lose their souls by being too generous."

9367. HEARERS, Various. 1. The inattentive hearer, that taketh very little heed to what he heareth. 2. The inconsiderate hearer, that never ponders what he hears, nor compares one thing with another. 3. The injudicious hearer, that never makes any judgment, whether it be true or false. 4. The unapprehensive hearer, who hears all his days, but is never the wiser. 5. The stupid, unaffected hearer, that is as a rock and a stone under the word. 6. There are your prejudiced, disaffected hearers, who hear with dislike, especially those things which relate to practice. 7. Your fantastical, voluptuous hearers, that hear only to please their fancy or imaginations. They come on purpose to try if they can hear a pretty sentence, any fine jingle, any flashes of wit. 8. Your notional hearers, that are of somewhat a higher form and sect than the others. They always come to learn some kind of novelty. 9. Those talkative persons, who only come to hear, that they may furnish themselves with notions for the sake of discourse. 10. The censorious and critical hearers, who come on purpose not as doers of the law, but as judges. 11. Malicious hearers, that come on purpose to seek an advantage against those they come to hear, particularly from what they preach. Thus you see the characters of those who are "Hearers only," which are various and manifold. Howe.

9368. HEARING, Attentive. Aruleus Rusticus was listening to a lecture by Plutarch, when a soldier entered and delivered him a letter from the emperor. The lecturer stopped to give him time to read the letter, but he would not allow it, postponing the letter of the prince for the lecture of a philosopher.

9369. HEARING, Biblical. Aaron and his sons.

—At their consecration, the blood of the ram was to be put partly upon the tip of the right ear, Exod. 29: 20; not only as one of the three extremities of the body, but probably also with a symbolical meaning—that they should be ever ready to hear the Divine commands. The leper.—At the cleansing of the leper in like manner some of the blood of the trespass-offering, and some of the holy oil, was to be put upon the tip of the right ear, Lev. 14: 14, 17. The faithful servant, whose ear was to be bored through at his master's door, was a beautiful token of willingness, cheerfully to hear and obey a master's wishes, Exod. 21: 6. How many kinds of ears and hearing are spoken of in Scripture! Dull, heavy, itching, uncircumcised, opened, obedient ears.—See Conc.; and also Ezekiel's hearers, Ezek. 33: 30–33; Athenian hearers, Acts 17: 21; the parable of the sower, Mark 4: 14–20. How MANY PRECEPTS urge the duty of attentive hearing!—See Conc. under give ear—hearken—diligently—incline the ear (the figure of one stooping down to catch the faintest whisper)—"swift to hear." "Hear this word" (the beginning of three consecutive chapters of Amos, 3, 4, 5); "Hear, all ye people;" "Hear, I pray you, . . . ye princes;" "Hear ye now what the Lord saith,"—the three sections of the prophecy of Micah (1: 2; 3: 1, 9; 6: 1, 2); "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." No precept, perhaps, was so frequently repeated by Christ as this, Matt. 11: 15; 13: 9, 43; Mark 4: 9, 23; 7: 16; Luke 14: 35. Even from the throne above, he addressed the same charge to each of the seven churches, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches," Rev. 2: 7, 11, 17, 29; 3: 6, 13, 22; also Christ's miracles of healing the deaf, Matt. 11: 11; Mark 7: 37; 9: 25, with their symbolical and spiritual meaning. Bowes.

9370. HEARING, Defending the. There are many organs and other parts of the body which serve as avenues and inlets to the soul to give admission to vice; there is but one passage of virtue into young minds, and that is by the ears. For this reason Xenocrates was of opinion that children ought to have a defence fitted to their ears rather than fencers or prize-players, because the ears only of the latter suffered by the blows, but the morals of the former were hurt and maimed by words. Plutarch.

9371. HEARING, Different Results of. At Basle, Switzerland, we crossed the river Rhine by a curious ferry. The current of the river propels the boat from side to side in either direction as you wish. The same influence carries passengers in opposite directions. Thus it is with the ordinances of the church, the hearing of the word, and other means of grace. By them one is carried heavenward and another hellward, according to the direction each attendant is pursuing. The best influences improved give life, rejected death. Alas, that many are sweeping at a swifter rate towards ruin because of the current of good influences which they are in!

9372. HEARING, Duty of. This is not a fair-weather duty. Has not the business of eternity as urgent claims as the business of time? Then it is not too high to let one rule govern decisions in both cases. The preacher is sent to be heard: He comes to tell the good news. He will be pretty certain to tell the best news he has. Joy bubbles up in the heart and ripples out over the lips, while sorrow settles, like life's sediment, in the bottom of the heart, to clog its throbbings. His best may not suit you. Remember that there are only a few model preachers. We have read of only one perfect Model, and he was crucified many centuries ago.

Dr. C. H. Fowler.

9373. HEARING, Figure of. Plutarch compares hearing to filling one vessel from another, in which care is taken to place the vessel to be filled so that the contents of the other may be poured into it without spilling. To fill one vessel from another there must be something in it besides wind. The moral of this will suggest itself to every hearer and speaker.

9374. HEARING, Formal. "Well, Master Jackson," said his minister, walking homewards after service with an industrious laborer, who was a constant attendant: "well, Master Jackson, Sunday must be a blessed day of rest for you, who work so hard all the week! And you make a good use of the day, for you are always to be seen at church!" "Ay, sir," replied Jackson, "it is indeed a blessed day; I works hard enough all the week, and then I comes to church o' Sundays, and sets me down, and lays my legs up, and thinks o' nothing."

Southey.

9375. HEARING, Motives to. A lady once heard Rev. Ebenezer Erskine preach without knowing who he was, and was much profited by his discourse. Having learned his name, she resolved to hear him the next Sabbath in his own church, which she did, but without the influences she felt on the first occasion. Wondering at this, she stated the case to Mr. Erskine, and asked what might be the reason of such a difference in her feeling. He replied, "Madame, the reason is this: last Sabbath you went to hear Jesus Christ preached, but to-day you have come to hear Ebenezer Erskine preach."

9376. HEARING, Neglect of. To a person who excused his non-attendance at public worship by pleading the disagreeable appearance and manner of the minister, the Bishop of Alet said, "Let us look more at our Saviour, and less at the instruments. Elijah was as well nourished when the bread from heaven was brought by a raven, as Ishmael when the spring of water was revealed to him by an angel. Whether, then, we are fed immediately from God, as the Israelites, with manna in the wilderness, or by the glorious instrumentality of those who may seem to us as angels, or by the base one of those who seem to us contemptible, let us be content and thankful if they are appointed of God, and if the bread and water of life they bring."

9377. HEARING, Peculiar. Naturalists affirm that there are tiny creatures with auricular organs so constructed that they cannot hear the thunder of heaven or the speech of men. The only sounds that strike their tympanum are the hum of bees, the grasshopper's call, and such like feeble pipings.

S. Coley.

9378. HEARING, Pre-occupied. A man who had been a faithful attendant at church for fourteen years was taken sick and was visited by the preacher. He was unconverted; and when urged to seek for pardon, and not to rest until he knew his sins forgiven, he expressed great surprise. He did not know that it was possible! "Have you not attended — church?" "Yes," was the reply; "but I do not know that I ever heard a sermon." "What do you mean? You have regularly sat there for some fourteen years, and not heard a sermon? How can that be?" "Why," said he, "the truth is this: as soon as the preacher took his text I began to think of my business; and I had acquired such a habit of abstraction that while the preacher was preaching, I could trace out on the panel of the seat before me all the work of the past week; and, having reviewed that, could lay all my plans for the week to come. And the consequence is, that I do not know that I ever heard a sermon."

9379. HEART, Argument from the. An anatomist, as Dr. Paley observes, who understood the structure of the heart, might say beforehand that it would play; but he would expect, I think, from the complexity of its mechanism, and the delicacy of many of its parts, that it should always be liable to derangement, or that it would soon work itself out. Yet shall this wonderful machine go night and day, for eighty years together, at the rate of a hundred thousand strokes every twenty-four hours, having at every stroke a great resistance to overcome; and shall continue this action for this length of time, without disorder and without weariness. Each ventricle will at least contain one ounce of blood. The heart contracts four thousand times in one hour, from which it follows, that there passes through the heart every hour four thousand ounces or three hundred and fifty pounds of blood. Now the whole mass of blood is said to be about twenty-five pounds, so that a quantity of blood, equal to the whole mass of blood, passes through the heart fourteen times in one hour; which is about once every four minutes. When we reflect also upon the number of muscles, not fewer than four hundred and forty-six in the human body, known and named; how contiguous they lie to each other, as it were, over one another; crossing one another; sometimes embedding in one another; sometimes perforating one another; an arrangement which leaves to each its liberty, and its full play; this must necessarily require meditation and counsel, Dr. Nienentyt, in the Leipsic Transaction, reckons up a hundred muscles that are em played every time we breathe; yet we take in or let out our breath without reflecting what a work is hereby performed—what an apparatus is laid in of instruments for the service, and how many such contribute their assistance to the effect. Breathing with ease is a blessing of every moment; yet of all others, it is that which we possess with the least consciousness. A man in an asthma is the only man who knows how to esteem it. Buck.

9380. HEART, A Bad. A little Kansas boy, well up in theology, watched the servant as she prepared the potatoes for dinner. She took up a large and fine one, cut it in two and found it hollow and black inside with dry rot. Willie exclaimed, "Why, Maggie, that potato isn't a Christian." "What do you mean?" asked Maggie. "Don't you see it has a bad heart?" was Willie's reply.

9381. HEART, Beginning at the. It is observed of the spider that in the morning, before she seeks her prey, she mends her broken web, and in doing this she always begins in the middle. And shall those who call themselves Christians rise and pursue the callings and profits of the world, and yet be unconcerned about the broken webs of their lives, and especially of their hearts? Those who would have the cocks run with wholesome water should look well to the springs that supply them. The heart is the presence-chamber where the King of glory takes up his residence. That which is most worthy in us should be resigned to him who is most worthy of us. Secker.

9382. HEART, The Bolted. Christ comes to bless us, but we bolt our hearts against him. In Glasgow they were telling me of a scene that occurred when Dr. Arnot was preaching there. A woman was in great distress about her rent. She could not pay it, and so he took some money, and going to the house, went to the door and knocked. He listened, and thought he heard the footsteps of some one inside, and so he knocked louder. No one came, and he knocked still louder, but after waiting some time he went away disappointed. A few days afterward he met this lady on the street at Glasgow and told her that he heard she had been in great distress and he went around to help her, and the woman threw up both hands and said, "Why, Doctor, that was not you, was it? I was in the house all the time, and I thought it was the landlord coming around to get the rent, and I kept the door bolted." Moody.

9383. HEART, Care of the. The heart may be engaged in a little business, as much, if thou watch it not, as in many and great affairs. A man may drown in a little brook or pool, as well as in a great river, if he lie down and plunge himself into it, and put his head under water. Some care thou must have, that thou mayest not care. Those things that are thorns indeed, thou must make a hedge of them, to keep out those temptations that accompany sloth, and extreme want that waits on it; but let them be the hedge, suffer them not to grow within the garden. Coleridge.

9384. HEART, Carnal or Spiritual. In the heart of a carnal man all things lie in a confused order, heaven below, and earth at top; earth seems to him to be vast and infinite, but heaven a little inconsiderable spot. But in the heart of a child of God everything keeps its natural posture. There earth sinks, as being the dregs of his thoughts and cares, but heaven shines above, very bright and glorious; earth seems to him to be but a little spot, as indeed it is, which is seldom seen or noted by him, but heaven is an infinite boundless sea of mercy, which he is still looking into and admiring.

Hopkins.

9385. HEART, Closet of the. Let me step into your heart, sir, and peep upon its furniture. My hands are pretty honest; you may trust me; and nothing will be found, I fear, to tempt a man to be a thief. Well, to be sure, what a filthy closet is here! Never swept, for certain, since you were christened. And what a fat idol stands skulking in the corner! A sweet heart-sin, I warrant it. How it simpers, and seems as pleasant as a right eye! Can you find a will to part with it, or strength to pluck it out? And supposing you a match for this self-denial, can you so command your heart as to hate the sin you do forsake? This is certainly required. Truth is called for in the inward parts. God will have sin not only cast aside, but cast away with abhorrence. So he speaks, "Ye that love the Lord hate evil."

John Berridge.

9386. HEART, Color of the. If a bowl of dye be crimson, whatever you draw out of it will be red; if a coat be black, each thread you pull from it will be black. So, if our hearts are sinful, whatever issues from them will be more or less sinful.

Bolton.

9387. HEART, Discipline of the. As smiths, better to work their iron, put it back frequently into the furnace, to be softened by the fire; and gardeners, to preserve a fine row of cedars and myrtles, frequently cut off the superfluous leaves and blossoms; so to preserve a soul in the fervor of virtue, it must often replace itself in the furnace of the exercises, and there, enlightened by God on its defects, divest itself of them and amend.

Ignatius.

9388. HEART, Double. Rev. William Johnston, missionary in Africa, gives the following account: "One woman was much distressed and wept, and said that she had two hearts, which troubled her so much that she did not know what to do. One was the new heart, that told her all things that she had ever been doing. The same heart told her that she must go to Jesus Christ, and tell him all her sins, as she had heard at church; but her old heart told her, 'Never mind, God no save black man, but white man. How know he died for black man?' Her new heart said, 'Go, cry to him, and ask.' 'Old heart tell me, do my work first: fetch water, make fire, wash, and then go pray. When work done, then me forget to pray. I don't know what I do.' I read to her the seventh chapter of Romans, and showed that the Apostle Paul felt the same things, and spoke of two principles in man. When I came to the verse, 'O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?' she said, 'Ah, Massa, that me: me no know what to do.' I added the words of St. Paul, 'I thank God, through Jesus Christ;' and explained to her the love of Christ, how he died for sinners like her. She burst into tears; and has continued ever since, so far as I know, to follow her Saviour."

9389. HEART, Figures of the. Old Humphrey compares the heart to a lamp which must be filled and trimmed. To a ship whose hull and rigging must be cared for. "Have an eye to the crew, and take especial care what merchandise you put aboard; mind that you have plenty of ballast, and that you carry not too much sail. Mind you have a heavenly Pilot at the helm. Be prepared for storms, for you will have them, whether you are prepared for them or not. Encourage the hope of a fair voyage and a happy arrival at a heavenly haven. A besieged city, liable to attacks on all sides. Go round about it; tell the towers thereof, and mark well the bulwarks; while you defend one part, keep a good look-out on the other; while you build up the bastion here, let not the gateway be left defenceless there. Shells may be thrown over the walls, and sappers may mine a way under them. Be alive! be diligent! post your sentinels! have a watchword! take care whom you let in, and whom you allow to go out. Muster your troops, and see that there be no traitors among them. You have plenty to do, and plenty to attend to; keep, then, your heart with all diligence."

9390. HEART a Garden. Shall we compare the garden to the heart of man? the flowers to Christian virtues and graces, the weeds to corruptions? The weed springeth of itself, but the flower must be sown by the gardener, and tended by his care. Some flowers require more care than others; they are brought from countries afar off, from brighter skies and more genial soils, and require all the vigilance and tenderness of the gardener, lest they be blighted by our colder winds, or starved by our ungenial ground. Salter.

9391. HEART, Giving the. A little boy said to his mother, "What does it mean to give your heart to God?" The mother said, "Charlie, do you love anybody?" With a look of surprise the child answered, "I love you; I love my father, and my sister, and Henry." "Then you give your heart to your father, to Henry, to your sister, to me; and you show that love by doing all you can for us, and obeying our commands. And you ought," continued his mother, "to love God the best, because he gave you your father and mother, and he gave you his dear Son, Jesus Christ, who came from heaven to die that you may live forever."

9392. HEART, God in the. Naturalists tell us that the loadstone will not draw in the presence of the diamond. O sirs! whilst a man can eye God as his portion, all the pride, pomp, bravery, glory, and gallantry in the world will never be able to draw him from God. It is reported that when the tyrant Trajan commanded Ignatius to be ripped up and unbowed, they found Jesus Christ written upon his heart in characters of gold. Here was a heart worth gold indeed; Christ carried away his heart from all other things. Brooks.

9393. HEART, God's Temple. Be diligent. Sometimes speak to God, at other times hear him speak to you. Let him regulate your soul. Whom he hath made rich, none shall make poor. There can be no penury with him whose heart has once been enriched with celestial bounty. Roofs arched with gold, and palaces adorned with marble, are vile in comparison with that house which the Lord has chosen to be his temple, in which the Holy Ghost dwells. Illuminate this house with the light of righteousness. Its ornaments shall never fade, and it shall dwell hereafter in spotless beauty and eternal majesty. St. Cyprian.

9394. HEART, Greed of the. The heart of a man is a short word, a small substance, scarce enough to give a kite a meal; yet great in capacity, yea, so indefinite in desire that the round globe of the world cannot fill the three corners of it, when it desires more, and cries "Give, give!" I will set it over to the Infinite Good, where the more it hath it may desire more, and see more to be desired.

9395. HEART a Hive. Take your place beside a hive of bees in a summer day at noon, and watch the busy traffickers. The outward-bound brush quickly past the heavy-laden incomers in the narrow passage. They flow like two opposite streams of water in the same channel, without impeding each other's motions. Every one is in haste: none tarries for a neighbor. Such a hive is a human heart, and the swarm of winged thoughts which harbor there maintain an intercourse with all the world in constant circulation, while the man sits among the worshipers still, and upright and steady as a bee-hive upon its pedestal. The thoughts that issue from their home in that human heart, bold like robbers in the dark, overleap the fences of holiness, suck at will every flower that they reckon sweet, and return to deposit their gatherings in the owner's cup. The eyes of the Lord are there, beholding the evil. Arnot.

9396. HEART, Idolatry in the. A man may hang the Decalogue upon the walls of his home, and still be an idolater—even as many a one has the Lord's Prayer, for an ornament, on the walls of his chamber, who yet forgets to pray, both at evening and morning. The thing to be done is, to hang the Decalogue on the inner walls of the heart. Chicago Pulpit.

9397. HEART, Keeping the. "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." As good housekeeping is essential to domestic comfort, so good heart-keeping is essential to healthful and happy piety. Cuyler.

9398. HEART, Mechanism of the. With what wonderful and inimitable art is that muscled body constructed, which is situated in the cav ity of the breast, and is called the heart? Its form is something like an obtuse pyramid; and it is so placed that the point inclines a little to the left side. Its substance appears to be a series of fleshy fibres interwoven with infinite art, in such a manner that the external fibres extend from the left side of the heart towards the right, and the internal fibres from the right side towards the left. This intestine has within it two cavities, called ventricles, separated from one another by a fleshy partition. In that there is a vein which conducts the blood of the upper parts of the body into the right ventricle of the heart; another which brings back the blood from the lower parts into that same cavity; an artery which sends it from thence into the lungs; another vein through which it runs from the lungs into the left ventricle, from whence it is sent over the whole body through the great artery. On the one side of the right ventricle is a sort of musculous bag, which is called the auricle of the heart, and which receives the blood before it has entered the right ventricle. Another auricle, not less useful, hangs at the left ventricle, that the blood may stop there during a new contraction. All the blood passes through the heart. It continually goes in and out; and by the contraction of this intestine, it is sent into every part of the human body, and circulates through all the veins. When even all the other members of the body are at rest, the heart is in perpetual motion, from the first moment of life to the last. In a state of health, the heart contracts itself at least sixty times in a minute, and consequently 3,600 times in an hour; and at each beating of the pulse it throws out about two ounces of blood. The force it must use to do so is not small. For in order to throw out the blood, so that it should reach only as far as two feet in the great artery, the heart must resist a weight of 12,600 pounds; and consequently in twenty-four hours, a resistance of 224,000,000 pounds weight. All these things are equally admirable and incomprehensible. They lead us to cry out with wonder and astonishment, How great is our divine Creator! Who can describe his glory!

Sturm.

9399. HEART, Morals of the. Moral life is no creation of moral phrases. The words that are truly vital powers for good or evil are only those which, as Pindar says, "The tongue draws up from the deep heart."

Whipple.

9400. HEART, Parable of the. I held in my hand a little dry tree, an infant hemlock. Had it lived a century it might have towered up above all the forest, and held up its head in majesty. But it grew on a sort of bog, and a muskrat, digging his hole under it, bit off its roots, and it was dead. It was full of limbs and knots and gnarls, and I felt curious to know how it happened that it was so. "Poor fellow! If you had all these limbs and knots to support, I don't wonder you died." "And with my roots, which were my mouths with which to feed, all cut off, too." "Yes, but where do all these ugly limbs come from?"

said I. "Just where all ugly things come from," said he. "I am pretty much like you men. Find out where my limbs come from, and you will find where all human sins come from." "I'll take you at your word, sir." So I took out my knife, and peeled off all the bark. But the limbs and the knots were left. "You must go deeper than that, sir." So I began to split and take off layer of wood after layer. But all the knots were there. "Deeper still," said the dry stick. Then I split it all off, and, separating it, the heart was laid bare; it looked like a small rod about six feet long, and perhaps an inch through at the large ends. Ah! and I was now surprised to see that every limb and knot and gnarl started in the heart. Every one was there, and every one grew out of the heart. The germ or the starting-point of each one was the center of the heart. Anon.

9401. HEART, Purged. The heart must be made a temple to God, wherein sacrifices do ascend; but, that they may be accepted, it must be purged of idols, nothing left in any corner, though never so secret, to stir the jealousy of our God, who sees through all. Oh, happy that heart that is, as Jacob's house, purged, in which no more idols are to be found, but the holy God dwelling there alone as in his holy temple!

Leighton.

9402. HEART, Purity of. A little girl who had been reading the beatitudes, was asked which she should desire most to possess. She replied, "I would rather be pure in heart." On being asked the reason of her preference, she answered to this effect: "Sir, if I could but obtain a pure heart, I should then possess all the other good qualities spoken of in this chapter."

9403. HEART, Purifying our Own. If a housewife wants her parlor to be thoroughly cleansed that the most critical visitor will find nothing but to approve, she opens all the blinds and lets the sunlight stream in. In this glare of light she sweeps, and dusts, and scrubs, and polishes. No speck of dust, no cobweb, no thread or scrap escapes her observation. If any nooks or hiding-places of dust remain unvisited, because her time or strength or courage fails, she at least knows of them, and purposes to attend to them at some future time. The light in which her visitors see the room, however strong, is less searching than that to which the housekeeper herself has already exposed it. However severe the judgments they pass, her own have been more intolerant. See, under this homely figure, the Christian purifying his heart in the sight of God. He floods, with the light of God's perfect law, the inner chambers of his life. Before his all-seeing Father he cleanses and purifies himself within.

Salter.

9404. HEART, Responsibility of the. It is reported that Apollodorus in a dream beheld himself flayed by the Scythians and then boiled, and that his heart, speaking to him out of the kettle, uttered these words, "I am the cause of thy suffering all this."

9405. HEART, Softening the. A Syrian anchor

ite went to Poemen, lamenting the hardness of his heart. "Read the word of God," said he, "the drop of a fountain pierces the stone, and the gentle word falling softly, day by day, on the dead, hard heart after awhile infallibly melts it."

9406. HEART, Spiritual Disease of the. Some malady which you do not understand troubles and alarms you. The physician is called. Thinking that the illness proceeds from a certain inflammatory process on a portion of your skin, you anxiously direct his attention to the spot. Silently, but sympathizingly, he looks at the place where you have bidden him look, and because you have bidden him look there, but soon he turns away. He is busy with an instrument on another part of your body. He presses his trumpet tube gently to your breast, and listens for the pulsations which faintly but distinctly pass through. He looks and listens there, and saddens as he looks. You again direct attention to the cutaneous eruption which annoys you. He sighs and sits silent. When you reiterate your request that something should be done for the external eruption, he gently shakes his head, and answers not a word. From this silence you would learn the truth at last; you would not miss its meaning long. O, miss not the meaning of the Lord when he points to the seat of the soul's disease: "Ye will not come." These, his enemies, dwell in your heart. W. Arnot.

9407. HEART, Stability of. If the world be in the middle of the heart, it will be often shaken, for all there is continual motion and change; but God in it keeps it stable. Labor, therefore, to get God into your hearts, residing in the midst of them; and then, in the midst of all conditions, they shall not move. Leighton.

9408. HEART, Stony. A little girl begged of her father to give her just three yards of ground; she wanted a little garden which should be her own, her very own. Well, he gave her just that little piece of ground; and O, how pleased she was! She raked it smooth and dropped in some seeds, and ere long they sprung up; but they soon withered away. She could not get them to grow. And she asked her father to come and look at her garden; and when he came, he knew it was like the stony ground in the scripture parable—that there was no depth of earth. Just under the soil was a stone slab which had somehow been covered over. Very much against her will he swept away all that superincumbent little bit of soil—flowers, roots, and every thing; and then he struck hard at the slab, broke it in pieces, and took it away, and then, after digging deeply into the soil, he made it smooth and straight. And then the seed was sown, and the seed took root. Ah! he had taken the stone out. Sometimes you want the garden of the heart to bring forth—but, alas! there are stones in it. You may try to plant the truth, but it won't grow; it cannot, till the great Father takes the stone out of the heart. Well, he can do it; and then the root will strike, and the flowers will bloom; and you that want your children to be virtuous must teach them to ask, as you ask for them, that the Father may take the stone out of the heart. S. Coley.

9409. HEART, Testing the. Stanhurst draws a lesson from the method of determining the rightful owner of certain debatable lands between England and Ireland. Toads or snakes were put upon the disputed territory, and, if they lived, it was concluded the lands belonged to England; if they died, to Ireland. So, if venomous passions or lusts live in the heart, it belongs to Satan, and its city is hell; but if they die, so that there is no life in them, it belongs to Christ, and its inheritance shall be a mansion in heaven.

9410. HEART, Treasures of the. The devil knows that if there be any good treasure, it is in our hearts; and he would gladly have the key of these cabinets that he might rob us of our jewels. A heart which is sanctified is better than a tongue that is silvered. He that gives only the skin of worship to God receives only the shell of comfort from God. It is not the bare touching of the strings that makes an harmonious tune. A spiritual man may pray carnally, but a carnal man cannot pray spiritually. If God's mercies do not eat out the heart of our sins, our sins will soon eat out the heart of our duties. A work that is heartless is a work that is fruitless. God cares not for the crazy cabinet, but for the precious jewel. Brooke.

9411. HEART, Unfruitfulness of the. There are some soils so shallow, and wanting in mould, and have so little depth, that while they are suited to bring forth flowers, bear but an imperfect crop of fruit. So there is much ground in the hearts of many, which, while it can bring forth the glittering leaves of a showy profession, yet bears no good fruit, or very sparingly. Salter.

9412. HEART, War in the. A man that is divided between piety and sin is like one that lives on the confines of two mighty contending states; his heart is a constant seat of war, and he is sometimes under the dominion of virtue, and sometimes under the tyranny of vice. Jeremiah Seed.

9413. HEARTS, Broken. I believe in broken hearts and the possibility of dying of disappointed love. I do not, however, consider it a malady often fatal to my own sex; but I firmly believe that it withers down many a lovely woman into an early grave. Man is the creature of interest and ambition. His nature leads him forth into the struggle and bustle of the world. Love is but the embellishment of his early life, or a song piped in the intervals of the acts. He seeks for fame, for fortune, for space in the world's thought, and dominion over his fellow-men. But a woman's whole life is a history of the affections. The heart is her world: it is there her ambition strives for empire; it is there her avarice seeks for hidden treasures. She sends forth her sympathies on adventure; she embarks her whole soul in the traffic of affection; and if shipwrecked, her case is hopeless—for it is a bankruptcy of the heart. W. Irving.

9414. HEAT, Effects of. The application of heat to the various branches of the mechanical and chemical arts has, within a few years, effected a greater change in the condition of man than had been accomplished in any equal period of his existence. Armed by the expansion and condensation of fluids, with a power equal to that of the lightning itself, conquering time and space, he flies over plains, and travels on paths cut by human industry even through mountains, with a velocity and smoothness more like planetary than terrestrial motion; he crosses the deep in opposition to wind and tide; he makes the elements of air and water the carriers of warmth, not only to banish winter from his home, but to adorn it, even during the snow-storm, with the blossoms of spring; and, like a magician, he raises from the gloomy and deep abyss of the mine the spirit of light, to dispel the midnight darkness. Somerville.

9415. HEATHEN, Exposure of the. Suppose a precipice, at the foot of which the deep ocean is foaming; and suppose a procession, consisting of men, women and children, moving on, night and day, two abreast, and at the rate of two miles a hour; and suppose that when they reached the precipice, they threw themselves over, and were engulfed in the devouring waters; and suppose that you inhabited a cottage near the precipice, and heard the ceaseless scream, and shriek, and loud agony of those perishing amid the billows—could you dwell in that house? Would it be possible to remain quiet? Would you not rush forth and endeavor to arouse the neighborhood to prevent those deluded persons from destroying themselves? Dr. Somerville.

9416. HEATHENISM, Bloody Rites of. Divi, as the Hindus believe, is the goddess who thirsts for blood; and hence at her annual mela much profit is supposed to be gained by making her blood-offerings. The whole process of worship and sacrifice is disgusting in the extreme; and as we have looked upon it during the past fortnight, our hearts have been greatly moved, and we have longed for the power to vividly portray the scene before the church at home. Sheep, goats, lambs, pigs and even chickens are brought and slaughtered to propitiate the goddess. The deluded devotee brings his offering, and after washing it and himself in a pool of dirty water, he presents himself before the temple, where stand two butchers (priests they can hardly be called), with bloody hands and knives. A rope is slipped over the head of the struggling victim, the butcher's knife suddenly descends, and in an instant the head is off, and falls to the ground. The man who brings the offering quickly gathers up the bleeding head, and rushes with it into the temple, to sprinkle with blood the image of the goddess. A relative or friend takes up the quivering body and carries it away, to be eaten by the family. Other members of the family buy cocoanuts, sweetmeats, flowers, etc., and present these before the goddess. Others bring young pigs, and holding them by the hind legs, they dash out their brains on a certain stone, and then smear with the blood another idol near at hand. This horrible work is accompanied by the beating of drums, ringing of bells, and singing, and continues with great enthusiasm from sunrise to sunset. B. H. Badley.

9417. HEATHENISM, Cruelty of. Bernier relates some incidents of the barbarous custom in India, (now prohibited), of widows immolating themselves on the funeral pile of their husbands. He says, "I have seen some of these victims who, at the sight of the fire and the pile, would have gone back when it was unhappily too late; those demons, the attendant Brahmins, with their great sticks, astound them, and sometimes even thrust them into the fire, as I once saw them act to a young woman who retreated five or six paces from the pile; perceiving her much disturbed, they absolutely forced her into the flames. For my own part, I have often been so enraged at these Brahmins, that if I dared I could have strangled them. I remember, among other occasions, that at Lahore I once saw a very handsome and very young woman burnt, not more, I believe, than twelve years of age. This poor, unhappy creature appeared more dead than alive when she came near the pile, and shook and wept bitterly; upon which three or four of these executioners, the Brahmins, together with an old hag who held her under the arm, pushed her forward, and made her sit down upon the wood; and lest she should run away, they tied her hands and legs, and so burnt her alive."

9418. HEAVEN, Adjustment in. An aged Christian paused to rest himself from a heavy load on a warm summer day. An acquaintance accosted him as a splendid carriage rolled past, in which a haughty man rode, whose whole appearance bespoke a life of luxurious ease. "What do you think of the providence of which you sometimes speak?" said the acquaintance. "You know that that is a wicked man; yet he spends himself like a green bay-tree. His eyes stand out with fatness; he is not plagued as other men; while you, believing that all the silver and gold is the Lord's, serving him and trusting in his providence, and toiling and sweating in your old age, get little more than bread and water. How can you reconcile this with a just providence?" The aged man looked at the questioner with amazement, and, with the greatest earnestness, replied: "Couple heaven with it! couple heaven with it, and then?"

9419. HEAVEN, Admittance to. At heaven's gate there stands an angel, with charge to admit none but those who in their countenances bear the same features as the Lord of the place. Here comes a monarch with a crown upon his head. The angel pays him no respect, but reminds him that the diadems of earth have no value in heaven. A company of eminent men advance dressed in robes of state, and others adorned with the gowns of learning, but to these no deference is rendered, for their faces are very unlike the Crucified. A maiden comes forward, fair and comely, but the celestial watcher sees not in that sparkling eye and ruddy cheek the beauty for which he is looking. A man of renown cometh up heralded by fame, and preceded by the admiring clamor of mankind; but the angel saith, "Such applause may please the sons of men, but thou hast no right to enter here." But free admittance is always given to those who in holiness are made like their Lord. Poor they may have been; illiterate they may have been; but the angel as he looks at them smiles a welcome as he says, "It is Christ again; a transcript of the holy child Jesus. Come in, come in; eternal glory thou shalt win. Thou shalt sit in heaven with Christ, for thou art like him."

Spurgeon.
9420. HEAVEN, All White in. A minister asked a colored boy, aged eleven years, "Do you really believe that there are any black children in heaven?" He reflected a moment, then answered, "No, Massa, I 'specs dey isn't." "Well, then, you can't go there, can you?" "Reckon I kin, massa." "But how can you go there when there are no black children there?" "'Kase dey is all white." "But how's that?" "Oh, dey is all washed white in de blood of de Lamb!" It was a child's faith, true to fact, whatever may be thought of its form.

9421. HEAVEN, Biblical Figures of. A paradise restored, 2 Cor. 12: 2, 4; Rev. 2: 7; where there will be more than Eden's beauty and Eden's peace, and no serpent creeping in to steal away sweet happiness. A city, Heb. 11: 16; 13: 14; a "city of God," without griefs or graves, or sins or sorrows; whose inhabitants no census has ever numbered; whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are praise. A country—a "better country—that is, an heavenly" (literally, a Fatherland), Heb. 11: 16; the meeting-place of those who were redeemed from among men unto God, and who worship him with holy angels in sinless happiness. A temple, Rev. 3: 12; 7: 15; bright with the Divine glory, filled with the Divine presence. A garner, Matt. 3: 12. A kingdom—"the kingdom of Christ and of God," Eph. 5: 5; "the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," 2 Pet. 1: 11. An inheritance "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away," 1 Pet. 1: 4; "the inheritance of the saints in light," Col. 1: 12. "The rest that remaineth for the people of God," Heb. 4: 9 ("the keeping of a Sabbath," marg.); the rest from care and sin and sorrow, from labor and trouble, weakness and want. God's dwelling-place, 1 Kings 8: 30; Matt. 6: 9. God's throne, Isa. 66: 1; 1 Kings 8: 27; Acts 17: 24. The "Father's house" of "many mansions," prepared for the redeemed by Christ, John 14: 2.

Bowes.
9422. HEAVEN: Brevities. Heaven's gates are wide enough to admit of many sinners, but too narrow to admit of any sin.—Howells.—

The earth is our workhouse, but heaven is our storehouse. This is a place to run in, and that is a place to rest in.—Secker.—The gates of heaven are shut upon workers and open to believers; shut to those who come with money in their hands, but open to those who are content to enter without paying anything for their entrance.—J. Simpson.—It is impossible to have a lively hope in another life, and yet be deeply immersed in the enjoyments of this.

Atterbury.
9423. HEAVEN, Care for. Anaxagoras being accused of not studying politics for his country's good replied, "I have a great care of my country," pointing up to heaven. So a Christian looks upon heaven as his country, and considers himself as a stranger and a pilgrim here on earth; nor will his heavenly-mindedness detract from his patriotism; for he is the best friend to order and happiness on earth, whose affections are most set on things in heaven.

Anon.
9424. HEAVEN, Child's Thought of. A mother overheard her little four-year-old boy soliloquizing thus about getting to heaven: "Heaven is a great way off. I wonder how I can get there. Oh, I know how! I will get a ladder, and put it on the top of a great big tree. Then I'll climb up and knock at the door of heaven. Then God will open the door and say, 'Who is there?' And I'll say, 'It's me, little Frankie.' Then God will open the door and say, 'Come in, little Frankie.'"

S. T. Treasury.
9425. HEAVEN, Christians in. I have read of Ingo, an ancient king of the Draves, who making a stately feast, appointed his nobles, at that time pagans, to sit in the hall below, and commanded certain poor Christians to be brought up into his presence-chamber, to sit with him at his table, to eat and drink of his kingly cheer; at which many wondering, he said, "He accounted Christians, though never so poor, a greater ornament to his table, and more worthy of his company, than the greatest peers unconverted to the Christian faith; for when these might be thrust down to hell, those might be his consorts and fellow-princes in heaven." "Who hath raised us up," saith the apostle, "and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

Brooks.
9426. HEAVEN, Climbing up to. The Mohammedans say that Nimrod built a tower in Babel to the height of about ten thousand feet, nearly one-third of a mile, purposing to ascend to heaven and wage war upon its inhabitants. God defeated the plan by sending a whirlwind and an earthquake, which utterly overthrew the tower. Others say he built the tower that he might visit Abraham's God in heaven, whom, for a time, he professed to serve. When the tower was overthrown, his desire to scale heaven continuing, he entered a chest, and was borne by four monstrous birds through the air till they wearied, and dropped him upon the top of a mountain. So fail all plans to gain heaven, except through Christ.

9427. HEAVEN, Company of. If the mere conception of the reunion of good men in a future state infused a momentary rapture into the mind of Tully—if an airy speculation, for there is reason to fear it had little hold on his convictions, could inspire him with such delight—what may we be expected to feel who are assured of such an event by the true sayings of God! How should we rejoice in the prospect, the certainty rather, of spending a blissful eternity with those whom we loved on earth; of seeing them emerge from the ruins of the tomb and the deeper ruins of the fall, not only uninjured, but refined and perfected, “with every tear wiped from their eyes,” standing before the throne of God and the Lamb in white robes, and palms in their hands, crying with a loud voice, Salvation to God that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb forever and ever! What delight will it afford to renew the sweet counsel we have taken together, to recount the toils of combat and the labor of the way, and to approach, not the house, but the throne, of God in company, in order to join in the symphonies of heavenly voices, and lose ourselves amid the splendor and fruitions of the beatific vision!

Robert Hall.

9428. HEAVEN, Compensations of. Think how completely all the griefs of this mortal life will be compensated by one age, for instance, of the felicities beyond the grave; and then think that one age multiplied ten thousand times is not so much to eternity as one grain of sand is to the whole material universe. Think what a state it will be to be growing happier and happier still as ages pass away, and yet leave something still happier to come!

John Foster.

9429. HEAVEN, Completeness in. There are many graces for which we may not cease hourly to sue, graces which are in bestowing always, but never come to be fully had in this present life; and therefore, when all things here have an end, endless thanks must have their beginning in a state which bringeth the full and final satisfaction of all such perpetual desires.

Hooker.

9430. HEAVEN, Contending for. The real business in hand for Christians is not heaven, but holiness. The issue may be left in the Leader's hands: the duty of the soldiers is to stand where they are placed, and strike as long as they see a foe. Until the trumpet shall sound, calling the weary to rest, our part is to fight. Woe to the deceiver who fraternizes with the enemy, or strikes with half his force a feeble blow! The kingdom of heaven is within you; within you, therefore, its battles must be fought and its victories won. Strike, and spare not for their crying. It is not a languid expectation of an easy heaven; it is a battle that is before us to-day. He is the best soldier in the warfare who hates most his Sovereign's enemy and his own. Polluting lust is the spark that kindles hell: there is no other way of being saved from that burning than by stamping out the embers of sin that lie hidden in the ashes of your own heart.

“The God of peace shal. bruise Satan under your feet shortly.” God will subdue the adversary; but he will subdue him under your own feet.

Arnol.

9431. HEAVEN, Denominations in. A young convert dreamed that he was translated to heaven. He thought Jesus Christ questioned each one as to their ecclesiastical position when on earth. One was an Episcopalian, another a Baptist, another a Presbyterian. Places were assigned to each denominationally. At last a poor Indian came trembling; not knowing the theological differences of his brethren, he was afraid there was no place assigned for him. When asked what he was, he replied, “I am a Christian, and love the Lord Jesus with all my heart.” “Then,” said the Saviour, “you may walk all about heaven, hither and thither, just as you please.”

9432. HEAVEN, Despised. As a man that comes into America, and sees the natives regard more a piece of glass, or an old knife, than a piece of gold, may think, Surely these people never heard of the worth of gold, or else they would not exchange it for toys; so a man that looked only upon the lives of most men, and did not hear their contrary confessions, would think either these men never heard of heaven, or else they never heard of its excellency and glory. As the Indians who live among the golden mines do little regard it, but are weary of the daily toil of getting it, when other nations will compass the world, and venture their lives, and sail through storms and waves to get it; so we that live where the gospel groweth, where heaven is urged upon us at our doors, and the manna falls upon our tents, do little regard it, and wish these mines of gold were further from us, that we might not be put upon the toil of getting it, when some that want it would be glad of it upon harder terms.

Salter.

9433. HEAVEN, Discoveries of. A man on the summit of a lofty mountain commands a wider landscape, and sees things that on the plains below would have been quite invisible. So many things unknown, incomprehensible to us on the plains of earth, will be all visible on the mount of heaven.

Dr. Guthrie.

9434. HEAVEN Disregarded. There in a room was a man that could look no way but downward, with a muck-rake in his hand. There stood also One over his head with a crown in his hand, and proffered him that crown for his muck-rake; but the man did neither look up nor regard, but raked to himself the straws, the small sticks, and dust of the floor. It is to show that heaven is but a fable to some, and that things here are counted the only things substantial.

Bunyan.

9435. HEAVEN, Distance to. Approaching a village far up on the side of the Alps, our party saw its buildings with remarkable distinctness, and were able to count the panes of glass in a window of the church. We thought the distance very short, and expected to reach it in a quarter of an hour at most. We walked on without getting perceptibly nearer, realizing more and more how we had misjudged the distance. The atmosphere was clearer and more rarefied than we were accustomed to. We gained it at last by perseverance, and found sweet rest after our toil. So sometimes we dwell in high altitudes of grace; heaven seems very near, and the hills of Beulah are in full view. At other times the clouds and fogs, through suffering and temptation, cut off our vision. We are just as near heaven in the one experience as the other, and just as sure of gaining it, if our feet are in the path of life.

9436. HEAVEN, Doing Business for. Heaven is one of our offices, and there is much business to be despatched in its beautiful courts; business for the interests of Jesus, business which he has at heart, and, therefore, which it behoves us to have in hand. F. W. Faber.

9437. HEAVEN, Earth and. What is an earthly man compared to an heavenly mansion? As carnal things seem small to a spiritual man, so spiritual things appear small to a carnal man. There is no moving after things beyond the sphere of our own knowledge. Heaven is to the worldling as a mine of gold covered with earth and rubbish; or as a bed of pearl enclosed in a heap of sand. But if he had the eyes of an eagle to see it, he would wish for the wings of an eagle to soar unto it. There is no more comparison to be made between heaven and earth, than there is between a piece of rusty iron and refined gold. It is the expectation of a future glorious heritage, which is the Jacob's staff of saints, with which they walk through this dark pilgrimage.

Secker.

9438. HEAVEN, Emblems of. As opposed to sin, and its bitter, baleful consequences, heaven is set forth in the Bible through the emblems of everything we cherish as most dear and long for as most desirable. It is painted in colors that glow upon the canvas. Raise your eyes to the new Jerusalem. Gold paves its streets, and around its secure and blissful homes rise walls of jasper. Earth holds no such city; the depths of ocean no such pearls as form its gates. No storms sweep its glassy sea; no winter strips its trees; no thunders shake its serene and cloudless sky. Day there never darkens into night. Harps and palms are in the hands, while crowns of glory flash and blaze upon the heads of its sinless and white-robed inhabitants. From this distant and stormy orb, as the dove eyed the ark, faith gazes on the glorious vision, and weary of the strife, longing to be gone, cries, "O that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away and be at rest."

Guthrie.

9439. HEAVEN, Enduring for. I have always been peculiarly subject to sea-sickness. When I was going abroad, and all the wonders of the continent were dazzling my imagination, I used to lie in my berth scarcely able to stir, wilted and worthless. I knew there were ten days between New York and Liverpool; and I used to say to myself: "Well, are you willing to take these ten days of nausea and universal disgust for the sake of three months of exquisite joy which you are going to have on the continent?" I said: "This is about as bad as anything can well be in this world; but for the sake of that which is beyond it, I will take even this." Returning, we had a passage of seventeen days. We came with a water-logged steamship. She was loaded down deeper by many feet than she should have been. It was stormy from shore to shore, without a single fair day. But the place to which we were going was my home; there was my family; there was my church; there were my friends, who were as dear to me as my own life. And I lay perfectly happy in the midst of sickness and nausea. All that the boat could do to me could not keep down the exultation and joy which rose up in me. For every single hour was carrying me nearer and nearer to the spot where was all that I loved in the world. It was deep, dark midnight when we ran into Halifax. I could see nothing. Yet the moment we came into still water, I rose from my berth and got upon deck. And as I sat near the smoke stack, while they were unloading the cargo upon the wharf, I saw the shadow of a person apparently going backward and forward near me. At last the thought occurred to me, "Am I watched?" Just then the person addressed me, saying: "Is this Mr. Beecher?" "It is," I replied. "I have a telegram for you from your wife." I had not realized that I had struck the continent where my family were. There in the middle of the night and in darkness, the intelligence that I had a telegram from home—I cannot tell you what thrill it sent through me. We are all sailing home; and by and by, when we are not thinking of it, some shadowy thing (men call it death), at midnight, will pass by, and will call us by name, and will say: "I have a message for you from home. God waits for you." It is but a hand-breadth. And on the stormy sea there are men who stop and think of discomforts when home and heart are calling for them. Are they worthy of anything but pity who are not able to bear the hardships of the voyage when they are going home? It will not be long before you, and I, and every one of us, will hear the messenger sent to bring us back to heaven.

Beecher.

9440. HEAVEN, Excellence of. If earth that is provided for mortality, and is possessed by the Maker's enemies, has so much pleasure in it, that worldlings think it worth the account of their heaven, what must heaven needs be that is provided for God himself and his friends? How can it be less in weight than God is above his creatures, and God's friends are better than his enemies?

Bp. Hall.

9441. HEAVEN, Foretaste of. If we really live under the hope of future happiness, we shall taste it by way of anticipation and forethought; an image of it will meet our minds often, and stay there, as all pleasing expectations do.

Atterbury.

9442. HEAVEN, Gate Open to. The death of the Rev. Thomas Collins' mother, was beautifully tranquil. He says, "Nearly the last thing she did was to repeat the Hundreth Psalm, a favorite with her. Her cough compelled a pause at the words, 'O go your way into his gates with thanksgiving.' She never finished the recitation, and was only able to add:—'His gates—his gates.—Go into them;—yes, I may, for they are open—wide open to me; and have been for some time.' And so, without another word, speedily and peacefully she passed those heavenly portals which her faith had gazed upon."

9443. HEAVEN, a Glorious Change. Palmer, of Reading, England, being condemned to die, in Queen Mary's time, was exhorted to recant, and among other things a friend said to him, "Take pity on thy golden years and pleasant flowers of youth, before it be too late." His reply was, "Sir, I long for those springing flowers which shall never fade away." When he was in the midst of the flames he exhorted his companions to constancy, saying, "We shall not end our lives in the fire, but make a change for a better life; yea, for coals we shall receive pearls."

9444. HEAVEN, Glory in. Fulgentius visited Rome, and observed the glory of the Roman nobility, the triumphant pomp of King Theodoric, and the universal splendor and gayety of that city. It raised his thoughts to heavenly joys, and he said to some of his friends that accompanied him, "How beautiful must the celestial Jerusalem be, since terrestrial Rome is so glittering! If such honor be given to lovers of vanity, what glory shall be imparted to the saints, who are lovers and followers of truth!"

9445. HEAVEN, Glory of. To the eye of man the sun appears a pure light, a mass of unmingled glory. Were we to ascend with a continual flight towards this luminary, and could we, like the eagle, gaze upon this lustre, we should in our progress behold its splendor become every moment more intense. As we rose through the heavens, we should see a little orb changing gradually unto a great world; and as we advanced nearer and nearer, should behold it expanding every way, until all that was before us became an universe of excessive and immeasurable glory. Thus the heavenly inhabitant will, at the commencement of his happy existence, see the divine system filled with magnificence and splendor and arrayed in beauty; and, as he advances onwards through the successive periods of duration, will behold all things more and more luminous, transporting, and sun-like for ever.

Dr. Dwight.

9446. HEAVEN, No Graves in. A little child filled the heart of a grieving mourner with joy, by saying as she pointed to heaven, "There are no graves there."

9447. HEAVEN, God's House. This glorious world is "the house of God," or the peculiar and favorite place of his residence; the place where those manifestations of himself are seen, which he is pleased to make, as the most special displays of his presence and character. Present in all other places, he is peculiarly present here. It is also "the throne of God," the seat of universal and endless dominion; where the Divine authority is peculiarly exercised and made known, and the splendor of the Divine government exhibited with singular effulgence and glory. It is the residence of his most favored creatures; of the saints, who are redeemed by the blood of his Son; and of the angels, who, innumerable in multitude, "stand round about his throne." It is the everlasting seat of consummate holiness or virtue; where that Divine principle shines without alloy, flourishes in immortal youth, and reigns and triumphs with eternal glory. It is the place in which are seen all the finishings of Divine workmanship, and in which the beauty and greatness of the Infinite Mind, and the endless diversities of omniscient skill, appear in all their most exquisite forms, and in the last degrees of refinement and perfection. It is the centre of all Divine communication; the city, in which all the paths of Providence terminate; the ocean, from which all the streams of Infinite Wisdom and Goodness proceed, and into which they return, to flow again and forever. It is the theatre in which an eternal providence of progressive knowledge, power, and love, rendered daily more and more beautiful and amiable, wonderful and majestic, is begun and carried on through ages, which will never approach towards an end. It is the place where all the works of God are studied and understood, through an eternal progress of knowledge; where all the diversities of virtuous intelligence, all the forms and hues of moral beauty, brighten in an unceasing gradation; and where gratitude, love, enjoyment, and praise, resound day and night in a more and more perfect harmony throughout the immensity of duration.

Dwight.

9448. HEAVEN, Going to. A gentleman said to an old negro slave, "You are an old man; will you not die soon?" "Yes, massa." "Well, where are you going?" "To the good land." "What makes you think so?" "Well, massa, I can't 'zactly 'splain; but somehow, as I comes nearer to death, Jesus and I get nearer and nearer together."

9449. HEAVEN, Happiness in. What matters it if thou art not happy on earth, provided thou art so in heaven? Heaven may have happiness as utterly unknown to us as the gift of vision would be to a man born blind. If we consider the inlets of pleasure from five senses only, we may be sure that the same Being who created us could have given us five hundred if he pleased. Mutual love, pure and exalted, founded on charms both mental and corporeal, as it constitutes the highest happiness on earth, may, for anything we know to the contrary, also form the lowest happiness of heaven. And it would appear consonant with the administration of Providence in other matters that there should be a link between heaven and earth; for in all cases a chasm seems to be purposely avoided; "prudento Deo." Thus the material world has its links, by which it is made to shake hands, as it were, with the veg-etale—the vegetable with the animal, the animal with the intellectual, and the intellectual with what we may be allowed to hope of the angelic.

Colton.

9450. HEAVEN, Hell and. That which makes hell so full of horror, is, that it is below all hopes; and that which makes heaven so full of splendor, is, that it is above all fears. The one is a night without the return of day; the other is a day free from the approach of night. Secker.

9451. HEAVEN, Holiness our Qualification for. From justification arises our title to heaven; from sanctification arises our meetness for it. A king's son is heir-apparent to his father's crown. We will suppose the young prince to be educated with all the advantages, and to be possessor of all the attainments, that are necessary to constitute a complete monarch. His accomplishments, however great, do not entitle him to the kingdom; they only qualify him for it: so the holiness and obedience of the saints are no part of that right on which their claim to glory is founded, or for which it is given; but a part of that spiritual education, whereby they are fitted and made meet to inherit "the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world." Though the mariner see not the pole-star, yet the needle of the compass that points to it tells him which way he sails. Thus the heart that is touched with the loadstone of divine love, trembling with godly fear, and yet still looking towards God by fixed believing, points at the love of election, and tells the soul that its course is heavenward, towards the haven of eternal rest.

Salter.

9452. HEAVEN, Honors of. From the Bible I take it that the redeemed of earth will somehow get a little nearer to the great white throne than any other inhabitants of that country. It seems to me our relationship is a little different, in the wonderful mercy of God. I think the time will come when the redeemed who have been steadfast, and maintained their fealty to God and to the great Captain of their salvation, rising from their dusty graves, and called up into that eternal world, will hear him say to Gabriel, Michael, and all the host of heaven, "Fall back! fall back!" And he that sitteth upon the throne, and is King of kings and Lord of lords, will exclaim, "Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." It seems to me we shall get a little nearer; that there will be a kind of relationship which angels will not know anything about; that there will be a feeling of love, gratitude, and adoration in the redeemed host that those who kept their first estate will not feel as we do. How we honor those who have stood up like men when it required men to stand! Some of us older ones can remember having met, in other days, the remnant of the grand old army of '76. I have seen a few of them. Rude, poor, uncultivated men they were; but how we honored them, and loved to do them reverence! How even the little bright-eyed boys and girls would look slyly up out of the corners of their eyes amidst their curls when an old Revolutionary soldier passed, and whispered to each other, "He is an old Revolutionary soldier." I like that; I think it is right, and I think God likes it. Bp. Ames.

9453. HEAVEN, Hope of. Not only is there comfort for the breaking up of our relationships on earth by death, but I declare to you that after having, by reason of my profession, pondered this subject to comfort mourners all my life long, during the thirty-five years of my ministry, I am more and more personally satisfied every single year that if for this life only we have hope, we are of all men most miserable. And I tell you truly that if I were to be convinced to-morrow that this is all a fiction, that there is no existence beyond the grave, I would seal my mouth with the seven seals of the Apocalypse, which no man could break open, before I would whisper that guilty disclosure. In this world of sin, he who takes away the hope of heaven takes away the consolation of those that sorrow. There is nothing else that can comfort a heart crushed by bereavement and losses. It is but for a moment. Out of my tree the bird has flown, and sings there no more. But it sits in the tree of life and sings, and I shall hear it again. I am alone; I have no counselor; I am without a companion; I am heart-sick and life-sick—but what then? I shall find again all that I have lost, and more, and more blessedly. Sorrows, as storms, bring down the clouds close to the earth; sorrows bring heaven down close; and they are instruments of cleansing and purifying.

Beecher.

9454. HEAVEN, Incitement to Seek. The Jesuit Fathers tried to move a sick Huron by the misery of life, the joys of heaven, and the pains of hell. He said, "I wish to go where my ancestors have gone." One asked him, "Do they hunt the caribou in heaven?" "Oh, no," replied the missionary. "Then I will not go there. Idleness is bad everywhere," responded the Indian. The fear of starvation in the regions of the blessed, was a great obstacle to their conversion, and the fathers had to assure them that the stock of game was there unlimited. Others feared that there would not be a supply of tobacco in heaven, and felt that they could not be happy there without it.

9455. HEAVEN Inconceivable. The joys of heaven are without example, above experience, and beyond imagination; for which the whole creation wants a comparison; we, as apprehension; and even the word of God, a revelation.

Norris.

9456. HEAVEN Indescribable. It is not for any mortal creature to make a map of that Canaan which lies above; it is, to all of us who live here on the hither side of death, an unknown country and an undiscovered land. It may be that some heavenly pilgrim, who, with his holy thoughts and holy desires, is continually traveling thitherward, arrives sometimes near the borders of the promised land and the suburbs of the new Jerusalem and gets upon the top of Pisgah, and there has the perfect prospect of a fair country, which lies a far way off; but he cannot tell how to describe it.

Bp. Rust.

9457. HEAVEN, Infamy of Losing. The infamy of losing heaven we may in some sort declare, under the example of a mighty king, who, having no heir to succeed him in his kingdom, took up a beautiful boy at the church door, and nourished him as his son, and in his testament commanded, that if at ripe years his conditions were virtuous and suitable to his calling, he should be received as a lawful king, and seated on his royal throne; but if he proved vicious and unfit for government, they should punish him with infamy, and send him to the galleys. The kingdom obeyed his command, provided him excellent tutors; but he became so untoward and ill-inclined, that he would learn nothing, flung away his books, spent his time amongst other boys in making houses of clay and other fooleries; for which his governors chastised him, and advised him of what was fitting and most imported him; but all did no good, only when they reprehended him he would weep—not because he repented, but because they hindered his sport; and the next day he did the same. The more he grew in age, the worse he became; and although they informed him of the king's testament, and what behoved him, all was to no purpose; until at last all being weary of his ill-conditions, declared him unworthy to reign, despoiled him of his royal ornaments, and condemned him with infamy unto the galleys. What greater ignominy can there be than this, to lose a kingdom, and to be made a galley-slave? A more ignominious, and a more lamentable tragedy is that of a Christian condemned after his probation; who was taken by God from the gates of death, with the condition, that if he kept his commandments, he should reign in heaven, and if not, he should be condemned; but he, forgetting those obligations, without respect of his tutors, or ministers, who exhorted him, both by their doctrine and example, what was fitting for a child of God; yet he, neither moved by their advice, nor the chastisements of heaven, by which God overthrew his vain intentions, and thwarted his unlawful pleasures, only lamented his temporal losses, and not his offenses, and the time of his death, was sentenced to be deprived of the kingdom of heaven and precipitated into hell.

Salter.

9458. HEAVEN, Knowledge in. An infant, standing on the top of a mountain, may see much further than a giant at its base; and even so the lisping babe, whom Jesus has taken from a mother's bosom to his own, excels in knowledge the profoundest of philosophers and greatest of divines.

Dr. Guthrie.

9459. HEAVEN at Last. After the fever of life—after weariness, sicknesses, fightings and despondings, languor and fretfulness, struggling and failing—struggling and succeeding—after all the changes and chances of this troubled and unhealthy state, at length comes death—at length the white throne of God—at length the beatific vision.

Newman.

9460. HEAVEN, Locality of. Where is heaven? I cannot tell. Even to the eye of faith, heaven looks much like a star to the eye of flesh. Set there on the brow of night, it shines most bright—most beautiful; but it is separated from us by so great a distance as to be raised almost as high above our investigations as above the storms and clouds of earth. A shining object, we see it gleaming in the fields of space; but we see nothing more, even when our eyes are assisted by the most powerful telescope. Nor does the matter cost us the least anxiety. If God spared not his own Son, heaven shall want nothing to make us supremely and eternally happy.

Dr. Guthrie.

9461. HEAVEN, Longing for. O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, the only place that can ease us of this misery! the place where the beloved of my soul dwelleth, the vision of peace, the seat of true tranquillity and repose, how fain would I have the satisfaction of being in the sure way to thy felicity! This is all the peace I wish for in the world. No other happiness do I thirst after, as everything can testify that hath been privy to my thoughts. There is never a room in my house but hath been filled with the noise of my sighs and groans after thee, O, Jerusalem! Every tree that grows in my ground hath thy sweet name engraven upon it. The birds of the air, if they can understand, are witnesses how incessantly my soul pants and longs to fly unto thee, O, Jerusalem! What charitable hand will guide me in the way to thy treasures? Who will bring me unto that strong city, the retreat of my wearied mind, the refuge to recruit my tired spirits, the only place of my security, my joy, my life itself? Wilt not thou, O God, who hast led me to the knowledge of it, who hast filled me with these desires, and hast brought me into a disesteem and contempt of all other things?

Patrick.

9462. HEAVEN, Manners of. It would not do to wear furs and speak the tongue of the Greenlanders out in Dahomey or Old Calabar. So I must get the language of heaven, and have its habits learned, to be fit to go there.

Edmond.

9463. HEAVEN, Meeting in. A few years ago a man of means, with a large heart, and genial manners, and loving convivial companions, was engaged to be married to a very worthy and estimable young lady. He had a present fortune and a home in the future. All at once that lady died. He bent over her lifeless form, and nearly died of a broken heart. What to do he did not know. He had no friend near to guide him, and instead of yielding himself to the providence of God, he turned his back upon him, and cursed heaven and earth, and rushed into the commotions of a daily life, where he found companions who were willing to lead him into many expenditures and vices. But one day he met a friend, who had been yoked with him in his gay living, in the counting house. He opened his safe, and by one of those strange fatalities he took out a little box. He saw a little silver key and a lock of golden hair. The key belonged to his wife's casket, and the lock of hair he had cut from her head. He looked at these two mementos, and then thought of the awful distance now between him and her. It struck him so forcibly that turning to his friend he said, "Ed, do you think I will ever see her again?" His friend being an honest man, answered, "I don't believe you ever will." "What! not see her again: why?" "No, George, because you and I have not been living the kind of life to take us where she has gone. But you can meet her there;" and George turned to his friend and said, "I am going to meet that girl there." Ed joined my church some months ago, and George joined it yesterday, and he said to me, "I would not take millions for my hope."

Dr. Hepworth.

9464. HEAVEN, A Minister's Welcome to. A Wesleyan missionary in Ashantee, visited his first convert there, who was then on his dying bed. The convert said: "I hear you preached last night about heaven. I could not be there, but I am going to heaven itself; and when I get there I will go to my Saviour and throw myself at his feet, and thank him for his mercy in sending a missionary to this land to tell me of the truth. Then I will come back to the gate and sit down till you come, and then I will take you to my Saviour's throne and say: You are the man who first told me of the cross of Christ."

9465. HEAVEN, Morning in. A traveler arriving at the city of Basle, Switzerland, by night drew this lesson: "We are now in a strange city: the entire place is shrouded in darkness. All is silent as the grave, or the far-off sky. How ignorant we are of the appearance of the city, or the surrounding landscape! But when the morning comes, the dim outlines which we have obscurely seen through the gloom of night, will be perceived with certainty and clearness. And thus it is, I have been thinking, with dying persons. Though quite on the verge of eternal scenes, yet the things revealed in the Bible as belonging to eternity can only be realized by faith: 'clouds and darkness' rest upon them; but, just as the morning light shall make us familiar with this fine old city, so with our departing this life—the night of death shall be succeeded by the daylight of eternity, when all those realities which were but matters of faith shall be clearly revealed to the astonished soul."

9467. HEAVEN, Music of. Our knowledge of the kind of delight afforded by the experience of earthly music may enable us to form a conception of the higher degree. The conception may be inadequate, and yet, so far as it can reach, it may be an approximation to the reality. And so, in like manner, with the beautiful in scenery. It would be folly to attempt to describe the details of heavenly scenery, but the general idea stands sufficiently out to justify belief. The most glorious bursts of harmony that ever thrilled and quivered through the brain of Handel, the pealing triumphs of "Hallelujah Chorus," the glowing snatches of Mozart, the gorgeous sonatas of Beethoven, the almost speaking melodies of Mendelssohn, and all the exquisite conceptions of the most gifted masters, may be only faint and far-off echoes of the grander performances above; yet as echoes they bring down something of heavenly music to the conceptions of men on earth, and make us yearn and bend before the thought, "If these be echoes, what must the realities be?"

Eternal Homes.

9468. HEAVEN, Negative. Of the positive joys of heaven we can form no conception; but its negative delights form a sufficiently attractive picture—no pain; no thirst; no hunger; no horror of the past; no fear of the future: no failure of mental capacity; no intellectual deficiency; no morbid imaginations; no follies; no stupidities: but, above all, no insulted feelings; no wounded affections; no despised love or unrequited regard; no hate, envy, jealousy, or indignation of or at others; no falsehood, dishonesty, dissimulation, hypocrisy, grief, or remorse. In a word, to end where I began, no sin and no suffering.

Prof. Wilson.

9469. HEAVEN, No Night in. Upon the tombstone of a girl, blind from her birth, is this inscription, "There is no night there."

9470. HEAVEN, No Other Way to. I heard of a man some time ago that was going to get into heaven in his own way. He did not believe in the Bible or the love of God, but was going to get in on account of his good deeds. He was very liberal, gave a great deal of money, and he thought the more he gave the better it would be in the other world. I don't as a general thing believe in dreams, but sometimes they teach good lessons. This man dreamed one night that he was building a ladder to heaven, and he dreamed that every good deed he did it put him one round higher on this ladder, and when he did an extra good deed it put him up a good many rounds; and in his dream he kept going, going up, until at last he got out of sight, and he went on and on doing his good deeds, and the ladder went up higher and higher, until at last he thought he saw it run up to the very throne of God. Then in his dream he died, and a mighty Voice came rolling down from above, "He that climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber," and down came his ladder and he woke from his sleep and thought, "If I go to heaven I must go some other way."

9471. HEAVEN, No Treasure in. Mr. Jacob Strawn, the largest farmer in the State of Illinois, took Chaplain McCabe and myself to the top of his house, to show us his splendid farms lying along the country in every direction far as the eye could reach. I asked him how many acres he owned. "Forty thousand, all under cultivation." "How much is the land worth an acre?" "Not less than $50, sir." "Then you are worth $2,000,000?" "Yes, and I made it all myself: when I started I hadn't fifty cents." I turned to him. A look of pride flushed his face, while his eyes swept the country in every direction. "Mr. Strawn, you have asked me to look north and south, east and west, and view your possessions; and you say I cannot see the end. Now, may I ask you to look up yonder. How much do you own up there?" "Ah," said he, the tears filling up his eyes, "I'm afraid I am poor up there." Mr. Strawn died suddenly about one year afterwards. Wm. Reynolds.

9472. HEAVEN, One Gate to. The ancient city of Troy had but one gate. Go round and round the city, you would have found no other. If you wanted to get in, there was but one way. So to the golden city of heaven there is but one gate. Christ says, "I am the door." Anon.

9473. HEAVEN Ours. I once heard a father tell that when he removed his family to a new residence, where the accommodation was much more ample, and the substance much more rich and varied than that to which they had previously been accustomed, his youngest son, yet a lisping infant, ran around every room, and scanned every article with ecstasy, calling out in childish wonder at every new sight, "Is this ours, father, and is this ours?" The child did not say "yours," and I observed that the father, while he told the story, was not offended with the freedom. You could read in his glistening eye that the infant's confidence in appropriating as his own all that his father had was an important element in his satisfaction. Such, I suppose, will be the surprise and joy, and appropriating confidence, with which the child of our Father's family will count all his own when he is removed from the comparatively mean condition of things present, and enters the infinite of things to come. When the glories of heaven burst upon his view, he does not stand at a distance, like a stranger, saying, "O God, these are thine." He bounds forward to touch and taste every provision which these blessed mansions contain, exclaiming, as he looks in the Father's face, "Father, this and this is ours!" The dear child is glad of all the Father's riches, and the Father is gladder of his dear child. Arnot.

9474. HEAVEN, Pointing to. A disconsolate deaf old woman was passing her days in the almshouse of Paris. The chaplain came by, and, seeing her despairing look, simply pointed upward. The action told her to look up. The clouds were scattered. After poverty, sickness, and death, comes heaven.

Humble, serious, diligent endeavors to increase in divine knowledge are very suitable to our present state of darkness and imperfection. The product of such inquiries we shall carry to heaven with us, with whatsoever is most akin thereto (besides their usefulness in the way thither). We shall carry truth and the knowledge of God to heaven with us; we shall carry purity thither, devotedness of soul to God and our Redeemer, divine love and joy, if we have their beginnings here, with whatsoever else of real permanent excellency that hath a settled fixed seat and place in our souls now; and shall there have them in perfection. But do we think we shall carry strife to heaven? Shall we carry anger to heaven? Envyings, heart-burnings, animosities, enmities, hatred of our brethren and fellow-Christians—shall we carry these to heaven with us? Let us labor to divest ourselves, and strike off from our spirits everything that shall not go with us to heaven, or is equally unsuitable to our end and way, that there may be nothing to obstruct and hinder our abundant entrance at length into the everlasting kingdom. Howe.

9476. HEAVEN Present. A boy walking with his mother, looked up to the sky and said, "O, mother, heaven is so far off I'm afraid I shall never get there." "My dear," said his mother, "heaven must come to us before we can go to it."

9477. HEAVEN, Presenting. Aristotle writes of a parcel of ground in Sicily, that sendeth such a strong smell of fragrant flowers to all the fields and leaves thereabouts, that no hound can hunt there: the scent is so confounded by the sweet smell of those flowers. Labor we so to present heavenly sweetness; so to savor the things above, that we may have no mind to hunt after earthly vanities. Trappe.

9478. HEAVEN, Qualification for. The last use which I shall make of this remarkable property in human nature of being delighted with those actions to which it is accustomed, is to show how absolutely necessary it is for us to gain habits of virtue in this life, if we would enjoy the pleasures of the next. The state of bliss we call heaven will not be capable of affecting those minds which are not thus qualified for it. We must in this world gain a relish of truth and virtue, if we would be able to taste that knowledge and perfection which are to make us happy in the next. The seeds of those spiritual joys and raptures which are to rise up and flourish in the soul to all eternity must be planted in her during this her present state of probation. In short, heaven is not to be looked upon only as the reward, but as the natural effect, of a religious life. Addison.

9479. HEAVEN, Question About. A little girl was going to bed. Her sister used to sleep on the pillow beside her. "Mamma," asked she, "who do you think Fannie sleeps with now in heaven?" "There is no night there," answered her mother. "Mamma," asked the little girl, "does a soul have eyes to see with? Will Fanny know us when we come?" "The Bible tells us that we shall see as we are seen and know as we are known," replied mother. "We shall see then," said the little girl; "but our eyes will not be crying eyes, will they, mamma?" "No, my child. God will wipe away all tears," said her mother. As she spoke, a small tear stood in her own eye, but it quickly went away. Little Jane saw it, and said within herself, "God wipes away mamma's tears now." "There will be nothing to hurt in heaven, and no dark; will there be?" asked the little one. "No, my child, for the glory of God lightens it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." "And what dress shall we wear?" "Jesus has a dress for all his little ones," said mamma; "the beautiful garments of righteousness. They are white and shining." "And I must keep it so nice, mamma?" "Yes, my child; an unkind word will spot it; a sinful thought will stain it; but there is no sin in heaven; and it is the beauty of heaven that we shall not want to do or to think a wrong thing." "And we shall not keep wanting things," said little Jane, thinking, perhaps, of the rocking-horse and the candy, and the big doll of Emma's which she could not have. "No, my darling," said her mother, taking her little girl in her arms; "for we shall be satisfied when we awake in his likeness."

9480. HEAVEN, Raptures of. If one could but look awhile through the chinks of heaven's door, and see the beauty and bliss of Paradise; if he could but lay his ear to heaven, and hear the ravishing music of those seraphic spirits, and the anthems of praise which they sing; how would his soul be exhilarated and transported with joy!

T. Watson.

9481. HEAVEN, Recognition in. I must confess, as the experience of my own soul, that the expectation of loving my friends in heaven principally kindles my love to them while on earth. If I thought I should never know, and consequently never love them after this life, I should number them with temporal things, and love them as such; but I now delightfully converse with my pious friends, in a firm persuasion that I shall converse with them for ever; and I take comfort in those that are dead or absent, believing that I shall shortly meet them in heaven, and love them with a heavenly love.

Baxter.

9482. HEAVEN, Registered in. Christmas Evans was addressing a Bible Society meeting over which the Marquis of Anglesea presided, when he turned, and personally addressed the marquis, "I imagine, my lord, that you have died, and that the angel of death has taken your soul to the portals of the holy city. Only a few are admitted into Paradise; the entrance is narrow and jealously watched. 'Open!' shouts the angel of death as he presses forward to secure a place in heaven worthy of your lordship. 'Who to?' asks the guardian of Paradise with an authoritative voice. 'To the Honorable the Marquis of Anglesea.' 'Who is he?' 'An old officer in the army of the Duke of Wellington.' 'In that capacity,' says Peter, 'he is not on my list.'

'But he has filled the office of high master of the ordnance.' 'That may be possible, but we know him not.' 'He has been several times lord-lieutenant of Ireland.' 'I say nothing to the contrary, but he is to us a total stranger.' 'He was the leader of the Horse Guards at the battle of Waterloo.' 'I repeat that we know nothing of him.' 'Besides that, he was for many years President of the Bible Society.' 'Ha!' shouts Peter; 'that alters the case. He can enter in; indeed, I see his name recorded among the blessed on the books of my Father.'

9483. HEAVEN, Review in. Our past lives will, when we attain the perfection of our being, be present to us again. There are close analogies between the laws of duration and of space. And these may help us to illustrate the manner in which the several stages of our former existence may reappear. A traveler who sets out upon a line of road sees a given object before him; as he advances, he comes up with that object, and it is present; he proceeds, and passes it and sees it no more. But let the traveler be elevated into the air, or ascend a mountain, and the whole line of progress which, as he journeyed, was measured out in gradual succession, becomes all at once present to him again. So with respect to the passenger through time. While here below, he reached and passed his several stages one by one; but when ascended to his eternal state, he may look down and see the whole path of life before him.

Woodward.

9484. HEAVEN, Ripe for. Let the mantle of worldly enjoyments hang loose about you, that it may be easily dropped when death comes to carry you into another world. When the corn is forsaking the ground it is ready for the sickle; when the fruit is ripe, it falls off the tree easily. So when a Christian's heart is truly weaned from the world, he is prepared for death, and it will be the more easy to him. A heart disengaged from the world is a heavenly one, and then we are ready for heaven when our heart is there before us.

Boston.

9485. HEAVEN, Road to. Didst thou never know of any that were in a journey, and, coming to some deep dirty lane, they thought to avoid it, and broke over the hedge into the field? But when they had rode round and round, they could find no way out, but were forced to go out where they got in; and then, notwithstanding their unwillingness, to go through that miry lane, or else not to go that journey—truly so it is in the journey to heaven. Thou art now come to this deep lane of humiliation, through which all must go that will reach that city whose "builder and maker is God."

Swinmock.

9486. HEAVEN, Roll Call in. The hospital tents had been filling up as fast as the wounded men had been brought to the rear. Among the number was a young man mortally wounded and not able to speak. It was near midnight and many a loved one lay sleeping on the battle-field—that sleep that knows no wakening until Jesus shall call for them. The surgeons had been on their rounds of duty, and for a moment all was quiet. Suddenly this young man, before speechless, calls in a clear voice, "Here." The surgeon hastened to his side, and asked what he wished. "Nothing," he said; "they are calling the roll in heaven, and I was answering to my name." He turned his head and was gone—gone to join the great army whose uniform is washed white in the blood of the Lamb, and to answer to his name at the roll call in heaven.

9487. HEAVEN, Securing. "Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory." The glory is a thing future and invisible; but the hope of it in a believer's heart is present and felt. The only link by which we can connect ourselves with the glory to be revealed, is present reconciliation to God through his grace. The full form of this is, "Christ in you, the hope of glory." It is not, I shall make my way in; but, "Thou shalt receive me." It does not imply any preternatural knowledge of heaven, but a spiritual communion with the Friend of sinners, who is already there. God with us, is in heaven God for us. "Lord, Lord, open to us!" But will he receive me then? That question must be answered by another,—Do you receive him now? If Christ knocks in vain at the door of your heart, you will knock in vain at the door of his heaven. Unless the kingdom of God be within you here, you shall not be within the kingdom of God yonder.

Arnol.

9488. HEAVEN, Shut Out of. An old minister related the following incident: "He had preached the Word for many a year in a wood hard by a beautiful village in the Inverness-shire Highlands, and it was his invariable custom, on dismissing his own congregation, to repair to the Baptist Chapel in this village to partake of the Lord's Supper with his people assembled there. It was then usual to shut the gates during this service, in order that communicants might not be exposed to any disturbance through persons going out or coming in. On one occasion the burden of the Lord pressed upon his servant with more than ordinary severity, and anxious to deliver it and clear his soul, he detained his hearers a little beyond the time, and consequently had to hurry to the chapel. As he drew near he noticed the door-keeper retire from the outer gate, after having shut it. He called to him, quickening his pace at the same time, but his cry was not heard, the attendant retreated inside and the minister came up 'just in time' to see the door put to, and hear it fastened from within. He walked round the chapel looking up at the windows, but could gain no admittance; there was only one door, and that door was shut. He listened and heard the singing, and thought how happy God's people were inside, while he himself was shut out. The circumstance made an impression upon him at the time which he could never afterwards forget, and he was led to ask himself the question, 'Shall it be so at the last? Shall I come up to the gate of heaven only in time to be too late, to find the last ransomed one admitted, and the door everlastingly shut?"

9489. HEAVEN, Signs in. The eclipse of the moon is occasioned by a diametrical opposition of the earth between it and the sun, and can only happen when the moon is at the full. The Jews, not being acquainted with the physical cause of eclipses, looked upon them, whether of sun or moon, as signs of the divine displeasure. The Athenian army, under Niceas, when they were about to withdraw secretly from Sicily, seeing the moon suddenly eclipsed, refused to embark, which proved fatal to them, as they were all shortly afterwards slain or taken prisoners.

Buck.

9490. HEAVEN, Straight Road to. A clergyman preached on the doctrine of future punishment. He was followed home by a man who told him that he did not believe the doctrine he had been preaching, and desired him to prove it. The clergyman said he had proved it from the Bible. But said the unbeliever, "I do not find anything in my Bible to prove that the sinner is eternally damned. I believe that mankind will be judged for the sins done in the body, and those that deserve punishment will be sent to hell and will remain there until the debt is paid." "I have but one word to say to you," said the minister, "and that is, Christ died for you, and there is a straight road to heaven; but if you prefer to go round through hell to get there, I cannot help it." These words, "There is a straight road to heaven," rang in his ears, and he was soon brought to believe in Jesus.

9491. HEAVEN, Suggestions of. The belief in the existence of the Happy Isles in the west, seems to have arisen from the discoveries of foreign and strange objects washed up by the ocean, and left upon the shore. Tree branches, fruits and nuts, all unknown, were demonstrations of the reality of these islands. Carved fragments of wood, and an abandoned canoe, sent Columbus to search for the undiscovered land. The shores of this earth are strewn with branches, fruits, and fragments floated hither from another world. Branches of the tree of life are here. Its fruits, love, joy, peace are found. They show the land from which they come, to be one of the fullness of joy and everlasting pleasure. It is the truest wisdom to begin at once the voyage to the Happy Isles.

9492. HEAVEN, Superiority of. To one firmly persuaded of the reality of heavenly happiness, and earnestly desirous of obtaining it, all earthly satisfactions must needs look little, and grow flat and unsavory.

Atterbury.

9493. HEAVEN, Unity in. I have seen a field here, and a field there, stand thick with corn—a hedge or two has separated them. At the proper season the reapers entered; soon the earth was disburdened, and the grain was conveyed to its destined resting-place, where, blended together in the barn or in the stack, it could not be known that a hedge had ever separated this corn from that. Thus it is with the church. Here it grows, as it were, in different fields, and even, it may be, by different hedges. By and by, when the harvest is come, all God's wheat shall be gathered into the garner, without one single mark to distinguish that once they differed in outward circumstances of form and order.

Toplady.

9494. HEAVEN, Wonder in. I imagine when Christ calls home his old, scattered, battered veterans of the cross, who have stood up against sin, hell and the devil, and wicked men—stood as the anvil to the stroke—when God lets them in through the gates into that city, the angels will say to each other, "Look! there is the travail of his soul; there is the purchase of his blood; there are human beings from the dusty battle-fields of earth—from that land of sin; there are those who stood up for God—who counted not their lives, fortunes, or anything else dear to them, that they might win Christ." I don't know about this, but some of us will know before long. We shall be introduced to those who have gone home before. We shall not be ashamed of Christ, but rejoice in that he counted us worthy to suffer for his name's sake. I think when that time comes, every redeemed soul from earth will be a sort of walking wonder in the golden streets, to be gazed at and admired of all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. Then we shall near the finale of the whole matter, "Well done!" Brother, did you ever think what that meant when God Almighty speaks it? That "well done" means heaven, glory, immortality, eternal life! When God says, "Well done," there are no temptations, trials, or dangers after that.

Bishop Ames.

9495. HEAVENLY-MINDEDNESS, Quiet of. Seneca says it is the higher heavens that are more tranquil, where there are neither clouds nor winds, storms nor tempests, and it is the inferior heavens that lighten and thunder, and the nearer the earth the more tempestuous and unquiet. So the sublime and heavenly-minded is placed in a calm and quiet station.

9496. HEAVENS, The Arctic. The intense beauty of the arctic firmament can hardly be imagined. It looked close above our heads, with its stars magnified in glory, and the very planets twinkling so much as to baffle the observations of our astronomer. I am afraid to speak of some of these night scenes. I have trodden the deck and the floes when the life of earth seemed suspended—its movements, its sounds, its coloring, its companionships; and as I looked on the radiant hemisphere circling above me, as if rendering worship to the unseen Centre of Light, I have ejaculated, in humility of spirit, "Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him?"

Kane.

9497. HELL, Bridge over. Mohammedans hold that those who are to be admitted into paradise will take the right-hand way, and those who are destined to hell-fire will take the left; but both of them must first pass the bridge called, in Arabic, Al Sirât, which they say is laid over the midst of hell, and describe to be finer than a hair and sharper than the edge of a sword; so that it seems very difficult to conceive how any one shall be able to stand upon it. The bridge is beset on each side with briars and hooked thorns; which will, however, be no impediment to the good, for they shall pass with wonderful ease and swiftness, like lightning or the wind, Mohammed and his Moslems leading the way; whereas the wicked, with the slipperiness and extreme narrowness of the pass, the entangling of the thorns, and the extinction of the light which directed the former to paradise, will soon miss their footing and fall down headlong into hell, which is gaping beneath them.

George Sale.

9498. HELL, Choosing. Whitefield says a minister in Scotland related to him the following story, which he knew to be true: "A woman who was dying was asked by the minister, 'Where do you hope to go when you die?' She answered, 'I don't care where I go.' 'What?' said he; 'don't care whether you go to heaven or hell?' 'No,' said she, 'I don't care whither I go.' 'But,' said he, 'if you had your choice, where would you go?' 'To hell,' she replied. 'Are you mad? will you go to hell?' 'Yes,' said she, 'I will.' 'Why so?' he asked. 'Why,' said she, 'because all my relations are there.' The preacher in attending her funeral related this sad story, which produced quite a shuddering among the people."

9499. HELL, Considering. Three men visited Sisoës, the hermit. One said, "My father, I think of the fires of hell, and they fill me with horror. How shall I escape them?" The second said, "My father, I think of the gnashing of teeth, and the never-dying worm, and am haunted by that thought. What shall I do?" The third said, "And I, O father, have ever before me the awful outer darkness, and the unspeakable horror thereof oppresses me." To each of these he gave no answer; but, after a pause, stated his own experience on these questions: "I have never given them a thought. I think how good my God is, and I know he will have pity on me." Thus men are diversely incited to the religious life. The love of God casts out all fear. "Alas!" he added, "I should have been a better man had I thought like you."

9500. HELL, Disbelief in. To disbelieve it is not to destroy the fact. Even in Scotland, the narrow end of an island nowhere very broad, I have met with persons well advanced in life, of good common education, and good common sense, who had never seen the sea. Suppose that these persons should have cause greatly to dread the sea, and should therefore ardently desire that there were no such thing in existence. Suppose further that, in the common way of the world, the wish should become father to the thought, and that they at last should firmly believe that there is not a sea. Would their sentiments change the state of the fact? Sinners, to whom the name and nature of a place of punishment are disagreeable, have no more power to annihilate the object of their aversion than the shepherds of the Cheviots to wipe out the sea by a wish.

The sea is near these men, though they have never seen it; and if they were cast into it, they would perish, notwithstanding their opinion.

Arnot.

9501. HELL, Dispute About. A young man called on a preacher whom he had heard preach on future punishment, and said, "I believe there is a small dispute between you and me, sir; and I thought I would call this morning, and try to settle it." "Ah," said he, "what is it?" "Why," replied he, "you say that the wicked will go into everlasting punishment; and I do not think that they will." "O, if that is all," answered the minister, "there is no dispute between you and me. If you turn to Matthew 24: 46, you will find that the dispute is between you and the Lord Jesus Christ; and I advise you to go immediately and settle it with him."

9502. HELL, Doubting a. For a man to doubt whether there be any hell, and thereupon to live as if absolutely there were none, but when he dies to find himself confuted in the flames, this must be the height of woe and disappointment, and a bitter conviction of an irrational venture and absurd choice.

South.

9503. HELL, Dread of. Col. Richardson, an orthodox Christian, and two Universalists, were in a boat on the Niagara river, some distance above the falls. The Universalists began to rally the colonel on his belief of future punishment, and expressed their astonishment that a man of his powers of mind should be so far misled as to believe the horrid dogma. The colonel defended his opinions, and the result was a controversy, which was carried on so long and earnestly that when they, after some time, looked round, they found that the boat was hurrying, with great rapidity, towards the falls. The Universalists at once dropped the oars, and began to cry to God to have mercy on them. Richardson laid hold of the oars, exerted all his strength, and, by God's mercy, they reached the shore. When they had landed, he addressed his companions: "Gentlemen, it is not long since you were railing at me for believing in future punishment. Your opinion is, that when a man dies, the first thing of which he is conscious is being in heaven: now, I want to know why you were so terribly frightened when you thought that in five minutes more you'd be over the falls in glory?" The Universalists were silent for some time: at length one of them said, "I'll tell you what, Colonel Richardson, Universalism does very well in smooth water, but it will never do to go over the Falls of Niagara!"

9504. HELL, Existence of. Verily, it is well for our own sakes to think sometimes of that horrid place! As truly as fair France lies across the Channel, as truly as the sun is shining on the white walls, and gay bridges, and bright gardens, and many-storied palaces of its beautiful capital, as truly as that thousands of men and women there are living real lives and fulfilling various destinies, so truly is there such a place as hell, all alive this hour with the multitudinous life of countless agonies, and innumerable gradations of despair. Save the blessed in heaven, none live so keen or conscious a life as those millions of ruined souls. It is not impossible that we may go there too. It is not impossible that we may have sent some there already. When we pass along the streets, we must often see those who will inhabit there forever. There are some there now who were not there an hour ago. There are some now in the green fields, or in the busy towns, on comfortable beds, or on the sunshiny seas, who, in another hour, perhaps, will have gone there. This is a dreadfully real truth.

F. W. Faber.

9505. HELL, Extemporized. An old colored minister, in a sermon on hell, pictured it as a region of ice and snow, where the damned froze throughout eternity. When privately asked his purpose in representing Gehenna in this way, he said: "I don't dare to tell dem people nuffin else. Why, if I were to say dat hell was warm, some o'dem old rheumatic niggas would be wanting to start down dar de very fust frost!" This story originated, if we are not mistaken, with Dr. Johnson. He tells it of a Scotch minister at the Hebrides, who, otherwise as orthodox as the very "Catecheese," gave the above description of the place of torments, and afterwards, to the doctor, reasons similar to the above for so unusual a representation.

Anon.

9506. HELL, Fear of. The fear of hell may indeed in some desperate cases, like the moxa, give the first rouse from a moral lethargy, like the green venom of copper, by evacuating poison or a dead load from the inner man, prepare it for nobler ministrations and medicines from the realm of light and life, that nourish while they stimulate.

Coleridge.

9507. HELL, Fire of. The sentence of the damned includes hell-fire; a tremendous penalty which we dare not explain away, and whose literal import no man has authority to deny. But hell-fire is not the sum of their penal sufferings: there is also the worm that dieth not; the self-consuming, everlasting anguish of a bad mind,—the grim, comfortless, unutterable, destitute despair of a desolate and abominable spirit, tormented with unavailing yet inevitable reflection on the interminable miseries of the wrath to come. The sum of these things is the loss of the soul; that is, the loss of its eternal happiness, and its condemnation to perpetual misery.

I. Keeling.

9508. HELL, Glimpses of. Its locality is untold, its creation and date are left in obscurity, its names are various; but all rather veils the discoveries of what seems elaborately concealed. It is hell, the hidden or sunken place; it is Gehenna, Tophet; it is a smoke ascending, as if to darken the universe; it is a lake burning with fire and brimstone, but of which the interior is unseen; it is a pit bottomless, a fire unquenchable, a worm undying, a death—the second and the last; it is "without," yet not unvisited or unseen; they shall be tormented in the presence of the Lamb and the holy angels; they shall go forth and look on the carcasses of them that were slain, whose worm dieth not. This is all, or nearly all, we know of it. And yet how unspeakably tremendous! Like the disappointed words upon the wall (in Coleridge's "Dream") taken singly each word is a riddle—put them together, and what a lesson of horrid terror do they combine to teach!

Gilfillan.

9509. HELL, Immunity from. The superstition of the scapular is one of the absurdities of Romanism. According to the authentic record, the Virgin Mary appeared to St. Simon Stock, having in her hand a scapular, a little brown woolen habit, to cover the shoulders, chest and back, and informed him that whosoever wore a similar article received from a Carmelite, should escape the flames of hell. This invention received the sanction of Pope Clement X. Pope John XXII., in his bull "Sabbathine," proclaimed that all who wore the scapular in life would be delivered from the flames of purgatory on the Saturday following the day of their death. Pope Clement VII. confirmed this in 1528. This secured the Carmelites a large business at the expense of souls who confided in it.

9510. HELL, Memory in. If it be one end of future punishment to make wicked men sensible of their folly and ingratitude and of the mercy and favors they have abused, it is probable that, in that future world or region to which they shall be confined, everything will be so arranged as to bring to their recollection the comforts they had abused and the Divine goodness they had despised, and to make them feel sensations opposite to those which were produced by the benevolent arrangements which exist in the present state.

Dr. T. Dick.

9511. HELL, Mohammedan. The Mohammedans are taught that hell is divided into seven stories, or apartments, one below another, designed for the reception of as many distinct classes of the damned. The first, which they call Jehennam, they say, will be the receptacle of those who acknowledged one God; that is, the wicked Mohammedans, who, after having there been punished according to their demerits, will at length be released. The second, named Ladhâ, they assigned to the Jews; the third, named al Hotama, to the Christians; the fourth, named al Sâir, to the Sabians; the fifth, named Sakar, to the Magians; the sixth, named al Jahîm, to the idolaters; and the seventh, which is the lowest and worst of all, and is called al Hâwiyat, to the hypocrites, or those who outwardly professed some religion, but in their hearts were of none.

George Sale.

9512. HELL, Personal. The heart of man is the place the devil dwells in: I feel sometimes a hell within myself: Lucifer keeps his court in my breast. Legion is reviv'd in me. There are as many hells as Anaxarchus conceived worlds: there was more than one hell in Magdalen, when there were seven devils, for every devil is an hell unto himself; he holds enough of torture in his own ubi, and needs not the misery of circumference to afflict him; and thus a distracted conscience here is a shadow or introduction unto hell hereafter.

Browne.

9513. HELL, Sinner's Own Way to. Whitefield reproved a young man for swearing, and requested him not to do so again. He replied, "Doctor, it is very hard that you will not let a man go to hell his own way."

9514. HELL, Society of. In hell thou shalt have none but a company of damned souls, with an innumerable company of devils, to keep company with thee. While thou art in this world, the very thought of the devils appearing to thee, makes thy flesh to tremble, and thine hair ready to stand upright on thy Lea. But, oh, what wilt thou do when not only the supposition of the devils appearing, but the real society of all the devils of hell will be with thee, howling, roaring and screeching in such a hideous manner that thou wilt be even at thy wits' end, and be ready to run stark mad again for anguish and torments. If after ten thousand years, an end should come, there would be comfort. But here is thy misery, here thou must be forever. When thou seest what an innumerable company of howling devils thou art amongst, thou shalt think this again, This is my portion forever. When thou hast been in hell so many thousand years as there are stars in the firmament, or drops in the sea, or sands on the sea-shore, yet thou hast to lie there forever. Oh, this one word ever, how will it torment thy soul!

Bunyan.

9515. HELL, Torments of. They who believe not shall have garments of fire fitted unto them; boiling water shall be poured on their heads; their bowels shall be dissolved thereby, and also their skins; and they shall be beaten with maces of iron. So often as they shall endeavor to get out of hell, because of the anguish of their torments, they shall be dragged back into the same, and their tormentors shall say unto them, "Taste ye the pain of burning."

Koran.

9516. HELL, Working Hard for. Many might go to heaven with half the labor they go to hell, if they would venture their industry the right way.

Ben Jonson.

9517. HELP, Condition of Heavenly. As a countryman was carelessly driving his wagon along a miry lane, his wheels stuck so deep in the clay that the horses came to a stand-still. Upon this the man, without making the least effort of his own, began to call upon Hercules to come and help him out of his trouble. But Hercules bade him lay his shoulder to the wheel, assuring him that heaven only aided those who endeavored to help themselves. It is in vain to expect our prayers to be heard, if we do not strive as well as pray.

Esop.

of God's hand, see Job 8: 20—"He will not take the ungodly by the hand," is the marginal reading, where the text is "neither will he help the evil doers;" see Ps. 119: 173. The help of God's shield, Deut. 33: 29; Ps. 115: 9-11 (three times). THE BOOK OF PSALMS contains about fifty references to help. Two thoughts seem to be clearly brought out by them—Vain is the help of man, see Ps. 60: 11, etc. Sufficient is the help of God, Ps. 46: 1; 22: 19. The earnest cry for speedy help should be noted. "Make haste to help me;" "Make no tarrying;" see Ps. 46: 5—"God shall help her, and that right early"—margin, "when the morning appeareth," as Ps. 30: 5. 1 Chron. 15: 26—"God helped the Levites." It might scarcely seem as if they required Divine help in this case; but perhaps they were afraid after the breach upon Uzzah. In any case, it is well to acknowledge our dependence upon God's help in everything, especially in our religious duties, Ps. 94: 17. 2 Chron. 32: 7, 8—Hezekiah's noble confidence. Acts 26: 22—St. Paul's testimony, after well nigh thirty years of Christian warfare. THE LORD JESUS. The "mighty One" chosen to be our Helper, Ps. 89: 19; "able to succor," Heb. 2: 18; to help them that have "no helper," Ps. 72: 12; just as he so graciously helped the impotent man at the pool, John 5: 7, 8; the blessed Mediator, through whom we may "come boldly to the throne of grace" for "help," Heb. 4: 16; the Son "made perfect through sufferings," who himself has felt the succor of the Father's help, Isa. 50: 7-9. Bowes.

9519. HELP, Mutual. An ant went to a fountain to quench his thirst, and tumbling in, was almost drowned. But a dove that happened to be sitting on a neighboring tree, saw the ant's danger, and plucking off a leaf, let it drop into the water before him, and the ant mounting upon it, was presently wafted safe ashore. Just at that time, a fowler was spreading his net, and was in the act of ensnaring the dove, when the ant perceiving his object, bit his heel. The start which the man gave made him drop his net; and the dove, aroused to a sense of her danger, flew safe away.

Æsop.

9520. HELP, Providential. A Russian fable tells of a man who wished to accomplish a journey over the snow and ice, through an inhospitable region infested with ravenous wolves. The distance was so great that it could only be traversed in a day by the strongest and swiftest horse to be found. Thus furnished, the traveler set forth to cross the steppe. When well on his way a huge wolf sprang upon the horse and devoured him. The wolf then became entangled in the harness and sped forth at a rapid rate, and soon drew the traveler to the very place he sought. Rev. Wm. Taylor says the devil has often attacked him in this way, and the result has only been to take him the quicker over the rough roads to the place desired. The devil himself becomes the Lord's servant to save and help his people.

9521. HELP, Reciprocal. In 1864, the steamship Askalon, bound from Liverpool to Port-au-Prince, was lost. She was overtaken by a storm, which she was unable to withstand. Hard effort of the crew kept her afloat till the Dutch barque Almonde discovered her distress, and rescued the crew, thirty-seven in number. It was soon after discovered that the rescuing ship had sprung a leak. The work of all hands at the pumps was required to save the ship. Without the aid of the rescued sailors, they must have been lost. In saving others, they saved themselves.

9522. HELP, Reward of. When I dig a man out of trouble, the hole that he leaves behind him is the grave where I bury my own trouble.

S. T. Treasury.

9523. HELP, Swift. I had a friend who stood by the rail-track at Carlisle, Pa., when the ammunition had given out at Antietam; and he saw the train from Harrisburg, freighted with shot and shell, as it went thundering down toward the battle-field. He said that it stopped not for any crossing. They put down the brakes for no grade. They held up for no peril. The wheels were on fire with the speed as they dashed past. If the train did not come up in time with the ammunition, it might as well not come at all. So, my friends, there are times in our lives when we must have help immediately or perish. The grace that comes too late is no grace at all. Oh is it not blessed to think that God is always in such quick pursuit of his dear children? Talmage.

9524. HERESY, Odor of. The Jesuit P. Francisco de Fonseca says: "I will relate another prodigy that occurred in Vienna, and which will serve not a little to confirm us in the faith with which we devoutly reverence these things. The Count of Harrach, who was greatly favored by the Duke of Saxony, besought him that he would be pleased to bestow upon him some of the very many relics in his treasury, which he preserved rather for curiosity than for devotion. The duke with much benignity ordered that various glasses should be given him, full of precious relics of Christ, of the most holy Virgin, the apostles, the innocents, and other various saints, and desired two Lutheran ministers to pack them with all decency in a valuable box, which the duke himself locked and sealed with his own seal, to prevent any fraud, and then sent it to Vienna. The box arrived at Vienna, and was deposited in the count's chapel, which is in Preiner Street; the count sent word to the bishop, that he might come to see, open, and authenticate the relics. The bishop came, and upon his opening the box there issued out a stench so abominable that it was not to be borne, and the whole chapel was infected with it. The bishop ordered that the reliquaries should be taken out, in order that he might carefully examine the cause of so strange an accident. This was done, and they soon discovered the mystery, for they found a case from which this pestilential odor proceeded; there was in it a piece of cloth with this inscription, 'Relics of Martin Luther's Breeches,' which the Lutheran preachers, in mockery of our piety, had placed among the sacred relics. These abominable remains of the heresiarch were burnt by command of the bishop, and then not only did the stink cease, but there issued from the sacred relics a most sweet perfume, which filled the whole chapel."

9525. HERESY, Trifling. Say they, all heresies and all heretics are not equal; some, comparatively, are "little" to be regarded, and it's cruelty to meddle with these that seem to profess fair. "No," saith he, "take them all, even the 'little foxes;' for though they be little, yet they are foxes, though they be not of the grossest kind." As all scandals in facts are not alike, yet none is to be dispensed with, "so they are," saith he, "'foxes,' and corrupt others." For a "little leaven will leaven the whole lump." Often small-like schisms or heresies, such as the Novatians and Donatists, etc., have been exceedingly defacing to the beauty of the Church. "Therefore," saith he, "hunt and take them all."

Durham.

9526. HERMITS, First Principles of. A rule among the hermits of Scete was never to teach others what they had not themselves first practiced. In their novitiate they learned to master themselves after the method of the philosophers of Greece. How to overcome pride, anger, lust and every manifestation of self, was their constant study. They treated the body as the stronghold of the enemy, which was to be conquered. St. John, the hermit, says, "If a general would take a city, he begins the siege by cutting off its supplies of water and provisions; so by sobriety, fasting and maceration of the flesh, are our affections and passions to be reduced and our domestic enemy weakened." By this practice of perfect self-denial they expected to secure the death of self and all vicious inclinations. Defects of virtue arise from unvanquished self. Alms, fasts and devotions profit nothing where self is not dead. These are the first principles of the hermit life.

9527. HERO, A Brave. In August, 1864, Commodore Farragut resolved to pass the obstructions and forts in Mobile bay. He intended to lead the line of battle with his flagship, the Hartford, but yielded to the unanimous request of his commanders. He protested that exposure was one of the penalties of rank, and that the flagship would be the main target of the enemy. The movement was very hazardous. The channel was known to be planted with torpedoes, and above the fort the powerful ram Tennessee waited to run them down. The Brooklyn led the line, but faltered at a perilous moment. Hesitation now would ensure defeat. The Commodore had lashed himself to the mast, where he overlooked the battle. He at once ordered his own ship to the front and led the fleet to victory.

9528. HERO, Definition of a. A hero is a man of high achievement, who performs famous exploits, who does things that are heroical, and in all his actions and demeanor is a hero indeed.

H. Brooke.

9529. HEROISM, Christian. The mission ship sent a delegation on to the shore of Raratonga at night-fall, who were barbarously treated and all would have been slain but for a Raratonga woman, whom they brought along with them. The company on their return to the ship decided against attempting to plant a mission there. At this juncture a converted Tahitian, named Papehia, came forward, and offered to be left to attempt the work of evangelizing the people alone. "Whether the savages spare me or kill me," said the intrepid teacher, "I will land among them. 'The Lord is my shepherd, I am in his hand.'" Clothing himself in a shirt and a few yards of calico as a wrapper, and tying in a handkerchief Tahitian portions of the Holy Scriptures, he committed himself to the waves. On the reef there stood a number of warriors. They looked with proud disdain on the humble servant of Christ as he approached, and seemed ready to strike him with their spears. God was his shield, and Raratonga redeemed his reward.

9530. HEROISM, Medal for. The examination was being held in an English Academy. Many ladies and gentlemen were present. James Hartley had taken the prize as best scholar, and was again called forward by the principal, who said he was about to confer a rare medal seldom merited. "Not long since some of the scholars belonging to this academy were flying a kite, just as a poor boy on horseback rode by. The horse took fright, threw the boy off, and injured him so badly that for weeks he was confined to the house. Only one of the scholars went to inquire after the boy who was hurt. He found that the boy was the grandson of a poor widow, whose only support consisted in selling milk. When she saw the wounded boy, she said, 'Now there is no one to take care of the cow.' The pupil volunteered to take care of the cow; and when he found that money was wanted for medicine, he gave the money he had saved to buy boots. The poor old woman, seeing how much he needed shoes, insisted that he wear a pair belonging to her poor Henry. The scholar bought the boots, clumsy as they were, and has worn them up to this time. Abuse and ridicule have been heaped upon him for driving a cow, selling milk, and wearing clumsy shoes; but he has fulfilled this self-imposed duty cheerfully. These facts were only learned by accident yesterday." Young Hartley meekly received the medal, which he richly deserved.

9531. HEROISM, Military. In the war of La Vendée, General Kléber, with four thousand men, was completely surrounded by an overwhelming force of the enemy, and saw no other way of saving his little band, except by stopping for a short time the passage of the Vendéans through a narrow ravine, which was all that was between the two armies. He called an officer to him, for whom he had a particular friendship and esteem. "Take," said he to him, "a company of grenadiers: stop the enemy before that ravine; you will be killed, but you will save your comrades." "General

I shall do it," replied the officer, who received the order to immolate himself with as much calmness as if it had been a simple military evolution. The prediction of Kléber was but too fatally verified. The brave officer arrested the enemy's progress, but perished in the achievement.

Percy.

9532. HEROISM, Remarkable. In September, 1857, a steamer bringing five hundred miners from the rich diggings of California to New York, encountered a fearful storm soon after leaving Havana. The vessel became disabled, and was kept afloat only by the herculean efforts of the crew and passengers in bailing out the water. For eighteen hours they labored, hoping that some passing ship would come to the rescue. Their vessel could not be kept afloat much longer, and despair began to settle down upon them. The brig Marine discovered their signal of distress, and stood off to await the steamer's boats with their loads of passengers. There was room only for the women and children. Not a male passenger attempted to enter the boats, and all were launched safely. These miners had with them ten millions of gold and gold dust, which they had labored very hard to accumulate, and with this they had delighted in the thought of surprising their friends on reaching home. The four hundred men counted it all, and their own lives also, less than that of the helpless women and children. They were frigidly calm with death staring them in the face. To this noble courage many owed their lives. Before the boats could return their vessel went down, and nearly all of this band of heroes were engulfed in the greedy sea.

9533. HEROISM, Unconscious. In the Gayoso Hospital, at Memphis, was a soldier who had lost an arm and leg in the assault at Vicksburg. Some cordial was given him, and he was made as comfortable as possible by Mr. F. G. Ensign, one of the agents of the Christian Commission. "Who are you? Where did you get these things?" asked the soldier. Mr. Ensign told him they came from Northern homes; they were sent by people who loved him. Tears came into his eyes as he lay quiet for a moment, and then he said, "Why, I haven't done anything to be remembered so." "You have given your leg and arm," was the reply, but this fact did not strike him as at all important; he only reiterated, "I haven't done anything." He was offered a Bible. "Well," said he, when his eye rested on the page without pain, "this is best of all. I have been here for weeks, and I did want to read the Bible so. This is just what I want. Who sent it?" And when told, the unselfish heart found utterance, "Why, I haven't done anything."

9534. HESITATION, Weakness of. Hesitation is a sign of weakness, for inasmuch as the comparative good and evil of the different modes of action about which we hesitate are seldom equally balanced, a strong mind should perceive the slightest inclination of the beam with the glance of an eagle, particularly as there are cases where the preponderance will be very minute, even although there should be life in one scale, and death in the other. Colton.

9535. HIDING PLACES, Oriental. We see in the case of David, and in that of many other good men, that they had to conceal themselves often in caves, mountains, and desert places, from the pursuit of their enemies. In countries like these, where the police is imperfect, where population is much scattered, and where it is very easy to sustain life, it can be no wonder that offenders and injured men often conceal themselves for months and years from the vigilance of their pursuers. It is an everyday occurrence to hear of men thus hiding themselves. Has a person to account for his conduct, or to appear in a court of justice? He packs up his valuables and makes a start into the jungle, or to some distant country. Perhaps he prowls about the skirts of a forest, and occasionally visits his family in the night. See him on his way; he walks so softly that the most delicate-eared animal cannot detect him; he looks in every direction; puts his ear near the ground, and listens for any sound; again he proceeds, sometimes crawling, sometimes walking, till he has reached his hiding-place. But the natives themselves are famous for assisting each other to elude the search of their pursuers, and often as did Jonathan and Ahimaaz, they conceal themselves in the well. Sometimes an offender will run to a man of rank who is at enmity with his foe, and exclaim, "My lord, you must be my hiding-place against that wicked man, who has committed so many crimes against you." "Ah, the good man! he was my hiding-place."

Roberts.

9536. HIGHER LIFE, Attaining. I have known men who have been up in balloons, and they have told me that when they want to rise higher they just throw out some of the sand with which they ballast the balloon. Now, I believe one reason why so many people are earthly-minded and have so little of the spirit of heaven is that they have got too much ballast in the shape of love for earthly joys and gains; and what you want is to throw out some of the sand, and you will rise higher.

Moody.

9537. HIGHWAY, God's. In the early times, if a man traveling in the king's highway between sun and sun, was robbed, he could recover all damages from the government of the country; but if he traveled in any other place and in any other time, it was at his own hazard and peril. So with God's highway, cast up for the redeemed to walk in. If we walk in God's highway we shall have God's protection. But we be to us if we try any other route or method than he marks out.

9538. HISTORY, Burden of. History is but a kind of Newgate Calendar, a register of the crimes and miseries that man has inflicted on his fellow-man. It is a huge libel on human nature, to which we industriously add page after page, volume after volume, as if we were building up a monument to the honor rather than the infamy of our species. If we turn over the pages of these chronicles that man has written of himself, what are the characters dignified by the appellation of "great," and held up to the admiration of posterity? Tyrants, robbers, conquerors, renowned only for the magnitude of their misdeeds and the stupendous wrongs and miseries they have inflicted on mankind—warriors who have hired themselves to the trade of blood, not from motives of virtuous patriotism, or to protect the injured and defenceless, but merely to gain the vaunted glory of being successful in massacring their fellow-beings! What are the great events that constitute a glorious era? The fall of empires, the desolation of happy countries, splendid cities smoking in their ruins, the proudest works of art tumbled in the dust, the shrieks and groans of whole nations ascending unto heaven. W. Irving.

9539. HISTORY, Revelations of. Peter the Great, Emperor of Russia, was one day in a sailing-boat, when he became so angry with one of his companions that he seized him, with the intention of throwing him overboard. "You may drown me," said his subject, "but your history will tell of it." This reminder was effectual, and the emperor pardoned the man.

9540. HOBBY, A Medical. A certain doctor always treated his juvenile patients for "worms," whatever might happen to be their symptoms. One day, being called to a boy who was suffering severely, he felt the pulse, and, looking at the mother, with a solemn shake of the head, said, "Worms, madam! worms!" "Now, Doctor," said the mother, "it isn't worms at all, I tell ye; that boy fell down on the wood-pile and broke his leg, and I want you to stop crying 'worms' and set it immediately." "Ah!" said the Doctor, determined not to be put down, "Worms in the wood, madam! worms in the wood!"

9541. HOLINESS, Ashamed of. What though the polite man count thy fashion a little odd, and too precise; it is because he knows nothing above that model of goodness which he hath set himself, and therefore approves of nothing beyond it; he knows not God, and therefore doth not discern and esteem what is most like him. When courtiers come down into the country, the common home-bred people possibly think their habit strange; but they care not for that—it is the fashion of court. What need, then, that Christians should be so tenderforeheaded as to be put out of countenance because the world looks upon holiness as a singularity? It is the only fashion in the highest court, yea, of the King of kings himself.

Coleridge.

9542. HOLINESS, Aversion to. Man's nature, being contrary to holiness, hath an aversion to any act of homage to God, because holiness must at least be pretended. In every duty wherein we have a communion with God, holiness is requisite; now, as men are against the truth of holiness, because it is unsuitable to them, so they are not friends to those duties which require it, and for some space divert them from the thoughts of their beloved lusts. The word of the Lord is a yoke, prayer a drudgery, obedience a strange element. We are like fish that "drink up iniquity like water," and come not to the bank without the force of an angle; no more willing to do service for God, than a fish is of itself to do service for man.

Charnock.

9543. HOLINESS, Beauty of. True holiness is a plain and an even thing, without falsehood, guile, perverseness of spirit, deceitfulness of heart, or starting aside. It hath one end, one rule, one way, one heart; whereas hypocrites are, in the Scripture, called "double-minded men," because they pretend to God, and follow the world:—and "crooked men," like the swelling of a wall, whose parts are not perpendicular, nor level to their foundation. Now rectitude, sincerity, and singleness of heart, are ever, both in the eyes of God and man, beautiful things. Salter.

9544. HOLINESS, Divine. In the temple, every "little" ornament even of the mighty structure that crowned the cliffs of Zion was "holy" to the Lord. Not the great courts and inner shrines and pillared halls merely, but all. Not a carven pomegranate, not a bell, silver or golden, but was "holy." The table and its lamps, with flowers of silver light, tent and staves, fluttering curtain and ascending incense, altar and sacrifice, breast-plate and ephod, mitre and gem-clasped girdle, wreathen chains and jeweled hangings—over all was inscribed holy; while within, in the innermost shrine, where God manifested himself above the mercy-seat, was the holiest. Thus the utter holiness of that God with whom they had to do was by every detail impressed upon the heart and conscience of ancient Israel.

9545. HOLINESS, Emblems of. The laurel, firm, erect, and bold, expands its leaf of vivid green. In spite of the united, the repeated attacks of wind, and rain, and frost, it preserves an undimmed lively look, and maintains its post while withering millions fall around. Worthy, by vanquishing the rugged force of winter, worthy to adorn the triumphant conqueror's brow. The bay-tree scorns to be a mean pensioner on a few transient sunny gleams; or, with a servile obsequiousness, to vary its appearance in conformity to the changing seasons: by such indications of sterling worth, and staunch resolution, reading a lecture to the poet's genius, while it weaves the chaplet for his temples. These, and a few other plants, clad with native verdure, retain their comely aspect in the bleakest climes and in the coldest months.

Ruskin.

9546. HOLINESS, Experience of. A Quaker lady of wealth, position and culture, was happily converted to God, and clearly taught the precious reality that Christ is the Lord our Righteousness. All doubt and fear as to her present acceptance and final salvation passed away, and she was happier than she had ever been before in her life. But one thing troubled her. She had her besetting sins, which she tried hard, but in vain, to conquer. She could suppress them, but she could not exterminate them. She could keep in the word, but she could not keep out the feeling. Another thing troubled her, too. Her service was more from duty than love, and her heart was not satisfied, neither was her conscience at rest in having it so. She wanted to have the well-spring of life in her as a fountain whence should flow forth rivers of living water. To attain this she made vigorous and persistent efforts, all however under a sense that the responsibility of the thing was upon her. Her efforts resulted only in deepening conviction and increasing her burden of heart. At last in a meeting she heard of the better way of faith in Jesus, and left herself, burden and all, in his hands. Light at once began to flow in upon her soul, and she became as happy as happy could be. When asked how it came about, "Oh," said she, "I just shifted the responsibility over upon Jesus."

W. E. Boardman.

9547. HOLINESS, Instantaneous. The separation of sin from the soul is constantly preceded and followed by a gradual work: but is that separation in itself instantaneous, or is it not? Examining this, let us go on step by step. An instantaneous change has been wrought in some believers: none can deny this. Since that change, they enjoy perfect love. They feel this, and this alone. They "rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks." Now this is all that I mean by perfection. Therefore, these are witnesses of the perfection which I preach. But in some, this change was not instantaneous. They did not perceive the instant when it was wrought. It is often difficult to perceive the instant when a man dies: yet there is an instant when life ceases. And, if ever sin ceases, there must be a last moment of its existence, and a first moment of our deliverance from it. J. Wesley.

9548. HOLINESS, Living. Lyncurgus would allow none of his laws to be written. He would have the principles of government interwoven in the lives and manners of the people, as most conducive to their happiness. Their education would be such as to imprint these laws upon their minds, that they might remain perpetually before them. He will most faithfully abide by the king's commandment who has the word of God so engraven upon his heart that nothing can erase it. The multiplication of Bibles that stand upon book-shelves or lie upon tables is an easy matter; but to multiply copies of walking Scriptures, in the form of holy men who can say, "Thy word have I hid in my heart," is much more difficult. Anon.

9549. HOLINESS, a Preparation. The heathen had this notion: they would not permit any to come to their religious services unless they were prepared. That saying of Æneas in the poem, to his father, when he came from the war, is a clear proof; Tu genitor, etc. "Father, do you meddle with the sacrifices; but as for me it is a sinful thing to touch them, till I have washed myself in the fountain." This was an outward external rite amongst them for cleansing themselves. The very heathen saw they must not meddle with their holy things till they were cleansed: therefore they had one who cried out to the people when they came to sacrifice: "All you that are unclean and profane, go far away from these sacrifices." Not only the word of God, but the very light of nature taught them not to meddle with holy things till they were sanctified. Take heed how you hear; not only hear, but take heed to prepare yourselves for hearing: "look to thy feet (it hath the same sense) when thou comest into the house of God:" prepare thyself, be not hasty, lest thine be counted but the "Sacrifice of Fools."

Caryl.

9550. HOLINESS, Reasonableness of. For where is the absurdity of this doctrine? If the light of a candle, brought into a dark room, can instantly expel the darkness; and if, upon opening the shutters at noon, your gloomy apartment can be instantly filled with meridian light; why might not the instantaneous rending of the veil of unbelief, or the sudden and full opening of the eye of faith, instantly fill your soul with the light of truth and the fire of love, supposing the Sun of Righteousness arise upon you with healing in his wings? May not the Sanctifier descend upon your waiting soul as quickly as the Spirit descended upon your Lord at his baptism? Did it not descend as a dove; that is, with the soft motion of a dove, which swiftly shoots down, and instantly alights? A good man said once, "A mote is little when compared to the sun; but I am far less before God." Alluding to this comparison, I ask, if the sun could instantly kindle a mote; nay, if a burning-glass can in a moment calcine a bone, and turn a stone to lime; and if the dim flame of a candle can, in the twinkling of an eye, destroy the flying insect which comes within its sphere; how unscriptural and irrational is it to suppose, that when God fully baptizes a soul with his sanctifying Spirit, and with the celestial fire of his love, he cannot, in an instant, destroy the man of sin, burn up the chaff of corruption, melt the heart of stone into a heart of flesh, and kindle the believing soul into pure seraphic love.

John Fletcher.

9551. HOLINESS, Receiving. It may be with the root of sin, as with its fruit: some souls parley many years before they can be persuaded to give up all their outward sins, and others part with them instantaneously. You may compare the former to those besieged towns which make a long resistance; while the latter resemble those fortresses which are surprised and taken by storm. Travelers inform us that vegetation is so quick and powerful in some warm climates, that the seeds of some vegetables yield a salad in less than twenty-four hours. Should a northern philosopher say, "Impossible!" and should an English gardener exclaim against such mushroom-salad, they would only expose their prejudices, as do those who decry instantaneous justification, or mock at the possibility of the instantaneous destruction of indwelling sin.

John Fletcher.

9552. HOLY OF HOLIES, Penalty of Entering the

It was death for any one except the high-priest to enter the holy of holies. So carefully was this observed and provided for, that to prevent it being necessary for any one to enter to bring out the body of the high-priest in case he should die there, before the Lord, on the great day of expiation, a cord was fastened to his foot, the end of which was left beyond the veil, that he might be drawn out by it, if such a circumstance occurred. It should be observed that the Jews were always in dread lest the high-priest should perish in performing the services of that great day. Kitto.

9553. HOLY SPIRIT, Agency of the. Unconverted men often say, "If these things are so, if they are so clear and great, why cannot we see them?" And there is no answer to be given but this, "Ye are blind." "But we want to see them. If they are real, they are our concern as well as yours. Oh, that some preacher would come who had power to make us see them!" Poor souls, there is no such preacher, and you need not wait for him. Let him gather God's light as he will, he can but pour it on blind eyes. A burning glass will condense sunbeams into a focus of brightness; and if a blind eye be put there, not a whit will it see, though it be consumed. Light is the remedy for darkness, not blindness. Neither will strong powers of understanding on your part serve. The great Earl of Chatham once went with a pious friend to hear Mr. Cecil. The sermon was on the Spirit's agency in the hearts of believers. As they were coming from the church, the mighty statesman confessed that he could not understand it all, and asked his friend if he supposed that any one in the house could. "Why yes," said he, "there were many plain, unlettered women, and some children there, who understood every word of it, and heard it with joy." Dr. Hoge.

9554. HOLY SPIRIT, Biblical. THE GIFT OF THE SPIRIT is frequently described by words expressive of abundance and continuance. Thus the Holy Ghost is spoken of as—Coming, as a mighty and powerful impulse, as in the case of Othniel, Jephthah, Samson, etc., personally, and upon the Church collectively. Poured out, Ps. 1: 23; Isa. 44: 3; Joel 2: 28, 29; Zech. 12: 10; Acts 2: 17, 18. Shed abundantly, Titus 3: 6. Clothing, Judges 6: 34; 1 Chron. 12: 18, margins; so Luke 24: 49—"endued," or invested with the Spirit. Dwelling, Ps. 68: 18; John 14: 17; Rom. 6: 9; 1 Cor. 3: 16, and also 6: 19. Abiding, John 14: 16. Supplying the wants of the Church, Phil. 1: 19. The Greek word here (Phil. 1: 19), is taken from the office of the Choregus, whose place it was to supply the chorus, at his own expense, with ornaments and all other necessities. So the Holy Spirit supplies the wants of the Church. St. Luke's Gospel contains the most frequent references to the Holy Ghost of all the gospels. In the first four chapters, we read of Zacharias and Elizabeth, John the Baptist, Mary, Simeon, and our Lord himself, being filled with, or moved by, the Holy Ghost. A STRIKING CON-TRAST. Thomas, though one of our Lord's chosen apostles, who had been with him during his ministry, and heard him so often foretell his own resurrection, yet refused to believe the resurrection, until compelled by sight to say, "My Lord," John 20: 18. Elizabeth—less favored—when Mary came to see her before he was born, at once acknowledged her as "the mother of my Lord," Luke 1: 43. "Elizabeth," we read, "was filled with the Holy Ghost," ver. 44. FILLED WITH THE SPIRIT—FULL OF THE HOLY GHOST. How often these pregnant expressions occur; denoting the energizing, ennobling power of the Spirit in the heart of God's saints. They are generally marked by some special result following. Take, e. g., the following cases: Bezaleel—Exod. 31: 3; 35: 30, 31—"filled with the spirit of God;" to prepare the materials for the tabernacle. Zacharias and Elizabeth—Luke 1: 41, 67—inspired with the spirit of prophecy. John Baptist, Luke 1: 15, 16. (See the beautiful connection.) The disciples at Pentecost, and afterwards—Acts 2: 4; 13: 52—endued with the ordinary and extraordinary gifts of the Spirit. The seven deacons—Acts 6—qualified for their important offices; filled with wisdom, ver. 3; faith, ver. 5; and power, ver. 8. Peter—Acts 4: 8; 13: 19, 20—emboldened to confess Jesus Christ without fear. Stephen—Acts 6: 5—witnessing a good confession; rejoicing in the midst of danger, 6: 15; calm in the hour of death, 7: 55. St. Paul—Acts 9: 17; 13: 9—even from the commencement of his ministerial course, was filled with the Holy Ghost. Bowes.

9555. HOLY SPIRIT, Descent of the. July 23d, 1839, whilst the Rev. William Burns, jun., was preaching in his father's church, "he clasped his hands, lifted his eyes to heaven, and, in an agony for the Holy Ghost to descend upon the people, exclaimed, 'O come! come!' and being strengthened in his faith, 'He is coming! He is coming!' Suddenly a voice was heard from among the congregation, 'He is come! He is come! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Glory be to God!' This ran like electricity through the whole assembly of fifteen hundred persons: and the scene which succeeded will not admit of description. Here was the formalist of fifty years' standing in the church, shaking from head to foot, and crying aloud for mercy. Then the cry was heard, 'What must I do to be saved?' while others were in exultation, exclaiming, 'Behold, God is become my salvation!' An elder, who was endeavoring to direct and comfort his aged mother, was seized by the convincing power of the Spirit; and with a voice which, had it not been heard whence it came, could scarcely have been believed to be human, cried out, 'O Christ, have mercy on my soul! O, break this hard heart!' Presently one ran to the manse with tidings of what had taken place in the church—when one of the ministers ascended the pulpit, gave a few words of advice, sung, prayed, and dismissed the congregation. But although the people left the church, many of them would not and did not go home till God had blessed them. The vestry was filled with penitents; other places in the town were opened for them; and scenes were witnessed that day in Kilsyth, the like of which had not been known within the memory of any then living. Numbers felt the gospel to be the power of God to salvation."

9556. HOLY SPIRIT, Earnest of the. In the early times, when land was sold, the owner cut a turf from the greensward and cast it into the cap of the purchaser as a token that it was his; or he tore off the branch of a tree and put it into the new owner's hand to show that he was entitled to all the products of the soil; and when the purchaser of a house received seizin or possession, the key of the door, or a bundle of thatch plucked from the roof, signified that the building was yielded up to him. The God of all grace has given to his people all the perfections of heaven to be their heritage for ever, and the earnest of his Spirit is to them the blessed token that all things are theirs. The Spirit's work of comfort and sanctification is a part of heaven's covenant blessings, a turf from the soil of Canaan, a twig from the tree of life, the key to mansions in the skies. Possessing the earnest of the Spirit, we have received seizin of heaven. Spurgeon.

9557. HOLY SPIRIT, Effects of the. Mark the rain that falls from above, and the same shower that droppeth out of one cloud increaseth sundry plants in a garden, and severally, according to the condition of every plant; in one stalk it makes a rose, in another a violet, divers in a third, and sweetening all. So the Spirit works its multiform effects in several complexions, and all according to the increase of God. Is thy habit and inclination choleric? Why, try thyself if thou be very apt to be zealous in a good cause, and it turns thy natural infirmity into a holy heat. Is melancholy predominant? The grace of God will turn that sad humor into devotion, prayer, and mortifying thy pleasures to die unto the world. Is thy temperature sanguine and cheerful? The goodness of God will allow it unto thee in thy civil life, in a good mean; but over and above, it will make thee bountiful, easy to pardon injuries, glad of reconciliations, comfortable to the distressed, always rejoicing in the Lord. Is a man fearful? If this freezing disease, which is in thee from thy mother's womb, be not absolutely cured, yet the Holy Ghost will work upon it, to make thy conscience tender, wary to give no offence, to make thee pitiful, penitent, contrite, ready to weep for thy transgressions. F. F. Trench.

9558. HOLY SPIRIT, Energy of the. At a revival meeting in a Southern State, a notoriously wicked infidel appeared, and stood outside while the meeting was going on in the church. A young girl arose, and gave a simple experience of love and faith. Her words were as the pebbles which David hurled at the giant. The wicked man heard, and fell, like Goliath, to the earth. The preacher and others took him up, and carried him inside.

He was converted, and became eminent for piety and usefulness. At a love-feast held in a barn in Vermont, from which the songs and experiences were heard by the crowd outside, the Holy Ghost came down upon them, and many were converted.

9559. HOLY SPIRIT, Gentleness of. It is curious to remark, that wherever the Holy Ghost is spoken of in the Bible, he is spoken of in terms of gentleness and love. We often read of "the wrath of God" the Father, as Rom. 1: 18; and we read of the wrath of God the Son, as Ps. 2: 12; but we nowhere read of the wrath of God the Holy Ghost. M. Cheyne.

9560. HOLY SPIRIT Grieved. A chaplain in passing through one of the wards of a hospital thought he saw a familiar face. He recognized the youth as one of his Sabbath school boys, his father a deacon in the Congregationalist church, and his mother a praying woman. It was understood that he could not live, and the chaplain was anxious to know if he was ready to exchange worlds. He met a clear intellectual response to all that was said of Christ as a Saviour, but insisted upon saying that "he knew he was going to perdition." He was told that there was hope in Christ, if he would but cast himself upon him. He responded, "I know that, but I don't want to go to Christ. I don't have any interest in him." "But can't you pray, 'God be merciful to me a sinner?'" asked the chaplain. "Yes," he replied, "I can say the words, but I don't feel it. My time has passed. Last year I thought that I was a Christian, and my father wanted me to join the church. Then I made up my mind that I'd see a little more of the world before I bound myself down, and now it is too late." He continued in this state about three weeks and then died, begging the chaplain not to tell his mother the state of his mind, and desiring him to implore his younger brother to take warning by his awful end. Gentle and winning in all his ways, he lacked a preparation to meet his God.

9561. HOLY SPIRIT, Influence of the. A little girl was sitting with her uncle while he was casting up accounts. All was quiet for a time, when she heard him say, "There! I have quite a nice little sum laid up against a time of need." "What are you talking about?" asked the little girl. "About my treasures that I have laid up," said the uncle. "Up in heaven?" she asked; for she heard her father read at prayers that morning about laying up treasures in heaven. The response was, "No! my treasures are all on earth; some in banks, and some in other places." "But ain't you got any up in heaven?" persisted the little child. "Well, I don't believe I have," replied the man; "but you may leave me now, I'm going out." Impressed with the thought that he was not rich towards God, he began immediately to lay up treasure in heaven. The words of the child, impressed by the Holy Spirit, led him to an active Christian life.

9562. HOLY SPIRIT, Life by the. Correct opinions are in order to correct morals, but a man's opinions may be right, while his heart and life are wrong. Colton wrote more moral precepts than any man of his time, and violated them all. We can put truth into the mind of our fellow-man no farther than the understanding. We cannot reach the moral nature by light alone. When one changes the opinions of an erring brother on moral subjects, something is accomplished; but to give a disposition to love and obey truth is a different thing. The Holy Spirit alone sinks the truth through the intelligence into the conscience and the affections. Truth is light, but it is not life. Alone it is like the sun in winter; it shines but to enlighten a dead, cold earth. With the Spirit it is like the sun in summer; it shines with life in its light, vivifying nature and producing blade, flower and fruitage. So the light of divine truth shines in the darkness of the natural mind, and the darkness appreciates it not, until by the Spirit it becomes "spirit and life" to the soul. "In him was life, and that life was the light of men." Walker.

9563. HOLY SPIRIT, Outpouring of the. The following marvelous account is fully authenticated: Rev. John Easter was holding a meeting in the forest; it was in the mid-day of his fame and power; hundreds and hundreds had gathered to hear the wonderful man. In the midst of his sermon, while all were hanging on his lips in breathless silence, suddenly a rushing sound as of a mighty wind smote the ears of the hearers. All eyes were instantly turned upward, but no storm had smitten the forest; not a twig, not a leaf stirred; still the awful sound swept over and around them. Instantly several hundred horses broke from their fastenings, and rushed wildly in all directions through the woods; hundreds of men and women fell flat upon their faces, stricken down by the mighty power of God. The cry of conviction that arose was appalling; even the holiest of Christians trembled in the presence of that mysterious sound. The work of conversion was as instantaneous as the work of conviction, and many were the witnesses for Christ that arose in the midst of the awe-stricken multitude. The effects of this display of divine power were great indeed on the part of the people far and near. The work spread like fire in dry stubble, and hundreds were added to the church.

Episcopal Methodist.

9564. HOLY SPIRIT, Power of the. During the persecution in 303, a timid deacon of Antioch, in Egypt, hired a piper and dancer to personate him before the governor, and bring him a certificate showing that Apollonius had sacrificed. Christians who did thus were called libellatics, but not apostates. The piper put on Apollonius' hood and cloak, and went before the judge. He said, "What art thou, fellow? A Christian perhaps, muffled thus, as if thou fearedst to be seen." Then the Holy Spirit came mightily upon him, and he who came a heathen with fraudulent intent said, "Yes, my lord, I am a Christian." "Thou knowest the choice that is set before thee, torture or sacrifice," said the judge. "I will not sacrifice," said the piper. He now had courage to refuse the very work he came to do. The magistrate said, "Send for Philemon, the piper; perchance his sweet melodies will drive away the fancies of this fool, and allure him to the worship of our gods." The piper was sought, but could not be found. In his stead his brother was brought and questioned as to where this piper was. Pointing to the man in the hooded cloak he said, "That is he." They plucked off the cloak, and there stood the piper in his gay buskins with his reeds in his hands. The judge laughed heartily and pronounced it a rare joke. "We make no account of this, man," said he, "for to this thou wast born and bred, that thou shouldst shake our sides with laughter. Now sacrifice and end the farce." Philemon persistently refused, and the judge knew that no jest was meant. The piper broke his reeds, received baptism, and maintained a firm confession of Christ to the end.

9565. HOLY SPIRIT Quenched. A gentleman called his sons around his dying bed, and said, "When I was a youth, the Spirit strove with me, and seemed to say, 'Seek religion now;' but Satan suggested the necessity of waiting till I grew up, because it was incompatible with youthful amusement; so I resolved I would wait till I grew up to be a man. I did so, and was then reminded of my promise to seek religion; but Satan again advised me to wait till middle age, for business and a young family demanded all my attention. Yes, I said, I will do so—I will wait till middle age. I did so—my serious impressions left me for some years. They were again renewed; conscience reminded me of my promises; the Spirit said, 'Seek religion now;' but then I had less time than ever; Satan advised my waiting till I was old, then my children would be settled in business, and I should have nothing else to do; I could then give an undivided attention to it. I listened to his suggestion, and the Spirit ceased to strive with me. I have lived to be old, but now I have no desire as formerly to attend to the concerns of my soul; my heart is hardened. I have resisted and quenched the Spirit; now there is no hope; already I feel a hell within, the beginning of an eternal misery. I feel the gnawings of that worm that never dies. Take warning from my miserable end; seek religion now; let nothing tempt you to put off this important concern." Then in the greatest agonies he expired.

9566. HOLY SPIRIT, Resisting the. Take heed of resisting the Spirit when he makes his approach to thee in the Word. Sometimes he knocks, and, meeting a repulse, goes from the sinner's door. He that hath promised to come in if we open, hath not promised to come again if we unkindly send him away. Gurnall.

9567. HOLY SPIRIT, Silent Working of the. Can I see the dew of heaven as it falls on a summer evening? I cannot. It comes down softly and gently, noiselessly and imperceptibly. But when I go forth in the morning after a cloudless night, and see every leaf sparkling with moisture, and feel every blade of grass damp and wet, I say at once, "There has been a dew." Just so it is with the presence of the Spirit in the soul. Ryle.

9568. HOLY SPIRIT, Withdrawal of the. When God takes his Holy Spirit from the sinner, he is left to the hardness and obduracy of his own depraved nature; no godly grief can ever affect his heart, no tears of penitential sorrow furrow his cheek: he sins without any remorse; from conscience he receives no checks; judgments excite in him no alarm; the bounties of Divine Providence, scattered liberally around him, awaken no sensations of gratitude: with an understanding dark as hell can make it, he has a heart unfeeling as a stone, and hard as adamant: and whatever view we take of the Spirit of God, or whatever office he may be presented as sustaining, his final abandonment of us must be considered, in its results, too tremendously horrible to admit of any adequate description. Is he a comforter?—When he is withdrawn, we can have none to comfort our hearts; for to all others we may say, "Miserable comforters are ye all." Man can have no sources of consolation in himself: when God leaves him, misery becomes his inalienable inheritance. Is the Spirit of God a guide?—Without him we are left to "grope, as if we had no eyes," and to "stumble at noonday as in the night;" to wander heedlessly and blindly on, in the mazes of error and delusion, the remaining days of our vain life, which we spend as a shadow; or to be like mariners "with ship half-foundered and with compass lost," left to the mercy of the waves, in midnight darkness on a stormy sea. Is the Spirit of God a sanctifier? is his agency essential to our being made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light? If, therefore, God take his Holy Spirit from us, the things that belong unto our peace will be hid from our eyes, and we must remain eternally unprepared for the heavenly world. Anon.

9569. HOME, Advice for the. It is just as possible to keep a calm house as a clean house, a cheerful house, an orderly house, as a furnished house, if the heads set themselves to do so. Where is the difficulty of consulting each other's weakness, as well as each other's wants; each other's tempers, as well as each other's health; each other's comfort, as well as each other's character? Oh! it is by leaving the peace at home to chance, instead of pursuing it by system, that so many houses are unhappy. It deserves notice, also, that almost any one can be courteous and forbearing and patient in a neighbor's house. If anything go wrong, or be out of time, or disagreeable there, it is made the best of, not the worst; even efforts are made to excuse it, and to show that it is not felt; or, if felt, it is attributed to accident, not design; and this is not only easy, but natural, in the house of a friend. I will not, therefore, believe that what is so natural in the house of another is impossible at home; but maintain, without fear, that all the courtesies of social life may be upheld in domestic societies. A husband as willing to be pleased at home, and as anxious to please as in his neighbor's house; and a wife as intent on making things comfortable every day to her family as on set days to her guests, could not fail to make their own home happy. Let us not evade the point of these remarks by recurring to the maxim about allowances for temper. It is worse than folly to refer to our temper, unless we could prove that we gained anything good by giving way to it. Fits of ill-humor punish us quite as much, if not more than those they are vented upon; and it actually requires more effort, and inflicts more pain to give them up, than would be requisite to avoid them. Phillip.

9570. HOME, Almost. A poor widow had been long struggling with adversity. The husband of her youth had been torn from her embrace by the ruthless hand of death. Her children, one by one, had been consigned to the dark and gloomy grave, and she was left to plod in sorrow her weary journey alone. Eager to join her loved ones who were beckoning her from the skies, she exclaims, "Patience, my soul; it won't be long; I'm almost home!" A man of God who had "served his generation," and whose work was done, when bidding farewell to his weeping family and friends, exclaimed, "Before morning I shall be at home!" Epis. Methodist.

9571. HOME, Ambition of All. To be happy at home, is the ultimate result of all ambition; the end to which every enterprise and labor tends, and of which every desire prompts the prosecution. It is indeed at home that every man must be known by those who would make a just estimate either of his virtue or felicity; for smiles and embroidery are alike occasional, and the mind is often dressed for show in painted honor and fictitious benevolence.

9572. HOME, Education in the. The fireside is a seminary of infinite importance. Few can receive the honors of a college, but all are graduates of the home. The learning of the university may fade from the recollection, its classic lore may moulder in the halls of memory; but the simple lessons of home, enameled upon the heart of childhood, defy the rust of years, and outlive the more mature but less vivid pictures of after years. So deep, so lasting, indeed, are the impressions of early life, that you often see a man in the imbecility of age holding fresh in his recollection the events of childhood, while all the wide space between that and the present hour is a blasted and forgotten waste. You have perchance seen an old and half-obliterated portrait, and in the attempt to have it cleaned and restored, you may have seen it fade away, while a brighter and more perfect picture, painted beneath, is revealed to view. This portrait, first drawn upon the canvas, is no inapt illustration of youth; and though it may be concealed by some after-design, still the original traits will shine through the outward picture, giving it tone while fresh, and surviving it in decay.

Godrich

9573. HOME, Esteeming. It was the policy of the good old gentleman to make his children feel that home was the happiest place in the world; and I value this delicious home-feeling as one of the choicest gifts a parent can bestow.

W. Irving.

9574. HOME, A Godly. Are you not surprised to find how independent of money peace of conscience is, and how much happiness can be condensed in the humblest home? A cottage will not hold the bulky furniture and sumptuous accommodations of a mansion; but if God be there, a cottage will hold as much happiness as might stock a palace.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

9575. HOME, Gone. A dying soldier was asked for a last message for his father. He was silent a moment, a smile playing over his face, "Tell him I have gone home." "Have you any message for your wife?" "Tell her I have gone home." "Is there nothing more you want to say, no other message I can bear for you?" "No, that is enough. They will all understand it—I have gone home."

9576. HOME, Influence of. Those of you who are best acquainted with the world, or who have read most extensively the histories of men, will allow that, in the formation of character, the most telling influence is the early home. It is that home which often in boyhood has formed beforehand our most famous scholars, our most celebrated heroes, our most devoted missionaries; and even when men have grown up reckless and reprobate, and have broken all restraints, human and divine, the last anchor which has dragged, the last cable they have been able to snap, is the memory which moored them to a virtuous home.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

9577. HOME, Happy. Six of the seven wise men of Greece give their opinion of what constitutes a happy home as follows: Solon thought the house most happy where the estate was got without injustice, kept without distrust, and spent without repentance. Bias said, "That house is happy where the master does freely and voluntarily at home what the law compels him to do abroad." Thales held that house most happy where the master had most leisure and respite from business. Cleobulus said, "That in which the master is more beloved than feared." Pittacus said, "That is most happy where superfluities are not required and necessities are not wanting." Chilo added, "That house is most happy where the master rules as a monarch in his kingdom." And he proceeded, "When a certain Lacedæmonian desired Lycurgus to establish a democracy in the city, 'Go you, friend,' replied he, 'and make the experiment first in your own house.'"

9578. HOME, Trifles Affect. The road to home happiness lies over small stepping-stones. Slight circumstances are the stumbling-blocks of families. The prick of a pin, says the proverb, is enough to make an empire insipid. The tenderer the feelings, the painfuller the wound. A cold, unkind word checks and withers the blossom of the dearest love, as the most delicate rings of the vine are troubled by the faintest breeze. The misery of a life is born of a chance observation. If the true history of quarrels, public and private, were honestly written, it would be silenced with an uproar of derision.

E. Jesse.

9579. HOME, Unhappy. A late writer says, "I am one of those whose lot in life has been to go out into an unfriendly world at an early age; and of nearly twenty families in which I made my home in the course of about nine years, there were only three that could be designated as happy families. The source of trouble was not so much the lack of love, as the lack of care to manifest it."

9580. HONESTY, Christian. The captain of a troop of German cavalry called at the door of a cottage, in a lonely valley, and was met by a venerable Moravian. "Father," said the officer, "show me a field where I can set my troops a-foraging." "Presently," replied he. The old man conducted them out of the valley. After a quarter of an hour's march, they found a fine field of barley. "There is the very thing we want," said the captain. "Have patience for a few minutes," replied his guide, "you shall be satisfied." They went on, and at the distance of about a quarter of a league further, they at length reached another field of barley. The troop immediately dismounted, cut and secured the grain, and remounted. The officer, upon this, said to his conductor, "Father, you have given yourself and us unnecessary trouble: the first field was much better than this." "Very true, Sir," replied the man; "but it was not mine."

9581. HONESTY, Commercial. A linen merchant in Coleraine offered the famous Dr. Adam Clarke, when a youth, a situation in his warehouse, which was accepted by him with the consent of his parents. He knew well that his clerk was religious, but he was not sensible of the extent of principle which actuated him. Some differences arose at times about the way of conducting the business, which were settled pretty amicably. But the time of the great Dublin market approached, and the merchant was busy preparing for it. The master and man were together in the folding-room, when one of the pieces was found short of the required number of yards. "Come," says the merchant, "it is but a trifle. We shall soon stretch it, and make out the yard. Come, Adam, take one end, and pull against me." Adam had neither ears nor heart for the proposal, and absolutely refused to do what he thought a dishonest thing. A long argument and expostulation followed, in which the usages of the trade were strongly and variously enforced; but all in vain. Adam kept to his purpose, resolving to suffer rather than sin. He was therefore obliged to call for one of his men less scrupulous, and Adam retired quietly to his desk. Soon after he informed his "young friend," as he always seemed proud to call him, that it was very clear he was not fit for worldly business, and wished him to look out for some employment more congenial to his own mind; and with what result is well known.

9582. HONESTY, Death or. Put it out of the power of truth to give you an ill character; and if anybody reports you not to be an honest man, let your practice give him the lie; and to make all sure, you should resolve to live no longer than you can live honestly; for it is better to be nothing than a knave.

Antoninus.

9583. HONESTY, Estimating. There is no ascertaining the quality of a tree but by its fruits. When the wheels of a clock move within, the hands on the dial will move without. When the heart of a man is sound in conversion, then the life will be fair in profession. When the conduit is walled in, how shall we judge of the spring but by the waters which run through the pipes?

Secker.

9584. HONESTY, Fable of. A woodman was felling a tree on the bank of a river, and by chance let slip his axe into the water, when it immediately sunk to the bottom. Being thereupon in great distress, he sat down and lamented his loss bitterly. But Mercury, whose river it was, taking compassion on him, and hearing from him the cause of his sorrow, dived to the bottom of the river, and bringing up a golden axe, asked the woodman if that were his. Upon the man's denying it, Mercury dived a second time, and brought up one of silver. Again the man denied that it was his. So diving a third time, he produced the identical axe which he had lost. "That is mine!" said the woodman, delighted to have recovered his own; and so pleased was Mercury with the fellow's truth and honesty, that he at once made him a present of the other two. The man goes to his companions, and giving them an account of what had happened to him, one of them determined to try whether he might not have the like good fortune. So repairing to the same place, as if for the purpose of cutting wood, he let slip his axe on purpose into the river, and then sat down on the bank, and made a great show of weeping. Mercury appeared as before, and hearing from him that his tears were caused by the loss of his axe, dived once more into the stream; and bringing up a golden axe, asked him if that was the axe he had lost. "Aye, surely," said the man, eagerly; and he was about to grasp the treasure, when Mercury, to punish his impudence and lying, not only refused to give him that, but would not so much as restore him his own axe again.

Æsop.

9585. HONESTY, Faith and. There are those who have received the Scriptures, unto whom if thou trust a talent they will restore it unto thee; and there are also of them, those unto whom if thou trust a dinar, they will not restore it unto thee, unless thou stand over them continually with great urgency.

Koran.

9586. HONESTY, Language of. The Arabs, notorious for their robberies, do not say, when exhibiting their plunder, "I robbed a man of it," but, "I gained it." The thief has an honest tongue.

9587. HONESTY, Moral. They that cry down moral honesty cry down that which is a great part of religion—my duty towards God, and my duty towards man. What care I to see a man run after a sermon, if he cozen and cheat as soon as he comes home? On the other side, morality must not be without religion; for if so, it may change as I see convenient. Religion must govern it. He that has no religion to govern his morality is not better than my mastiff dog: so long as you stroke and please him, and do not pinch him, he will play with you as finely as may be: he is a very good moral mastiff; but if you hurt him he will fly in your face.

Selden.

9588. HONESTY, Principle of. As a man can never be truly honest unless he be religious, so, on the other hand, whatever show of religion a man may make, he cannot be truly religious in God's judgment unless he is honest in his conversation towards his neighbor.

Bishop Mant.

9589. HONESTY, Rare. A poor widow at Lisbon, went several times to the ante-chamber of the Court, and though frequently ordered to retire, she as constantly returned the next day, saying she must speak to the king. At length she saw him passing by, and presented a casket to him, saying, "Sire, behold what I have discovered among the rubbish of some of the ruined edifices by the great earthquake of 1755. I am a poor widow, and have six children. That casket would relieve me from my present distresses; but I prefer my honor with a good conscience, to all the treasures in the world. I deliver this to your Majesty, as the most proper person to restore it to its lawful possessor, and to recompense me for the discovery." The king immediately ordered the casket to be opened, and was struck with the beauty of the jewels which it contained; after which he commended the widow's honesty and assured her of his protection, and ordered twenty thousand piastres to be given to her. He caused search to be made to discover the real proprietor; and ordered if their researches should prove fruitless, that the jewels should be sold, and the proceeds appropriated to the use of the widow and her children.

9590. HONESTY, Record of. The obituary of Mr. Martin recently appeared, remarkable for its rarity in these days of demoralization, both in public and private life: "At Plainfield, N. J. Henry A. H. Martin, locally known as 'the man whom everybody trusted,' died on Friday. He was town collector for fifteen years, and his accounts never varied a cent. No nominations were ever made against him at an election."

9591. HONESTY, Religion and. A West India planter would not allow the missionaries to preach to his slaves. Visiting a neighboring plantation, he was astonished to find fruits exposed, yet untouched: "How is this?" said he; "you negroes are always ready to take everything you can lay your hands on." "No, massa," replied a slave, "negroes who pray never thieve." He saw his error. "What have I been about, not to let the missionaries come to my estate?" he exclaimed. He at once sent a request to the missionaries to come and teach his slaves whenever they pleased.

9592. HONESTY, Result of. Charlie received the lesson of honesty at an early age from his widowed mother. He won the approval of his employer, who gratified his mother when he told her that her son could be trusted anywhere. But a dark day came upon them. They were poor; his work would be done in one day more. He expressed his anxieties to his trusting mother, who said God had taken care of them when he was not large enough to help, and he would not forsake them now. The next day his employer handed him a bill, saying, "Take this ten dollar bill, pay Jones and Young, and bring the change." Without looking at the bill, he put it into his pocket. On his way he looked at it, and found he had one hundred instead of ten dollars. He met an associate and told him the case, and was told that he was a fool to think of returning the money. He went to the bank, had his bill changed, and rolled up ninety dollars for his employer. On the way to pay the bills he met him much excited, and was told he must have given one hundred dollars to some men that were in his office. Charlie said, "You gave it to me, and here is the change." His employer said, "You are an honest boy, and I must see that you have another situation." He kept his word, and Charlie was installed in the bank which had changed his hundred-dollar bill, with some fear at seeing so small a boy have so much money. He prospered, and has placed the secret of his success over his private desk, "Honesty is the best policy."

9593. HONESTY, Success of. The fortune of the Rothschilds is traced to the honesty of Moses Rothschild, of Frankfort. During the French Revolution, a prince of Hesse-Cassel, fleeing through Frankfort, left his treasures with a small Jew banker there, who refused to give him a receipt for them. Afterwards the French plundered the Jew, robbing him of all but the prince's treasures, which were buried in his garden. These he dug up, and used in trade, and when the times of peace returned, he restored the money and jewels to the prince, though he had lost his own. The prince in gratitude recommended the honest banker to various sovereigns. His business prospered, and his house has exercised a greater influence in the affairs of Europe than any king. Strict honesty has been their principle. People found that they could be trusted, and unprecedented success is the result.

9594. HONESTY, Tested. The Prince of Conti, at the siege of Phillipsburg, in 1734, threw a purse to a brave grenadier, excusing the smallness of the sum it contained, as being too poor a reward for such courage as his. Next morning the grenadier went to the Prince with two diamond rings, and other jewels of value. "Sir," said he, "the gold I found in your purse, I suppose you intended for me; but these I bring back to you, having no claim to them."

"You have doubly deserved them by your bravery, and by your honesty," said the Prince, "therefore they are yours."

9595. HONESTY, Triumph of. A schoolboy went to a situation, and on Saturday his master gave him a sovereign by mistake for a shilling. The boy had a hard battle about that sovereign. "The sovereign must go back to your master," says conscience; "it is not yours." "Your master gave it you," says temptation; "keep it, Willie; perhaps it was not a mistake, and if it was, it will never be found out." "Don't listen to temptation, Willie," says conscience; "you know it was a mistake, and that you have no right to the sovereign." "You are very poor," says temptation; "look at your clothes, Willie, how old they are, and this will buy new ones." "You are wrong, Willie, to listen to what temptation is saying; listen to what the Bible says, Willie: 'Resist the devil, and he will flee from you,'" says conscience. "I say, Willie, you will be a blockhead," says temptation, "if you don't keep the sovereign." "It will be a curse to you as long as you live," says conscience, "if you do; and then there is another world, Willie; take it back at once." "Nay, wait till to-morrow," says temptation, "it will be time enough." "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," says conscience; "do it at once, and you will have a quiet Sunday." Poor Willie! It was a sad fight, but conscience had something more to say yet. "What did the teacher at the Sunday-school talk about last Sunday, Willie? What was the text? 'Thou God seest me.'" "Oh," cried Willie, "Thou God seest me!" In a few minutes he reached his master's house. The mistake was made known and the money returned. The master said little. Willie won the confidence of his employer, was promoted, and rose rapidly to a place of trust and to a condition of prosperity.

9596. HONESTY, Unpopular. Bishop Ames tells a story of a slave master in the olden time who said to his chattel, "Pompey, I hear you are a great preacher." "Yes, massa, de Lord do help me powerful sometimes." "Well, Pompey, don't you think the negroes steal little things on the plantation?" "I 'se mighty 'fraid they does, massa." "Then, Pompey, I want you to preach a sermon to the negroes against stealing." After a brief reflection, Pompey replied, "You see, massa, dat wouldn't never do, 'cause 'twould trow such a co'ness over de meetin'."

9597. HONOR, Appeal to. James Harper left his father's house in boyhood, to learn the trade of printer in the city of New York. His parents were Methodists of the earnest sort. Family prayer, led by his mother, was the last service at parting. When seated in the wagon, his mother took him by the hand and said, "James, remember you have got good blood in you; don't disgrace it." He knew this counsel covered all of life, and related alike to business and religion. Industry, honesty and piety carried him safely through all temptations, and steadily to great success. He was the founder of the famous publishing house of Harper Brothers, and once mayor of New York. The old appeal to honor needs to be revived in these times.

9598. HONOR, Brief. All the officers of a company engaged on the Weldon Road had either been killed or wounded. The sergeant upon whom devolved the command was frightened, and the line began to waver. A corporal instantly snatched the colors, stepped to the front, and led the men to victory. A brigadier near by noticed the occurrence and sent for the corporal after the fight, to learn his name, much to the brave man's discomposure, for he was afraid he had somehow subjected himself to military discipline. The officer took him to the major-general commanding the corps, and related the circumstances, the poor corporal meanwhile wishing himself well out of the scrape. After a little private conference, the two generals came forward and pinned a captain's straps upon the corporal's shoulders, sending him back to command the company. Before night there was another charge upon the enemy's position; the newly-made captain, while gallantly leading his men, was shot through the heart. E. F. Williams.

9599. HONOR, Chasing. Honor, like the shadow, follows those that flee from it, but flies from those that pursue it. Anon.

9600. HONOR, Conferring. The Spartan king, Agesilaus the Great, was put in a dishonorable place at a heathen solemnity. He endured it, saying, "I'll show that it is not the places that grace men, but men the places." The Thasians, having received great benefits by him, made him a god, and erected temples to his honor. They sent ambassadors to announce the fact, and congratulate him. He asked them, "Can your country make men gods?" They assented, and he rejoined, "Go to, make yourselves all gods first, and then I will believe you can make me one."

9601. HONOR, Moderate. Anaxagoras, putting back the other honors that were given him, desired that on the day of his death the children might have leave to play and intermit their studies. The honor also which Pittacus received had something political; for being bid to take what portion he would of the land he had gotten for his citizens, he accepted as much as he could reach with the cast of his dart. So Cocles, the Roman, took as much as he himself, being lame, could plough in a day. For the honor should not be a recompense of the action, but an acknowledgment of gratitude, that it may continue also long, as those did which we have mentioned. But of the three hundred statues erected to Demetrius Phalereus, not one was eaten into rust or covered with filth, they being all pulled down whilst himself was yet alive, and those of Demades were melted into chamber-pots. Plutarch.

9602. HONOR, Pagan. The physician of Pyrrhus proposed to Fabricius to poison his master. The noble Roman general sent the traitor's letter to Pyrrhus, saying, "Prince, know better for the future how to choose both your friends and foes." To requite this act of generosity, Pyrrhus released all the Roman prisoners; but Fabricius would only receive them on condition that he would accept an equal number in exchange. Said he, "Do not believe, Pyrrhus, that I have discovered this treachery to you out of particular regard to your person, or for the hope of advantage; but because the Romans shun base stratagems, and will not triumph but with open force."

9603. HONOR, Rejected. Genuine faith influences us to deny ourselves, to renounce the world, to cherish holiness, to bear reproach, and to look beyond the present scene to the world of light and eternal glory. Such an effect will be produced, more or less, on all who possess this divine grace. The Marquis of Vico, in Italy, when he was come to years, and to the knowledge of Jesus Christ, refused to be called the son and heir to a Marquis, a cup-bearer to an Emperor, and nephew to a Pope, and chose rather to suffer affliction, persecution, banishment, loss of lands, living, wife, children, honors, and preferments, than to enjoy the sinful pleasures of Italy for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than all the honors of the most brilliant connections, and all the enjoyments of the most ample fortune; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward. Biblical Treasury.

9604. HONOR, Renunciation of. The Emperor Charles V., of Spain, became satiated with the emptiness of earthly grandeur, and tired of the burden of government, and disgusted with the fashions and dissipation of court life. He abdicated the throne by a legal document, which he signed at Zuytburg, Sept. 7, 1556, renouncing all his earthly offices, honors, and wealth. He retired to a monastery in Placentia, and endeavored, by devotional reading, meditation, and prayer, to prepare for death. He busied himself sometimes by working in his garden or making clocks. He had his funeral celebrated before his death, at which he assisted, that he might be the better prepared for its coming.

9605. HONOR, Resigned. Doris governed the commonwealth of Athens for thirty-six years with honor. Becoming wearied of public life, he sought a home on a farm in a village not far from Athens, where he spent his time in reading books of husbandry by night, and utilizing his new-found knowledge by day. Thus he spent fifteen years of his life. Over his door these words were engraved: "Fortune and hope, adieu to you both, seeing I have found the entrance to rest and contentment."

9606. HONOR, Roman. Fabius had agreed with Hannibal for the exchange of captives; and he that had the most in number, should receive money for the overplus. Fabius acquainted the Senate of this agreement, and that Hannibal, having two hundred and forty more captives, requested the money might be sent to ransom them. This the Senate refused, and said, "It was not for the honor of the republic to free those men whose cowardice had made them the prey of their enemies." Fabius took this rebuff patiently, and finding he had not the money, and not wishing to deceive Hannibal, he sent his son to Rome, commanding him to sell his lands, and return with the money to the camp. This was speedily accomplished. He sent the ransom money to Hannibal, and the prisoners were liberated.

9607. HONOR, Seat of. The hall in which a wealthy Chinese receives his guest, is open in front and has a screen in the back. Before this screen a square table is usually placed, which may either serve as an altar for the reception of offerings of meat and incense, or as a board for the entertainment of the host and his friends. A row of chairs runs from the bottom to the top of the room, corresponding with the ends of this table. A quadrangle is thus formed, at the top of which stands the table, on each side a line of seats with perpendicular backs, and at the bottom, which is left unoccupied, the party enters. The visitor bows as he advances within the ranges, and is forthwith invited to sit down, which he does, after some hesitation, by taking the lowest room, or the seat at the bottom of the line. He is scarcely seated before he is told, with a peremptory tone, a little softened by the melodious accent of kindness to "come up higher." As soon as he has consented to this new arrangement, the host sits down on the seat immediately below the stranger, and thus awards to him the higher or more honorable place.

S. S. Visitor.

9608. HONOR, Source of. Virtue and honor are such inseparable companions that the heathens would admit no man into the temple of Honor who did not pass into it through the temple of Virtue. Princes, indeed, may confer honors, or rather titles and names of honor; but they are a man's or a woman's own actions which must make him or her truly honorable. And every man's life is the herald's office from which he must derive that which must blazon him to the world; honor being but the reflection of a man's own actions, shining bright in the face of all about him, and from thence rebounding on himself. It teaches a man not to avenge a contumelious or a reproachful word, but to be above it, and therefore it was greatly spoken by Caius Marcus. He said he valued not what men could say of him, for if they spoke true they must needs speak honorably of him; if otherwise, his life and his manners should be their confutation.

South.

9609. HONOR, Worldly. How loosely do honors sit on men, when every disease shakes them off and lays them in the dust. How miserable is the condition of the glory of this world, which hardly holds out a life, but often dies before us, ravished away by a frown or forfeited by a fault. Or, if it do last as long as its owner, with the staff of office cracked and thrown into the grave, is there buried with the corpse.

King.

9610. HONOR, Youthful. More worship the rising than the setting sun.

Pompey.

9611. HONORING THE LORD. 1 Sam. 2: 30—

The great principle, "Them that honor me I will honor." It was a singular coincidence, that when the Rev. O. Simeon's funeral sermons were preached, two of the preachers, without any previous consultation, fixed upon this text— "What a testimony to a holy life!" At the end of the Franco-Prussian war in 1871, the Emperor of Prussia had a medal struck off of two different kinds, for combatants and non-combatants, both bearing the device—"God was with us, to him be the honor." God's honor is the first thing to be thought of.

Bowes.

9612. HOPE, Basis of Christian. When he lay on an expected deathbed (though God spared him some years longer to the world and Church), his attendants asked John Wesley what were his hopes for eternity. And something like this was his reply: "For fifty years, amid scorn and hardship, I have been wandering up and down this world to preach Jesus Christ, and I have done what in me lay to serve my blessed Master." Now what he had done, how poor he lived, how hard he labored, with what holy fire his bosom burned, with what success he preached, how brilliantly he illustrated the character—"Dying, and behold we live; unknown, and yet well-known; poor, yet making many rich; having nothing, yet possessing all things"—these things his life and works attest. They are recorded in his church's history, and seen in the crown he wears in heaven, so bright with a blaze of jewels—the saved through his agency. Yet thus he spake, "My hope for eternity? My only hopes rest on Christ.

"I the chief of sinners am,
But Jesus died for me."

Guthrie.

9613. HOPE, Biblical. An anchor, Heb. 6: 19. A harbor, or "place of repair," Joel 3: 16, marg. A helmet, 1 Thess. 5: 8. A door, Hosea 2: 14, 15, like "the valley of Achor" (the scene of Israel's trouble, Joshua 7: 26, marg., and one of the first earnestness of their future acquisitions in Canaan), for a "door of hope." Deep humblings of heart are often "the door of hope" to joy and victory. The hope of a tree cut down, Job 14: 7. The hope in the ploughman's expectation, 1 Cor. 9: 10; James 5: 7. The hope in a parent's chastening of a wayward child, Prov. 19: 18. Rom. 8: 19.—"The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth;" properly, looking out with outstretched neck, as if in intense and eager expectation of some much longed-for object. 1 Cor. 13: 13.—Rendered by Macbride, Faith—Expectation—Love. The encouragement of hope, Ezra 10: 2. The patience of hope, 1 Thess. 1: 3; Rom. 8: 24; 15: 4; 5: 4; Lam. 3: 26. The joy of hope, Ps. 12: 12; Prov. 10: 28; Rom. 5: 2; Heb. 3: 6. The strength of hope, Ps. 31: 24; Joel 3: 15—(hope and strength.) The persistency of hope, Ps. 71: 14; Rom. 4: 18–20. The service of hope Acts 26: 6, 7. The reward of hope, Prov. 10: 28; 13: 12. THE PSALMS OF DAVID—It is worthy of note, that in the Psalms of David, written in his deepest trouble, from the persecution of Saul, the rebellion of Absalom, etc., we always find some ray of hope. Hope to the end, 1 Pet. 1: 13. Weiss calls Peter the apostle of hope. In five chapters he has ten allusions to the future. Bowes.

9614. HOPE, Brevities. Hope is like the cork in the net, which keeps the soul from sinking in despair; and fear is like the lead to the net, which keeps it from floating in presumption. —Watson.—Hope is the element by which the afflicted live, the anchor of the soul in a storm, the bladder which keeps up a man from sinking when in deep waters, and upholds a man in life when death knocks at the door.

William Greenhill.

9615. HOPE, Cheering. The traveler, when taken in a storm, can stand patiently under a tree while it rains, because he hopes it is but a shower, and sees it clear up in one part of the heavens while it is dark in another. Providence is never so dark and cloudy, but hope can see fair weather coming. Anon.

9616. HOPE, Death Bed of. Richard Bacon, Jr., a young American poet of much promise, died in 1841, at the early age of twenty-four. He constructed the plan of a great poem to be entitled, "The Death Bed of Hope." In his sickness, and in great agony and despair, he exclaimed, "Strangel was it not strange that I should have thought of that subject? Now I see it all: I am without hope."

9617. HOPE, Drafts of. Hope is a prodigal young heir, and experience is his banker; but his drafts are seldom honored, since there is often a heavy balance against him, because he draws largely on a small capital, is not yet in possession, and if he were, would die. Colton.

9618. HOPE, Extent of. Hope is the tenant, not of a heart that was never broken, but of a heart that has been broken and healed again. A pure, bright star fixed high in heaven, it reaches with its rays the uplifted eye of the weary pilgrim; but stars shine not in the day; the darkness brings them out. So grief summons hope to the aid of the sufferer. When the ransomed rise from the sleep of the grave, and open their eyes on the dawning of an everlasting day, this gentle star, which had often soothed them in the night of their pilgrimage, will nowhere be found in all the upper firmament; for, in presence of the Sun of righteousness, hope, no longer needed, no more appears. Arnot.

9619. HOPE, Faith and. Hope is not paid down in ready money (as we say, what we hope for), but we have a good bond by assurance. Hope has still something in hand, because that which faith lays hold of is actually its own. Hope is faith's rent-gatherer, and takes up that which faith claims upon the bargain which Christ has made for us. An earnest penny is more than nothing; and the ground of our work is the earnest which God gives us of our inheritance. Just as the blossoms of spring do not only promise, but are God's earnest to represent the fruits which will wax ripe in autumn. Salter.

9620. HOPE, False. Let thy hope of heaven moderate thy affections to earth. "Be sober and hope," saith the apostle (1 Peter 1: 13). You that look for so much in another world may very well be content with a little in this. Nothing more unbecomes a heavenly hope than an earthly heart. You would think it an unseemly thing to see some rich man, that hath a vast estate, among the poor gleaners in harvest-time, as busy to pick up the ears of corn that are left in the field as the most miserable beggar in the company. Oh, how all the world would cry shame of such a sordid-spirited man! Well, Christian, be not angry if I tell thee that thou dost a more shameful thing thyself by far, if thou that pretendest to hope for heaven beest as eager in the pursuit of this world's trash as the poor carnal wretch is who expects no portion but what God hath left him to pick up in the field of this world. Certainly thy hope is either false, or at best but very little. Gurnall.

9621. HOPE, Heathen. Aristippus, a Socratic philosopher, was wrecked upon the island of Rhodes, and lost his all. Walking along the shore, he saw geometrical figures traced upon the sand. Returning to his company he desired them to hope for the best, "for," said he, "even here I perceive the footsteps of men."

9622. HOPE, Living. The same Scripture that speaks of a living (lively) hope, reveals incidentally how we may reach it: "Begotten again into a living hope" (1 Pet. 1: 3). How has that strong nether ring got into the equally strong upper ring, so that they form one chain and safely bear their burden? In the fires. It was brought to a white heat ere it could be welded in. It is by a similar process that a soul's hope is admitted into living faith, and so becomes living too. A cold heart in contact with the dead letter of the truth will not suffice, although the two are fitted to each other with all the exactitude of a confession. There must be a melting heart. It is when the heart flows down like water under the glow of redeeming love, that hope is fixed on faith, and faith is fixed on Jesus, never to part again. Arnot.

9623. HOPE, Loss of. The setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun. The brightness of our life is gone, shadows of the evening fall around us, and the world seems but a dim reflection itself—a broader shadow. We look forward into the coming lonely night: the soul withdraws itself. Then stars arise, and the night is holy. Longfellow.

9624. HOPE, Power of. Hope keeps our hearts from bursting under the pressure of evils; and that flattering mirror gives us a prospect of greater good. Hence some call it the manna from heaven, that comforts us in all extremities. Others call it the pleasant and honest flatterer, that caresses the unhappy with expectation of happiness in the bosom of futurity. When all other things fail us, hope stands by us to the last. Hope gives freedom to the captive when chained to the oar; health to the sick, while death grins in his face; victory to the defeated; and wealth to the beggar, while he is craving an alms. Wanley.

9625. HOPE, Promises of. Hope is necessary in every condition. The miseries of poverty, of sickness, of captivity, would, without this comfort, be insupportable; nor does it appear that the happiest lot of terrestrial existence can set us above the want of this general blessing; or that life, when the gifts of nature and of fortune are accumulated upon it, would not still be wretched, were it not elevated and delighted by the expectation of some new possession, of some enjoyment yet behind, by which the wish shall be at last satisfied, and the heart filled up to its utmost extent. Hope is, indeed, very fallacious, and promises what it seldom gives; but its promises are more valuable than the gifts of fortune, and it seldom frustrates us without assuring us of recompensing the delay by a greater bounty.

Dr. S. Johnson.

9626. HOPE, Proper Use of. Used with due abstinence, hope acts as a healthful tonic; intemperately indulged, as an enervating opiate. The visions of future triumph, which at first animate exertion, if dwelt upon too intently, will usurp the place of the stern reality; and noble objects will be contemplated, not for their own inherent worth, but on account of the day-dreams they engender. Thus hope, aided by imagination, makes one man a hero, another a somnambulist, and a third a lunatic; while it renders them all enthusiasts.

Sir J. Stephens.

9627. HOPE, Reservation of. When Alexander started on his expedition to Persia, he divided his patrimony among his Macedonian friends. To one he gave a field, to another a village, to a third a town, and to the fourth a port; and in this manner he disposed of all his revenues. Perdicas said, "What have you reserved for yourself, O, king?" "My hopes," he replied. Then said Perdicas, "Of those hopes, then, we who are your followers, will also be partakers." His followers then resigned what had previously been given to them, from the same consideration. So the Christian resigns all but his hope in Christ.

9628. HOPE, Spring of. The spring returns with the blossoms and flowers, its green foliage and blue sky. The voices of the singing birds are heard once more, and earth adorned as a bride looks forth rejoicing. The storms of winter have passed away, its coldness and desolation are felt no more. So the believer emerges out of all that was dark, and dreary, and chilling, with fears and apprehensions as to an eternal state of things, and a new world of light and gladness springs up to cheer and animate him. Hope in Christ is to the little world of the inner man what spring is to the external world of nature—an animating principle in perpetual operation, to soften the present if it be gloomy, and to gild the prospect before us with bright expectations of good things to come.

Salter.

9629. HOPE, Support of. If we would be in a fit posture for suffering, we must get a lively hope of eternal life. As our life is a sea, hope is compared to an anchor, which makes us stand steady in a storm; as our life is a warfare, hope is compared to an helmet, which covers the soul in times of danger; as the body liveth spirando, by breathing, so the soul liveth spirando, by hoping. A man cannot drown so long as his head is above water; hope lifts up the head, and looks up to the redemption and salvation which is to come in another world, in its fullness and perfection. Hope doth three things: it assures good things to come; it disposes us for them; it waits for them unto the end; each of which will be of singular use to fit us for pious sufferings.

Polhill.

9630. HOPE, Survival of. A cruel tyrant cast one of his subjects into a cage, and there kept him as a wild beast. His hands were cut off, his nostrils slit, and his face sadly disfigured by wounds and bruises. He was advised in this his extremity to refrain from food, and thus shorten his sufferings. But he rejected their counsel with indignation, saying, "While a man is alive, all things are to be hoped for by him."

9631. HORSE, Prayer for a. On Wednesday morning, after spending the preceding night at Mr. Cunningham's, Mr. Rowland Hill and Mr. Haldane were about to proceed southward, when Mr. Hill's carriage being brought to the door, his horse was found to be dead lame. A farrier was sent for, who after a careful examination reported that the seat of the mischief was in the shoulder, that the disease was incurable, and that they might shoot the poor animal as soon as they pleased. To this proposal Mr. Hill was by no means prepared to accede. Indeed it seemed to Mr. Haldane as precipitate as the conduct of an Irish sailor on board the Monarch, who, on seeing another knocked down senseless by a splinter, and supposing his companion to be dead, went up to Captain Duncan on the quarter-deck, in the midst of the action with Languard off St. Vincent, and exclaimed, "Shall we jerk him overboard, sir?" On that occasion the sailor revived in a short time, and was even able to work at his gun. In the present instance the horse too recovered, and was able to carry his master on many a future errand of mercy. Meanwhile, however, the travelers availed themselves of Mr. Cunningham's hospitality, and remained for two days more at his place near Dunbar. In the evening Mr. Hill conducted family worship; and after supplications for the family, domestics and friends, added a fervent prayer for the restoration of the valuable animal which had carried him so many thousand miles, preaching the everlasting gospel to his fellow-sinners. Mr. Cunningham, who was remarkable for the staid and orderly, if not stiff, demeanor which characterized the Anti-burghers, was not only surprised but grieved, and even scandalized, at what he deemed so great an impropriety. He remonstrated with his guest. But Mr. Hill stoutly defended his conduct by an appeal to Scripture, and the superintending watchfulness of him without whom a sparrow falls not to the ground. He persisted in his prayer. During the two days he continued at Dunbar, and although he left the horse in a hopeless state, to follow in charge of his servant by easy stages, he continued his prayer night and morning, till one day at an inn in Yorkshire, while the two travelers were sitting at breakfast, they heard a horse and chaise trot quickly into the yard, and in looking out saw that Mr. Hill's servant had arrived, bringing the horse perfectly restored. Mr. Hill did not fail to return thanks, and begged his fellow-traveler to consider whether the minuteness of his prayers had deserved the censure which had been directed against them. Lives of the Haldanes.

9632. HOSPITALITY, Biblical. Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, Heb. 13: 2. It is observed by Gouge—"I find not this composition in any Greek author before the apostles' time; as it is probable they were the first authors thereof. St. Paul uses it four times. It is also used 1 Pet. 4: 9. Rom. 12: 13—"Given to hospitality." Literally, pursuing it—a strong word, intimating that we should not only embrace the opportunity, but even seek it—regard it as a privilege and an honor. The Christians in St. Paul's times were for the most part poor (see Heb. 10: 38); yet the duty is pressed upon such no less than on the rich. Hospitality in the poor is often a test of godly character, 1 Kings 17: 12. An abundant recompense generally follows hospitality. Of this we have many examples: Abraham received the strangers who came to him, and "thereby entertained angels unawares;" nay more, he received the Lord of angels, Gen. 18; Heb. 13: 2. Lot was delivered from Sodom by the angels he received. Laban's hospitality was rewarded by his finding a faithful servant for himself, and a good husband for his daughter, and the Lord's blessing on his house; see Gen. 30: 27. Rahab received the spies, and afforded them protection. How abundantly she was repaid in the preservation of herself and of her kindred, Joshua 6: 22, 23-25. The widow of Zarephath had indeed her faith and compassion put to a severe test in a time of famine. But she was more than repaid in the provision for herself and son, and the restoration of her dead son to life, 1 Kings 17: 8-24. The Shunammite was rewarded in a similar manner for kindness to Elisha the man of God, 2 Kings 4: 8-37. Martha and Mary, in giving the Master a welcome in their home at Bethany. How they were honored in his teaching, and in the stupendous miracle of raising their brother from the grave, Luke 10: 38-42; John 11. Zacchæus received the Lord joyfully, and salvation came to his house, Luke 19: 1-10. Lydia—Justus—Gaius, gave the apostles and the brethren shelter in those days of peril and persecution. "The household of Stephanas" is especially favored with honorable mention, 1 Cor. 16: 15; Acts 16: 15, 40; 18: 7; Rom. 16: 23; 3 John 5, 6. Publius and the people of Melita courteously entertained St. Paul, and Publius's father was miraculously healed of a dangerous illness, and after him many others also, Acts 28: 1-10. The Lord Jesus himself honored hospitality in his first miracle at Cana; and, though he had no earthly home, he provided "a table in the wilderness" for those who followed him, and wrought two striking miracles to feed the hungry.

Bowes.

9633. HOSPITALITY, Heathen. Mungo Park, when suffering under the pangs of hunger, rode up to the Dooty's house, in a Foulah village, but was denied admittance; nor could he even obtain a handful of corn either for himself or his horse. "Turning," says he, "from this inhospitable door, I rode slowly out of the town; and perceiving some low Scotland huts without the walls, I directed my steps towards them, knowing that in Africa, as well as in Europe, hospitality does not always prefer the highest dwellings. At the door of one of these huts, an old motherly-looking woman sat spinning cotton. I made signs to her that I was hungry, and inquired if she had any victuals with her in her hut. She immediately laid down her distaff, and desired me, in Arabic, to come in. When I had seated myself on the floor, she set before me a dish of kouskous that had been left the preceding night, of which I made a tolerable meal; and, in return for this kindness, I gave her one of my pocket handkerchiefs, begging, at the same time, a little corn for my horse, which she readily brought me. Overcome with joy at so unexpected a deliverance, I lifted up my eyes to heaven; and, whilst my heart swelled with gratitude, I returned thanks to that gracious and bountiful Being, whose power had supported me under so many dangers, and had now spread for me a table in the wilderness."

9634. HOSPITALITY, Mohammedan. I was beginning to make my meal upon the food we had with us, when in came nine people, each bearing a dish. A large tray was raised on the rim of a corn sieve placed on the ground, in the centre of which was placed a tureen of soup, with pieces of bread around it. The stranger, my servant, and a person who seemed to be the head man of the village, sat around the tray dipping their wooden spoons or fingers into each dish as it was placed in succession before them. Of the nine dishes I observed three were soups. I asked why this was, and who was to pay for the repast? and was informed it was the custom of the people, strictly enjoined by their religion, that as soon as a stranger appears, each peasant should bring his dish, he himself remaining to partake of it after the stranger—a sort of picnic, of which the stranger partakes without contributing. The hospitality extends to everything he requires: his horse is fed, and wood is brought for his fire, each inhabitant feeling honored by offering something. This custom accounts for the frequent occurring of the same dish, as no one knows what his neighbor will contribute. Towards a Turkish guest this practice is perfectly disinterested, but from a European they may possibly be led to expect a return, although to offer payment would be an insult. The whole of the contributors afterwards sat down and ate in another part of the room. Fellows.

9635. HOSPITALITY, Oriental. On two occasions we arrived at a camp late at night, and, halting before a tent, found the owner, with his wife and children, having arranged their carpets, etc., for the night, had just retired to rest; when it was astonishing to see the good humor with which they all arose again, and kindled a fire, the wife commencing to knead the dough, and prepare our supper, our Arabs making no apology, but taking all as a matter of course, though the nights were bitterly cold."

Irby and Mangles.

9636. HOSPITALITY, Outraged. Gedaliah, a man of great benevolence and integrity, was made governor of Judea by the Babylonian general, after his conquest of the Jews. He invited those who had fled to return and cultivate their lands, and promised them protection. Among those who came to him was one Ishmael, to whom he showed great hospitality. It was reported to Gedaliah that this man sought to kill him, but he could not be induced to believe that a guest of his, to whom he had shown such favor, could be guilty of such base treachery. His informer proposed to slay the suspected guest, but Gedaliah said it was better for himself to be slain than to destroy a man who had fled to him for refuge, and intrusted his safety to him. Soon after Gedaliah entertained Ishmael and his company at a splendid feast, and then the ingrate violated the sanctity of hospitality by slaying his magnanimous host.

9637. HOSPITALITY, Selfish. A poor wandering woman, who had crossed the Border and traveled north into Scotland until she was belated and benighted, knocked at the door of a house where a light came streaming out of the window, and cast herself on the charity of its tenants, asking a morsel of bread and a night's lodging. This was her touching and simple appeal: "Is there no good Christian here who will have pity on me and take me in?" "Na, na," was the answer of a rough voice, as the door, which had been opened at her knocking, was rudely shut in her face, "there are nae Christians here; we are a' Johnstones and Jardines!"

Guthrie.

9638. HOSPITALITY, Token of. The tessera hospitalis, the tally or token of hospitality, was employed by the ancients. At a time when houses of public entertainment were less common, private hospitality was the more necessary. When one person was received kindly by another, or a contract of friendship was entered into, the tessera was given. It was so named from its shape, being four-sided: it was sometimes of wood, sometimes of stone; it was divided in two by the contracting parties; each wrote his own name on half of the tessera; then they exchanged pieces, and therefore the name or device on the piece of the tessera which each received was the same the other person had written upon it, and which no one else knew but him who received it. It was carefully prized, and entitled the bearer to protection and hospitality. Plantus, in one of his plays, refers to this custom. Hanno inquires of a stranger where he may find Agorastocles, and discovers to his surprise that he is addressing the object of his search. "If so," he says "compare, if you please, this hospitable tessera; here it is; I have it with me." Agorastocles replies, "It is the exact counterpart; I have the other part at home." Hanno responds, "O my friend, I rejoice to meet thee; thy father was my friend, my guest; I divided with him this hospitable tessera." "Therefore," said Agorastocles, "thou shalt have a home with me, for I reverence hospitality." Beautiful illustration of gospel truth! The Saviour visits the sinner's heart, and being received as a guest, bestows the white stone, the token of his unchanging love. He enrols our name as among his friends. He makes an everlasting covenant with us, ordered in all things and sure. He promises never to leave nor forsake us. He tells us, "we shall never perish." He gives us the tessera, the white stone!

N. Hall.

9639. HOSPITALITY, Treasures in. The founder of a hospital for lepers and cripples near Alexandria, showing his visitors through the upper wards, occupied by women, used to say, "Behold my jacinths." Descending to the lower floors, occupied by men, "See my emeralds."

9640. HOURS, Flight of the. Hours have wings, and fly up to the Author of Time, and carry news of our usage: all our prayers cannot entreat one of them to return or slacken his pace.

Zimmerman.

9641. HOURS, Lost. Lost, yesterday, somewhere between sunrise and sunset, two golden hours, each set with sixty diamond minutes. No reward is offered, for they have gone forever!

H. Mann.

9642. HOUSEHOLD, Chinese God of the. Among the Chinese a very curious custom is observed on their New-Year's eve. They have a sort of mystical divinity among them called the Kitchen God, who has no temple or image, but is worshiped under the representation of an engraving, generally about a foot square, which is conspicuously pasted on the kitchen-range. This god is the household divinity of the Chinese. He is supposed to go once a year on a mission to the chief god to report to him the doings of the family during the past twelve months. A ceremonious feast is held in his honor on the night of his supposed departure, with the view of propitiating him to make a satisfactory report of the family. After the feast is ended, the picture is carefully removed and burned in the fire with great ceremony. On New-Year's day, a new picture is put up, and the kitchen god is invoked to resume his household supervision.

Anon.

9643. HOUSEHOLD, Quarrels in a. The best have their domestic contentions; some household words will now and then pass betwixt them. We match not with angels, but men and women. Two flints may as soon smite together and not fire come forth, as two persons meet in marriage and not offences fall out. Publius Rubius Celer was held a happy man among the Romans, who commanded it to be engraven upon his grave-stone that he had lived three-and-forty years and eight months with C. Ennia, his wife, sine querela—without the least quarrel. Alphonsus, king of Aragon, was wont to say that, to procure a quiet life, the husband must be deaf and the wife blind. But they say better that advise to a mutual forbearance, that no offence be given on either side; or, if given, yet not taken. The second blow makes the fray, we say. But be not both incensed together. Let two fires meet, and it will be hard quenching them. A choleric couple being asked how they agreed so well, the husband made this answer: "When my wife's fit is on, I bear with her, as Abram did with Sarah; and when my fit is on me, she bears with me; and so we never chide together, but asunder." Trapp.

9644. HOUSE OF GOD, Everywhere. You have all got into the habit of calling the church the "house of God." I have seen over the doors of many churches, the legend actually carved, "This is the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." Now, note where that legend comes from, and of what place it was first spoken. A boy leaves his father's house to go on a long journey on foot, to visit his uncle; he has to cross a wild hilly desert; just as if one of your own boys had to cross the wilds of Westmoreland, to visit an uncle at Carlisle. The second or third day your boy finds himself somewhere between Hawes and Brough, in the midst of the moors, at sunset. It is stony ground, and boggy; he cannot go one foot farther that night. Down he lies to sleep on Wharnside where best he may, gathering a few of the stones together to put under his head; so wild the place is, he cannot get anything but stones. And there, under the broad night, he has a dream; and he sees a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reaches to heaven, and the angels of God are ascending and descending upon it. And when he wakes out of his sleep, he says, "How dreadful is this place; surely, this is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." This place, observe: not this church; not this city; not this stone even, which he puts up for a memorial—the piece of flint on which his head has lain: but this place; this windy slope of Wharnside; this moorland hollow, torrent-bitten, snow-blighted; this any place where God lets down the ladder. And how are you to know where that will be? or how are you to determine where it may be, but by being ready for it always? Do you know where the lightning is to fall next? You do know that, partly; you can guide the lightning: but you cannot guide the going forth of the Spirit, which is as the lightning when it shines from the east to the west. We call our churches temples. Now, you know, or ought to know, they are not temples. They have never had, never can have, anything whatever to do with temples. They are "synagogues," "gathering-places," where you gather yourselves together as an assembly; and by not calling them so, you again miss the force of another mighty text—"Thou, when thou prayest, shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the churches (we should translate it), that they may be seen of men—but thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father," "which is," not in chancel nor in aisle, but "in secret." Now you feel, as I say this to you—I know you feel—as if I were trying to take away the honor of your churches. Not so; I am trying to prove to you the honor of your houses and your hills; I am trying to show you, not that the church is not sacred, but that the whole earth is. I would have you feel what careless, what constant, what infectious sin there is in all modes of thought, whereby, in calling your churches only "holy," you call your hearths and homes profane; and have separated yourselves from the heathen, by casting all your household gods to the ground, instead of recognizing, in the places of their many and feeble lares, the presence of your One and Mighty Lord. Ruskin.

9645. HOUSES, Preferable. Houses are built to live in, and not to look on; therefore let use be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had. Leave the goodly fabrics of houses for beauty only to the enchanted palaces of the poets, who build them with small cost. Lord Bacon.

9646. HUMANITY, Advantage of. It is related that when Agrippa was in a private station, he was accused by one of his servants of having spoken injuriously of Tiberius, and was condemned by the Emperor to be exposed in chains before the palace gate. The weather was very hot, and Agrippa became exceedingly thirsty. Seeing Thaumastus, a servant of Caligula, pass by with a pitcher of water, he called to him, and entreated leave to drink. The servant presented the pitcher with much courtesy, and Agrippa having allayed his thirst, said to him, "Assure thyself, Thaumastus, that if I get out of this captivity, I will one day pay thee well for this draught of water." Tiberius dying, his successor, Caligula, soon after not only set Agrippa at liberty, but made him King of Judaea. In this high situation Agrippa was not unmindful of the glass of water given to him when a captive. He immediately sent for Thaumastus, and made him comptroller of his household.

9647. HUMANITY, Lesson of. The night after the battle of Bassano, the moon rose cloudless and brilliant over the sanguinary scene. Napoleon, who seldom exhibited even exhilaration of spirits in the hour of victory, rode, accompanied by his staff, over the plain covered with the bodies of the dying and the dead, and, silent and thoughtful, seemed lost in painful reverie. It was midnight; the confusion and the uproar of the battle had passed away, and the deep silence of the calm starlight night was only disturbed by the moans of the wounded and dying. Suddenly a dog sprang from beneath the cloak of his dead master, and rushed to Napoleon as if frantically imploring his aid, and then rushed back again to the mangled corpse, licking the blood from its face and hands, and howling most piteously. Napoleon was deeply moved by the affecting scene, and turned to his officers, with his hand pointed towards the faithful dog, and said with evident emotion—"There, gentlemen, that dog teaches us a lesson of humanity." Denton.

9648. HUMANITY, Memory of. Pericles, the noble Athenian, lay dying. His friends thought that he was so far gone as not to understand them. They recounted his virtues, his riches, his eloquence, and his numerous victories. But he heard all that passed, and said, "I wonder that you celebrate those deeds of mine, in which fortune has challenged a part, and which are common to other leaders, and yet pass over in silence that which is the greatest and most excellent of them all—that none of my fellow citizens have ever put on mourning through my means." His clemency to his most bitter enemies was remarkable, none ever suffering from his hand, though he remained in power for years.

9649. HUMANITY, Model of. Sir Philip Sidney was Governor of Flushing, and General of the Horse, under his uncle, the Earl of Leicester. His valor, which was esteemed great, and not exceeded by any of his age, was at least equalled by his humanity. After he had received his death-wound at the battle of Zutphen, and was overcome with thirst from excessive bleeding, he called for drink, which was soon brought him. At the same time a poor soldier, dangerously wounded, was carried along, who fixed his eager eyes upon the bottle just as Sir Philip was lifting it to his mouth. Sir Philip immediately presented it to him, with the remark, "Thy necessity is greater than mine." Percy.

9650. HUMANITY, Official. The wife of a defaulting officer called upon Gen. Grant last December to implore the release of her husband from the Albany penitentiary. She told the President that crushing as the sorrow was to herself, she would try to bear it; but that every morning, without an exception, since her husband's incarceration, her four little children had come to her bedside with the tearful inquiry, "Will dear papa come home to-day?" "This plea of my children will, I know, ere long drive me into insanity. And now," said she, "my little ones have varied their agonizing questioning, with a pathos that is maddening, to 'Won't papa come home Christmas?'" "Madam, I will consult the Attorney-General and do whatever I can for your husband with his approval." "I know that will all be useless," said the grief-stricken wife. "His decision will only be adverse, and I may as well go home and tell my children at once their papa can't come home, and give up in despair." "Wait a moment," said the President, and sitting down, he hastily penned a note to

Attorney-General Williams, and nervously handing it to her said, "Go and tell your children that their papa shall come Christmas!" Almost fainting, the woman was carried from the Executive office, with the open note in her hand. On examining it, it was found to be a peremptory order for the immediate release of the husband and father. But this was not all. All over the page were great blots of the President's fast-falling tears as he wrote. On the night before Christmas there was a house in Washington as joyous as it had been desolate, and other eyes dropped great tears as the recital was made of President Grant's tenderness and mercy in restoring their long-absent papa to the children of Paymaster Hodges. Norwalk Gazette.

9651. HUMANITY, Reward of. A poor man had been fishing all day to supply the wants of his large and needy family. Being unsuccessful, he was disheartened, and was about to give it up, when he threw out his line and drew in a human skull. His first impulse was to throw it back into the water. He decided, however, to bury it, thinking, as he did so, that it might be a portion of the body of some poor man, whose children were longing for food as his were. On digging the grave for it, he found a rich treasure hidden away. With such a prize, he returned to his home rejoicing. Thus the love we show to our brethren is often rewarded with a Heavenly Father's beneficence.

9653. HUMAN NATURE, Characteristics of. Human nature is not so much depraved as to hinder us from respecting goodness in others, though we ourselves want it. This is the reason why we are so much charmed with the pretty prattle of children, and even the expressions of pleasure or uneasiness in some part of the brute creation. They are without artifice or malice; and we love truth too well to resist the charms of sincerity. Steele.

9654. HUMAN NATURE, Divineness of. With our sciences and our cyclopædias, we are apt to forget the divineness in those laboratories of ours. We ought not to forget it! That once well forgotten, I know not what else were worth remembering! Most sciences, I think, were then a very dead thing—withered, contentious, empty—a thistle in late autumn. The best science, without this, is but as the dead timber; it is not the growing tree and forest—which gives ever-new timber among other things! Man cannot know either, unless he can worship in some way. His knowledge is a pedantry and dead thistle, otherwise. Carlyle.

9655. HUMAN NATURE, Inconsistency of. The practice of men holds not an equal pace; yea, and often runs counter to their theory; we naturally know what is good, but naturally pursue what is evil; the rhetoric wherewith I persuade another cannot persuade myself: there is a depraved appetite in us that will with patience hear the learned instructions of reason, but yet perform no farther than agrees to its own irregular humor. In brief, we all are monsters, that is, a composition of man and beast, wherein we must endeavor to be as the poets fancy that wise man Chiron; that is, to have the region of man above that of beast, and sense to sit but at the feet of reason. Lastly, I do desire with God, that all, but yet affirm with men, that few shall know salvation: that the bridge is narrow, the passage straight unto life: yet those who do confine the church of God either to particular nations, churches, or families, have made it far narrower than our Saviour ever meant it.

Browne.

9656. HUMAN NATURE, Rebellion of. Did you ever, of a hot afternoon, witness the contest of innumerable worms over a carrion carcass? Did you ever notice the greediness, and selfishness, and quarrelsomeness displayed by the actors in a scene like that? And yet such a contest is decent, compared with the gigantic contest that has been carried on for thousands of years by the vermicular human race, and God has looked upon it, dwelt and pondered over it, and carried it in his heart; and all this time he has not ceased to pour out upon the world, in rich abundance, the blessings of his never-failing love!

Beecher.

Spurgeon.

9658. HUMILIATION, Christ's. It is said that when the story of West India slavery was told to the Moravians, and it was told that it was impossible to reach the slave population because they were so separated from the ruling classes, two Moravian missionaries offered themselves, and said, "We will go and be slaves on the plantations, and work and toil, if need be, under the lash, to get right beside the poor slaves and instruct them." And they left their homes, went to the West Indies, went to work on the plantations as slaves, and by the side of slaves, to get close to the hearts of slaves; and the slaves heard them, and their hearts were touched, because they had humbled themselves to their condition. That was grand; it was glorious; and yet Christ's example was more glorious, for he stepped from heaven to earth to get by our side; he laid himself down beside us that we might feel the throbbings of his bosom, be encircled in the embrace of his loving arms, be drawn right up beside him, and feel him whisper to our ears, "God is love."

Bp. Simpson.

9659. HUMILITY, Advantage of. The high mountains are barren, but the low valleys are covered over with corn; and accordingly the show-ers of God's grace fall into lowly hearts and humble souls. The more poor in spirit, the more self-empty, the more earnestly we are desirous of spiritual things; and such shall be filled.

Worthington.

9660. HUMILITY, Affected. True and genuine humility does not lie in a person's affecting the meanest habit, or yet a singularity of dress, however mean, that he may not seem to be proud. I speak not this, however, to cloak the proud gaudiness of any. Excess in costly attire, following vain, strange, light, immodest fashions, is a great sin and shame of our times. Oh, how many are there that in this way glory in their shame! Were the "daughters of Zion" reproved and threatened for this sin by the prophet Isaiah (ch. iii.) ever more guilty than multitudes among us at this day? But yet I must tell you that a proud heart may be under vile raiment too. Some may be proud of an affected plainness—proud of their seeming free from pride, of their looking like humble, mortified men. And some there are whose pride lies not so much in gaudy dress and fine clothes, which one would think that none but children and fools would be taken with, as in a high conceit of themselves—their knowledge, light, and perfection.

Barrett.

9661. HUMILITY, Arguments for. All the world all that we are, and all that we have, our bodies and our souls, our actions and our sufferings, our conditions at home, our accidents abroad, our many sins and our seldom virtues, are as so many arguments to make our souls dwell low in the deep valley of humility.

Jeremy Taylor.

9662. HUMILITY, Biblical Examples of. John the Baptist—How beautiful it is to compare John's testimony of himself, and Christ's commendation of him! The Baptist himself never forgot his inferiority to Christ. "I am," he said, "the voice," John 1: 23; whilst Jesus was "the Word," John 1: 1; "the latchet of whose shoes," he said, "I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose," Mark 1: 7; "He must increase, but I must decrease," John 3: 30. Yet see what the Master said in exaltation of one so humble, Matt. 11: 21; John 5: 35. Mary—Three times we read of her in the same posture, sitting "at the feet of Jesus," Luke 10: 39; John 11: 32; 12: 3. The Evangelists are remarkable for so frequently omitting the points of history which might have thrown honor upon themselves; whilst they are careful to mention things which might tend to their own humiliation. St. Matthew, e. g., records his own name as "the publican" (10: 3), and makes no mention of having himself made the great feast at his house (9: 10), nor of his having left all to follow Christ, Luke 5: 27-29—a circumstance which he carefully records about James and John, 4: 20-22. St. Mark, writing, as is supposed, under the direction of St. Peter, makes no mention of the keys, nor of his (Peter's) walking on the water, whilst he records most fully Peter's rebuke, 8: 33; and Peter's fall, and Peter's repentance, 14: 66-72. St. John—"That other disciple," who modestly conceals his own name. Bowes.

9663. HUMILITY, Conquests of. The devil told St. Macarius, "I can surpass thee in watching, fasting and many other things; but humility conquers and disarms me."

9664. HUMILITY, Cultivation of. St. Francis Borgia, the Duke of Gandia, who had renounced all his wealth and honors for the monastic life, signed his letters, Francis the Sinner. This he declared to be his only title. For six years he rated himself at the feet of Judas. Then he recalled the fact that Christ washed the traitor's feet. From that time he looked upon himself as below all creatures. He said, "I consider in my morning meditation that hell is my due; and I think that all men, even children and dumb creatures, ought to cry out to me, 'Away; hell is thy place; thy soul ought to be in hell.'" From this standpoint of his own unworthiness he obtained enlarged views of the love and mercy of God. He chose the meanest cell and the poorest fare. A lady of rank said to him, "Your condition, Francis, is wretched, if after exchanging your riches for so great poverty, you should not gain heaven in the end." Hereplied, "I should be miserable indeed; but as for the exchange, I have been already a great gainer by it."

9665. HUMILITY, Derivation of. The whole Roman language, even with all the improvements of the Augustan age, does not afford so much as a name for humility (the word from whence we borrow this, as is well known, bearing in Latin a quite different meaning); no, nor was one found in all the copious language of the Greeks till it was made by the great Apostle.

John Wesley.

9666. HUMILITY, Effect of. The grandest edifices, the tallest towers, the loftiest spires, rest upon deep foundations. The very safety of eminent gifts and pre-eminent graces lies in their association with deep humility. They were dangerous without it. Great men do need to be good men. Look at this mighty ship, a leviathan on the deep. With her towering masts, and carrying a cloud of canvas, how she steadies herself on the waves, and walks erect upon the rolling waters, like a thing of inherent, self-regulating life. When the corn is waving, and trees are bending, and foaming billows roll before the blast and break in thunders on the beach, why is she not flung on her beam ends, sent down foundering into the deep? Why, because, unseen, beneath the surface, a vast well-ballasted hull gives her balance, and, taking hold of the water, keeps her steady under a press of sail, and on the bosom of a swelling sea. Even so, to preserve the saint upright, erect, and safe from falling, God gives him balance and ballast, bestowing on the man to whom he has given lofty endowments the attendant grace of a proportionate humility. Guthrie.

9667. HUMILITY, Emblem of. Observe the peculiar characters of the grass, which adapt it especially for the service of man, are its apparent humility and cheerfulness. Its humility, in that it seems created only for lowest service, appointed to be trodden on and fed upon. Its cheerfulness, in that it seems to exult under all kinds of violence and suffering. You roll it, and it is stronger the next day; you mow it, and it multiplies its shoots, as if it were grateful; you tread upon it, and it only sends up richer perfume. Spring comes; and it rejoices with all the earth—glowing with variegated flame of flowers, waving in soft depth of fruitful strength. Winter comes; and though it will not mock its fellow-plants by growing then, it will not pine and mourn, and turn colorless and leafless as they. It is always green, and is only the brighter and gayer for the hoar frost. Ruskin.

9668. HUMILITY Entrance to Honor. Prov. 15: 33, "Before honor is humility." In Caius College, Cambridge, there are three gateways in succession: "the first is called Humilitatis, the next Virtutis, the third (which opens towards the Senate House), Honoris. Not in vain did our forefathers make these emblems of an undergraduate's progress; and happy would it be if every youth entered by the gate of humility, to pass through the gate of Christian virtue, that he might come forth in the highest sense to that of honor." R. F. Walker.

9669. HUMILITY, Examples of. The truly virtuous or valorous are no whit ashamed of their mean parentage, but rather glory in themselves, that their merit hath advanced them above so many thousands far better descended. Dr. Cox, almoner, and Sir John Cheek, tutor to King Edward VI., were men of mean "birth, but so well esteemed," saith the historian, "for virtue and bearing, that they might well be said to be born of themselves." So were Iphicrates, that brave Athenian, the son of a cobbler; Eumenes, one of Alexander's best captains, the son of a carter; Agathocles, king of Sicily, the son of a potter, etc. And these would many a time freely discourse of their beginning, and plainly relate their bringing up, and what their parents were. Trapp.

9670. HUMILITY, Gain of. Many a poor man makes a bright Christian; God keep him humble that he may dwell in his heart, and that the beams of his grace may shine in his heart. See yon evening star, how bright it shines, how pure and steady are its rays; but look, it is lower in the heavens than those stars which sparkle with a restless twinkling in the higher region of the skies. God keep you low, that you may shine bright. Salter 9671. HUMILITY, Grace of. It was well observed by Austin, "that they who will ascend to God must descend in self-abasement and humility." The farther from pride, the nearer to God. He that ascends in himself, descends and falls from God. Pride and vain glory are the prime elements of vain philosophy; whereas sacred and sound philosophy is found in humility. Ships that are heaviest laden sail lowest; so a mind laden with sound philosophy is most humble. Gale.

9672. HUMILITY, Flower of. 'Tis a fair and fragrant flower; in its appearance modest, in its situation low and hidden; it doth not flaunt its beauties to every vulgar eye, or throw its odors upon every passing gale; 'tis unknown to the earthly botanist, it discovers itself only to the spiritual searcher; neither does he find it among those gay and gaudy tribes of flowers with which the generality are so easily captivated, but in some obscure and unfrequented spot, where the prints of human footsteps are rarely seen. But whenever he finds it, he is sure to behold its bosom opened to the Sun of Righteousness, receiving new sweets in perpetual succession from his exhaustless source. Caspipini.

9673. HUMILITY, Heathen. Epaminondas, that heathen captain, finding himself lifted up in the day of his public triumph, the next day went drooping and hanging down his head; but being asked what was the reason of his so great dejection, made answer: "Yesterday I felt myself transported with vain-glory, therefore I chastise myself for it to-day." Plutarch.

9674. HUMILITY, Intellectual. It is said that the young students of Athens, called themselves sophoi, wise men; having studied some time they thought it an honor to be termed philosophoi, lovers of wisdom; but at length, when they had made good progress in learning, they accounted themselves moroi, mere ignoramuses, that understood nothing at all. The more knowledge they had, the more they discovered their own ignorance.

9675. HUMILITY, Lesson of. Rufinus, a friend of St. Francis of Assisi, asked the latter to tell him what he thought of himself. Francis answered, "I esteem myself the greatest sinner of any in the world, and that I serve God less than any other man." "How can that be," said Rufinus, "seeing some are thieves, some murderers, some adulterers, and many most profane and wicked wretches, such as are in the very gall of bitterness, such as never think of God or goodness, and thou art not only free from these, but withal a man of much sanctity and holiness?" Francis replied, "No doubt, if God had been so merciful to them as he hath been to me, they would have showed themselves more thankful than I have been; and, besides, if God had forsaken me, I should have committed far greater sins than they have done." Examples of humility have now to be sought in the lives of the ancients. It is quite time for a revival of this old-fashioned virtue.

9676. HUMILITY, Model of. Christ voluntarily

mourned, because mourning humiliates, and he would be humble; he daily suffered, because suffering subdues the pride of human hearts, and he would teach us to accomplish that conquest. It was the humiliation of a God to take our nature at all; it was the humiliation of a man to crucify that nature daily. He knew what sages had failed to see, that it was loftiest when lowest; that as it sank to humbleness it rose in glory. And thus, the model of all he taught, himself "the first-born from the dead," he soared to heaven with a spirit lowly as the grave he left; thus beats there, at the right hand of the Majesty on high, a human heart—the heart of an enthroned King—more softly subdued to mercy, more meekly patient, than ever sorrowed among the loneliest solitudes of earthly affliction. W. A. Butler.

9677. HUMILITY, Profit of. Dr. Morrison, missionary in China, sent home to ask for an assistant. Attention was called to a young man of Aberdeen, who wished to devote himself to missionary work. When he came before the committee his appearance was so unpromising that they said, "He will never do for a missionary; he is too rustic." Then they thought he might be good enough for a servant. One of the committee was requested to speak to the young man in private. He was told of the objection to his being a missionary, and also of the proposal to send him out as a servant. He was asked if he were willing. He replied, without any hesitation and with a bright smile, "Yes, sir, most certainly; I am willing to do anything, so that I am in the work. To be a 'hewer of wood and a drawer of water,' is too great an honor for me, when the Lord's house is building." That unpromising rustic became the famous Dr. Milne.

9679. HUMILITY, Royal. Trajan, the Roman Emperor, has set us an example of condescension and affability. He was equal, indeed, to the greatest generals of antiquity; but the sounding titles of Optimus and the Father of his Country did not elate him. All the oldest soldiers he knew by their own name; he conversed with them with the greatest familiarity, and never retired to his tent before he had visited the camps. He refused the statues which the flattery of friends wished to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation that could pay adoration to cold inanimate pieces of marble. His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people; he appeared on foot, and showed himself an enemy to parade and ostentatious equipage. His wish to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, distinguished his palace by the inscription of "The Public Palace." Buck.

9680. HUMILITY, Spiritual. The humble soul is like the violet, which grows low, hangs the head downwards, and hides itself with its own leaves; and were it not that the fragrant smell of his many graces discovered him to the world, he would choose to live and die in secrecy.

Teachers' Treasury.

9681. HUMILITY, Testing. A monk fasted excessively and offered long prayers. Pachomius, his abbot, suspecting that he was influenced more by self-esteem than true piety, bade him eat regularly, and not pray except at the usual service with the rest of the brethren. The monk refused to obey. Soon after, the abbot sent his disciple Theodore to his cell to see what he was about. He came back and reported that he found the rebellious monk praying. "Go and interrupt him several times," said the master. Theodore did so, till at length the devout monk could endure it no longer. He swore at his disturber and seizing a stick endeavored to chastise him. "Ah!" said Pachomius, "it is quite evident that he needs true conversion."

9682. HUMILITY, Test of. We learn from coins and inscriptions, that the couriers in the service of the Roman government had the privilege of traveling through the provinces free of expense, and of calling on the villagers to forward their carriages and baggage to the next town. Under a despotic government, this became a cruel grievance. Every Roman of high rank claimed the same privilege; the horses were unyoked from the plough to be harnessed to the rich man's carriage. It was the most galling injustice which the provinces suffered. We have an inscription on the frontier-town of Egypt and Nubia, mentioning its petition for a redress of this grievance; and a coin of Nerva's reign records its abolition in Italy. Our Lord could give no stronger exhortation to patient humility than by advising his Syrian hearers, instead of resenting the demand for one stage's "vehiculation," to go willingly a second time. Eclectic Review.

9683. HUMILITY, True. When Matthew Prior was servant to King William's ambassador in France, A. D. 1698, he was shown by the French king's household at Versailles, picture stories of Louis XIV., painted by Le Brun; and being asked whether the actions of King William were likewise to be seen in his palace, Prior answered, "No; the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen everywhere but in his own house." So the good works of a true believer shine everywhere except in his own esteem. Salter.

9684. HUNGER, Absence of. "Never," said a poor woman, "did I understand the sweetness of those blessed words, 'they shall hunger no more,' until I looked upon the pale, pinched face of my little child, who died upon my bosom for want of food."

9685. HUNGER, Influence of. Hunger is one of the beneficent and terrible instincts. It is, indeed, the very fire of life, underlying all impulses to labor, and moving man to noble activities by its imperious demands. Look where we may, we see it as the motive power which sets the vast array of human machinery in action. It is hunger which brings these stalwart navvies together in orderly gangs to cut paths through mountains, to throw bridges across rivers, to intersect the land with the great iron-ways which bring city into daily communication with city. Hunger is the overseer of those men erecting palaces, prison-houses, barracks, and villas. Hunger sits at the loom, which, with stealthy power, is weaving the wondrous fabrics of cotton and silk. Hunger labors at the furnace and the plough, coercing the native indolence of man into strenuous and incessant activity. Let food be abundant and easy of access, and civilization becomes impossible; for our higher efforts are dependent on our lower impulses in an indissoluble manner. Nothing but the necessities of food will force man to labor, which he hates, and will always avoid when possible. And although this seems obvious only when applied to the laboring classes, it is equally, though less obviously true, when applied to all other classes; for the money we all labor to gain is nothing but food, and the surplus of food, which will buy other men's labor. If in this sense hunger is seen to be a beneficent instinct, in another sense it is terrible; for when its progress is unchecked it becomes a devouring flame, destroying all that is noble in man, subjugating his humanity, and making the brute dominant in him, till finally life itself is extinguished. Beside the picture of the activities it inspires, we might also place a picture of the ferocities it evokes. Many an appalling story might be cited, from that of Ugolino in the famine-tower to those of wretched shipwrecked men and women who have been impelled by the madness of starvation to murder their companions that they might feed upon their flesh. Smiles.

9686. HUSBAND, Devotion of a. Two snakes were found in the house of Titus Gracchus. The Angurs decided that one of them must die. If the male should be put to death, Cornelia would soon die; if the female, Titus Gracchus would die. "Dismiss, then, the female," said Gracchus, "so that Cornelia may survive me, for she is the younger of the two." Gracchus died soon after, leaving many sons, to whom Cornelia devoted her entire attention. Her husband's memory was so dear to her, that she refused a proffered marriage with Ptolemy, king of Egypt. The splendor of a diadem and the pomp of a rich kingdom was not sufficient to break her constancy to one who had sacrificed his life for her.

9687. HUSBANDS, Hen-pecked. Socrates, who is by all accounts the undoubted head of the sect of the hen-pecked, owned and acknowledged that he owed great part of his virtue to the exercise which his useful wife constantly gave it. There are several good instructions may be drawn from his wise answers to the people of less fortitude than himself on this subject. A friend, with indignation, asked nim how so good a man could live with so violent a creature? He observed to him, that they who learn to keep a good seat on horse-back mount the least manageable they can get; and when they have mastered them, they are sure never to be discomposd on the backs of steeds less restive. At several times, to different persons, on the same subject, he has said, "My dear friend, you are beholden to Xantippe that I bear so well your flying out in a dispute." Steele.

9688. HUSBANDS, ill-natured. Patricius was a pagan of most ungovernable temper, who poured out his violence upon his patient, Christian wife, Monica. At length he was softened by her exemplary conduct, and became a Christian. They were the parents of the famous Augustine. When Monica heard ladies complain of the ill nature and bad treatment which they received from their husbands, she asked, "Who are to blame? Are not we and our sharp tongues?" For herself, she never answered his sharp words, nor provoked him by her own complaints. It is said that many matrons followed her example with success. We recommend the experiment to any who are similarly troubled.

9689. HUSBAND AND WIFE, Reconciliation of. A man complained to St. Columba, that his wife had taken an aversion to him and abandoned him. The saint called her and reminded her of her duties. "I am ready to do everything," said the woman. "I will obey you in the hardest things you can command. I will go even, if it is desired, on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, or I will shut myself up in a nunnery; in short, I will do everything except live with that man." The saint told her there could be no question of a pilgrimage, or a convent, so long as her husband lived. "But," said he, "let us try to pray to God, all three fasting, you, your husband and myself." "Oh, I know that you can obtain what is impossible from God," Columba prayed all night. Next morning he said to the woman, "Tell me, to what convent are you bound after your yesterday's projects?" "To none," said she. "My heart has been changed to-night. I know not how I have passed from hate to love." From that till death, their married life was most happy.

9690. HUSBAND AND WIFE, Unity of. Husband and wife should be like two candles burning together, which make the house more light-some; or like two fragrant flowers bound up in one nosegay, that augment its sweetness; or like two well-tuned instruments, which, sounding together, make the more melodious music. Husband and wife—what are they but as two springs meeting, and so joining their streams that they make but one current? W. Secker.

9691. HYPOCHONDRIAC, Cure of. A young student at college became so deeply hypochondriac that he proclaimed himself dead, and ordered the college bell to be tolled on the occasion of his death. In this he was indulged; but the man employed to execute the task appeared to the student to perform it so imperfectly, that he arose from his bed, in a fury of passion, to toll the bell for his own departure. When he had finished, he retired to his bed in a state of profuse perspiration, and was from that moment alive and well. Dr. Mead.

9692. HYPOCRISY, Biblical Figures of. The Greek word properly refers to an actor, one who wears a mask and plays a part on the stage. It is compared to leaven, Luke 12: 1. Whited sepulchres, Matt. 23: 27-31; painted and garnished, but full of the decay of death. A whited wall, Acts 23: 3. Graves overgrown with grass, and concealed from the notice of those who walk over them, and are hurt or defiled by the unexpected contact, Luke 11: 44. Potsherds, covered with silver dross, Prov. 26: 23. Tares, Matt. 13: 38, remarkable for their resemblance to good wheat, especially in the early stages. Wolves in sheep's clothing, Matt. 7: 15. Wells without water, 2 Pet. 2: 17; Jude 12. A cloak to cover sin, 1 Thess. 2: 5; 1 Pet. 2: 16. Deceitful kisses, Prov. 27: 6 (Absalom, 2 Sam. 15: 5; Joab, 20: 9, 10; Judas, Luke 22: 47, 48). The spider's web, Job 8: 13, 14, a figure of the hypocrite's trust. The rush without water, and flag without mire, Job 8: 11-13, a figure of the hypocrite's hope. Matt. 26: 65.—"Rending the garments" was a sign of mourning amongst the Jews, but it was also a frequent evidence of their hypocrisy. It is said that many of them took good care to rend the garment on the seam, so that they might, without much trouble or loss, repair the rent. —(Jacobi). Like the "hypocritical mockers in feasts," Ps. 35: 16; and the hired mourners and minstrels so customary in Eastern countries in the house of death, Matt. 9: 13; Mal. 3: 14 (see marg.). Bowes.

9693. HYPOCRISY, Common. The shops in the square of San Marco were all religiously closed, for the day was a high festival; we were much disappointed, for it was our last day, and we desired to take away with us some souvenirs of lovely Venice; but our regret soon vanished, for on looking at the shop we meant to patronize, we readily discovered signs of traffic within. We stepped to the side door, and found, when one or two other customers had been served, that we might purchase to our heart's content, saint or no saint. After this fashion too many keep the laws of God to the eye, but violate them in the heart. The shutters are up as if the man no more dealt with sin and Satan; but a brisk commerce is going on behind the scenes. Spurgeon.

9694. HYPOCRISY, Concealment of. Formality frequently takes its dwelling near the chambers of integrity, and so assumes its name; the soul not suspecting that hell should make so near an approach to heaven. A rotten post, though covered with gold, is more fit to be burned in the fire, than for the building of a fabric. Where there is a pure conscience, there will be a pure conversation. The dial of our faces does not infallibly show the time of day in our hearts; the humblest looks may enamel the former, while unbounded pride covers the latter. Unclean spirits may inhabit the chamber when they look not out at the window. A hypocrite may be both the fairest and the foulest creature in the world; he may be fairest outwardly in the eyes of man, and foulest inwardly in the sight of God. How commonly do such unclean swans cover their black flesh with their white feathers! Though such wear the mantle of Samuel, that should bear the name of Satan. Secker.

9695. HYPOCRISY, Confession of. A reliable author says, "A young man, who held a confidential post in a large mercantile establishment, and who, as a church member and a Sabbath-school teacher, had for years maintained an unsuspected reputation, during an illness which elicited his real character, confessed that his whole life had been one course of concealed iniquity. The statement was ascertained to be perfectly correct; and he died in the agonies of despair."

9696. HYPOCRISY, Examples of. Julius Caesar was a great dissembler. He would appear to be pleased with his friends, though he might through others be seeking their ruin. Cicero was in this manner banished from Rome. So also was Pompey rendered odious in the sight of the people, and when he fled into Egypt, Caesar pursued him there. But when Pompey's head was brought to him, he shed tears and said, "It is the victory and not the revenge that pleases me." Charles the Ninth of France, a little before the massacre of St. Bartholomew's invited Admiral Coligni to his palace, desiring to receive counsel from, and promising to abide by his decisions, affirming that he revered him as a son should a father. Very shortly after he caused him to be ignominiously put to death.

9697. HYPOCRISY versus Honesty. Hypocrisy desires to seem good rather than to be so: honesty desires to be good rather than seem so. The worldlings purchase reputation by the sale of desert, wise men buy desert with the hazard of reputation. I would do much to hear well, more to deserve well, and rather lose opinion than merit. It shall more joy me that I know myself what I am, than it shall grieve me to hear what others report me. I had rather deserve well without praise, than do ill with commendation. Warwick.

9698. HYPOCRISY, Religious. He that hath a false end in his profession, will soon come to an end of his profession, when he is pinched on that toe where his corn is: I mean, called to deny that his naughty heart aimed at all this while; now his heart fails him, he can go no farther. O, take heed of this squint-eye to our profit, pleasure, or anything beneath Christ and heaven; for they will take away your heart, as the prophet saith of wine and women; that is, our love; and if our love be taken away, there will be little courage left for Christ. Like some soldiers, when once they meet with a rich booty at the sacking of some town, are spoiled for fighting ever after.

9699. HYPOCRISY, Speciousness of. While every vice is hid by hypocrisy, every virtue is suspected to be hypocrisy. This excuses the bad from imitating virtue, the ungenerous from rewarding it; and the suspicion is looked upon as wisdom, as if it was not as necessary a part of wisdom to know what to believe, as what to reject. Mrs. Montague.

9700. HYPOCRITE, Assumption of the. Apes will be imitating men: spiders have their webs, and wasps their honeycombs. Hypocrites will needs to do something, that they may seem to be somebody; but, for want of an inward principle, they do nothing well; they amend one error with another, as Esau here (Gen. 28); and as Herod prevents perjury by murder. Thus, while they shun the sands, they rush upon the rocks; and while they keep off the shallows, they fall into the whirlpool. Trapp.

9701. HYPOCRITE, Detection of a. Consider, hypocrisy lies close in the heart; if thou art not very careful, thou mayest easily pass a false judgment on thyself. They who went to search the cellar under the Parliament, at first saw nothing but coals and winter provisions; but upon a review, when they came to throw away that stuff, they found all but provision for the devil's kitchen; then the mystery of iniquity was uncased, and the barrels of powder appeared. How many are there that, from some duties of piety they perform, some seeming zeal they express in profession, presently cry, "Omnia bene," and are so kind to themselves as to vote themselves good Christians, who, did they but take the pains to throw those aside, they might find a foul hypocrite at the bottom of them all! Anon.

9702. HYPOCRITE, Doom of a. N—— was a branch of a pious family, some of whose ancestors were martyrs. She was religiously educated by her pious parents; and her education, particularly her knowledge of history, was extensive. In her study of history the progress of religion had attracted her chief attention. Religious topics were her element; her remarks often evinced the correctness and vigor of her judgment; and she often delighted the social circle by her striking application of the current matters of conversation to the subject of religion. Like the rest of the pious family, she seemed devoted to all the duties of a Christian, with only one exception, and this they wondered at; that she did not attend with them at the Lord's table. All regarded her as an ornament of religion, and urged her to take part in this ordinance. In one year N—— lost both her pious parents, and she had just put off mourning when she was taken desperately ill. Having been on terms of intimacy with the family, I was sent for at her request to visit the dying sister. I certainly went prepared to see a Christian die: but what was my astonishment to behold those features, instead of smiling in death, as I expected, clothed in all the horrors of mental agony! Bidding me sit down, and ascertaining that there were no witnesses, she addressed me in nearly these terms: "I am glad you have come: I can not bear to go out of the world a deceiver, but I am unable to tell the sad secret of my heart to those about me; it would be too much for them to bear. I am not the character my friends have supposed. I am not religious—do not interrupt me—I have talked about religion, my passions have often felt the powers of the world to come, and my imagination roved at large among things unseen; I have amused myself with these matters, and regarded with the interest of an amateur their effects upon minds whom I reckoned of an inferior order, though ennobled by a birth from heaven. But amidst all, my own heart has never loved religion as a personal thing: indeed, I have never concerned myself about it for myself, and now I must die without any of its prospects, and be shut out forever from all its enjoyments." I paused a moment, and began to observe that "Life is the season of hope," and admitting all I heard to be correct, still the Saviour's saying, "Whosoever cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out," is equally entitled to credit. But she cut me short, observing, "The vigor of my youth and the strength of my intellect I have wasted in living to myself; I never cared for the divine approbation; and God is justly my adversary. Cast down as I am, I cannot go with a piteous tale of misery to petition for mercy for which I can plead no services, nor live to show any gratitude. I know already what you would say to these sentiments—you would hold out mercy as yet attainable; but my heart revolts at it. Heaven would be no heaven to me on the terms I can only enter it. I have been a worthless idler, and cannot endure to receive the reward of a faithful soldier." Surprised as I was, I endeavored to enforce the necessity of renouncing such sentiments, and was urging that a good confession, though late, would find acceptance, when she interrupted me with some energy: "No, sir, spare me, spare yourself; my character is finished; what I am, that shall I be forever. The tree is even now falling: it is too late to direct where its trunk shall be extended on the earth." The doctor coming in, I soon after took my leave, intending to renew my visit, but in the morning learned that N—— had expired in the night.

Pastoral Letters.

9703. HYPOCRITE, Emblems of the. Hypocrites resemble looking-glasses, which present the faces which are not in them. Oh, how desirous are men to put the fairest gloves upon the foulest hands, and the finest paint upon the rottenest posts! To counterfeit the coin of heaven is to commit treason against the King of heaven. Who would spread a curious cloth upon a dusty table? If a mariner set sail in an unsound bottom, he may reasonably expect to lose his voyage. No wise virgin would carry a lamp without light. O professor, either get the latter or part with the former. None are so black in the eyes of the Deity as those who paint spiritual beauty where there is no spirituality. Secker.

9704. HYPOCRITE, Exposure of the. A false friend is worse than an open enemy. A painted barlot is less dangerous than a painted hypocrite. A treacherous Judas is more abhorred of God than a bloody Pilate. Christians! remember the sheep's clothing will soon be stripped from the wolf's back. The velvet plaster of profession shall not always conceal the offensive ulcer of corruption. Neither the ship of formality nor hypocrisy will carry one person to the harbor of felicity. The blazing lamps of foolish virgins may light them to the bridegroom's gate, but not into his chamber. . . . Oh, what vanity it is to lope off the boughs, and leave the roots which can send forth more; or to empty the cistern, and leave the fountain running which can soon fill it again! Such may swim in the water as the visible church; but when the net is drawn to shore, they must be thrown away as bad fishes. Though the tares and the wheat may grow in the field together, yet they will not be housed in the granary together. Secker.

9705. HYPOCRITE, Fate of the. A wolf, once upon a time, resolved to disguise himself, thinking that he should thus gain an easier livelihood. Having, therefore, clothed himself in a sheep's skin, he contrived to get among a flock of sheep, and fed along with them, so that even the shepherd was deceived. The wolf was shut up with the sheep, and the door made fast. But the shepherd, wanting some thing for his supper, and going in to fetch out a sheep, mistook the wolf for one of them and killed him on the spot. Æsop.

9708. HYPOCRITES, Motives of. God is in the hypocrite's mouth, but the world is in his heart, which he expects to gain through his good reputation. I have read of one that offered his prince a great sum of money to have leave once or twice a day to come into his presence, and only say, "God save your Majesty!" The prince wondering at this large offer for so small a favor, asked him, "What advantage would this afford him?" "O sire," saith he, "this, though I have nothing else at your hands, will get me a name in the country for one who is a great favorite at court, and such an opinion will help me to more at the year's end, than it costs me for the purchase." Thus some, by the name they get for great

9709. HYPOCRITES, Schemes of. The abbot in Melancthon lived strictly, and walked demurely, and looked humbly, so long as he was but a monk; but when, by his seeming extraordinary sanctity, he got to be abbot, he grew intolerable, proud, and insolent, and, being asked the reason of it, confessed "that his former lowly look was but to see if he could find the keys of the abbey." Brooks.

9710. IDEAL, Influence of an. Every man has at times in his mind the ideal of what he should be, but is not. This ideal may be high and complete, or it may be quite low and insufficient; yet, in all men that really seek to improve, it is better than the actual character. Perhaps no one is so satisfied with himself that he never wishes to be wiser, better, and more holy. Man never falls so low that he can see nothing higher than himself. This ideal man which we project, as it were, out of ourselves, and seek to make real—this wisdom, goodness, and holiness, which we aim to transfer from our thoughts to our life—has an action more or less powerful on each man, rendering him dissatisfied with present attainments, and restless unless he is becoming better. With some men it takes the rose out of the cheek, and forces them to wander a long pilgrimage of temptations before they reach the Delectable Mountains of tranquillity, and find "rest" under the tree of life. T. Parker.

9711. IDEAL, Unattainable. Alas! we know that ideals can never be completely embodied in practice. Ideals must ever lie a great way off, and we will thankfully content ourselves with any not intolerable approximation thereto! Let no man, as Schiller says, too querulously "measure by a scale of perfection the meagre product of reality" in this poor world of ours. We will esteem him no wise man; we will esteem him a sickly, discontented, foolish man. And yet, on the other hand, it is never to be forgotten that ideals do exist; that if they be not approximated to at all, the whole matter goes to wreck! Infallibly. No bricklayer builds a wall perpendicular; mathematically, this is not possible; a certain degree of perpendicularity suffices him, and he, like a good bricklayer, who must have done with his job, leaves it so. And yet, if he sway too much from the perpendicular, above all, if he throw plummet and level quite away from him, and pile brick on brick heedless, just as it comes to hand, such bricklayer, I think, is in a bad way. He has forgotten himself; but the law of gravitation does not forget to act on him; he and his wall rush down into a confused welter of ruins! Carlyle.

9712. IDEALISM, Value of. Precious beyond rubies is the idealism which can invest with celestial dignity the earthly avocation, and which, even when the hands are engaged in downright drudgery, can fill the mind with noble thoughts, and carry you through the daily task as a son or daughter of the king.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

9713. IDIOSYNCRASY, Acquaintance with our. It is a very wise rule in the conduct of the understanding, to acquire early a correct notion of your own peculiar constitution of mind, and to become well acquainted, as a physician would say, with your idiosyncrasy! Are you an acute man, and see sharply for small distances? or are you a comprehensive man, and able to take in wide and extensive views into your mind? Does your mind turn its ideas into wit? or are you apt to take a common-sense view of the objects presented to you? Have you an exuberant imagination, or a correct judgment? Are you quick, or slow? accurate, or hasty? a great reader, or a great thinker? It is a prodigious point gained if any man can find out where his powers lie, and what are his deficiencies—if he can contrive to ascertain what nature intended him for. S. Smith.

9714. IDIOSYNCRASY, General. The variety of distempers in men's minds is as great as of those in their bodies: some are epidemic, few escape them, and every one, too, if he would look into himself, would find some defect of his particular genius. There is scarcely any one without some idiosyncrasy that he suffers by. Locke.

9715. IDLENESS, Accounting for. Some one, in casting up his accounts, put down a very large sum per annum for his idleness. But there is another account more awful than that of our expenses, in which many will find that their idleness has mainly contributed to the balance against them. From its very inaction, idleness ultimately becomes the most active cause of evil; as a palsy is more to be dreaded than a fever. Colton.

9716. IDLENESS, Bane of. Idleness is the great corrupter of youth, and the bane and dishonor of middle age. He who, in the prime of life, finds time to hang heavy on his hands, may with much reason suspect that he has not consulted the duties which the consideration of his age imposed on him; assuredly he has not consulted his happiness. Blair.

9717. IDLENESS Considered. It is very great vanity in many professors to mind more other men's business than their own; from the society of such saints we must withdraw. No man is too noble to have a calling. If iron had reason, it would choose rather to be used in labor, than to grow rusty in a corner. By the law of Mohamet, the Grand Turk himself was to be of some trade. The hour of idleness is the hour of temptation. An idle person is the devil's tennis-ball, tossed by him at his pleasure. God ordained that the neck of the consecrated ass should be broken (Exodus xiii. 13), instead of sacrificing it; peradventure, because that animal hath ever been the hieroglyphic of sloth and laziness. Among the Egyptians idleness was a capital crime. Among the Locrians, he that lent money to an idle person was to lose it. Among the Corinthians, idle persons were delivered to the carnifex. By the laws of Solon, idle persons were to suffer death. The ancients call idleness the burial of a living man; and Seneca had rather be sick than idle. Now, shall nature do more than grace? Shall poor blind heathens be so severe against idle persons, and shall Christians embrace them? Should they not rather turn their backs upon them and have no intercourse with them who think themselves too great, or too good, to hold the plough?

T. Brooks.

9718. IDLENESS, Cure for. I apprehend there is not a more miserable, as well as a more worthless being, than a young man of fortune who has nothing to do but to find some new way of doing nothing. In a neighboring nation they endure no idleness among them. If any poor man turns idle, and admonition does him no good, they take the following method to make him work: they confine him in a large cistern, into which the water runs so fast that unless he pumps it out with all his might for several hours, it will prevail over him and drown him.

Sir W. Jones.

9719. IDLENESS, Degradation of. Æleas, king of Scythia, said that when he was idle he considered himself no better than his horse-keeper.

9720. IDLENESS, Employment of. Domitian, while he held the empire, was so given up to sloth and idleness that he spent most of his time in pricking flies to death with the point of a needle. When it was asked, "Who is with the emperor," the answer would be, "Not so much as a fly."

9721. IDLENESS not Enjoyment. So far from complete inaction being perfect enjoyment, there are few sufferings greater than that which the total absence of occupation generally induces. Count Caylus, the celebrated French antiquary, spent much time in engraving the plates which illustrate his valuable works. When his friends asked him why he worked so hard at such an almost mechanical occupation, he replied, "Je grave pour ne pas me pendre"—I engrave lest I should hang myself. Nature has beneficently provided that if the greater proportion of her sons must earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, that bread is far sweeter from the previous effort than if it fell spontaneously into the hand of listless indolence. It is scarcely to be questioned, then, that labor is desirable for its own sake, as well as for the substantial results which it affords; and, consequently, that it by no means lessens, but rather adds to, the general chance of happiness, that nearly all the members of society should, in some shape or other, be placed under an obligation to labor for their support.

Dr. Potter.

9722. IDLENESS, Figure of. Hast thou looked on the potter's wheel,—one of the venerablest objects, old as the prophet Ezekiel, and far older? Rude lumps of clay, how they spin themselves up, by mere quick whirling, into beautiful circular dishes! And fancy the most assiduous potter, but without his wheel, reduced to make dishes by mere kneading and baking! Even such a potter were destiny with a human soul that would rest and lie at ease,—that would not work and spin! Of an idle, unrevolving man, the kindest destiny can bake and knead nothing other than a botch: let her spend on him what expensive coloring, or gilding and enameling she will, he is but a botch—a mere enameled vessel of dishonor. Carlyle.

9723. IDLENESS, Intellectual. It is no more possible for an idle man to keep together a certain stock of knowledge, than it is possible to keep together a stock of ice exposed to a meridian sun. Every day destroys a fact, a relation, or an influence; and the only method of preserving the bulk and value of the pile is by constantly adding to it.

S. Smith.

9724. IDLENESS, Mental. Dionysius the elder was asked if he was at leisure, and had no business at present. He replied, "The gods forbid that it ever should be so with me; for a bow, if it be over-bent, will break; but the mind breaks if it be over-slack."

9725. IDLENESS, Offense of. Herondas, hearing that an Athenian had been condemned for idleness, desired to be shown the man that had been convicted of so gentlemanly an offense.

9726. IDLENESS, Opposition to. The Romans set up in temples within the city the goddesses Agenotea, Stimula, and Srenua, to be worshiped. They would not receive Quies, or Rest, as a goddess in the city; but built a temple for her in the Lavicanian way, and thither they sent the idle people of the commonwealth with their sacrifices.

9728. IDLENESS, A Philosopher of. Altades, the twelfth king of Babylon, an idle and slothful person, laid down two maxims, which he called his own. The first was, "That he was a vain and foolish man, who, with continual labor and misery, makes war to the destruction of himself and others." His other was, "He is the most fool of all that, with toil and labor, heaps up a treasure, not for himself, but his posterity." From this idle philosophy, he collected two things: "That no war was to be made because of the labor, and that we should enjoy the riches and glory that was got by the sweat and miseries of others." Altades' life was formed on this basis, and was most vicious and useless.

9729. IDLENESS, Sin of. I would have every one lay to heart, that a state of idleness is a state of damnable sin. Idleness is directly repugnant to the great ends of God, both in our creation and redemption. As to our creation: can we imagine that God, who created not any thing but for some excellent end, should create man for none, or for a silly one? The spirit within us is an active and vivacious principle: our rational faculties qualify us for doing good: this is the proper work of reason, the truest and most natural pleasure of a rational soul. Who can think now, that our wise Creator lighted this candle within us, that we might oppress and stifle it by negligence and idleness?

that he contrived and destined such a mind to squander and fool away its talents in vanity and impertinence? As to our redemption, it is evident both what the design of it is, and how opposite idleness is to it. Christ gave himself for us, "to redeem us from all iniquity, and to purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." How little, then, can a useless and barren life answer the expectations of God? What a miserable return must it be to the blood of his Son; and how utterly must it disappoint all the purposes of his Word and Spirit!

Lucas.

9730. IDLENESS and Trifling. An Athenian said to Nicander, "You Spartans are extremely idle." "You say true," he answered, "but we do not busy ourselves, like you, in every trifle."

9731. IDOLATRY, Conversion from. As Pontius, the little son of a Roman senator, was passing through a street in Rome, he heard many voices chanting the 115 Ps. He was impressed by the words, "As for our God, he is in heaven; he hath done whatsoever pleased him. Their idols are silver and gold; even the work of men's hands. They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not. They have ears, and hear not; noses have they, and smell not. They have hands, and handle not; feet have they, and walk not; neither speak they through their throat." He went up to the door and knocked. The doorkeeper looked out, and reported to the bishop, "It is only a little fellow knocking at the door." "Well, open and let him in," said he, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Having been admitted, he went up to Pontianus, the bishop, and said, "Teach me that beautiful song I heard you sing. It is all so true. You sang that they had feet, and walk not. I know that they cannot move, and that people are afraid of their being blown over by the wind, or stolen, or knocked down by accident; and I have myself seen how they are fastened into their pedestals with melted lead." The bishop was astonished at the boy's perception, and saw that the Holy Spirit was enlightening him. He asked him about his parents. Learning that they were pagans, the bishop said, "God in his own good time may enlighten thy father as he is illumining thee." On his return home the boy was so full of this new religion that he could not tell his father all about it. The boy led his father to the bishop. Both became catechumens, and were baptized together. This boy Christian became a hero for Christ, and died a martyr, A. D. 257.

9732. IDOLATRY, Destroying. The Koran relates that Abraham endeavored to convert his father and neighbors from idolatry. In their absence, he went into the temple, where their idols stood, and broke them in pieces, except one large one. When they discovered the misfortune of their gods, they accused Abraham with destroying them. He answered, "Nay; but that big one has done it. Ask them, if they can speak." They said, "Thou knowest that these speak not." Abraham said, "Do ye then worship that which cannot 'profit you at all, neither can it hurt you? Fie on you, and that which ye worship instead of God!" Then they cast him into a great fire to avenge their gods; but the fire did not burn him, for his God delivered him.

9733. IDOLATRY, Ignorance and. A missionary at Sierra Leone called on a heathen widow, and was surprised at the evidences of heathen darkness which he saw. He writes: "She had in her room four gods—one for herself, one for her husband, and one for each of her two children. She had been rubbing eggiddi (a rich kind of food made of Indian corn, beaten fine in a mortar, and mixed with palm oil) on their mouths; but they ate not. I endeavored to show her the folly of such practices; but she was joined to her idols!"

9734. IDOLATRY, Local. The Romans deified their own city, and built a temple to her on Mt. Palatine, calling in the provinces to do her homage. This spirit is common to modern times.

9735. IDOLATRY, Motive of. The Romans worshiped some of their deities that they might do them good; but they worshiped the fever and ague that they might do them less harm.

9736. IDOLS, Accusations of. Mohammed was unsparing in his denunciations of idolatry. He hurls all his anathemas against it. His followers believe that, in the day of judgment, God, by his mighty power, will bring the idol gods to bear swift testimony against idolaters, that the idols will open their mouths in accusation against, instead of intercession for them. We may, with equal probability, extend the application to each improper object of human devotion.

9737. IDOLS, Classification of. I do find, therefore, in this enchanted glass, four idols, or false appearances, of several distinct sorts, every sort comprehending many divisions. The first sort I call idols of the nation or tribe; the second, idols of the den or cave; the third, idols of the forum; and the fourth, idols of the theatre.

Bacon.

9738. IDOLS, Destruction of. King Olaf and his retinue came to a place where the Pagan farmers armed against him. A meeting was called, and the king exhorted them to accept the true God and put away their idols. Gudbrand, the chief of the place, answered, "We know nothing of him thou speakest about. Dost thou call him a God whom no one can see? We have a god that we should have brought unto the assembly to-day, but that it is so rainy; and the sight of him will make your blood run cold." It was arranged that if the morrow should be fair, the idol should be brought, and after a further explanation they would either do as the king desired or else fight him. This god was Thor the Thunderer. Every day five cakes were set before him, and as they disappeared, he was believed to have consumed them. The next day was favorable. The council gathered, the king with his bishop Grimkel and other attendants on one side of the plain, and the pagans on the other. A great image, gleaming with silver and gold and jewels, was brought in on the shoulders of the Pagans and set down in the midst of the field. The heathen chief stood up and said, 'Where now, O king, is thy God? I think he will be ashamed before this glorious god of ours, whom I see you fear.' Then King Olaf arose and answered, "Much hast thou talked, and greatly hast thou wondered, because thou canst not see our God; but we expect his arrival. Thou wouldst frighten us with thy blind and deaf god, who cannot move and must be borne upon your shoulders. But now," he cried aloud, "look to the east; behold, our God, is coming!" All looked that way, and at the instant Kolbing, a faithful servant of the king, smote the idol with a large club, as previously instructed. The fragments of the terrific god were scattered on all sides, and out came a great swarm of rats and mice. The Pagans fled in all directions. The king rose and said, "Ye see yourselves what your god can do—the idol ye adorned with gold and silver, and to which ye offered meat. Take now your gold and ornaments from the grass, and give them to your wives and daughters; but never hang them hereafter on stocks and stones." He then offered them the alternative of accepting Christianity or fighting his army. To fight was folly, and the Pagans sullenly submitted, and were baptized by the bishop. Thus was idolatry put away in the eleventh century.

9739. IF, The Danger of. The heathens have observed that, in rhetoric, it is a point of chiefest cunning, when you would outface a man, or importune him to do a thing, to press and urge him with that which he will not, or cannot, for shame, deny to be in himself; as, by saying, "If you have any wit, then you will do thus and thus; if you be an honest man, or a good fellow, do this." So here the devil, not being to learn any point of subtlety, comes to our Saviour, saying, "If thou be the Son of God," as it may be doubted. You being in this case, then "make these stones bread." No, no, it follows not; a man may be the Son of God, and not show it by any such art. So, when Pilate asked who accused Christ, they answered, "If he had not been a malefactor, we would not have brought him before thee." They were jolly, grave men; it was a flat flattery. This ought to put us in mind, when we are tempted in like manner, that we take heed that we be not outfaced. Andrewes.

9740. IGNORANCE, Ancient. Archelaus, king of Macedon, was so ignorant of the things of nature, that upon the eclipse of the sun, amazed with fear, he caused the gates of the palace to be shut up, and the hair of his son to be cut off, as the custom was in solemn mournings. "Great men and learned," saith Pliny, "who know more in natural causes than others do, feared the extinction of the stars, or some mischief to befall them, in their eclipses. Pindarus and Stofichorus were subjects to this fear, attributing the failing of their lights to the power of witchcraft." Wanley.

9741. IGNORANCE, Contentions from. I believe that it is from our ignorance that our contentions flow; we debate with strife and with wrath, with bickering and with hatred; but of the thing debated upon we remain in the profoundest ignorance. Like the laborers of Babel, while we endeavor in vain to express our meaning to each other, the fabric by which, for a common end, we would have ascended to heaven from the ills of earth, remains forever unadvanced and incomplete. Lyttton.

9742. IGNORANCE, Deformity of. As blindness is the deformity of the face, so is ignorance the deformity of the soul. As the want of fleshly eyes spoils the beauty of the face, so the want of spiritual eyes spoils the beauty of the soul. A man without knowledge is as a workman without his hands, as a painter without his eyes, as a traveler without his legs, or as a ship without sails, or a bird without wings, or like a body without soul. Brooks.

9743. IGNORANCE, Deprecating. When the Duchess of Modena was complained to that her son had too many branches to learn at one time, and that his health was suffering from the excessive labor, she calmly replied: "It were better for me to have no son than to have an ignorant son." Hutchinson.

9744. IGNORANCE, Fate of. I turned my head to look back, and saw Ignorance coming up to the river side; but he soon got over, and that without half the difficulty which the other two men met with. For it happened that there was then in that place one Vain Hope, a ferryman, that with his boat helped him over; so he, as the other I saw, did ascend the hill to come up to the gate, only he came alone; neither did any man meet him with the least encouragement. When he was coming up to the gate, he looked up to the writing that was above, and then began to knock, supposing that entrance should have been quickly administered to him; but he was asked by the men that looked over the top of the gate, "Whence come you, and what would you have?" He answered, "I have ate and drank in the presence of the King, and he has taught in our streets." Then they asked for his certificate, that they might go in and show it to the King: so he fumbled in his bosom for one, and found none. Then said they "You have none!" But the man answered never a word. So they told the King, but he would not come down to see him, but commanded the two shining ones that conducted Christian and Hopeful to the city to go out and take Ignorance, and bind him hand and foot, and have him away. Then they took him up and carried him through the air to the door that I saw on the side of the hill, and put him in there. Then I saw that there was a way to hell even from the gates of heaven, as well as from the City of Destruction. John Bunyan.

9745. IGNORANCE, Guilt of. He that voluntarily continues ignorant, is guilty of all the crimes which ignorance produces: as to him that should extinguish the tapers of a light-house might justly be imputed the calamities of shipwrecks. Dr. Johnson.

9746. IGNORANCE, Inexcusable. To write or talk concerning any subject, without having previously taken the pains to understand it, is a breach of the duty which we owe to ourselves, though it may be no offence against the laws of the land. The privilege of talking and even publishing nonsense is necessary in a free state; but the more sparingly we make use of it the better. Coleridge.

9747. IGNORANCE, Instinct and. As a cock was scratching up the straw in a farmyard, in search of food for the hens, he hit upon a jewel that by some chance had found its way there. "He!" said he, "you are a very fine thing, no doubt, to those who prize you; but give me a barley-corn before all the pearls in the world." The cock was a sensible cock; but there are many silly people who despise what is precious because they cannot understand it. Æsop.

9748. IGNORANCE, Unexpected. Samuel Wesley visited one of his parishioners as he was upon his dying bed—a man who had never missed going to church in forty years. Thomas, where do you think your soul will go? "Soul! soul!" said Thomas. "Yes, sir," said Mr. Wesley, "do you not know what your soul is?" "Ay, surely," said Thomas; "why, it is a little bone in the back that lives longer than the body." "So much," says John Wesley, who related it on the authority of Dr. Lupton, who had it from his father, "had Thomas learned from hearing sermons, and exceedingly good sermons, for forty years." Dr. J. B. Wakeley.

9749. IGNORANCE, Violence of. There never was any party, faction, sect, or cabal whatsoever, in which the most ignorant were not the most violent: for a bee is not a busier animal than a blockhead. However, such instruments are necessary to politicians; and, perhaps, it may be with states as with clocks, which must have some lead weight hanging at them, to help and regulate the motion of the finer and more useful parts. Pope.

9750. ILLIBERALITY Cured. A little girl cured her fashionable mother of giving little when she should have given much, by saying, "I wonder if Mr. — saw what you gave this morning? If he didn't, God did, and he knows how rich you are."

9751. ILLIBERALITY, Excuse for. A clergyman was endeavoring to get a subscription in aid of some charitable institution out of a close parishioner, who attempted to excuse himself on the ground that he already owed a great deal of money. "But, said the minister, 'you owe God a larger debt than you do any one else.'" "That is so, parson; but then he ain't pushing like the balance of my creditors."

9752. ILLIBERALITY, Self-Condemed. A man being asked for five dollars for a worthy object of benevolence, replied, "O, I can't! I have had $100,000 lying in bank several months without drawing interest." He could not perceive that he had condemned himself.

9753. ILLS, Bear Present. The bees, once on a time, determined to make an end of the butchers, whose whole art, they said, was conceived for their destruction. So they assembled together, and had already whetted their horns for the contest, when a very old ox, who had long worked at the plough, thus addressed them: "Have a care, my friends, what you do. These men, at least, kill us with decency and skill; but if we fall to the hands of butchers instead of butchers, we shall suffer a double death; for be well assured, men will not go without beef, even though they were without butchers." Better to bear with the ills we have than to fly to others that we know not of. Æsop.

9754. ILLS, No Remedies for. A rich slipper will not cure the gout, a diamond ring a whitlow, nor will an imperial diadem ease the headache. Plutarch.

9755. ILLS, Origin of. All ills spring from some vice, either in ourselves or others; and even many of our diseases proceed from the same origin. Remove the vices and the ills follow. You must only take care to remove all the vices. If you remove part, you may render the matter worse. By banishing vicious luxury, without curing sloth and an indifference to others, you only diminish industry in the State, and add nothing to men's charity or their generosity. David Hume.

9756. ILLUSTRATION, Advantage of. An illustration is a moral painting on which the imagination has been employed; and it has the advantage over the simple annunciation of a truth, that it appeals to both the faculties—the reason and imagination; like the painting on the canvas, which, while it charms the eye, also interests the mind—or like the incense which flamed on Jewish altars, which arrested the eye with its cloudy pillar, while it regaled the senses with its fragrance. Salter.

9757. ILLUSTRATION, Benefit of. Illustration includes everything which is employed to make an argument intelligible, attractive, or convincing; but in more recent times it has been restricted to such rhetorical figures as the metaphor, simile, allegory and parable. In this narrower sense I use it now, and in treating of it we must bear in mind, in the outset, that illustrations ought not to form the staple of a sermon. There must be something to be illustrated. The beauty of a simile lies in its pertinence to the point you design to brighten by its light; but when illustrations are employed purely for the sake of the stories in which they consist, are a snare to the poverty of thought, they are a snare to the preacher and an offence to the hearer. We may paint a picture, but we must never do that simply for the sake of the picture. We must not construct ornament, but seek only to ornament construction. But, presuming that you have in your discourse a body of substantial thought or a closely-linked argumentative chain, what is the use of illustration? Various answers, all equally true and equally important, may be given. It helps to make the matter in hand more plain. It uses that which is known and acknowledged to be true in such a way as to lead the mind of the hearer to the acceptance of something else, of which hitherto he has been in doubt.

It employs the imagination for the assistance of the judgment, and brings the material to the aid of the spiritual, using the one as a diagram for the demonstration of the other. But there is more than an illuminating power in a good illustration. There is a force of proof as well. Wherever smiles rest on the unity between God's world and man's nature, they are arguments, as well as illustrations. The "like" is intimately connected with the "likeness." The similitude is a ground of probability; and, as the physical philosopher by analogy has been led to some of his finest discoveries, so the preacher by the use of illustration may lead his hearers to the discovery of new truths. There is a principle of unity running through revelation, nature and Providence, such that what is found in one has its "double" in the others. This is the principle that gives the Saviour's parables their power. They are not merely felicitous yet arbitrary illustrations. They are outward symbols of inward realities. And, though we may not claim the same force of argument for every analogy which we discover; yet in so far as the analogy is true, the illustration we use has a force of proof; and even when it may fall short of establishing a probability, it is invaluable, as Butler has shown in his immortal work, in answering objections. But the employment of telling illustrations is of great service in awakening the interest of an audience. The "like" leads to the "likely" and is that for which men have a "liking." Every one delights in a vivid and effective illustration. And just as the child reads the book to find out what the picture means, so a hearer will listen to learn what you are going to make of your analogy. While you are dealing with the story he is all attention, and it will be your own fault if, before his interest flags, you have not insinuated your lesson or pointed your application. Moreover, impressions thus produced are never forgotten. You may find difficulty in recalling an intricate argument; but that which has been fastened to an illustration fixes itself in your memory. Guthrie has put the whole thing into a nutshell when he says—his own words illustrating the very principle laid down: "By awakening and gratifying the imagination, the truth finds its way more readily to the heart and makes a deeper impression on the memory. The story, like a float, keeps it from sinking; like a nail, fastens it in the mind; like the feathers of an arrow, makes it strike; and, like the barb, makes it stick." Dr. W. M. Taylor.

9758. ILLUSTRATION, Blunder in. Coleridge tells the following story of Lord Kenyon. In one of his speeches his lordship said: "Above all, need I name to you the Emperor Julian, who was so celebrated for the practice of every Christian virtue that he was called Julian the Apostle!"

9759. ILLUSTRATION, Cautions Regarding. But a few cautions must be observed in the use of illustrations. For one thing, we must not attempt to illustrate that which is already perfectly plain. You cannot handle crystal without leaving on it the marks of your touch, and they will mar its transparency. Again, do not use too many illustrations for the same purpose. The effect of such a course will be to bewilder and dazzle, rather than to enlighten. One lamp is worth a million fire-flies. When, therefore, you have obtained a good illustration, leave it to do its work and go on. Still further, do not use as illustrations things which are in themselves recondite and obscure, needing to be explained. Take the familiar to brighten that which is strange; but, just because you are dealing in the familiar, take care that you have got it accurately; for if your hearers see that you cannot be depended on in describing things in their department, they will place no reliance on you when you are talking of matters in your own. Finally, be careful always that the full force of the illustration goes to illuminate the truth which you are expounding. The foot-lights are studiously veiled from the eyes of the spectators; but they throw a lustre on the actor's face. Like them, our illustrations must not draw attention to ourselves, but to the truth we have in hand. We must not turn them on ourselves, but on the Master and his work. It is as criminal to hide him beneath gorgeous illustrations as it is to ignore him altogether. We may and ought to cover our faces before him; but we must never put a veil, no matter how exquisite may be its texture, over his countenance. Dr. W. M. Taylor.

9760. ILLUSTRATION, Cultivating the Faculty of. But how are we to get illustrations? In answer, let me say, first, that no one should be discouraged here; for, judging from my own experience, there is no faculty more susceptible of development by culture than that of discovering analogies. We may paraphrase here the inscription on Wren's monument, and say, "Si illustrationes quaeris circumspice." You will find them everywhere—in the talk of the children and the shouts of the schoolboys; on the street and in the store; on the ship and in the railroad car; in the field of Nature and on the page of literature. Only compel yourself for a time to look at everything with the question uppermost, "What use can I make of that in commending the truth of Christ to my fellow-men?" And by and by you will have so formed the habit that, unconsciously and without any effort on your part, the finest analogies will strike you. Dr. W. M. Taylor.

9761. ILLUSTRATION, Effect of. The effect of illustration is that which Wharton has remarked respecting the moral passages in Dyer's poetry—that "the unexpected insertion of such reflections imparts to us the same pleasure which we feel, when, in wandering through a wilderness or grove, we suddenly behold in the turning of the walk a statue of some virtue or muse."

9762. ILLUSTRATION, Example of. The philosopher Knox refers to Hannah More's recommendation of this manner of instruction as follows: "I am ready to think he (John Wesley) came nearer your own most excellent idea than any other person whose writings I have seen. When you 'advise, instruct to be communicated, in a way that shall interest the feelings by lively images; and when you observe that 'there seems to be no good reason why religion must be dry and uninteresting, while every other thing is to be made amusing; and ask, 'why should not the most entertaining powers of the human mind be supremely consecrated to that subject which is most worthy of their full exercise?' I read that of which I must say, John Wesley gives me the most entire exemplification I have ever met with, except in the Bible." Salter.

9763. ILLUSTRATION, Facility of. Whitefield understood the power of illustration. He ever kept the volume of nature open before him, delighting to unfold its magnificent pages. The ocean, the thunder-storm, the bow encircling the heavens, furnished him with themes to illustrate his subject; or a trial, or a pilot-fish, or a furnace—in fact, anything and everything, whether magnificently grand or ever so insignificant, he made subservient to his oratorical powers. His eloquence reminded one of the ocean, adding, as it does, to its own boundlessness, contributions from every part of the universe. Well has it been said that Whitefield "ransacked creation for figures, time for facts, heaven for motives, hell for warnings, and eternity for arguments."

Philips.

9764. ILLUSTRATION, Notable Examples of. George Herbert says, "It is an ill mason that refuseth any stone; and there is no knowledge but, in a skillful hand, serves either positively as it is, or else to illustrate some other knowledge." In all ages they have been the greatest powers, both in the pulpit, in the classroom, and on the platform, who have kept this truth in mind. The fathers of the early church, who lived in days nearest to those of the Son of man—the Puritans, whose names are inspiration still—enrich their discourses with simile, metaphor and anecdote. These made all nature, all history, all the lives of men their treasury, out of which to bring the "new" things which were to embellish and enforce the "old."

Dr. W. M. Punshon.

9765. ILLUSTRATION, Power of. If a man would use illustration as a power for good, he must cultivate a refinement of thought in his own mind. He must have a clear perception of the truth itself, and of the fitness and fulness of the analogy by which he means to illuminate it; and then he must learn to present it gracefully, that it may attract without startling, and be a "power of surprise" without awakening either repulsion or alarm. Above all, he must remember that the illustration is but the handmaid in the palace, while truth is the queen upon the throne. And he will take care that truth be not hampered by too many handmaids, nor, like the Roman matron, hindered in her progress by the weight of her own jewels.

Dr. W. M. Punshon.

9766. ILLUSTRATIONS, Arrows. Talking of preaching, Dr. Guthrie said to me, "When I was in my first parish, I used to have a class of young pupils whom I questioned about my sermons. Thus I learned what parts were best remembered, and I found that they always remembered best the parts that had illustrations. So I resolved never to shoot off an arrow without winging it."

Newman Hall.

9767. ILLUSTRATIONS, Books of. To a letter, inquiring as to the propriety of the use of Cyclopædias of Illustration, Dr. Curry replied in the Christian Advocate: "To us it seems that the worst thing a minister can do (leaving immoralities aside) is to preach poor sermons; and yet there is reason to suspect that there is a great amount of poor preaching. Whatever means, therefore, are not immoral, may be resorted to, to remedy this evil, and should be freely used, so as to make the sermons really good. One minister out of four may have the genius requisite to originate sermons in due supply for a regular course of church services. The other three-fourths must either draw on other men's productions, or else starve their hearers on weak and ill-prepared diet. There are enough ways in which any minister of fair intelligence and a modicum of common sense may avail himself of the helps offered him in the wide range of pulpit literature, so as to give both richness and variety to his ministrations; and he must be very unskillful who could not do this without making false pretenses to originality. It is sometimes thought that such a method would favor idleness in the preacher, but we think quite the contrary. Whoever shall attempt to wisely select and skillfully arrange the best thoughts of the great Christian thinkers, so as to present a proper unity in each discourse or arranged selection, will find that he has given himself no inconsiderable task. It certainly is not designed to find a way for preaching made easy; but, if possible, to replace the vapid common-places of very many of our prevailing spoken sermons by something better, because richer in thought and more forcible in illustration and application."

9768. ILLUSTRATIONS, Enticement of. Plato in his Symposium, where he disputed of the chief end of the chief good, and is altogether on subjects theological, doth not lay down strong and close demonstrations; he doth not prepare himself for the contest like a wrestler, that he may take the fastest hold of his adversary and be more sure of giving him the trip; but he draws men on by more soft and pliable attacks, by pleasant fictions and pat examples.

Plutarch.

9769. ILLUSTRATIONS, Memory of. George Herbert, in his "Country Parson," says: "Sometimes he tells them stories and sayings of others, according as his text invites him: for them also men heed, and remember better than exhortations which, though earnest, die with the sermon. But stories and sayings they will remember."

9770. ILLUSTRATIONS, Natural. The whole visible world is a large Bible full of parables, allegories, and doctrines. They were written before there were men to read them, that after man's creation he might immediately begin to learn and spell; as you have seen a schoolmaster write on the black-board before the children assemble, so as not to lose time, but to be able to begin his instructions at once.

Alban Stolz.

9771. ILLUSTRATIONS, Oriental. Molly says of his journey in the East:—Every day brought some new scene, which explained some passage of the Bible we had hardly understood, or gave force to some other one, which we had scarcely appreciated. One day we met a Bedouin, rich in herds, who was pursuing a single sheep, or camel, across the sandy wastes, tracking the animal by its footsteps; the next we might come on the ninety-and-nine left without their shepherd. We have felt the disappointment of arriving at a well and finding the waters bitter. And the cup of cold water cannot be fully appreciated except in a country like this, where the water, rare to get at any time, can hardly ever be obtained, even tepid, and generally has a taste of the skin it is kept in, which would disgust any but the most thirsty. Our Lord's command is still obeyed by these people, indeed, throughout the East, and you may always drink any quantity of water, wherever it may belong to. I was surprised once at seeing a Bedouin walk up to my camel and drink a whole bottle of water, my supply for the day; and I have often, when out shooting, gone into a hut or tent, and asked for water, which the poor people have had to carry a great distance. Not only have I never been refused, but my offer of a piastre or two was never accepted; they gave it to me, as a Nubian woman once beautifully expressed it, "for God's sake." One of our guides told us how he was ruined last year; for, entrusting his flocks to a "hireling," they were all eaten by a wolf (hyena), and scattered over the desert, while he was leading some merchants over the sandy plains. When, after a march of ten days over stony hills and arid plains of deep sand, we came suddenly upon the broad river, winding through the rich green of the durra-covered banks, we could exclaim with the Psalmist, "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside still waters;" and, as a Bedouin in advance of us called his servant, who was walking before him with his sandals, that he might put them on before he reached the village, we remembered that John the Baptist did not deem himself worthy to unloose the latchet of our Saviour's shoes.

9772. ILLUSTRATIONS, Result of. There was a wild, dissolute, brilliant English youth, who distributed the drink at a public house. In the same town was a dissenting chapel whither a story-telling cobbler drew the people by the power of his illustrations. The youth said to his companions, "Come, let us go down and hear old Cole tell his stories." They went, and the result was the youth's conversion, followed by a ministry of remarkable power and eloquence in the life of George Whitefield.

9773. IMAGINATION, Chambers of the. The mind of man is a chamber of imagery. We have the power to conceive picturesque thoughts, to conjure up scenes and circumstances from either experience or imagination, and thus to constitute the mind as a picture gallery, more or less furnished in proportion as we cultivate the study and taste for these things. It is thus that the "Pilgrim's Progress" has commanded a reputation beyond that of any other uninspired work. It is itself a gallery of pictures—states of mind described, abstract principles personified, and the whole inward experience of the soul expressed in the form of outward and familiar illustration. R. Maquire.

9774. IMAGINATION, Charm of. It is this talent of affecting the imagination that gives an embellishment to good sense, and makes one man's compositions more agreeable than another's. It sets off all writings in general, but is the very life and highest perfection of poetry, where it shines in an eminent degree. It has preserved several poems for many ages, that have nothing else to recommend them; and where all the other beauties are present, the work appears dry and insipid if this single one be wanting. It has something in it like creation. It bestows a kind of existence, and draws up to the reader's view several objects which are not to be found in being. It makes additions to nature, and gives a greater variety to God's works. In a word, it is able to beautify and adorn the most illustrious scenes in the universe, or to fill the mind with more glorious shows and apparitions than can be found in any part of it. Addison.

9775. IMAGINATION, Imposition of. A nobleman in Portugal became possessed with the idea that God would never pardon his sins. His agony was great, and he wasted away as if by disease. Every means was made use of that would divert his mind, but all to no purpose. At last it was decided to break the spell by artifice. Going into a room above him, about midnight, an opening was made in the ceiling, and an artificial angel, having a drawn sword in his right hand, and a lighted torch in his left, appeared to him. He rose up in his bed and adored the angel, and while he worshiped, the angel told him "all his sins had been forgiven." The torch was then extinguished, and the angel passed away. The man was overjoyed at the vision, and roused his family to tell them what had transpired. After that his health became good, and he was never troubled with the thought of unpardoned sin.

9776. IMAGINATION, Pleasures of the. A man of a polite imagination is let into a great many pleasures that the vulgar are not capable of receiving. He can converse with a picture, and find an agreeable companion in a statue. He meets with a secret refreshment in a description, and often feels a greater satisfaction in the prospect of fields and meadows than another does in the possession. It gives him, indeed, a kind of property in everything he sees, and makes the most rude, uncultivated parts of nature administer to his pleasures: so that he looks upon the world as it were in another light, and discovers in it a multitude of charms that conceal themselves from the generality of mankind.

Addison.

9777. IMAGINATION, Riches of. Thrasilaus, the son of Pythodorus, imagined that all the ships that came into the harbor belonged to him. He would number them and dismiss them, but took no account of those that were shipwrecked. Thus he was rich, while harmlessly but pleasantly passing his time. In after times, when cured of this malady, he affirmed that he never lived so happily as when indulging in his madness.

9778. IMITATION, Faulty. When a boy is learning to write, his master either gives him a copy-slip or else writes the first line in the page for him. Now, I have often seen a boy write the next line with some care, looking at the letters he had to copy. But when he came to the third line, instead of looking at his copy, he looked only at his own writing just above. And what came of that? Why, he copied all his faults, and made more too, so that every line down the page was worse than the one before it. He never tried to make each line more like his copy.

Dr. J. M. Freeman.

9779. IMITATION, Law of. Now, it is the nature of love, at least in reference to a superior, that it always inclines and disposes to imitation of him. A child's love to his father disposes him to imitate his father, and especially does the love of God's children dispose them to imitate their Heavenly Father.

Dr. J. Edwards.

9780. IMITATION, Passion of. The second passion belonging to society is imitation, or, if you will, a desire of imitating, and consequently a pleasure in it. This passion arises from much the same cause with sympathy. For as sympathy makes us take a concern in whatever men feel, so this affection prompts us to copy whatever they do; and consequently we have a pleasure in imitating, and in whatever belongs to imitation merely as it is such, without any intervention of the reasoning faculty; but solely from our natural constitution, which Providence has framed in such a manner as to find either pleasure or delight, according to the nature of the object, in whatever regards the purposes of our being. It is by imitation far more than by precept that we learn everything; and what we learn thus, we acquire not only more effectually, but more pleasantly. This forms our manners, our opinions, our lives. It is one of the strongest links of society; it is a species of mutual compliance which all men yield to each other, without constraint to themselves, and which is extremely flattering to all. Herein it is that painting and many other agreeable arts have the principal foundations of their power.

Burke.

9781. IMMENSITY, Image of. I never passed the desert without experiencing very painful emotions. It was the image of immensity to my thoughts. It showed no limits. It had neither beginning nor end. It was an ocean for the foot of man!

Napoleon I.

9782. IMMORTALITY, Consideration of. The cast of mind which is natural to a discreet man makes him look forward into futurity, and consider what will be his condition millions of ages hence, as well as what it is at present. He knows that the misery or happiness which are reserved for him in another world lose nothing of their reality by being at so great distance from him. The objects do not appear little to him because they are remote. He considers that those pleasures and pains which lie hid in eternity approach nearer to him every moment, and will be present with him in their full weight and measure, as much as those pains and pleasures which he feels at this very instant. For this reason he is careful to secure to himself that which is the proper happiness of his nature and the ultimate design of his being. He carries his thoughts to the end of every action, and considers the most distant as well as the most immediate effects of it. He supersedes every little prospect of gain and advantage which offers itself here, if he does not find it consistent with his views of an hereafter. In a word, his hopes are full of immortality, his schemes are large and glorious, and his conduct suitable to one who knows his true interest, and how to pursue it by proper methods.

Addison.

9783. IMMORTALITY, Emblems of. An English nobleman was once exploring among the catacombs of Egypt. He came to one mummy case, which bore a date two thousand years before. On unwrapping the many folds of linen from the shriveled form, he found in the blackened hand a dahlia bulb. For all these ages the hand of death had held it. Could there be life in it still? The gentleman took it home, and placed it in a pot of warm moist soil. He tended it carefully for a few weeks; and what was his surprise and delight, to see the soil part, and the tender shoots of a strong, vigorous dahlia spring up. In due time it bore a beautiful blossom, which was looked upon with an interest deeper and stronger than ever greeted such a flower before. It seemed almost beyond belief that life could exist so long, shut out from all that nourishes life. Yet this is but a faint type of the immortality of that soul which once moved the lifeless hand which so long had grasped it.

F. F. Trench.

9784. IMMORTALITY, Faith in. Plato represents his admirable Socrates, after an unjust condemnation to death in the prison at Athens, encompassed with a noble circle of philosophers, discoursing of the soul's immortality; and that having finished his arguments for it, he drank the cup of poison with an undisturbed courage, as one that did not lose, but exchange this short and wretched life for a blessed and eternal. For thus he argued, that there are two ways of departing souls, leading to two contrary states, of felicity and of misery. Those who had defiled themselves with sensual vices, and given full scope to boundless lust in their private conversation, or who by frauds and violence had been injurious to the commonwealth, are dragged to a place of torment, and forever excluded from the joyful presence of the blessed society above. But those who had preserved themselves upright and chaste, at the greatest distance possible from the contagion of the flesh, and had during their union with human bodies imitated the divine life, by an easy and open way returned to God from whom they came. And this was not the sense only of the more virtuous heathens, but even some of those who had done the greatest force to human nature, yet could not so slacken their minds and corrupt their wills, but there remained in them stinging apprehensions of punishment hereafter. Buck.

9785. IMMORTALITY, Forfeiture of. Before a court in the province of Pesth, Hungary, a suit was pending in which an aged Jew was to make a statement under oath. He was about to take the oath, when another Jew arose and protested against it. "This man dare not take an oath." "Why not?" asked the judge. "There exists a Hebrew prayer which contains the sentence that 'every Jew has a share in the life to come.' About twenty years ago, I was present when the man who is now about to take an oath sold his 'share in the life to come,' guaranteed to him in the prayer, to another Jew, a Mr. Y., who paid him a certain amount of money for it. As he, therefore, can not count any longer on a future existence, he has nothing to fear or hope for in the life to come; it must be certainly indifferent to him whether he swear to a truth or a falsehood." After examination the statement was found to be true, and the court granted the protest of the old man, and the party who sold his "share in the life to come" was declared incapable of taking an oath.

9786. IMMORTALITY, Heathen. If the soul be immortal, it requires to be cultivated with attention, not only for what we call the time of life, but for that which is to follow—I mean eternity; and the least neglect in this point may be attended with endless consequences. If death were the final dissolution of being, the wicked would be great gainers by it, by being delivered at once from their bodies, their souls, and their vices; but, as the soul is immortal, it has no other means of being freed from its evils, nor any safety for it, but in becoming very good and very wise; for it carries nothing with it but its bad or good deeds, its virtues and vices, which are commonly the consequences of the education it has received, and the causes of eternal happiness or misery. Socrates.

9787. IMMORTALITY, Heathen Ideas of. Can we think that God so little considers his own actions, or is such a waster of his time in trifles, that, if we had nothing of divine within us, nothing that in the least resembled his perfections, nothing permanent and stable, but were only poor creatures that (according to Homer's expression) faded and dropped like withered leaves, and in a short time too, yet he should make so great account of us—like women that bestow their pains in making little gardens, no less delightful to them than the gardens of Adonis, in earthen pans and pots—as to create us souls to blossom and flourish only for a day in a soft and tender body of flesh, without any firm and solid root of life, and then to be blasted and extinguished in a moment upon every slight occasion? It is impious to declare that the human soul can die. There is one and the same reason to confirm the providence of God and the immortality of the soul; neither is it possible to admit the one if you deny the other. Now, then, the soul surviving after the decease of the body, the inference is the stronger that it partakes of punishment and reward. For during the mortal life the soul is in continual combat, like a wrestler; but after all those conflicts are at an end, she then receives according to her merits. What the punishments and what the rewards of past transgressions or just and laudable actions are to be while the soul is thus alone by itself, is nothing at all to us that are alive; for either they are altogether concealed from our knowledge, or else we give little credit to them. Plutarch.

9788. IMMORTALITY, Importance of. The announcement of life and immortality by the gospel, did it contain no other truth, were sufficient to cast all the discoveries of science into shade, and to reduce the highest improvements of reason to the comparative nothingness which the flight of a moment bears to eternity. By this discovery the prospects of human nature are infinitely widened, the creature of yesterday becomes the child of eternity; and as felicity is not the less valuable in the eye of reason because it is remote, nor the misery which is certain less to be deprecated because it is not immediately felt, the care of our future interests becomes our chief, and, properly speaking, our only concern. All besides will shortly become nothing; and, therefore, whenever it comes into competition with these, it is as the small dust of the balance. Robert Hall.

9789. IMMORTALITY, Legend of. A strong friendship existed between Michael Mercatus, the elder, and Marsilius Ficinus. They possessed an equal veneration for the doctrines of Plato, and discoursed together on the state of man after death. When their disputation and discourse had grown somewhat lengthy they mutually agreed: "That whichever of them two should first depart out of this life, he should inform the survivor of the state of the other life, and whether the soul be immortal or not." Some time after this agreement was made, Michael Mercatus was early at his study, when he heard the noise of a horse upon a gallop, and then stopping at his door. He heard Marsilius, his friend, crying to him: "O Michael, Michael! those things are true, they are true!" Michael wondering to hear his friend's voice, rose up, and opening the casement saw Marsilius riding away on a white horse. He called after him, and followed him with his eye, but he soon vanished out of sight. Amazed at this, he solicitously inquired if anything had happened to Marsilius, who then lived at Florence. Upon inquiry he found that he had died at the very time he had heard and seen him.

9790. IMMORTALITY, Opinions of. Plato and Pythagoras say that the soul is immortal; when it departs out of the body, it retreats to the Soul of the World, which is a being of the same nature with it. The Stoics—when the souls leave the bodies, they are carried to divers places; the souls of the unlearned and ignorant descend to the coagmentation of earthly things, but the learned and vigorous endure till the general fire. Epicurus and Democritus—the soul is mortal and perisheth with the body. Plato and Pythagoras—that part of the soul of man which is rational is eternal; for though it be not God, yet it is the product of an eternal Deity; but that part of the soul which is divested of reason dies.

Plutarch.

9791. IMMORTALITY, Pagan Faith in. When I consider the wonderful activity of the mind, so great a memory of what is past, and such a capacity of penetrating into the future; when I behold such a number of arts and sciences, and such a multitude of discoveries thence arising: I believe and am firmly persuaded that a nature which contains so many things within itself cannot be mortal. . . . But if I err in believing that the souls of men are immortal, I willingly err; nor while I live would I wish to have this delightful error extorted from me; and if after death I shall feel nothing, as some minute philosophers think, I am not afraid lest dead philosophers should laugh at me for the error.

Cicero.

9792. IMMORTALITY, Question of. Upon this short question, "Is man immortal, or is he not?" depends all that is valuable in science, in morals, and in theology,—and all that is most interesting to man as a social being and as a rational and accountable intelligence. If he is destined to an eternal existence, an immense importance must attach to all his present affections, actions and pursuits; and it must be a matter of infinite moment that they be directed in such a channel as will tend to carry him forward in safety to the felicities of a future world. But if his whole existence be circumscribed within the circle of a few fleeting years, man appears an enigma, an inexplicable phenomenon in the universe, human life a mystery, the world a scene of confusion, virtue a mere phantom, the Creator a capricious being, and his plans and arrangements an inextricable maze.

Dr. Dick.

9793. IMMORTALITY, Seekers after. As all people feel that they must die, each seeks immortality on earth, that he may be had in everlasting remembrance. Some great princes and kings seek it by raising great columns of stone, and high pyramids, great churches, costly and glorious palaces, castles, etc. Soldiers hunt after praise and honor, by obtaining famous victories. The learned seek an undying name by writing books. With these, and such like things, people think to be immortal.

Luther.

9794. IMMUTABILITY, Divine. If God be immutable, it is sad news to those that are resolved in wickedness, or careless of returning to that duty he requires. Sinners must not expect that God will alter his will, make a breach upon his nature, and violate his own word, to gratify their lusts. No, it is not reasonable God should dishonor himself to secure them, and cease to be God, that they may continue to be wicked, by changing his own nature, that they may be unchanged in their vanity. God is the same; goodness is as amiable in his sight, and sin as abominable in his eyes, now, as it was at the beginning of the world. Being the same God, he is the same enemy to the wicked, as the same friend to the righteous. He is the same in knowledge, and cannot forget sinful acts. He is the same in will, and cannot approve of unrighteous practices. Goodness cannot but be always the object of his love, and wickedness cannot but be always the object of his hatred; and as his aversion to sin is always the same, so as he hath been in his judgments upon sinners, the same he will be still; for the same perfection of immutability belongs to his justice for the punishment of sin, as to his holiness for his disaffection to sin.

Charnock.

9795. IMPATIENCE, Aggravation of. "If God afflict thee, let not impatience add to the affliction." Impatience makes the wound the more painful. Hannah More on her dying bed was asked, "Is there anything we can do for you?" She answered, "Nothing; but leave me and forgive me if I am impatient."

9796. IMPATIENCE, Biblical Examples of. Esau, Gen. 25: 29-31. "Behold I am at the point to die." Esau was then only about thirty-two, and in perfect health! "And what profit shall this birthright do to me?" Too impatient to wait, the craving a moment's gratification, made him blind to the value of the birthright he recklessly threw away! Sarah, Gen. 16, grown weary of waiting God's time, tried to hasten, by means of her own devising, the fulfillment of God's promise. Rachel.—"Give me children, or else I die," Gen. 30: 1. Oh, how hard it would go with us, if God gave us all our desires! Rachel had children given her, and died in child-bearing, Gen. 35: 16-20. "Enjoyments snatched out of God's hands, like fruit plucked before it is ripe, soon rot, and only injure. Like David's child, born in adultery, they die in the birth."—(Gurnall.)

Bowes.

9797. IMPATIENCE, Nature of. Impatience is a quality sudden, eager, and insatiable, which grasps at all, and admits of no delay: scorning to wait God's leisure, and attend humbly and dutifully upon the issues of his wise and just Providence.

South.

9798. IMPATIENCE, Penalty of. A mother who was preparing some flour to bake into bread, left it for a few moments, when little Mary, with childish curiosity took hold of the dish, which fell to the floor, spilling the contents. The mother struck the child a severe blow, saying, with anger, that she was always in the way. Two weeks after the child sickened and died. On her death-bed, while delirious, she asked her mother if there would be room for her among the angels. "I was always in your way, mother—you had no room for little Mary! And will I be in the angels' way?" The broken-hearted mother saw her fault, and would have done anything to save her child or wipe the dark spot from her own or the child's memory. God often takes us at our word.

9799. IMPERFECTION, Human. In playing over a tune upon an instrument, a single string may jar and slip, and yet the main be musical. It would be folly, indeed, to think our fields had no corn in them, because there is chaff about the wheat; or that the ore had no gold in it, because there is dross among it. In heaven there is service alone without any sin; in hell there is sin alone without any service: but on earth there is sin and service in the same man, as there is light and shade in the same picture. Secker.

9800. IMPERFECTION, Marks of. A large and beautiful block of marble was brought from Paros, out of which it was designed to chisel a statue of the great Napoleon. The famous sculptor, Canova, surveyed it with critical eyes, before commencing work upon it, and discovered a slight red mark traversing the block. To the unskilled it was an insignificant matter, but Canova said, "I cannot work upon this; it has a flaw. It is not perfectly pure and white. I will not lay my chisel upon it." So he rejected it. What imperfections does the omniscient eye detect in the purest human characters? Yet he does not reject them on this account.

9801. IMPERFECTIONS, Universal. I have known several persons of great fame for wisdom in public affairs and councils, governed by foolish servants. I have known great ministers, distinguished for wit and learning, who preferred none but dunces. I have known men of valor cowards to their wives. I have known men of cunning perpetually cheated. I knew three ministers, who would exactly compute and settle the accounts of a kingdom, wholly ignorant of their own economy. Walpole.

9802. IMPIETY, Bold. Mahomet Effendi was a man well skilled in Oriental learning, but a vile blasphemer. One of his principal arguments against the being of God was, "That if there was a God, and he so wise and omnipotent as his priests declared him to be, he would never suffer him to live that was the greatest enemy and reproacher of the Deity in the world, but would strike him dead with lightning, or by some other dreadful punishment, and thus make him an example to others." He was at last condemned to die for his open blasphemy. He chose rather to die a martyr for his wicked principles than to obtain life by reformation, and so was executed.

9803. IMPIETY, Mohammedan. Mahomet Second made a furious assault upon the city of Scodra, but was repulsed by its inhabitants. In his rage, he wished he had never heard the name of Scodra, and most horribly blasphemed God, impiously, saying, "That it was enough for God to take care of heavenly things, and not to cross him in his worldly actions."

9804. IMPIETY, Papal. Pope Leo Tenth, looking at the pile of money he had accumulated through the sale of indulgences, said to Cardinal Bembo, "See what a deal of wealth we have gotten by this fable of Christ!" When he lay upon his death-bed, the cardinal repeated a passage of scripture to comfort him. He sneeringly replied, "Away with these baubles concerning Christ!"

9805. IMPIETY, Punishment of. The punishment for sacrilege among the Grecians was death. Philomelus, Onomarchus, and Phaulus, had despoiled the temple of Delphos, and their punishment was divinely allotted them. One was thrown from a steep place and killed; one was burnt alive, and the other was drowned.

9806. IMPOSSIBILITY, Conditions of. An orphan boy was left to the tender and loving authority of five old-maid aunts (the five wise virgins, as they thought). One said he might go anywhere, except out of doors—he must not be allowed to become a street-rat; another said he might go anywhere, except in the house; the third said he must not stand up; the fourth forbade his sitting down; and the fifth forbade his lying down. So the poor boy was reduced to a state of absolute impossibility. Dr. Fowler.

9807. IMPOSSIBILITY, Example of. The Egyptian hieroglyphics represent an impossibility by depicting a man walking on the sea.

9808. IMPRACTICABLE, Fable of the. Once upon a time the mice being sadly distressed by the persecution of the cat, resolved to call a meeting to decide upon the best means of getting rid of this continual annoyance. Many plans were discussed and rejected; at last a young mouse got up, and proposed that a bell should be hung round the cat's neck, that they might for the future always have notice of her coming, and so be enabled to escape. This proposition was hailed with the greatest applause, and was agreed to at once unanimously. Upon which an old mouse, who had sat silent all the while, got up and said that he considered the contrivance most ingenious, and that it would, no doubt, be quite successful; but he had only one short question to put, namely, which of them it was who would bell the cat? Æsop.

9809. IMPRECATIONS Answered. Some English soldiers in the time of Edward the Sixth, were shipwrecked on the French coast in a storm. In great distress they prayed they might be saved. One soldier instead of praying, cried out, "Gallows, claim thy due." When he did arrive home he met the fate for which he prayed. Another man was wont on every ordinary occasion to say, "If it be not so, I pray God I may rot before I die." His prayer was answered. A mother, who was very angry with her son, cried, "Go thy ways, God grant thou mayest never return alive again to me." The same day the young man was drowned.

9810. IMPRECATIONS Fulfilled. Narcissus, Bishop of Jerusalem, a man of faultless life, and faithful in reproving vice of every kind, was falsely accused. His first accuser said in closing his testimony, "If these things are not so, may I perish by fire." Another said, "If I speak anything of falsehood, I pray God I may be consumed by some cruel disease." The third said, "If I accuse him falsely, I pray God that I may become blind." The accusations against the Bishop were not believed by such as knew the great integrity of the man, but from grief he left his bishopric and retired into private life. But his accusers escaped not the all-seeing justice of heaven. For the house of one of them took fire, and he and his family perished in the flames. The second languished away under a loathsome disease; and the other, seeing the terrible end of his companions, confessed their villainy, and wept over his crime so long that he utterly lost his sight.

9811. IMPRESSIONS, Distant. Any satisfaction we have recently enjoyed, and of which the memory is fresh and perfect, operates on the will with more violence than another of which the traces are decayed and obliterated. Contiguity in time and place has an amazing effect upon the passions. An enormous globe of fire, which fell at Pekin, would not excite half the interest which the most trifling phenomenon could give birth to nearer home. I am persuaded many men might be picked out of the streets, who, for a thousand guineas laid down, would consent to submit to a very cruel death in fifteen years from the time of receiving the money. S. Smith.

9812. IMPRESSIONS, False. Thomas Jackson, in his Life of the Rev. Richard Watson, relates, "that when traveling together, in passing by a churchyard, which is close by the Bath and Bristol road, Mr. Watson pointed to a grave-stone, in a conspicuous situation, and said, 'The first time I traveled this way, that grave-stone caught my eye; and especially the words, who died, aged forty-two. A very deep impression, for which I could not account, was immediately made upon my mind, that I should die precisely at the same age. The impression was both strong and sudden. I have already passed beyond that period; and this shows how little stress can be justly laid upon those sudden impulses and impressions of which some people make so much account.' This impression, it appears, had created considerable uneasiness in the family of Mr. Watson; but its precise effect upon his own mind it is not easy to determine."

9813. IMPRESSIONS Followed. John Bunyan was allowed by his jailer to often leave prison. An officer was sent by his persecutors to inquire into the matter. It so happened that Bunyan was out that night with his family; but he was so restless he could not sleep, and determined to return to the prison. The jailer blamed him for coming in at so unseasonable an hour. The next morning early the officer arrived, and asked, "Are all the prisoners safe?" "Yes." "Is John Bunyan safe?" "Yes." "Let me see him." He answered to the call, and all was well. The messenger left, and the jailer told Bunyan to go in and out when he pleased; "you know better when to return than I can tell you."

9814. IMPRESSIONS, Obeying. As Admiral

Williams sailed near the Island of Ascension, a desolate and uninhabited place, he felt a strong impulse to call there. This course seemed absurd, but the impression grew upon him as he saw the dim outline of the island, and was sailing every moment so that it would be more difficult to call. He gave the order to "put about ship" and steer for Ascension, to which the second officer objected. The Admiral persisted. As they neared it, they caught sight of a signal of distress, and soon rescued sixteen shipwrecked men who were just at the point of starvation.

9816. IMPRISONMENT, Glorifying in. Guy de Brez, a French preacher, was imprisoned in the castle of Tournay. A lady who visited him said she wondered how he could eat, or drink, or sleep in quiet. "Madam," said he, "my chains do not terrify me, or break my sleep; on the contrary, I glory and take delight therein, esteeming them at an higher rate than chains and rings of gold, or jewels of any price whatever. The rattling of my chains is like the effect of an instrument of music in my ears: not that such an effect comes merely from my chains, but it is because I am bound therewith for maintaining the truth of the gospel."

9817. IMPROVEMENT, Discouraged in. Some men get early disgusted with the task of improvement, and the cultivation of the mind, from some excesses which they have committed, and mistakes into which they have been betrayed, at the beginning of life. They abuse the whole art of navigation because they have stuck upon a shoal; whereas, the business is—to refit, careen, and set out a second time. The navigation is very difficult: few of us get through it at first without some rubs and losses, which the world is always ready to forgive, where they are honestly confessed, and diligently repaired. S. Smith.

9818. IMPROVEMENT, Moral. Infinite toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but by ascending a little, you may often look over it altogether. So it is with our moral improvement; we wrestle fiercely with a vicious habit, which could have no hold upon us if we ascended into a higher moral atmosphere. Helps.

9819. IMPROVEMENTS, Objectors to. Baron Humboldt, a traveler in South America, tells us that, upon a road being made over a part of the great chain of mountains called the Andes, the government was petitioned against the road by a body of men, who for centuries had gained a living by carrying travelers in baskets strapped upon their backs over the fearful rocks, which only three guides could cross. Which was the best course;—to make the road, and create the thousand employments belonging to freedom of intercourse for these very carriers of travelers, and for all other men; or to leave the mountains without a road, that the poor guides might gain a premium for risking their lives in an unnecessary peril?

Charles Knight.

9820. IMPROVIDENCE, Characteristics of. It has always been more difficult for a man to keep than to get; for, in the one case, fortune aids, which often assists injustice; but in the other case, sense is required. Therefore, we often see a person deficient in cleverness rise to wealth; and then, from want of sense, roll head-over-heels to the bottom. Basil.

9821. IMPROVIDENCE, Fable of. On a cold frosty day an ant was dragging out some of the corn which he had laid up in summer time, to dry it. A grasshopper, half-perished with hunger, besought the ant to give him a morsel of it to preserve his life. "What were you doing," said the ant, "this last summer?" "Oh," said the grasshopper, "I was not idle. I kept singing all the summer long." Said the ant, laughing and shutting up his granary, "Since you could sing all summer, you may dance all winter." Æsop.

9822. IMPUDENCE, Gratified. Philip Melancthon had gathered together a great quantity of rare coin in gold and silver, and took delight in exhibiting them to his friends, to whom he would now and then give a choice piece. One day a foreigner was visiting him, to whom he showed his collection, and seeing he was pleased with them, bade him choose out one or two of the pieces that he desired the most. "I desire them all," replied the stranger. Melancthon, though disgusted with his immodesty and impudence, gave them all, that he might satisfy his covetousness.

9823. IMPUDENCE, Refusal of. While Archelaus, King of Macedon, sat at supper, one of his guests asked as a gift, the cup of gold out of which the king himself drank. The king called a page, and commanded him to give the cup to Euripides, who sat at the table with him; then looking earnestly at the impudent person who craved it, said, "As for you, sir, you are worthy for your asking to go without, but Euripides deserveth to have, though he asketh not."

9824. IMPURITY, Detection of. Two of the early Christians, while in prison expecting martyrdom, became estranged. A dream which one of them had was received as an admonition, and resulted in reconciliation. In the dream they came into a very luminous place, where their garments became white, and their flesh whiter than their garments, and so wonderfully transparent that there was nothing in their hearts not clearly exposed to view. The dreamer saw in his own heart a dark spot, and decided that it was his coldness towards his Christian brother. Thereby they were reunited and prepared for their martyrdom, which followed only a few days later.

9825. IMPURITY, Passion of. A monk came to Poemen, whose mind was inflamed with impure imaginations. "What shall I do, my father, my father?" he cried. The abbot led him out where the flat, glaring desert lay before him, and the mirage quivered above the sands. A hot blast, as from a furnace, blew upon them. "Open the breast of your habit," said Poemen. The wind struck the bared breast of the monk. "Fold your robe again," said Poemen. "And now tell me, have you enclosed the wind in your bosom?" "No." "So let passion sweep by like a hot breath, fanning you. You can not help that. Let it pass. Do not take it in and harbor it."

9826. INABILITY, Human, Biblical. May be illustrated by the case of Leprosy—the deep and foul stain, which was not only loathsome, but incurable, Lev. 13. Silly sheep going astray, Isa. 53: 6.—Proverbial for their proneness to wander, and their inability to find their way back. The Ethiopian.—"Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?" Jer. 13: 23. A picture of sin, inborn by nature, strengthened by education and confirmed by habit. The bankrupt debtor, who owed ten thousand talents, and had nothing to pay, Matt. 18: 24. A corrupt tree, that cannot bring good fruit, Matt. 7: 18. A branch severed from the parent stem, John 15: 5. We may also add the representations in Christ's miracle of man's natural impotence, which were no doubt designed to be symbolical. The man born blind, John 9; the man with a withered hand, to whom Christ said, "Stretch forth thine hand," Matt. 12: 13; the impotent man at Bethesda, "without strength," and "who had no helper," John 5: 7; the deaf, deformed, demoniacs, etc.; sad pictures of suffering humanity, but emblems of the sadder state of sin and spiritual helplessness. Bowes.

9827. INAPPROPRIATENESS, Case of. During the war a lady, distributing tracts in the wards of a hospital, was shocked to hear a soldier laughing at her, and turned to reprove him. "Why, look here, madam," said the soldier, "you have given me a tract on the sin of dancing, when I've both legs shot off."

9828. INCARNATION, Mystery of. For the sun to fall from its sphere, and be degraded into a wandering atom; for an angel to be turned out from heaven, and be converted into a fly or a worm, had not been such abasement; for they were but creatures before, and so they would abide still, though in an inferior rank. But for the infinite glorious Creator of all things to become a creature, is a mystery exceeding all human understanding.

John Flavel.

9830. INCONSISTENCY, Biblical Figures of. "The salt losing its savor;" of all things then most worthless; a figure used three times by our Lord in his teaching, Matt. 5: 13; Mark 9:

50; Luke 14: 34, 35. "Spots in your feasts of charity," Jude 12. The Greek word refers to dangerous rocks sunken under the sea. Spots and blemishes, 2 Pet. 2: 13. Rom. 2: 17-24.—The sins of teachers are the teachers of sins. Prov. 25: 26.—The inconsistencies and falls of professed believers before the wicked, are like "a troubled fountain, and a corrupt (or muddy) spring." Prov. 25: 28.—"He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down, and without walls,"—lying open to the attacks of every enemy, who may enter without resistance the unguarded castle. Eccles. 10: 1.—"Dead flies" in the ointment are like "a little folly" to the reputation of one honored for wisdom and good character. John 18: 25.—"Art not thou also one of his disciples?" "Did not I see thee in the garden with him?" ver. 26. Peter was now not at the upper end of the hall, standing by his Master, ready to witness for him, but at the lower end, amongst his enemies, following Jesus "afar off." Bowes.

9831. INCONSISTENCY, Effects of. There is no favorite child of nature who may hold the fireball in the hollow of his hand and trifle with it without being burnt; there is no selected child of grace who can live an irregular life without unrest; or be proud, and at the same time have peace; or indolent, and receive fresh inspiration; or remain unloving and cold, and yet see, and hear, and feel the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.

F. W. Robertson.
9832. INCONSISTENCY, Emblem of. A drunken man trying to walk on both sides of the same street at the same time is the emblem of inconsistency. It is a thing hard to do, but he does it. We account for it by saying, "O, he is drunk!" There is a fearful amount of moral drunkenness, professors going zig-zag in the way, and traveling the distance three times over, if they do not fall quite into the ditch. The moral drunkard shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven.

9833. INCONSISTENCY, Example of. A traveler in Russia says: "A lady, on leaving a private party in St. Petersburg at a rather advanced hour in the morning, called a droschky, and having given directions to the driver, the latter proceeded toward her home, as she thought, instead of which he drove her to a rather deserted part of the city, when he suddenly turned round and cut her throat, the sable-lined cloak in which she was enveloped having excited his cupidity. Having divested her of this, he dragged the body to the brink of the canal, and threw her into it. On his way back to the stand he was hailed by a gentleman, and however reluctant, obliged to take him as a fare. The gentleman not only noticed the cloak, but, touching it, found his fingers stained with blood. He said nothing till he reached a police station, where, having ordered the driver to stop, he gave him into custody on suspicion. The gentleman was the husband of the lady, and recognized the cloak as belonging to his wife. The tragedy happened during Lent, when meat is forbidden. The murdered lady had a little basket with her which contained a pie. Having been asked by the commissary why he had not eaten the pie, 'How could I think of eating the pie! replied the assassin, 'it may contain meat, and'—devoutly crossing himself—"I am, thank God, a good Christian!"

9834. INCONSISTENCY, Ignorant. A lady was convinced that her colored cook had stolen a goose. The woman stoutly and angrily denied it. On the following Sunday morning the cook asked leave to go out for the day that she might attend the "munion." Her mistress was quite willing that she should go, but wondered at her thinking of going to the communion. "You know you took that goose; how can you think of going to the 'munion?'" "Well, missus," said she, "if you will have it, I did take the goose; but if you suppose that for the matter of one goose I am going to renounce my Lord and Saviour, you're very much mistaken."

9835. INCONSISTENCY, Pagan. A missionary in Africa says: "One day a trader chief came to join my church with his two wives—one old and ugly, the other a handsome young negress. 'That will never do,' I cried; 'my religion allows a man but one wife. Choose one for the partner of your joys and sorrows, and make suitable provision for the other.' They all went away looking very crest-fallen. A week or two afterward the old chief came back, leading the young and pretty one, both looking very happy. 'Me come back,' he said; 'me all ready now.' 'That is right,' said I; 'and, pray, how have you disposed of the other wife?' 'All right,' he said; 'me ate her up!'"

9836. INCONSISTENCY, Self-Condensation of. How commonly doth the whole course of our lives displease ourselves as much as others; and yet we live on in contradiction to our reason, and sometimes to our inclinations too! How unlike are we in conversation, to ourselves in retirement! How unlike are we in the devotions of our closets, to ourselves in the employment of our several professions! How calm, sedate, wise, holy, and resolved in the one! How anxious and uneasy; how foolish, earthy, and inconstant in the other! But in nothing does our deviation from reason more evidently appear than in two things: first, in our proposing to ourselves false and irrational ends of life; secondly, in our insincerity in pursuing the true and rational one, that is, happiness. Lucas.

9837. INCONSTANCY, Artful. It is said of Alcibiades that he passed through more mutations than the chameleon has colors. Socrates, in his Ecclesiastical History, says of Eccebiolus that he was a Christian under Constantine, a pagan under Julian, and a Christian again under Jovinian. A Scotch politician, named Lydington, became so famous for his variability that he was called Chameleon Lydington. Caligula's attendants never knew what to expect from him, so inconstant was he.

9838. INCONSTANCY, Emblem of. In the country of the Troglodytes it is said that there is a ake, the water of which is bitter and salt thrice a day, then it returns to sweet again, and in the same manner it is in the night also; whereupon it hath gained the name of the mad water. Some men are no less unequal and inconstant in their manners than these waters are in their tastes; now courteous, and then rough; now prodigal, and straight sordid; one while extremely kind, and ere long vehemently hating where they passionately loved before.

Wanley.

9839. INCONSTANCY, Popular. As long as Marius, the younger, was successful in wars, he was called by the Romans the Son of Mars. But as soon as fortune began to frown upon him they called him the Son of Venus, and destroyed the statues that were erected in honor of his exploits. In like manner the Athenians had flattered Demetrius during his extensive victories, and had set up two hundred statues in his honor. But when they heard of his overthrow by Ptolemy, King of Egypt, and that he was coming to them for succor, they sent him word that he must not come near them, for they had made a decree that no king should come into Athens; and they took down the statues and broke them to pieces before the year was out.

9840. INCREDULITY, Faith and. Two children were standing at evening on the summit of a hill, watching the setting sun as it seemed slowly to roll along the bright horizon. "What a way," said the elder, "the sun has moved since we saw it coming from behind that tree!" "And yet you remember," said the little one, "we learned this morning's lesson with our father, that the sun never moves at all." "I know we did," replied the first; "but I do not believe it, because I see it is not so. I saw the sun rise there this morning, and I see it set there to-night. How can a thing get all that distance without moving? You know very well, that if we did not move, we should remain always just where we are upon the hill." "But our father," said the other, "told us it is the earth that moves." "That is impossible, too," replied the elder; "for you see it does not move: I am standing upon it now, and so are you, and it does not stir: how can you pretend to think it moves, while all the time it stands quietly under our feet?" These simple ones might divide mankind between them, and carry the banner of their parties through the world from first to last, from the gates of Paradise to the judgment-seat: there never has been, and there never will be, any other division, but they that take, and they that will not take, their Father's word.

A. Monod.

9841. INCREDULITY, Ignorant. A native of India, in England, said to his teacher, "O, sir, what wicked men these sailors are! What do you think they have been telling me? They say that, in England, sometimes the water gets so hard that men can stand upon it: but do you think that I believe them? No I don't." The missionary replied, "But it is so, my dear: and now you believe it, don't you?" "Yes," said she, "I believe it because you say so; but how can it be?"

9842. INDECISION, Emblems of. The expression, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" is rather an explanation than a literal rendering of the original, which to us has a significance that ought not to be lost. Literally the words may be translated, "How long leap ye upon two branches?"—a most beautiful poetical allusion to the restlessness of a bird, which remains not long in one posture, but is continually hopping from branch to branch. Some what less expressive, but still very significant, is the version which others extract from the original word,—“How long limp ye upon two hams?”—alluding to the alternate movements of the body—now on one side and then on the other—of a lame man in his walk. Kitto.

9843. INDECISION, Influence of. Indecision is that slatternly housewife by whose fault chiefly the moth and the rust are allowed to make such dull work of life; corrupting all the gleam and gloss of earth's perishable treasures.

Edith Clarel.

9844. INDIGESTION, Evils of. How many serious family quarrels, marriages out of spite, alterations of wills, and secessions to the Church of Rome, might have been prevented by a gentle dose of blue pill! What awful instances of chronic dyspepsia are presented to our view by the immortal bard in the characters of Hamlet and Othello! I look with awe on the digestion of such a man as the present King of Naples. Banish dyspepsia and spirituous liquors from society, and you would have no crime, or at least so little that you would not consider it worth mentioning. Kingsley

9845. INDISCRETION, Mischief of. An indiscreet man is more hurtful than an ill-natured one; for, as the latter will only attack his enemies, and those he wishes ill to, the other injures indifferently both friends and foes. Addison.

9846. INDOLENCE, Hereditary Sin of. If you ask me which is the real hereditary sin of human nature, do you imagine I shall answer, pride, or luxury, or ambition, or egotism? No: I shall say indolence. Who conquers indolence will conquer all the rest. Indeed, all good principles must stagnate without mental activity. Zimmerman.

9847. INDOLENCE, Remonstrance against. Since thou hast an alarm in thy breast, which tells thee thou hast a living spirit in thee above two thousand times in an hour, dull not away thy days in slothful supinity and the tediousness of doing nothing. To strenuous minds there is an inquietude in overquietness, and no laboriousness in labor; and to tread a mile after the slow pace of a snail, or the heavy measures of the lazy of Brazilia, were a most tiring penance, and worse than a race of some furlongs at the Olympics. The rapid courses of the heavenly bodies are rather imitable by our thoughts, than our corporeal motions: yet the solemn motions of our lives amount unto a greater measure than is commonly apprehended. Some few men have surrounded the globe of the earth; yet many in the set loco-motions and movements of their days have measured the circuit of it, and twenty thousand miles have been exceeded by them.

T. Browne.

9848. INDULGENCE, Danger of. The Syrian Semiramis was a poor wench, kept by one of Ninus' slaves, till Ninus meeting her and taking a fancy to her, at length doted upon her to that degree that she not only governed him as she pleased, but contemned him; so that, finding that she had got the absolute mastery over him, she became so bold as to desire him to do her the favor to see her sit but one day upon the throne, with the royal diadem upon her head, dispatching the public business. The king consented, and gave order to all his officers to yield her the same obedience as to himself. At first she was very moderate in her commands, only to make trial of the guards about her; but when she saw that they obeyed her without the least hesitation or murmuring, she commanded them first to lay hold of Ninus himself, then to bind him, at length to kill him. Which being done, she took the government upon herself, and reigned victoriously over all Asia.

Plutarch.

9849. INDULGENCES, Papal. A Saxon gentleman had heard Tetzel at Leipsic, and was much shocked by his impostures. He went to the monk and inquired if he was authorized to pardon sins in intention, or such as the applicant intended to commit? "Assuredly," answered Tetzel; "I have full power from the Pope to do so." "Well," returned the gentleman, "I want to take some slight revenge on one of my enemies without attempting his life. I will pay you ten crowns if you will give me a letter of indulgence that shall bear me harmless." Tetzel made some scruples; they struck their bargain for thirty crowns. Shortly after, the monk set out from Leipsic. The gentleman, attended by his servants, laid wait for him in a wood between Jüterboch and Treblin, fell upon him, gave him a beating, and carried off the rich chest of indulgence-money the inquisitor had with him. Tetzel clamored against this act of violence, and brought an action before the judges. But the gentleman showed the letter signed by Tetzel himself, which exempted him beforehand from all responsibility. Duke George, who had at first been much irritated at this action, upon seeing this writing, ordered that the accused should be acquitted.

9850. INDUSTRY, Advantages of. There is no art or science that is too difficult for industry to attain to; it is the gift of tongues, and makes a man understood and valued in all countries, and by all nations. It is the philosopher's stone that turns all metals, and even stones, into gold, and suffers no want to break into its dwelling. It is the northwest passage, that brings the merchant's ships as soon to him as he can desire. In a word, it conquers all enemies, and makes fortune itself pay contribution.

Lord Clarendon.

9851. INDUSTRY, Bread of. The bread earned by the sweat of the brow is thrice blessed, and it is far sweeter than the tasteless loaf of idleness.

Crowquill.

9852. INDUSTRY, Capacity for. People may tell you of your being unfit for some peculiar occupations in life; but heed them not. Whatever employ you follow with perseverance and assiduity will be found fit for you; it will be your support in youth, and your comfort in age. In learning the useful part of any profession, very moderate abilities will suffice—great abilities are generally injurious to the possessors. Life has been compared to a race: but the allusion still improves by observing that the most swift are ever the most apt to stray from the course.

Goldsmith.

9853. INDUSTRY, Enforced. The court of the Areopagites was the most renowned in the city of Athens. It inquired into the manner of life of each Athenian, what was his income, and how he sustained his family. They were instructed to follow some honest course of life, knowing they were to give a public account thereof. If a man was convicted of idleness, a mark of infamy was set upon him, or he was ejected from the city, as an unprofitable person.

9854. INDUSTRY, God's Delight in Man's. I persuade myself that the bountiful and gracious Author of man's being and faculties, and all things else, delights in the beauty of his creation, and is well pleased with the industry of man in adorning the earth with beautiful cities and castles, with pleasant villages and country houses, with regular gardens and orchards, and plantations of all sorts of shrubs, and herbs, and fruits, for meat, medicine, or moderate delight; with shady woods and groves, and walks set with rows of elegant trees; with pastures clothed with flocks, and valleys covered over with corn, and meadows burdened with grass, and whatever else differenceth a civil and well-cultivated region from a barren and desolate wilderness.

Ray.

9855. INDUSTRY, Habits of. A man who gives his children habits of industry, provides for them better than by giving them a fortune.

Whateley.

9856. INDUSTRY, Honored. I spent no time in taverns, games, or frolics of any kind; and my industry in my business continued as indefatigable as it was necessary. I was indebted for my printing-house; I had a young family coming on to be educated; and I had two competitors to contend with for business, who were established in the place before me. My circumstances, however, grew daily easier. My original habits of frugality continuing, and my father having, among his instructions to me when a boy, frequently repeated a proverb of Solomon—"Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings;" I thence considered industry as a means of obtaining wealth and distinction; which encouraged me, though I did not think that I should ever literally stand before kings; which, however, has since happened; for I have stood before five, and even had the honor of dining with one, the King of Denmark.

Franklin.

9857. INFANCY, Consecrating. Augustine has a strong saying, that "he tasted of the salt of God in his mother's womb;" a forcible utterance of the fact that he was by Monica pledged unto the Lord ere he saw the light, dedicated before he was born. The Rev. Thomas Collins was not wanting in this pre-consecration. When he was first brought to his father, he took him, placed a Bible on his breast, and folded the left arm around it; then, after putting a pen in the tiny right hand, knelt down, and prayed that God would accept the lad; would make him a faithful witness of that saving word: would help him with tongue and pen, to bless his fellows. Historians tell that the infant Bernard, with equal form and at as early an opportunity was offered to Jesus, and thenceforth regarded as one separated unto, and to be disciplined for the most arduous service of the Great Master. Very likely the parents, both of the Methodist and of the mediæval saint, found real stimulus to faithful training in the memory of their voluntary pledge. S. Coley.

9858. INFANT BAPTISM, Abuse of. I say it is a farce, and with many of you who make no further use of the baptism of your children, it is a farce. That is to be the initiation of discipline. You remember how the father of Hannibal took his child to the altar of the gods, and swore that child to eternal enmity to Rome. Now, suppose he had never reminded him of the vows under which he was laid; I tell you they would as much have been forgotten, and would have had as much effect on the child's life, as some sorry game of childhood. But there was not a day after that that the father did not say, "My child, you are sworn to smite Rome." He was brought up to it, and it became a settled principle with him, till when he was a man he did smite Rome as Rome had never been smitten before. Now, I tell you, you have sworn your child to be a true soldier of Christ; you have sworn your child to enmity to the world, the flesh, and the devil. What are you doing? Not one single day should pass without the child being reminded of these things; not one single month should go by without your saying, "My child, are you true? You are sworn to Christ, and if you live not to him your life will be a burden. You are sworn to be true to him, and to withhold your life is one long felony." If you do that, the baptismal bond will not be a little thing, but your children will grow up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, a generation to serve God; and they shall deal such blows to Satan and his kingdom as have never smitten them before. Baptism is the dedication of the child's life; it is the first act of that series of discipline which is to train up the child "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." S. Coley.

9859. INFANT, Death of an. Those who have lost an infant are never, as it were, without an infant child. Their other children grow up to manhood and womanhood, and suffer all the changes of mortality; but this one alone is rendered an immortal child; for death has arrested it with his kindly harshness, and blessed it into an eternal image of youth and innocence. Leigh Hunt.

9860. INFANTS, Blessing. It was the custom of the Jews to bring their infant children, on the first anniversary of their birth, to be blessed by the Rabbi of their synagogue. Dr. Holme.

9861. INFANTS, Safety of. A minister had noticed that a Scotch grave-digger took particular pains in dressing and caring for the graves of infants, and he asked why he did so. John paused a moment at his work, and looking up to the sky, said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." "And is it on this account you tend and adorn them with so much care?" "Surely, sir," answered John, "I cannot make too fine the bed-covering of a little innocent sleeper that is waiting there until it is God's time to waken it, and cover it with a white robe, and waft it to glory. Where such grandeur is awaiting it yonder, it is fit that it should be decked out here. I think the Saviour will like to see white clover spread about it; do you not think so too, sir?" "But why not thus cover larger graves?" asked the minister; "the dust of all his saints is precious in the Saviour's sight." "Very true, sir," responded John, with great solemnity, "but I cannot be sure who are his saints and who are not. I hope there are many lying in the kirkyard; but it would be great presumption to mark them out. There are some I am quite sure about, and I keep their graves as neat as I can, and plant a bit of flower here and there as a sign of my hope, but dare not give them the white shirt," referring to the white clover. "It's clean different, though, with the bairns."

9862. INFIDEL, Christian Burial Denied to an. Whitefield visited an unbeliever during a lingering illness. At one time he asked him what was his religion. He answered, "Religion is of so many sects I know not which to choose." Another time he offered to pray with him, but he would not accept it, upon which he resolved to go to see him no more. But being told, two days before he died, that he had an inclination to see him, he went again, and after a little conversation, put the following questions to him: "Do you believe Jesus Christ to be God, and the one Mediator between God and man?" He said, "I believe Jesus Christ was a good man." "Do you believe the Holy Scriptures?" "I believe something of the Old Testament; the New I do not believe at all." "Do you believe, sir, in a judgment to come?" He turned himself about, and replied, "I know not what to say to that." "Alas, sir!" Whitefield said, "if all these things should be true, what?" These words gave him great concern, for he seemed afterward to be very uneasy, grew delirious, and in a day or two departed. The day after his decease he was carried to the ground, and Whitefield refused to read the service over him; but he went to the grave, and told the people what had passed between them, and warned them all against infidelity.

9863. INFIDEL, Death of an: Voltaire. In "Simp

son's Plea for Religion," published at the commencement of this century, are the following facts in regard to Voltaire: "When the first apprehensions for his life were entertained, D'Alembert, Diderot and Marmontel hastened to support his resolution, but they were only witnesses of their own ignominy. The long agony of the dying sceptic was characterized by rage, remorse, recantation, blasphemy and reproach. In the first days of his illness, in spite of all his associates, he showed signs of wishing to return unto the God he had so often blasphemed. He called for a priest. His danger increasing, he sent the following note to the Abbé Gaultier: "You had promised, sir, to come and hear me. I entreat you would take the trouble of calling on me as soon as possible. Signed, VOLTAIRE, Paris, 26th Feb., 1778." A few days after, he wrote the following declaration, in the presence of Abbé Gaultier, the Abbé Mignot, and the Marquis de Villevielle, copied from the minutes deposited with M. Mouet, Notary of Paris: "I, the undersigned, declare that, for these four days past, having been afflicted with a vomiting of blood, at the age of eighty-four, and not having been able to drag myself to the church, the Rev. the Rector of Sulpice having been pleased to add to his good works that of sending to me the Abbé Gaultier, I confessed to him, and if it please God to dispose of me, I die in the church in which I was born; hoping that the Divine mercy will deign to pardon all faults. Second March, 1778, signed in presence of Abbé Mignot, my nephew, and the Marquis de Villevielle, my friend." The Marquis de Villevielle was the individual to whom, eleven years before, Voltaire wrote: "Conceal your march from the enemy in your endeavors to crush the wretch!" A favorite motto, with which he closed his letters to his friends was, "Crush, then, do crush the Wretch," referring to Christ. Voltaire permitted the above declaration to be carried to the Rector of Sulpice and to the Archbishop of Paris, to know whether it would be sufficient. But when Abbé Gaultier returned with the answer, it was impossible for him to gain admittance to the patient. The conspirators strained every nerve to prevent their chief from consummating his recantation, and every avenue was closed against the priest whom Voltaire had sent for. Rage succeeded to fury, and fury to rage, during the remainder of his life. Sometimes he would turn upon his companions: "Retire! it is you that have brought me to my present state. Begone! I could have done without you all, but you could not exist without me. And what a wretched glory you have procured me." They could hear him, the prey of anguish and dread, alternately supplicating and blaspheming that God against whom he had conspired; and in plaintive accents he would cry, "O Christ! O Jesus Christ!" Then he would complain that he was abandoned by God and man. The hand that had traced in ancient writ the sentence of an impious and reviling king, seemed to trace before his eyes his own impious motto, "Crush, then, do crush the Wretch!" In vain he turned his head away; the time was coming apace when he was to appear before the tribunal of him whom he had blasphemed; and his physicians, particularly M. Tronchin, retired, declaring that the death of this impious man was terrible indeed. The pride of the conspirators would willingly have suppressed these declarations, but in vain. Mareschal de Richelieu fled from the bed-side, declaring it to be a sight too terrible to be endured; and M. Tronchin said that "the furies of Orestes could give but a faint idea of those of Voltaire." Could he say, then, at the last, "I have fought a good fight; I have kept the faith?" This account of the death of Voltaire was confirmed by a letter from M. de Luc, an eminent philosopher, and a man of the strictest honor and probity.

D. Dorchester.

9864. INFIDEL, Inconsistency of an. This miserable man had an only daughter lying upon a sick-bed; his wife, I may observe, who died, was in her life-time a devoted, spiritual-minded and praying Christian. When the daughter's death was very near and all hope of restoration was utterly dissipated, she called her father to her bed-side, and said: "My mother died a Christian some years ago, rejoicing in Jesus, and assured of heaven; you are a disbeliever in Christianity; I am going to make the last venture; am I to die in my mother's faith, or in yours? I beseech you to advise me," she said with earnestness and fervor, "whether I am to die in my mother's faith, or in yours." The father's struggle between affection to his only child and the pride of devotedness to his principles was tremendous; but at last, amid a burst of tears and in an agony of feeling, the hardened, yet melting infidel said: "Die in your mother's faith." And she died in her mother's faith. And yet the man who gave that advice lives to propagate infidelity in the world, and labors with all the energy he has to make men as contaminated as himself.

Dr. Cumming.

9865. INFIDEL, Judgment of an. An infidel who had publicly lauded the writings of Paine and Voltaire, as superior to the Bible, was asked: "Have you a family?" "Yes; a wife and children." "Which would you recommend to them, infidelity or Christianity?" Confounded at this home thrust, he answered, "I never heard that kind of argument before; I would rather give them the Bible than any infidel book."

9866. INFIDEL, Sealing an. An old minister in Massachusetts visited a dying infidel, and found him in despair, from which nothing could release him. Before leaving, the infidel made the following strange request: "I want to preach at my own funeral; and when you have closed the other parts of the service, I want you to come down from the pulpit and place your two fore-fingers on my lips, and say, 'This soul is sealed for hell!'" "You must spare me from such a commission. It will frighten the people," said the minister. "It is my dying request, and I feel that you must do it. Let others take warning by my death. I cannot excuse you." The minister complied. At his funeral, after he had finished the sermon, he came down from the pulpit, and, approaching the coffin, laid the tips of his fingers on those marble lips, and with tears streaming from his eyes, stated the man's dying request, and pronounced the words, "This soul is sealed for hell!"

9867. INFIDELITY, The Bible and. It is only in the creation that all our ideas and conceptions of a word of God can unite. The creation speaketh a universal language, independently of human speech or human language, multiplied and various as they be. It is an ever-existing original, which every man can read. It cannot be forged; it cannot be counterfeited; it cannot be lost; it cannot be altered; it cannot be suppressed. It does not depend upon the will of man whether it shall be published or not; it publishes itself from one end of the earth to the other. It preaches to all nations, and to all worlds; and this Word of God reveals to man all that is necessary to know of God. Thomas Paine.

9868. INFIDELITY, Credulity of. It is most important to keep in mind the self-evident, but often forgotten maxim, that disbelief is belief; only, they have reference to opposite conclusions—e. g., to disbelieve the real existence of the city of Troy is to believe that it was feigned—and which conclusion implies the greater credulity is the question to be decided. To some it may appear more, to others less probable, that a Greek poet should have celebrated (with whatever exaggeration) some of the feats of arms in which his countrymen had actually been engaged, than that he should have passed by all these, and resorted to such as were wholly imaginary. So, also, though the terms "infidel" and "unbeliever" are commonly applied to one who rejects Christianity, it is plain that to disbelieve its divine origin is to believe its human origin: and which belief requires the more credulous mind is the very question at issue. A man who should doubt whether there is such a city as Rome would imply his belief in (what most would account a moral impossibility) the possibility of such multitudes of independent witnesses having concurred in a fabrication.

Illustrations of Truth.

9869. INFIDELITY, Effects of. Mr. Paine submitted the manuscript of an infidel article to his friend Dr. Franklin for his opinion. The doctor, though himself an infidel, replied, "I would advise you not to attempt to unchain the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person. If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it!"

9870. INFIDELITY and Faith. Infidelity and Faith look both through the same perspective glass, but at contrary ends. Infidelity looks through the wrong end of the glass; and, therefore, sees those objects near, which are afar off, and makes great things little,—diminishing the greatest spiritual blessings, and removing far from us threatened evils: Faith looks at the right end, and brings the blessings that are far off in time close to our eye, and multiplies God's mercies, which in the distance lost their greatness. Bishop Hall.

9871. INFIDELITY, French. Near the close of the eighteenth century, "infidelity had become the fashion of the public mind. Its evil influences, like the smoke from the abyss mentioned in the apocalypse, had ushered in an unnatural night upon the European continent, compared with which the gloom of the so-called dark ages was sunshine. Faith was dying out of men's hearts all over the land. Voltaire's Satanic gibes, the dismal rant of Jean Jacques Rousseau, Lessing's astute skepticism, the God-denying blasphemies of Holbach, and even the poetic rationalism of Herder,—together with the example of kings and queens, and the nobility generally, upon the minds of those who could not read,—were all telling upon various orders of minds, and tending to bring about the same disastrous consummation. The priest at the altar, the monarch on the throne, the doctor in the college chair, the dramatist on the stage, the wit in the salon, the soldier in the ranks, the trader in the shop, the peasant at the plough—blasphemed God, and renounced the hope of immortality." From this terrible seeding France has reaped a sad harvest of irreligion, debauch, bloody revolutions and communism.

9872. INFIDELITY, Hopeless. Mr. Owen visiting Alexander Campbell, at Bethany, they went to the family burying-ground. Mr. Owen, addressing himself to Mr. Campbell, said, "There is one advantage I have over the Christian—I am not afraid to die. Most Christians have fear in death; but if some few items of my business were settled, I should be perfectly willing to die at any moment." "Well," answered Mr. Campbell, "you say you have no fear in death; have you any hope in death?" After a solemn pause—"No," said Mr. Owen. "Then," rejoined Mr. Campbell, pointing to an ox standing near, "you are on a level with that brute. He has fed until he is satisfied, and stands in the shade, whisking off the flies, and has neither hope nor fear in death."

9873. INFIDELITY, Insincerity of. An infidel lecturer addressed an audience with great earnestness, denying God and immortality, and uttering the most horrid blasphemies. When he was done, a man of middle age arose, and said: "My friends, I have a word to speak to you to-night. I am not about to refute any of the arguments of the orator. I shall not criticise his style. I shall say nothing concerning what I believe to be the blasphemies he has uttered; but I shall simply relate to you a fact, and, after I have done that, you shall draw your own conclusions. Yesterday I walked by the side of yonder river; I saw on its floods a young man in a boat; the boat was unmanageable; it was going fast toward the rapids. He could not use the oars, and I saw that he was not capable of bringing the boat to the shore. I saw that young man wring his hands in agony. By and by he gave up the attempt to save his life, kneeled down and cried with desperate earnestness, "O God, save my soul. If my body cannot be saved, save my soul!" I heard him confess that he had been a blasphemer. I heard him vow that if his life were spared he would never be such again. I heard him implore the mercy of heaven for Jesus Christ's sake, and earnestly plead that he might be washed in his blood. These arms saved that young man from the flood. I plunged in, brought the boat to shore, and saved his life. That same young man has just now addressed you, and cursed his Maker. What say you to this, sirs?" The speaker sat down. A shudder ran through the young man himself, and the audience saw, that while it was a fine thing to act the bravado against Almighty God on dry land, when danger was distant, it was not the same near the verge of the grave.

9874. INFIDELITY, Propagating. Sheridan, the noted infidel, said in a speech on the French Revolution in the House of Commons: "Although no man can command his conviction, I have ever considered a deliberate disposition to make proselytes to infidelity as an unaccountable depravity. Whoever attempts to pluck the belief or the prejudice on this subject, style it which he will, from the bosom of one man, woman, or child, commits a brutal outrage, the motives for which I have never been able to trace or conceive."

9875. INFIDELITY, Results of. Thomas Paine tells us that he has passed through the forest of Christianity and hewn down every tree; and yet, in the language of a quaint writer, he did not bark the first sapling. They all stood firmer after Paine passed through with his hosts of satellites than before, and will forever stand beautiful and green with immortality.

Bp. Bowman.

9876. INFIDELITY Tested. A very wicked man affirmed that he did not believe there was either God or devil, heaven or hell. Not long after he was apprehended for a notorious crime, and condemned to be hung. A minister sought admittance to his cell, and told him he was desirous of knowing if his atheistical principles had changed any in view of approaching death. With many tears he bewailed his former life; he said, "That a prison, and the serious thoughts of death, had opened the eyes of his understanding, and that when he said there was no God, he had not heartily believed what he said; but leading such a wicked life as he had, he thought it necessary to blind his conscience, and outbrave the world, with a pretence that it was his principle."

9877. INFIDELITY, Thoughtlessness of. Boswell asked Dr. Johnson, the great lexicographer, if he did not think Foote, the famous tragedian, was an infidel. Johnson replied, "I do not know, sir, that the fellow is an infidel; but if he be an infidel, he is an infidel as a dog is an infidel: that is to say, he has never thought upon the subject." This being reported to Foote, he exclaimed indignantly, "What, sir, to talk thus of a man of liberal education; a man who for years was at the University of Oxford; a man who has added sixteen new characters to the literature of his country!" Foote's case is only too common. Men of little minds and partial culture condemn religion and reject God.

9878. INFIDELITY, Worthlessness of. Infidelity gives nothing in return for what it takes away. What, then, is it worth? Every thing to be valued has a compensating power. Not a blade of grass that withers, or the ugliest weed that is flung away to rot and die, but reproduces something. Nothing in nature is barren. Therefore, everything that is or seems opposed to nature cannot be true; it can only exist in the shape that a diseased man imparts to one of its coinages. Infidelity is one of these coinages—a mass of base money that won't pass current with any heart that loves truly, or any head that thinks correctly. And infidels are poor, sad creatures; they carry about them a load of dejection and desolation, not the less heavy that it is invisible. It is the fearful blindness of the soul. Chalmers.

9879. INFIDELS, Agreement of. There is but one thing in which infidels do agree, and that is, in their rejection of Christianity; though here, again, no two of them will agree as to their reasons for rejecting it. In this respect they remind us of the story of an Irishman who landed in New York on the crisis of an election, and—whether the process of naturalization was consummated on the spot, or Pat was required to personate some missing voter, we don't know—but he was challenged to give a vote for or against the Government. "Is there a Government?" was the single question Pat asked. "Yes," was the answer. "Then," cried he, with a flourish of his shillalah; "then I'm agin it!" "Is there religion?" asks your average Free-thinker; "Is there a revelation? Then I'm agin it!" Dr. Curry.

9880. INFIDELS, Effrontery of. Rousseau, who was first a Protestant, then a Romanist, then an infidel, is characterized by unmitigated conceit. After a life of crime and debauchery, in which he gloried, according to his autobiography, he wrote, "No man can come to the throne of God and say, I am a better man than Rousseau." His last-recorded utterance was: "Eternal Being, the soul that I am going to give thee back is as pure as it was when it proceeded from thee. Make it a partaker of thy felicity."

9881. INFIDELS, Ignorance of. The biographer of Thomas Paine, the author of "The Age of Reason," in order to excuse the blunder which Paine made in his criticisms on the Bible, says, that at "the time he wrote the first part of the work 'he was without a Bible, neither could he procure one.'"

9882. INFIDELS, Works of. "When an infidel comes forth from the grave," says Jallaloddin, "his works shall be represented to him under the ugliest form that ever he beheld, having a most deformed countenance, a filthy smell, and a disagreeable voice; so that he shall cry out.

'God defend me from thee! What art thou? I never saw any thing more detestable.' To which the figures will answer, 'Why dost thou wonder at my ugliness? I am thy evil works; thou didst ride upon me while thou wast in the world, but now will I ride upon thee, and thou shalt carry me.' And immediately he shall get upon him; and whatever he shall meet shall terrify him, and say, 'Hail, thou enemy of God!'"

9883. INFINITY, Characteristics of. Infinity is the retirement in which perfect love and wisdom only dwell with God. In infinity and eternity the sceptic sees an abyss, in which all is lost. I see in them the residence of Almighty power, in which my reason and my wishes find equally a firm support. Here, holding by the pillars of heaven, I exist—I stand fast. Miller.

9884. INFIRMITIES, Benefit of. It is found in husbandry that the removal of the small stones which frequently encumber the fields does not increase the crop. In many soils they are an advantage, attracting the moisture, and radiating the heat. Around these stones you will find the largest berries. In an experiment made in England the result of removing the stones was so unfavorable to the crop that they were brought back and spread over the ground. We often cry out, like Paul, for the removal of some thorn in the flesh. After-experience teaches us it is better that it should remain. We may learn the sufficiency of grace, and glory even in our infirmities.

9886. INFLUENCE, Abiding. It was a striking remark of a dying man, whose life had been, alas! but poorly spent, "Oh that my influence could be gathered up, and buried with me!" it could not be. That man's influence survives him; it still lives, is still working on, and will live and work for centuries to come. He could not when he came to die, and perceived how sad and deleterious his influence had been—he could not put forth his dying hand and arrest that influence. It was too late; he had put in motion an agency which he was altogether powerless to arrest. His body could be enshrouded, and confined, and buried out of sight, but not his influence; for that, alas! corrupt and deadly as it is, there is no shroud, no burial. It walks the earth like a pestilence—like the angel of death, and will walk till the hand of God arrests and chains it. Anon.

9887. INFLUENCE, Biblical Figures of. Ointment that bewrayeth itself, Prov. 27:16; Eccles. 7:1. Sound, spreading far and wide, like the shrill blast of the trumpet, 1 Thess. 1:8. Leaven, gradually fermenting and working into the whole mass, for good, Matt. 13:

33; or for evil, Luke 12:1; 1 Cor. 5:7, 8; Gal. 5:9. Salt, preserving and seasoning Matt. 5:13. "A root of bitterness," Heb. 12:15; cf. Deut. 29:18, marg.—"a poisonous herb." See in Heb. 12:15, what may come from one root—"lest there be any root. . . and thereby many be defiled." A canker or gangrene, 2 Tim. 2:17, i. e. a mortification in the flesh, which, unless stopped, is fatal. Bewitching or fascinating, Gal. 3:1. A viper brood, Ps. 58:4; 140:3; Matt. 3:7. Tares, choking the good wheat, Matt. 13:24-30. Bowes.

9888. INFLUENCE, Contagious. In the temple of Apollo, at Babylon, there was said to be a little cabinet of gold. A soldier passing it one day chanced to open it, whence there was breathed out such a pestilent air, that it first infected the Parthians, then the adjacent provinces, and crept over almost all the inhabited parts of the world. Such was the fury of that plague, that it destroyed almost the third part of mankind.

9889. INFLUENCE, Dangerous. Among the high Alps at certain seasons the traveler is told to proceed very quietly, for on the steep slopes overhead the snow hangs so evenly balanced that the sound of a voice or the report of a gun may destroy the equilibrium, and bring down an immense avalanche that will overwhelm everything in ruin in its downward path. And so about our way there may be a soul in the very crisis of its moral history, trembling between life and death, and a mere touch or shadow may determine its destiny. A young lady who was deeply impressed with the truth, and was ready, under a conviction of sin, to ask, "What must I do to be saved?" had all her solemn impressions dissipated by the unseemly jesting and laughter of a member of the church by her side as she passed out of the sanctuary. Her irreverent and worldly spirit cast a repellent shadow on that young lady not far from the kingdom of God. T. Stork.

9890. INFLUENCE, Female. If mankind had been perpetuated without their milder companions, a strong and iron race would have inhabited the earth. There is something in the active spirits and powers of the manly portion of our common species which loves difficulties, enterprise, exertion, dangers, and personal displays. These qualities and propensities would too often animate self-love and selfishness into continual strife, civil discord, and battle, if no softer and kinder companions were about such beings, to occupy some portion of their thoughts and attentions, to create and cherish milder and sweeter feelings, and to provide for them the more soothing happiness of a quiet home and a domestic life. Tenderness, sympathy, good humor, smiles, gentleness, benignity, and affection, can diffuse pleasures more grateful than those of irritation and contest, and awaken the sensibilities that most favor intellectual and moral cultivation. S. Turner.

9891. INFLUENCE, Maternal. The mother of the Rev. John Newton, a pious woman of the south of England, died when he was but seven years old, leaving him only the memory of her religious teaching and goodness. At an early age he became a dissipated sailor. The memory of his mother brought him to himself and started a stream of incalculable influence. Through him Claudius Buchanan was converted, who became a missionary to India. He wrote "The Star in the East," which made Adoniram Judson a missionary to India. Newton was also the means of converting Thomas Scott, the commentator. Through him Cowper was rescued from despondency and his harp tuned to the key of religion. His influence upon the career of Wilberforce is asserted, and also that the abolition of the slave trade was one of its remote results. Wilberforce wrote "A Practical View of Christianity," a useful book, the instrument of converting Leigh Richmond the author of "The Dairyman's Daughter," which has saved thousands. Back of it all stands the faithful mother of John Newton.

9892. INFLUENCE, Parental. We may see, with broad and distinct lines, in every land, how vast and extensive, how lengthened, how enduring is the influence of the conduct of the parent on the character and happiness of future ages! An infant born in New Zealand follows its cruel parents in barbarism and cannibalism: an infant in China inherits the deceitfulness and ungodliness of Chinese paganism; infants among Arabs, Hottentots, American Indians, are brought up in all the respective peculiarities, vices, and miseries of their various countries, and continue in them, unless God graciously interposes, with deepening darkness and misery. Yet the original ancestors of all these, thus sunk in error and wickedness, were the sons of one man, and had equal advantages in the beginning, till parents led the way in evil. Ham and his son Canaan departed from the good ways of Noah, and so all Africa became debased. In one branch of the family of Shem, chiefly through God's special interposition in the call of Abraham, the Church of God continued for 2,000 years; in other branches we see the issues of wickedness throughout the immense continent of Asia. What a blessing was Abraham's piety to his posterity!

E. Bickersteth.

9893. INFLUENCE, Posthumous. Theodore Parker lay on his dying bed in Florence, his great expectations unfulfilled. Hope still survived. He said, "There are two Theodore Parkers now: one is dying here in Italy, and the other I have planted in America." He died among strangers, and was buried in the Protestant Cemetery at Florence.

9894. INFLUENCE, Records of. Nothing takes place without leaving traces behind it; and these are in many cases so distinct and various, as to leave not a doubt of their cause. We all understand how, in the material world, events testify of themselves to future ages. Should we visit an unknown region, and behold masses of lava covered with soil of different degrees of thickness, and surrounding a blackened crater, we should have as firm a persuasion of the occurrence of remote and successive volcanic eruptions, as if we had lived through the ages in which they took place. The chasms of the earth would report how terribly it had been shaken, and the awful might of long extinguished fires would be written in desolations which ages had failed to efface. Now conquest, and civil and religious revolutions, leave equally their impressions on society, leave institutions, manners, and a variety of monuments, which are inexplicable without them, and which, taken together, admit not a doubt of their occurrence.

Channing.

9895. INFLUENCE, Secret of. Henry III. of France inquired why it was that the Duke of Guise appeared to charm everybody. The answer was, "The Duke of Guise endeavors to do good to all people without exception, directly by himself, or indirectly by his recommendation. He is civil, courteous, liberal, has always something good to say of everybody, and never speaks ill of any. This is the reason he reigns in men's hearts as absolutely as your majesty does in your kingdom."

9896. INFLUENCE, Spiritual. McChesney had in a rare and singular degree his "conversation in heaven," and the influence for good he left in every place which he visited was quite extraordinary. I remember Dr. Anderson, of Morpeth, telling me how, when he was minister of St. Fergus, which he left at the disruption, McChesney had spent a day or two in his manse; and not only while he was there, but for a week or two after he had left, it seemed a heavenlier place than ever before. Associated with McChesney's person, appearance and conversation, on the walls of the house and everything around seemed to be inscribed, "Holiness unto the Lord."

Dr. Guthrie.

9897. INFLUENCE, Sum Total of. No human being can come into this world without increasing or diminishing the sum total of human happiness, not only of the present, but of every subsequent age of humanity. No one can detach himself from this connection. There is no sequestered spot in the universe, no dark niche along the disc of non-existence, to which he can retreat from his relations to others, where he can withdraw the influence of his existence upon the moral destiny of the world; everywhere his presence or absence will be felt—everywhere he will have companions who will be better or worse for his influence. It is an old saying, and one of fearful and fathomless import, that we are forming characters for eternity. Forming characters! Whose? our own or others? Both; and in that momentous fact lies the peril and responsibility of our existence. Who is sufficient for the thought? Thousands of my fellow-beings will yearly enter eternity with characters differing from those they would have carried thither had I never lived. The sunlight of that world will reveal my finger-marks in their primary formations, and in their successive strata of thought and life.

Elihu Burritt.

9898. INFLUENCE, Teacher's. Isocrates being once asked how he, who was not very eloquent himself, could make others so, he answered, "Just as a whetstone cannot cut, yet it will sharpen knives for that purpose."

9899. INFLUENCE, Wids. Sir Astley Cooper, while writing a "vade mecum" for surgeons, would accomplish more than if that time had all been spent in setting broken bones. It was worth while locking Paul up in the gaol to get his prison epistles out of him. The debility—then mourned—which gave John Wesley leisure to pen his "Notes," will yield larger harvest than strength through all those months to go "gospeling" twice a day could have reaped. They who direct an age's intellect are more potent, though to the eye less active, than those who do its deeds. He who could purge a fever-breathing atmosphere would well affect the national health more than the hardest-working parish doctor, though his case-book were filled with notices of typhoid patients successfully treated. S. Coley.

9900. INGRATITUDE, Alexander's. Parmenio was a faithful general under Philip and Alexander. He opened the way for them into Asia, had depressed Attalus, the king's enemy, and always led the king's vanguard; a man beloved by all the men of war; and all the glory and fame Alexander possessed appeared to come through the counsel of Parmenio. He had sacrificed two of his sons in battle, Hector and Nicanor, and another on suspicion of treason for the good of his country. Alexander, however, determined to take his life, having become jealous of his popularity. Cleander and Polydamus, Parmenio's most trusted friends, were sent to slay him, without even giving him a reason for doing so, and while he was reading a letter from the king himself, in apparent security.

9902. INGRATITUDE, Example of. An Englishman, named Inkle, would have been slain by the bloody Caribs, but a girl of the tribe pitied, concealed and fed him, until such time as an English vessel visited the coast, when she helped him to escape. The Indian girl had become much interested in the man for whom she had done so much, and asked that she might go with him, which was granted. On reaching the Barbadoes, the heartless wretch sold the girl, to whom he owed his life, into hopeless slavery. This is the story of Inkle and Yarico.

9903. INGRATITUDE, Experience of. Do you know what is more hard to bear than the reverses of fortune? It is the baseness, the hideous ingratitude, of man. I turn my head in disgust from their cowardice and selfishness. I hold life in horror: death is repose—repose at last. What I have suffered for the last twenty days cannot be comprehended.

Napoleon I.

9904. INGRATITUDE, Fortune of. Humphrey Bannister was brought up and exalted to promotion by the Duke of Buckingham, then his master. The Duke by reason of the separation of his army, that he had raised against Richard the usurper, was driven to seek refuge with Bannister, with whom he had every reason to expect security. Upon the king offering one thousand pounds reward for the Duke, Bannister betrayed his benefactor. He was sent under strong guard to the king, in Salisbury, and there publicly beheaded. But the vengeance of God followed Bannister to his entire discomfiture. His eldest son became insane; his eldest daughter was suddenly stricken with leprosy, another son became seriously deformed, and another was drowned, and he was himself found guilty of murder, and spared only from death by the clemency of his persecutors; while through his perfidious action, in betraying his friend, the king would not allow him to receive the price of his master's blood, saying that "he who would be so untrue to so good a master must needs be false to all others."

9905. INGRATITUDE, Frequency of. As there are no laws extant against ingratitude, so it is utterly impossible to contrive any that in all circumstances shall reach it. If it were actionable, there would not be courts enough in the whole world to try the causes in. There can be no setting a day for the requiting of benefits as for the payment of money; nor any estimate upon the benefits themselves; but the whole matter rests in the conscience of both parties: and then there are so many degrees of it, that the same rule will never serve all. Seneca.

9906. INGRATITUDE, Pride and. There neither is nor ever was any person remarkably ungrateful who was not also insufferably proud; for as snakes breed on dunghills, not singly, but in knots, so in such base hearts you always find pride and ingratitude twisted together. Ingratitude overlooks all kindness, but it is because pride makes it carry its head so high. In a word, ingratitude is too base to return a kindness, too proud to regard it, much like the tops of mountains, barren indeed, but yet lofty; they produce nothing; they feed nobody; they clothe nobody; yet are high and stately, and look down upon all the world.

South.

9907. INGRATITUDE, Punishment of. Lycurgus, being asked why in his laws he had set down no punishment for ingratitude, answered, "I have left it to the gods to punish."

Abp. Sandys.

9908. INGRATITUDE, Similes of. Ingratitude is a nail which, driven into the tree of courtesy, causes it to wither; it is a broken channel, by which the foundations of the affections are undermined; and a lump of soot, which, falling into the dish of friendship, destroys its scent and flavor. Basil.

9909. INGRATITUDE, Spectacle of. When Tamerlane had overcome and taken prisoner Bajazet, the great Turk, he asked him, "Whether he had ever given God thanks for making him so great an emperor?" Bajazet confessed "that he had never so much as thought of such a thing." Tamerlane replied, "That it was no wonder that so ungrateful a man should be made a spectacle of misery, for you being blind in one eye, and I lame in one leg, what worth is there in us, that God should set us over two such mighty empires, when he could command men so much worthier than ourselves?"

9910. INHOSPITALITY Rebuked. A minister who had traveled far to preach, after the sermon waited some time, expecting some one of the brethren to invite him home to dinner. In this he was disappointed; one and another departed, until the house was almost empty. He walked up to an elderly-looking gentleman, and said: "Will you go home to dinner with me to-day, brother?" "Where do you live?" "About twenty miles from this, sir." "No," said the man, coloring, "but you must go with me." "Thank you, I will cheerfully." The minister was no more troubled about his dinner at that appointment.

9911. INJURIES, Benefits and. Aristotle was asked what grew old the soonest? He replied, "Benefits." "What then grows old the latest?" and he answered "Injuries."

9912. INJURIES, Forgetting. A man who had done Sir Matthew Hale a great injury, went afterwards to him for his advice in the settlement of his estate. He gave it very frankly, but would accept no fee for it. When asked how he could use a man so kindly who had wronged him so much, he answered: "I thank God I have learned to forget injuries."

9913. INJURIES, Forgetting and Forgiving. How many are there who profess to forgive, but cannot forget an injury. Such are like persons who sweep the chamber, but leave the dust behind the door. Whenever we grant our offending brethren a discharge, our hearts also should set their hands to the acquittance.

Secker.

9914. INJURY, Damaging. Plato says that it is worse to do than to suffer injury, and that a man injures himself more when he hurts another, than he would be injured if he were the sufferer.

9915. INJUSTICE, Criticising. The Mohammedan commentators relate that Moses thought too highly of himself, and God sent him to learn wisdom of the prophet Al Khedr. According to the Koran, Moses went to him and was accepted as his disciple, with the condition that he should ask nothing concerning anything which he should see. They went together in a ship, and the prophet took an axe and made a hole in its bottom. Moses could not keep silence at this injustice, and said, "Hast thou made a hole therein that thou mightest drown those who are on board? Now hast thou done a strange thing." They left the ship and met a youth, whom the prophet slew.

Moses said, "Hast thou slain an innocent person? Now hast thou committed an unjust action." The prophet said, "Did I not tell thee thou couldst not bear with me?" Moses promised silence, and they went together to a city whose inhabitants refused to give them food. Finding a piece of wall ready to tumble down, the prophet built it up again. Moses' spirit chafed at this doing good to those who had refused them food, and he broke the condition again. Before they separated the prophet made the following explanation: "The vessel belonged to certain poor men who did business in the sea, and I was minded to render it unserviceable, because there was a king behind them who took every sound ship by force. As to the youth, his parents were true believers, and we feared lest he, being an unbeliever, should oblige them to suffer his perverseness and ingratitude. The wall belonged to two orphan youths in the city, and under it was a treasure hidden which belonged to them; and their father was a righteous man; the Lord was pleased that they should attain their full age, and take forth their treasure. I did not what thou hast seen of mine own will, but by God's direction. This is the explanation of that which thou couldst not bear with patience."

9916. INJUSTICE, Rebuke of. A Moorish king desired to purchase a piece of ground of a woman, but she preferred not to part with the inheritance of her fathers. The field was therefore siezed, and a pavilion erected. The poor woman complained to the Cadi of the injustice, and he promised to do all in his power to make it right. One day, while the king was in the field, the Cadi came with an empty sack and asked permission to fill it with the earth on which he was treading. He obtained leave, and when the sack was filled, he requested the king to complete his kindness by helping him load his ass with it. The monarch laughed, and tried to lift it, but soon let it drop, complaining of its great weight. "It is, however," said the Cadi, "only a small part of the ground thou hast wrested from one of thy subjects; how then wilt thou bear the weight of the whole field, when thou shalt appear before the great Judge laden with thine iniquity?" The king, thankful for the reproof, restored the field to its owner, together with the pavilion and the wealth which it contained.

9917. INJUSTICE, Treatment of. Any contumely, any outrage, is readily passed over by the indulgence which we all owe to sudden passion. These things are soon forgot upon occasions in which all men are so apt to forget themselves. Deliberate injuries, to a degree, must be remembered, because they require deliberate precautions to be secured against their return.

Burke.

9918. INNOCENCE, Example of. Portius Cato the Elder was a man of great integrity. His honesty and severity made him a great many enemies, who were constantly troubling him. Fifty times he was accused, and as many times found innocent. At length, in his old age, he was accused, when he demanded that Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, his bitterest enemy, should be appointed his judge. Even he acquitted him, and declared that he was innocent. After that he lived in honor and security.

9919. INNOCENCE, Memento of. Upon a tombstone in Rome is an inscription in these words, "Julia B. Prisca, vixit Annos XXVI. Nihil unquam peccavit nisi quod mortua est." In this only she did amiss, that she died.

9920. INNOCENCE, Peace of. How many bitter thoughts does the innocent man avoid! Serenity and cheerfulness are his portion. Hope is continually pouring its balm into his soul. His heart is at rest, whilst others are goaded and tortured by the stings of a wounded conscience, the remonstrances and risings up of principles which they cannot forget; perpetually teased by returning temptations, perpetually lamenting defeated resolutions. Paley.

9921. INNOCENCE, Power of. What a power there is in innocence! whose very helplessness is its safeguard; in whose presence even Passion himself stands abashed, and turns worshiper at the very altar he came to despoil.

Moore.

9922. INNOCENCE, Rare. Asclepiodorus journeyed from the city of Athens into Syria, stopping at the large cities on the way, that he might study the habits and customs of men. On his return he said he had not met with more than three men that "lived with modesty and according to the rules of honesty and justice." One was Ilapius, a philosopher in Antioch; the other Mares, of Laodicea, the most honest man of the age; the third, Dominius, a philosopher.

9923. INNOCENCY, Well-armed. A naked man with innocency, is better armed than Goliath in brass or iron.

Bp. Reynolds.

9924. INNOCENT, Accusing the. Be careful how you hastily accuse, or even suspect persons of crime, or repair the mischiefs which often result from such a course. A story is told of a banker who missed a hundred-pound note from his safe. He had placed it there himself. No one had access to the safe but a confidential clerk. The clerk was charged with the theft, but declared his entire innocence. He had long served the banker; no suspicion had ever before attached to him. But the money was gone, and how else could it have been removed? He only could enter the safe, therefore he must have stolen it. Circumstances were against him, so he was dismissed. The charge clung to him. He could obtain no other situation, and finally died in disgrace and poverty. Years afterward the safe was overhauled for repairs, and there, behind the drawer from which it had slipped when placed by the owner, was the hundred-pound note. Yet every one at the time believed the clerk guilty, because no other reason could be found for the disappearance of the money. Similar experiences are constantly occurring.

Anon.

9925. INNOCENT, Advantage of Being. It is far better to be innocent than penitent;—to prevent the malady than invent the remedy.

W. Secker.

9926. INNOCENT, Evil Spoken of the. There is none so innocent as not to be evil spoken of; none so wicked as to want all commendation. There are too many who condemn the just, and not a few who justify the wicked. I often hear both envy and flattery speaking falsehoods of myself to myself: may not the like tongues perform the like task of others to others? I will know others by what they do themselves; but not learn myself by what hear of others. I will be careful of mine own actions, not credulous of others' relations. A. Warwick.

9927. INNOCENTS, Slaughter of. In 1641, Sir Phelim O'Neil, and other Papists, commenced a universal massacre of the Protestants in Ireland. "No age," says Hume, "no sex, no condition, was spared. The wife, weeping for her butchered husband, and embracing her helpless children, was pierced with them, and perished by the same stroke. In vain did flight save from the first assault. Destruction was everywhere let loose, and met the hunted victims at every turn. They were stripped of their very clothes, and turned out naked and defenceless in all the rigors of winter. The feeble age of children, the tender sex of women, soon sunk under the multiplied rigors of cold and hunger. Here the husband, bidding a final adieu to his expiring family, envied them that fate which he himself expected so soon to share! There the son, having long supported his aged parent, with reluctance obeyed his last command, and abandoning him in his utmost distress, reserved himself to the hopes of avenging that death which all his efforts could not prevent or delay." Forty thousand persons perished in these massacres!

9928. INQUISITION, Fear of the. A Spanish inquisitor desirous of eating some pears that grew in a poor man's orchard not far from him, sent for the man. The message caused such fright, that he was taken sick. On being informed that his pears were the only cause for sending for him, he caused his tree to be cut down, and carried with all the pears on it to the inquisitor's house. On being asked the reason for such a performance, he said "he would not keep that thing about him, which should give an occasion for their lordships to send any more for him."

9929. INSANITY, Varieties of. Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," gives the story of a physician in Milan who kept a house for the reception of lunatics, and by way of cure used to make his patients stand for a length of time in a pit of water, some up to the knees, some to the girdle, and others as high as the chin, pro modo insanire, according as they were more or less affected. An inmate of this establishment, who happened "by chance" to be pretty well recovered, was standing at the door of the house, and, seeing a gallant cavalier ride past with a hawk on his fist, and his spaniels after him, he must needs ask, "What do these preparations mean?" The cavalier answered, "To kill game." "What may the game be worth which you kill in the course of a year?" rejoined the patient. "About five or ten crowns." "And what may your horse, dogs, and hawks, stand you in?" "Four hundred crowns more." On hearing this, the patient, with great earnestness of manner, bade the cavalier instantly be gone, as he valued his life and welfare; "for," said he, "if our master come and find you here, he will put you into his pit up to the very chin."

9930. INSIGNIFICANCE, Advantage of. A fisherman was drawing up a net which he had cast into the sea, full of all sorts of fish. The little fish escaped through the meshes of the net, and got back into the deep, but the great fish were all caught and hauled into the ship.

Æsop.

9931. INSPIRATION, Conviction of. A Chinese assistant instructed for some time in the New Testament by Bishop Boone, one day came into the room with an open Testament in his hand and exclaimed, "Whoever made this book made me. It knows all that is in my heart; it tells me what no one else except God can know about me. Whoever made me, wrote that book." This conviction was followed by conversion.

9932. INSPIRATION, The Style of. Some men ask, If the prophets spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, why did they not all speak in the same manner? why these varieties of style? I will answer that by asking you another question: Why do not all the pipes of that organ give one and the same sound? What awakens all the sounds but one and the same blast from the wind-chest? If there be a monoblast, why is there not a monotone? Because the pipes are of different shapes and different sizes: the awakening breath is one, the intonation varies with the shape and size of the pipe. The inspiration was one, but the style and manner varied with the disposition and character of the writer.

Dean McNeile.

9933. INSTINCT, Argument from. All creatures have a natural affection to their young ones; all young ones, by a natural instinct, move to and receive the nourishment that is proper for them; some are their own physicians, as well as their own caterers, and naturally discern what preserves them in life, and what restores them when sick. The swallow flies to its celandine, and the toad hastens to its platanus. Can we behold the spider's nests, or silkworm's web, the bee's closets, or the ant's granaries, without acknowledging a higher being than a creature, who hath planted that genius in them?

Charnock.

9934. INSTINCT, Law of. Beasts, birds, and insects, even to the minutest and meanest of their kind, act with the unerring providence of instinct; man, the while, who possesses a higher faculty, abuses it, and therefore goes blundering on. They, by their unconscious and unhesitating obedience to the laws of nature, fulfill the end of their existence; he, in wilful neglect of the laws of God, loses sight of the end of his.

Southey.

9935. INSTINCT, Man's. Man's instincts are elevated, ennobled by the moral ends and purposes of his being. He is not destined to be the slave of blind impulses, a vessel purposeless, unmeant. He is constituted, by his moral and intelligent will, to be the first freed being, the masterwork and the end of nature; but this freedom and high office can only co-exist with fealty and devotion to the service of truth and virtue.

Matthew Greene.

9936. INSTINCT, Reason and. No sound philosopher will confound instinct with reason because an orang-outang has used a walking-stick, or a trained elephant a lever. Reason imparts powers that are progressive, and that, in many cases, without any assignable limit; instinct only measures out faculties that arrive at a certain point, and then invariably stand still. Five thousand years have added no improvement to the hive of the bee, nor to the house of the beaver; but look at the habitations and the achievements of man. Colton.

9937. INSTRUCTION, Frozen. Antiphanes said merrily, that in a certain city the cold was so intense that words were congealed as soon as spoken, but that after some time they thawed and became audible, so that the words spoken in winter were articulated next summer. Even so, the many excellent precepts of Plato, which he instilled into the tender ears of his scholars were scarce perceived and distinguished by many of them, till they grew men and attained the warm vigorous summer of their age.

Plutarch.

9938. INSTRUCTION, Repetition of. Repetition is the mother, not only of study, but also of education. Like the fresco-painter, the teacher lays colors on the wet plaster, which ever fade away, and which he must ever renew until they remain and brightly shine.

Richter.

9939. INSTRUMENTS, God's. What if a dozen pickaxes, standing together aside in the corner, after the day's work, should begin to talk among themselves, and say one to another: "We are getting so dull, and so used up, that I think we shall not be able to support these miners much longer." Suppose they should dream, because they were employed to pick in the mountain by the hand of intelligence and strength, that therefore on them the whole success of the miners depended. And yet, men, who are God's pickaxes, are afraid that the gold, and silver, and iron, and copper of truth will be lost in this world. But God is the miner. It is his thought and hand that use you. Not that the pickaxe is not a very good thing, and quite necessary for human industry; but after all, it is an instrument, and is subordinate to the might and power that are behind and above it.

Beecher.

9940. INSULT, Customary. A lion worn out with years lay stretched upon the ground, utterly helpless, and drawing his last breath. A boar came up, and to satisfy an ancient grudge, drove at him with his tusks. Next a bull, determined to be revenged on an old enemy, gored him with his horns. Upon this an ass, seeing that the old lion could thus be treated with impunity, thought that he would show his spite also, and came and threw his heels in the lion's face. Whereupon the dying beast exclaimed: "The insults of the powerful were bad enough, but those I could have managed to bear; but to be spurned by so base a creature as thou, the disgrace of nature, is to die a double death." Æsop.

9941. INSULT, Provocation of. People are generally very ready to put up with even intentional injury, when neither preceded nor followed by insult. I recollect a strong instance of this. A man applied to me for a warrant against another for knocking out one of his front teeth, which he held up before me. On my remarking upon his loss, he replied, "Oh! I should not have come for that, only he called me a thief." It is useful in going through life to bear in mind that courtesy to, and sympathy with, those we have accidentally injured, ordinarily diminish greatly the amount of reparation required, and sometimes even inspire as much good-will as a benefit conferred. Moir.

9942. INTEGRITY, Example of. The integrity of Biblius, the Roman, was such that he would not pick up any thing that was lost in the street, but would pass it by, saying, "It was kind of a blossom of injustice, to seize upon what was so found." The law of Stagira was, "Take not that up, which you never laid down."

9943. INTEGRITY, Preserve thy. Perish what may—gold, silver, houses, lands; let the winds of misfortune dash our vessel on the sunken rock; but let integrity be like the valued keepsake the sailor-boy lashed with the rope round his body, the only thing we care to save. Macduff.

9944. INTELLECT, Development of the. By the pursuit of the intellect the mind is always carried forward in search of something more excellent than it finds, and obtains its proper superiority over the common senses of life by learning to feel itself capable of higher aims and nobler enjoyments. In this gradual exaltation of human nature every art contributes its contingent towards the general supply of mental pleasure. Sir J. Reynolds.

9945. INTELLECT, Employments of the. To perceive external objects, to conceive of them, to remember, to imagine, to compare, to judge, to abstract and to analyze, to connect thought with thought, according to the real relation between one notion and another;—these are the employments of the intellectual powers; and these occupations of the mind, though most often, if not always connected with, or preceded, or followed by desires or emotions, of some sort, are essentially different from loving, hating, fearing, hoping, etc. I. Taylor.

9946. INTELLECT, Pleasures of. The more any object is spiritualized, the more delightful it is. There is much delight in the tragical representation of those things which in reality would be sights full of amazement and horror. The ticklings of fancy are more delightful than the touches of sense. How does poetry insinuate and turn about the minds of men! Anacreon might take more delight in one of his odes than in one of his cups; Catullus might easily find more sweetness in one of his epigrams than in the lips of a Lesbia. Sappho might take more complacency in one of her verses than in her practices. The nearer any thing comes to mental joy, the purer and choicer it is. It is the observation not only of Aristotle, but of every one almost, "Some things delight merely because of their novelty;" and that surely upon this account, because the mind, which is the spring of joy, is more fixed and intense upon such things. The rosebud thus pleases more than the blown rose. Lamb.

9947. INTELLECT, Power of. Some men of a secluded and studious life have sent forth from their closet or their cloister, rays of intellectual light that have agitated courts, and revolutionized kingdoms; like the moon which, though far removed from the ocean, and shining upon it with a serene and sober light, is the chief cause of all those ebbings and flowings which incessantly disturb that restless world of waters. Colton.

9948. INTELLECT, Right Use of the. The powers of the intellect are not given to man merely for self; they are not intended to aid his own cunning, and craft, and intrigues, and conspiracies, and enrichment. They will do nothing for these base purposes. The instinct of a tiger, a vulture, or a fox will do better. Genius and abilities are given as lamps to the world, not to self. Brydges.

9949. INTELLECT, Unseen. There can be no doubt that there are many premature births in the mental world; and Gray is not far wrong when he thinks that many mute inglorious Miltons may have been buried in village obscurity. Nature, no doubt, in her boundless and untraceable prodigality, allows much of her noblest creation, the inventive and intelligent mind of man, to run to waste. The whole analogy of created things indicates this. The most powerful intellect just as it arrives at maturity sinks into the grave; and the baffled hopes of those who have watched the precocious promise of genius and wisdom, are surely not always fond illusions. But it should seem, on the other hand, that if we may so speak, there is always a vast floating capital of invention and intellect, which only requires to be directed into the proper channels to multiply a hundred fold. Great occasions seem always to call forth great minds; and that great mind which is best adapted to the necessities and to the character of the age, springs at once to the first rank. Whenever any important question has arisen, some bold intellect has arisen to grapple with it; and it is this happy coincidence between the character and powers of the commanding mind, and the intellectual or social necessities of the time, which brings to maturity all the noblest and the semipiternal works of human genius. Quarterly Review.

9950. INTEMPERANCE, Companions of. Intemperance is a hydra with a hundred heads. She never stalks abroad unaccompanied with impurity, anger, and the most infamous profligacies.

St. Chrysostom.

19951. INTEMPERANCE Death's Prime Minister. Death, the king of terrors, was determined to choose a prime minister, and his pale courtiers, the ghastly train of diseases, were all summoned to attend, when each preferred his claim to the honor of this illustrious office. Fever urged the numbers he had destroyed; cold palsy set forth his pretensions by shaking all his limbs; gout hobbled up, and alleged his great power in racking every joint; and asthma's inability to speak was a strong, though silent, argument in favor of his claim. Stone and colic pleaded their violence; plague, his rapid progress in destruction; and consumption, though slow, insisted that he was sure. In the midst of this contention the court was disturbed with the noise of music, dancing, feasting, and revelry; when immediately entered a lady, with a bold lascivious air, and flushed jovial countenance. She was attended on one hand by a troop of bacchanals: and on the other, by a train of wanton youths and damsels, who danced half naked to the softest musical instruments; her name was Intemperance, she waved her hand, and thus addressed the crowd of diseases: "Give way, ye sickly band of pretenders, nor dare to vie with my superior merits in the service of this monarch! am I not your parent—the author of your being? Do ye not derive your power of shortening human life almost wholly from me? who then so fit as myself for this important office?" The grisly monarch grinned a smile of approbation, placed her at his right hand, and she immediately became his principal favorite and Prime Minister.

Illustrations of Truth.

19952. INTEMPERANCE, Hereditary Effect of. It is remarkable that all the diseases from drinking spirituous or fermented liquors are liable to become hereditary, even to the third generation; and gradually to increase, if the cause be continued, till the family becomes extinct.

Dr. E. Darwin.

19953. INTEMPERANCE, Personal Effects of. Wine heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. It often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity. Nor does this vice only betray the hidden faults of a man, and show them in the most odious colors, but often occasions faults to which he is not naturally subject. There is more of turn than of truth in a saying of Seneca, that drunkenness does not produce but discover faults. Common experience teaches us the contrary. Wine throws a man out of himself, and infuses qualities into the mind which she is a stranger to in her sober moments.

Addison.

19954. INTEMPERANCE, Preventing. Diogenes, the Athenian philosopher, met a young man who was on his way to a bacchanalian feast.

He stopped him and carried him back to his own friends, to keep him out of danger. Prevention is the work of the hour. Old inebriates will soon be all dead. If their ranks are not recruited, the sad procession of drunkards marching fantastically to their grave will be ended.

19955. INTEMPERANCE, Roman. In the first ages of Rome, no one was permitted to drink wine till thirty years of age. Later, when wealth had increased and the grape became abundant, they vied with each other in the quantity of wine they could drink. Of Cicero, the younger, Pliny says, "He drank as if he wished to deprive Antony, the murderer of his father, of the glory of being the greatest drunkard of the age." The Emperor Tiberius was always drunk, so that Seneca says of him, "He was never drunk but once: that was from the moment of his first intoxication to the day of his death." He appointed Pomponius Flaccus and Lucius Piso to high offices because they had passed two days and nights with him at table at a single drunken carousal, which fact he expressed in their patent of office.

19956. INTEMPERANCE, Suicide by. Those men who destroy a healthful constitution of body by intemperance and an irregular life, do as manifestly kill themselves as those who hang, or poison, or drown themselves.

Sherlock.

19957. INTEMPERANCE, Trophies of. Like the skulls which a savage carries at his girdle, or sets up on poles in his palace-yard, and tells the traveler what a mighty warrior this or the other was till his axe or arrow laid him low; so, of all the sins, intemperance is the one which, reaped from the ranks of British genius, boasts the most crowded row of ghastly trophies. To say nothing of the many sorely wounded, amongst the actually slain in numbers, the musician and the artist, the philosopher and the poet, the physician and the lawyer, the statesman and the judge.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

19958. INTEMPERANCE, Upsetting Sin of. President McCosh, of Princeton College, tells the story of a negro who prayed earnestly that he and his colored brethren might be preserved from what he called their "upsettin' sins." "Brudder," said one of his friends at the close of meeting, "you ain't got de hang ob dat ar word. It's 'besettin', not 'upsettin'." "Bruder," replied the other, "if dat's so, it's so. But I was prayin' the Lord to save us from the sin of intoxication, and if dat ain't a upsettin' sin, I dunno what am."

19959. INTENTIONS, Biblical. The Lord discerns them, Heb. 4: 12. The chief value of good deeds, lies in their right intentions. Abraham offered Isaac not in deed but in intention; and the intention was accepted, Heb. 11: 17. David was commended because he desired to build the temple, 1 Kings, 8: 18. The widow's mite. Mark 12: 43. Mary—What a noble eulogy. "She hath done what she could." Mark 14: 8. The Macedonian's liberality, 2 Cor. 8: 2, 3, 12. Wickedness lies not in acts only, but in intentions. Looking may be lusting, Matt. 5: 28. Hatred is accounted murder, 1 John 3: 15; Jacob was a murderer when he wished to kill Esau, Gen. 22: 41; Joseph's brethren, Gen. 37: 20, 21; Saul wishing to kill David, 1 Sam. 18: 25; Solomon wishing to kill Jeroboam, 1 Kings 11: 40. Good intentions cannot justify wrong actions. Gideon, Judges 8: 24-27. Uzzah, 2 Sam. 6: 6, 7. James and John, Luke 9: 54. Peter, John 18: 10. Bowes.

9960. INTENTIONS, Exposure of. I care not if there were a window in my heart for all mankind to see the uprightness of my intentions.

Whitefield.

9961. INTENTIONS, Transient. No sooner does the warm aspect of good fortune shine, than all the plans of virtue, raised like a beautiful frost-work in the winter season of adversity, thaw and disappear.

Warburton.

9962. INTERCESSION, Christ's. The bank-note without a signature at the bottom, is nothing but a worthless piece of paper. The stroke of a pen confers on it all its value. The prayer of a poor child of Adam is a feeble thing in itself, but once endorsed by the hand of the Lord Jesus, it availeth much. There was an officer in the city of Rome who was appointed to have his doors always open, in order to receive any Roman citizen who applied to him for help. Just so the ear of the Lord Jesus is ever open to the cry of all who want mercy and grace. It is his office to help them. Their prayer is his delight. Reader, think of this. Is not this encouragement?

Ryle.

9963. INTERCESSION, Effects of Christ's. We have an advocate, who stops whatever plea may be brought in against us by the devil, or the law, and answers all by his satisfaction: he gets out fresh pardons for new sins. And this advocate is "with the Father." He doth not say with his Father, though that had been a singular support in itself; nor yet with our Father, which is a sweet encouragement singly considered; but with the Father, which takes in both, to make the encouragement full. Remember, you that are cast down under the sense of sin, that Jesus, your friend in the court above, "is able to save to the uttermost." Which is, as one calls it, a reaching word, and extends itself so far that thou canst not look beyond it. "Let thy soul be set on the highest mount that any creature ever attained, and enlarged to take into view the most spacious prospect, both of sin and misery, and the difficulties of being saved, that ever yet oppressed any poor humble soul; yea, join to these all the hindrances and objections, that the heart of man can invent against itself and salvation: lift up thine eyes, and look to the utmost thou canst see—and Christ, by his intercession, is able to save thee beyond the horizon and largest compass of thy thoughts, even to the utmost."

John Flavel.

9964. INTERCESSION, Example of. About the year 1350 Edward III. of England invaded France with thirty thousand men, and at the battle of Crecy defeated Philip, who was at the head of the French army. After the battle Edward besieged the city of Calais, which, after an obstinate resistance of a year, was taken by the English king. He offered to spare the lives of the inhabitants on condition that six of their principal citizens should be delivered up to him, with halters round their necks, to be immediately executed. When these terms were announced in the city there was consternation on every countenance. The rulers of the town came together, and the question was publicly proposed, "Who will offer himself as an atonement for the city?" There was silence in the assembly. The form in which the question was put suggested another, which, after the lapse of a few moments, fell from the same lips: "Who will imitate Christ, who gave himself for the salvation of men?" Eustace St. Pierre, the commander of the town, immediately stepped forward and said, "I will lay down my life for your sakes. I do it freely—cheerfully. Who is the next one?" "Your son," cried a young man, not yet arrived at manhood. "Who next?" Another and another quickly offered, until the whole number was made up. They started for the English camp. Their families and fellow-citizens clung around them, groaning and weeping until the noise was heard in the opposite army. On reaching it they were received by the soldiers of Edward with every mark of commiseration and friendship. They appeared before the king. "Are these the principal inhabitants of Calais?" he inquired sternly. "Of France, my lord," they replied. "Lead them to execution." At this moment a shout of triumph was heard in the camp. The queen had just arrived. She was immediately informed of the punishment about to be inflicted on the six victims. Hastening to the king, she pleaded for their pardon. At first he sternly refused to grant it, but her earnestness conquered, and the king yielded. Calling the captives before her, she said, "Natives of France, though you were ten-fold the enemies of our throne, yet we loose your chains. We snatch you from the scaffold. You are free." What a forcible emblem is this of the intercession of our Lord Jesus Christ! When we submit our hearts as captives to the Father, and feel that we are condemned and lost, we have an effectual Mediator who stays the hand of justice. The queen, by her relation to the victorious monarch, succeeded. Not another in his army could have done so. So Christ, by his relation to the Father—his Son, his only Son—can never plead in vain. But Jesus has done more than the queen of England ever did for the captives of Calais. He gave himself. He shed his blood to save us.

Carter.

9965. INTERCESSION, Import of. Intercession is a law term, borrowed from courts of judicature, and signifies the action of a proxy or attorney, either in suing out the rights of his client, or answering the cavils and objections brought against him by the plaintiff. This Christ doth for believers. Intercession is of three sorts. 1. Charitative intercession. Thus one man is bound to pray and intercede for another (1. Tim. 2: 1, 2). 2. Adjutory intercession. Thus the Holy Spirit makes intercession for believers (Rom. 8: 26, 27). 3. An official and authoritative intercession. And this properly belongs to Christ. Hopkins.

9966. INTERCESSION, Romish. A poor Protestant tenant of the second Duke Gordon having fallen behind in his rent, in the Duke's absence, the farmer's stock was seized and advertised to be sold by auction on a fixed day. The Duke returned home in the interval, and the tenant went to him to supplicate for indulgence. "What is the matter, Donald?" said the Duke, as he saw him enter, and noted his sorrowful face. The tenant told his story of poverty so touchingly that the Duke was moved, and forgave him all the debt and restored him to favor. With a light heart he was retiring through the hall which was hung with portraits, and observing them he inquired who they were. "These," said the Duke, who was a Romanist, "are the saints who intercede with God for me." "My lord Duke," said Donald, "would it not be better to apply yourself direct to God? I went to muckle Sawney Gordon, and to little Sawney Gordon, but if I hadn't have come to your good Grace's self, I could not have got my discharge, and both I and my bairns had been turned out of house and home."

9967. INTERCESSOR, Appointing an. It was a custom in Vienna, in the sixth century to select some holy monk, and to wall him up in a cell where he would enjoy uninterrupted seclusion, and employ all his time in fasting and prayer for the blessing of God upon the people. St. Chef was chosen for this important work, and discharged it with great fervor. Every priest should be an intercessor, bringing down blessings upon the souls in his charge. Yea, every Christian stands between some soul and God.

9969. INTEREST, Power of. No blister draws sharper than interest does. Of all industries, none is comparable to that of interest. It works day and night, in fair weather or foul. It has no sound in its footsteps, but travels fast. It gnaws at a man's substance with invisible teeth. It binds industry with its film, as a fly is bound upon a spider's web. Beecher.

9970. INTERMEDIATE STATE, Jewish Idea of the. The Jews say that the angel of death, coming and sitting on the grave, the soul immediately enters the body, and raises it on its feet; that he then examines the departed person, and stripes him with a chain half of iron and half of fire; at the first blow all his limbs are loosened, at the second his bones are scattered, which are gathered together again by angels, and the third stroke reduces the body to dust and ashes, and it returns into the grave. This rack, or torture, they call Hibbut hakkeber, or the beating of the sepulchre, and pretend that all men in general must undergo it, except only those who die on the evening of the Sabbath, or have dwelt in the land of Israel. George Sale.

9971. INTERMEDIATE STATE, Mohammedan Idea of the. When a corpse is laid in the grave, they say he is received by an angel who gives him notice of the coming of the two examiners, which are two black livid angels, of a terrible appearance, named Monker and Nakir. These order the dead person to sit upright, and examine him concerning his faith as to the unity of God and the mission of Mohammed; if he answer rightly, they suffer the body to rest in peace, and it is refreshed by the air of Paradise; but if not, they beat him on the temples with iron maces, till he roars out for anguish so loud that he is heard by all from east to west, except men and genii. Then they press the earth on the corpse, which is gnawed and stung till the resurrection by ninety-nine dragons, with seven heads each; or, as others say, their sins will become venomous beasts, the grievous ones stinging like dragons, the smaller like scorpions, and the others like serpents; circumstances which some understand in a figurative sense. George Sale.

9972. INVISIBLE, Love for the. Mr. Kilpin says of his son: "My boy said to me, before he was six years old, 'Tell me, papa, how is it that we can love persons when we have not seen them?' 'Ask yourself,' I replied, 'who gave you your beaver hat?' 'Grandpapa.' 'Do you love him?' 'Yes.' 'Have you seen him?' 'No.' 'Yet you love him. Why do you love him?' 'Because I have heard you say such a number of pretty things about him.' 'Did you believe that what I said of him was true?' 'Yes, to be sure I did.' 'Then you love him by faith, do you not?' 'Yes.' 'So then, having not seen, we love; and though now we see him not, yet believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.'"

9973. INVITATION, Accepting the. In the courts of law if a man be called as a witness, no sooner is his name mentioned, though he may be at the end of the court, than he begins to force his way up to the witness box. Nobody says, "Why is this man pushing here?" or, if they should say, "Who are you?" it would be a sufficient answer to say, "My name was called." "But you are not rich, you have no gold ring upon your finger!" "No, but that is not my right of way: I was called." "Sir, you are not a man of repute, or rank, or character!" "It matters not, I was called. Make way." "So make way, ye doubts and fears; make way, ye devils of the infernal lake; Christ calls the sinner. Sinner, come; for though thou hast naught to recommend thee, yet it is written, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

Spurgeon.

9974. INVITATION, Discipline and. A farmer wished to take his sheep out of a barren field into a rich pasture. He set open the gate between the lots, and called the sheep. A part of them went in at once, but others disregarded the call, and seemed resolved to stay and starve in the old place. Then he cut some long sticks, and sent his men to drive them in. God's ways are herein symbolized. He invites sinners into his own rich pastures of grace, and sets open the gate. When they refuse he sends the rod of affliction upon them to drive them into the green fields on the banks of the river of life.

9975. INVITATION, Society for. A gentleman residing in one of our cities was deeply impressed and grieved by seeing multitudes who neglected public worship, and he determined to make the effort to induce some of the Sabbath-breakers to frequent the house of God. It required some little effort at first, but he overcame his timidity. The Lord's day evening he went forth with his holy purpose, and, meeting a young man who did not appear to be on his way to a place of worship, he respectfully addressed him, got into conversation with him, and persuaded the stranger to accompany him to worship, and as an inducement offered him a seat in his own pew. Succeeding in this, he was emboldened and encouraged to proceed in the line of Christian activity and usefulness. And now mark with what a blessed result. He was the means of leading one hundred young men to become stated attendants at the sanctuary, many of whom have been truly converted to God. A minister of the gospel mentioned this at one of his prayer-meetings, when the idea was caught up by some persons present, who at once said, "How admirable a plan this is for doing good!" A little association was immediately formed, called "The Invitation Society." In sixteen months two hundred persons were persuaded by eight or ten of its agents no longer to forsake the assembling of themselves together in the house of prayer. One of these agents, an earnest Christian in humble life, devoted himself to this work, and was the means of bringing forty to hear the word of life. J. A. Adams.

9976. IRASCIBILITY, Treatment of. This criminal habit is oftenest found in spoiled children, pampered old ladies and men in their dotage. The subjects of it are as sensitive as the snakes which are constantly darting out their tongues and glaring at you. Those who suffer most from them are their own friends, children, and servants, upon whom they pour out their wrath without stint. Outside they "may smile and smile," and seem saints. We either kill the snakes, or shut them up in a cage, and put a guard about them, and warn people to keep away. Every irascible person ought to be compelled to give warning to all comers, like the lepers of old. Avoid them. "With an angry man thou shalt not go." Beware of cultivating it yourself. Conquer passion, or it will conquer you.

9977. IRREGULARITY, Scriptural. "What is your opinion of the Ranters?" was asked of Robert Hall. "Don't you think they ought to be put down?" "I don't know enough of their conduct to say that. What do they do? Do they inculcate antinomianism, or do they exhibit immorality in their lives?" "Not that I know of; but they fall into very irregular practices." "Indeed! What practices?" "Why, sir, when they enter a village they begin to sing hymns, and they go on singing until they collect a number of people about them, on the village green, or in some neighboring field, and then they preach." "Well: whether they may be prudent or expedient, or not, depends upon circumstances; but as yet I see no criminality." "But you must admit, Mr. Hall that it is very irregular." "And suppose I do admit that, what follows? Was not our Lord's rebuking the scribes and Pharisees, and driving the buyers and sellers out of the temple, very irregular? Was not almost all he did in his public ministry very irregular? Was not the course of the apostles, and of Stephen, and of many of the evangelists, very irregular? Were not the proceedings of Luther and Calvin and of their fellow-workers in the Reformation very irregular? a complete and shocking innovation upon all the quiescent doings of the papists? And were not the whole lives of Whitefield and Wesley very irregular lives, as you view such things? Yet how infinitely is the world indebted to all these! No, sir; there must be something widely different from mere irregularity before I can condemn."

Gregory.

9978. IRRESOLUTION, Evils of. In matters of great concern, and which must be done, there is no surer argument of a weak mind than irresolution; to be undetermined, where the case is so plain, and the necessity so urgent; to be always intending to live a new life, but never to find time to set about it: this is as if a man should put off eating, and drinking, and sleeping, from one day and night to another, till he is starved and destroyed.

Tillotson.

9979. IRRESOLUTION, Misery of. I hope, when you know the worst, you will at once leap into the river, and swim through handsomely, and not, weather-beaten with the divers blasts of irresolution, stand shivering upon the brink.

Suckling.

9980. IRRESOLUTION, Vice of. Irresolution is a worse vice than rashness. He that shoots best may sometimes miss the mark; but he that shoots not at all, can never hit it. Irresolution loosens all the joints of a state; like an ague, it shakes not this or that limb, but all the body is at once in a fit. The irresolute man is lifted from one place to another, and hath no place left to rest on. He flecks from one egg to another; so hatcheth nothing, but addles all his actions.

Feltham.

9981. IRREVERENCE, Beware of. We must take heed how we accustom ourselves to a slight and irreverent use of the name of God, and of the phrases and expressions of the Holy Bible, which ought not to be applied upon every slight occasion. Tillotson.

9982. IRREVERENCE, Crime of. To call God to witness truth, or a lie perhaps; or to appeal to him on every trivial occasion, in common discourse, customarily without consideration, is one of the highest indignities and affronts that can be offered him. Ray.

9983. ISAIAH, Character of. He was a prince amid a generation of princes, a Titan among a tribe of Titans; and of all the prophets who rose on aspiring pinion to meet the Sun of Righteousness, it was his, the Evangelical Eagle, to mount highest, and to catch on his wing the richest anticipation of his rising. It was his, too, to pierce most clearly down into the abyss of the future, and become an eye-witness of the great events which were enclosed in its womb. He is the most eloquent, the most dramatic, the most poetic, in one word, the most complete of the Bards of Israel. He has not the austere majesty of Moses, the gorgeous natural description of Job, Ezekiel's rough and rapid vehemence, like a red torrent from the hills seeking the Lake of Galilee in the day of storm, David's high gusts of lyric enthusiasm, dying away into the low wailings of penitential sorrow, Daniel's awful allegory, John's piled and enthroned thunders; his power is solemn, sustained and majestic; his step moves gracefully, at the same time that it shakes the wilderness. We have little doubt that many of his visions became objective, and actually painted themselves on the prophet's eye. Would we had witnessed that awful eye as it was piercing the depths of time, seeing the future glaring through the thin mist of the present! G. Gilfillan.

9984. JAMES, Martyrdom of. St. James, "the Lord's Brother," so much resembled him that it is reported that it required the kiss of the traitor Judas, to point out the real Christ to the soldiers. He is said to have been the first bishop of Jerusalem. To him St. Paul was sent after his conversion. "Go show these things unto James and to the brethren." His success in establishing the church brought down the vengeance of the Jews upon him. The Scribes and Pharisees were set to entrap him. They flattered him as a just man, having the respect of the whole nation, and desired that he should correct the people in regard to Jesus on the approaching Paschal festival. They placed him on a wing of the temple where he could be seen and heard of all, and then called to him, "Tell us, O Justus, whom we have all the reason in the world to believe. Seeing the people are generally led away with the doctrine of Jesus that was crucified, tell us what is this institution of the crucified Jesus." The apostle spake so that the people heard, "Why do ye inquire of Jesus, the Son of man? He sitteth in heaven at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and will come again in the clouds of heaven." The people hearing this, blessed Jesus, and shouted "Hosanna to the Son of David!" The Scribes and Pharisees saw that they had made a mistake in relying upon flatterers to change the voice of James, for he had strengthened the cause of Jesus. They cried out that he had become an impostor, and pushed him off the temple. He was bruised but not killed by the fall, and began to pray for his persecutors. They cast stones upon him, and then one of them beat out his brains with a fuller's club. His martyrdom was accomplished at Jerusalem A. D. 62, in the ninety-sixth year of his age.

9985. JEALOUSY, Love without. Love may exist without jealousy, although this is rare; but jealousy may exist without love, and this is common; for jealousy can feed on that which is bitter, no less than on that which is sweet, and is sustained by pride as often as by affection. Colton.

9986. JEALOUSY, Poison of. Jealousy may be compared to Indian arrows, so venomous, that if they prick the skin it is very dangerous; but if they draw blood, it is irrecoverably deadly. The first motions that arise from this root of bitterness have their evil effects; but where the disease progresses, it poisons all our comforts, and throws us headlong into the most tragical resolutions. Wanley.

9987. JEERING, Cruel. Scoff not at the natural defects of any which are not in their power to amend. Oh, it is cruel to beat a cripple with his own crutches! Fuller.

9988. JEERING, Unallowable. Jeer not others upon any occasion. If they be foolish, God hath denied them understanding; if they be vicious, you ought to pity, not revile them; if deformed, God framed their bodies, and will you scorn his workmanship? Are you wiser than your Creator? If poor, poverty was designed for a motive to charity, not to contempt; you cannot see what riches they have within. Especially despise not your aged parents, if they be come to their second childhood, and be not so wise as formerly; they are yet your parents; your duty is not diminished. South.

9989. JEHOVAH, The Name. Jehovah is a name of great power and efficacy; a name that hath in it three syllables, to signify the Trinity of Persons; the eternity of God, One in Three, and Three in One. A name of such dread and reverence among the Jews, that they tremble to name it, and, therefore, they used the name Adonai, Lord, in all their devotion. Rayment.

9990. JEREMIAH, Character of. The first quality exhibited in Jeremiah's character and history is shrinking timidity. His first words are, "Ah! Lord God, behold I cannot speak, for I am a child!" The storm of inspiration had seized on a sensitive plant or quivering aspen, instead of an oak or a pine. And yet this very weakness serves at length to attest the power and truth of the afflatus. Jeremiah with a less pronounced personality than his brethren, supplies a better image of an instrument in God's hand, of one moved, tuned, taught from behind and above. Strong in supernal strength, the child is made a "fenced city, an iron pillar, and a brazen wall." Traces, indeed, of his original feebleness and reluctance to undertake stern duties are found scattered throughout his prophecy. But he is reassured by remembering that the Lord is with him as a "mighty terrible One." His chief power, beside pathos, is impassioned exhortation. His prophecy is one long exhortation. He is urgent, vehement, to agony.

Gilfillan.

9991. JERUSALEM, Overthrow of. Our Saviour's words were literally fulfilled, even when royalty tried to prevent it. Titus was very desirous of preserving the temple; he had expressed the like desire of preserving the city too, and repeatedly sent Josephus, the historian, and other Jews, to persuade them to surrender. The Jews themselves set fire to the gates, through which the Romans were endeavoring to force an entrance, and one of the soldiers threw a burning brand into a window of the temple; the flames soon spread, and the people and soldiers rushed to the spot, shouting and fighting. Titus hastened to the place, calling to the soldiers to quench the fire, but they either could not hear or would not hear, and those behind encouraged those before them to set other parts on fire. Titus then, supposing that the interior might yet be saved, ordered the crowd of soldiers to be beaten back; but their anger and hatred of the Jews, and a certain vehement fury, overcame their reverence for their commander, and one of them threw the fire within, when the flame then burst forth, and thus the whole temple was burnt down, even contrary to the will of Cæsar: as if not one jot or tittle of our Lord's word should pass away until all should be fulfilled.

Dr. Cumming.

9992. JERUSALEM, People of. Jerusalem is one of the duller places I ever entered, and if the traveler did not come here to converse with the dead, rather than the living, he would be much disappointed. It has no commerce, few manufactures, and when the pilgrims are absent, little intercourse with other people or cities. There are three descriptions of persons within its walls, all of whom have a rooted antipathy to each other. The Jew despises alike the Mussulman and Christian, and regards them both as intruders upon the soil given to his nation by God. The Mussulman, with a consciousness of greater political dignity, and with a supposed freedom from the degrading superstitions that the others practice, looks upon himself as far above the Israelite dog and the Nazarite kaffer, and he would not willingly allow them to tread the same earth or breathe the same air. The Christian, with equal pride, curses the hand of the Islam oppressor, under which he constantly writhes, and turns from the child of Abraham as from one who would defile his purity, or steal his purse.

Hardy.

9993. JERUSALEM, Warning to. There was one Jesus, son of Ananias, a countryman of mean birth, four years before the war against the Jews, at a time when all was in deep peace and tranquillity, who, coming up to the feast of tabernacles, according to the custom, began on a sudden to cry out, and say, "A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds, a voice against Jerusalem and the temple, a voice against bridegrooms and brides, a voice against all the people." Thus he went about all the narrow lanes, crying night and day: and being apprehended and scourged, he still continued the same language under the blows without any other word. And they, upon this, supposing (as it was) that it was some divine motion, brought him to the Roman prefect: and by his appointment, being wounded by whips and the flesh torn to the bones, he neither entreated, nor shed a tear; but to every blow, in a most lamentable, mournful note, cried out, "Woe, woe to Jerusalem." This he continued to do till the time of the siege, seven years together; and, at last, to his extraordinary note of woe to the city, the people, the temple, adding "Woe also to me," a stone from the battlements fell down upon him and killed him.

Josephus.

9994. JESTING, Proper and Improper. A jest should be such—that all shall be able to join in the laugh which it occasions; but if it bears hard upon one of the company, like the crack of a string, it makes a stop in the music.

Feltham.

9995. JESTING, Lawful. Some men are of a very cheerful disposition, and God forbid that all such should be condemned for lightness. O let not any envious eye disinherit men of that which is their "portion in this life, comfortably to enjoy the blessings thereof!" Harmless mirth is the best cordial against the consumption of the spirit; wherefore, jesting is not unlawful, if it trespasseth not in quantity, quality, or season.

T. Fuller.

9996. JESUIT, Character of a. A Jesuit may be shortly described as an empty suit of clothes, with another person living in them, who acts for him, thinks for him, decides for him, whether he shall be a prince or a beggar, and moves him about wheresoever he pleases—who allows him to exhibit the external aspect of a man, but leaves him none of the privileges—no liberty, no property, no affections, not even the power to refuse obedience when ordered to commit the most atrocious of crimes; for, the more he outrages his own feelings, the greater his merits. Obedience to the Superior is his only idea of virtue, and in all other respects he is a mere image.

Southey.

9997. JESUITISM, Doings of. Ignatius's black militia, armed with this precious message of salvation, have now been campaigning over all the world for about three hundred years; and, openly or secretly, have done a mighty work! Who can count what a work! Where you meet a man believing in the salutary nature of falsehoods, or the divine authority of things doubtful, and fancying that to serve the good cause he must call the devil to his aid, there is a follower of Unsaint Ignatius. Not till the last of these men has vanished from earth will our account with Ignatius be quite settled, and his black militia have got their mittimus to chaos again. They have given a new substantive to modern languages. The word Jesuitism now, in all countries, expresses an idea for which there was in nature no prototype before. Not till these late centuries had the human soul generated that abomination, or needed to name it. Truly, they have achieved great things in the world; and a general result, which we may call stupendous. Not victory for Ignatius and the black militia—no, till the universe itself become a cunningly-devised fable, and God the Maker abdicates in favor of Beelzebub, I do not see how victory can fall on that side! But they have done such deadly execution on the general soul of man, and have wrought such havoc on the terrestrial and supernal interests of this world, as insure to Jesuitism a long memory in human annals.

Carlyle.

9998. JESUS, Blood of. Poets have loved the music of the mountain stream, as it tinkled down the hills amidst the stones, or murmured under leafy shades. Scripture speaks of the voice of God as the voice of many waters. So it is with the precious blood of Jesus: it has a voice which God hears, speaking better things than the blood of Abel, more than restoring to him again the lost music of his primeval creation.

Faber.

9999. JESUS, Companionship of. I went into a tent at the general hospital, and there lay a beautiful drummer boy, sixteen years old, burning up with fever. I asked him where his home was. "In Massachusetts, sir." "Are you not lonely here, far from father and mother, and friends, and so sick?" "Oh, no," was his answer; "how could I be lonely, when Jesus is here?" The smile that lit his deep blue eye, and played for a moment over his fevered lips as he uttered the words, will never cease to be the sweetest and freshest picture in my memory. My companion asked him, "How long is it since you loved Jesus?" "So long that I cannot remember when I did not love him."

W. G. Taylor.

10,000. JESUS, Esteem, not Love for. A Friend who, after listening to the eloquent praise bestowed by a gifted acquaintance upon the character and career of Christ, put the plain question, "Friend R., does thee love the Lord Jesus Christ?" The deliberate answer was, "No, sir, I am ashamed to say that I do not." The simple reply, "We wish thee did, Friend R.," was spoken with a tenderness, significance, and earnestness which could never be forgotten.

10,001. JESUS Found. A teacher in a Chinese Sunday-school in California, in talking with his class, ascertained that one of his pupils was a believing Christian, and asked him how he came to find Jesus. "Me no find Jesus," said the boy; "Jesus find me."

10,002. JESUS, Greatness of. His greatness transcends everything that is merely particular and individual. 'Tis not the greatness of the lawgiver, or of the hero,—the greatness of the thinker, or of the artist; nor is it the greatness in which the spirit of one single nation is concentrated; no, it is a perfect mirror of humanity—the greatness of the true and universal human.

Ullmann.

10,003. JESUS, Help in the Name of. A great general who was about to undertake an expedition to rid his country of a ravaging enemy, dreamed the night before that Alexander the Great called him. He obeyed the call, and found the great hero very sick in bed, but he promised that he would immediately grant him help. When asked how a sick man could help a warrior in the fight, he replied, "I will do it with my name."

10,004. JESUS, Leaning on. A little girl lay near death. "Does my little one feel sad at the thought of her death?" asked her papa, as he watched the look of pain on her face. "No, dear papa," said she, smiling, "my hand is all the while in the hand of Jesus, and he will not let it go." "Are you afraid, dear child?" asked her minister at another time. "No, I cannot fear while Jesus supports me," she replied. "But are you not weary with bearing pain?" She said, "I am leaning on Jesus, and don't mind the pain." And so she went to the fold above, leaning on the Good Shepherd who "gathers the lambs in his arms."

10,005. JESUS, Lessons of. The life of Jesus is not described to be like a picture in a chamber of pleasure, only for beauty and entertainment of the eye; but like the Egyptian hieroglyphics, whose every feature is a precept, and the images converse with men by sense and signification of excellent discourses.

Bp. Taylor.

10,006. JESUS, Mission of. A city missionary was visiting one of the lowest and most degraded courts in London, when a woman said something like this to him: "You say you care for us, and are anxious about us; but it is a very easy thing for you to come from your clean quiet home just to visit us. Would you come and bring your family, and live in this court, expose yourself to all these evils day by day, in order to lift us up?" Jesus met this demand, took upon him our flesh, dwelt in our world, exposed himself to trial and death to save us.

10,007. JESUS, The Name of. This name Jesus is compared to "oil poured out;" oil being kept close, it sendeth not forth such a savor, as it doth being poured out; and oil hath these properties, it suppleth, it cherisheth, it maketh look cheerfully: so doth this name of Jesus; it suppleth the hardness of our hearts, it cherisheth the weakness of our faith, enlighteneth the darkness of our soul, and maketh man look with a cheerful countenance towards the throne of grace.

Sutton.

10,008. JESUS, Need of. A pastor related the following incident: "Some time since, in the place where I have been preaching, I called at his office to see the gentleman who had charge of the railroad shops—a strange-looking man, almost dwarfish in stature, but with such a head and features as might belong to a giant. We spoke of religion. He talked freely; as we separated, however, expressing himself in these terms: 'I am interested in church matters, and am always glad to see ministers when they call. But I have thought the subject over long and carefully, and have come to the deliberate decision that I have no need of Jesus.' A single week had not passed before that man was taken sick. His disease was accompanied with such inflammation of the throat as forbade his speaking at all. This enforced silence continued until the hour of death, when he was enabled to utter simply this one despairing whisper: 'Who shall carry me over the river?'"

10,009. JESUS, Our. A little three-year-old girl stood at the window one pleasant Sabbath "watching for papa," who was at church. Soon she spied him coming, and as he entered the door she raised her dark eyes to him, and said: "Papa, what did Mr. Roberts preach about this morning?" Her father replied: "He preached about Jesus." "Papa, was it our Jesus?" she asked. "Yes," said her father, "it was our Jesus." The dark eyes brightened at the thought that papa's minister knew her Jesus, and talked about him to his congregation. Dr. Vincent.

10,010. JESUS, Perfection of. One flaw or fault of temper, one symptom of moral impotence or of moral perversion, one hasty word, one ill-considered act, would have shattered the ideal for ever. Liddon.

10,011. JESUS, Presence of. Abydis, a Christian child, was struck by that terrible disease, the leprosy. A cell was constructed for her, where she must spend her days alone. As she entered it, a sense of her utter helplessness and desolation came over her, and she fell to the ground in great agony. She was conscious of being caught and held up. Shuddering, she opened her eyes and looked, and One was raising her up, upon whose brow was a wreath of thorns, and in whose hands and feet were nail-prints. "My child," said he, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Her sufferings were very great. Her eyes grew dark, cue after the other, but in her blindness she saw clearly her Guardian ever present. So had we spiritual vision, we should see Jesus constantly with us, as did the blind child of this legend.

10,012. JESUS, Sleep in. It is reported as a matter of great honor to the celebrated painter Leonardo da Vinci, that he expired in the arms of Francis I. who came to pay him a visit in his last illness. The eye which is enlightened by divine grace sees infinitely more glory in the last hours of a true Christian departing in a cottage with the triumphs of faith in his soul, than in all that could be derived from the most condescending attentions of the greatest princes in the world; these are mortal like all other men, and can yield no more than kind expressions of benevolence, even where they are sincere: but the believer in Jesus hath the God of heaven and earth bestowing real blessings while he lies upon his couch, and (to use the emphatic expression of the Psalmist) "making all his bed in his sickness."

He gloriously expires in the bosom of his Redeemer, and is carried to the blissful habitation of the saints in light. Buck.

10,013. JESUS, Visit of. An old gentleman much reduced in circumstances, and financially embarrassed, was visited by a friend, who said to him, "I hope Jesus visits you." "Visits me!" said the old man, "he lives with me all the time." W. F. Sherwin.

10,014. JESUS, The Word of. There was one lately who saw herself to be lost; who, when told that Jesus' own word was that he came to seek and to save the lost, and that he was there—willing to save her, because he had said it—exclaimed: "Then I take him at his word. He is mine!" J. H. Wilson.

10,015. JESUS, Work for. The teacher of an infant class one Sunday morning asked her scholars, "What have you done for the Saviour since last we met?" One said, "I have earned some money for the heathen by doing errands;" another, "I tend our sick baby;" another, "I fetch hunchback Billy to school." One after another told of the little activities and self-denials of the week, so pleasing to the teacher, and still more to him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me." At last a little four-year-old hand was stretched up, and moved hastily to and fro to attract the teacher's attention. "Well, my dear, what are you doing to please Jesus?" The little eager face flushed with excitement as the unexpected reply came: "I scrubs, ma'am!"

10,016. JEWS, Biblical Figures of the. The vine and vineyard, Ps. 80 8: Is. 5: 1-7; Jer. 2: 21. The barren fig-tree, Luke 13: 6-9; Mark 11: 12-14, 20. The olive into which the Gentile Church was grafted, Rom. 11: 17-21. The dry tree, fit only for burning, Luke 23: 31. The dry bones, Ezek. 37: 1-14. A vessel wherein is no pleasure, Hos. 8: 8. Corn sifted, yet not lost, Amos 9: 9. The Lord's peculiar treasure, Ex. 12: 5; Ps. 135: 4. The Lord's portion, the lot of his inheritance, Deut. 32: 9. Bowes.

10,017. JEWS, Captivity of. What a mournful company! The sick, the bed-ridden, the blind; old men tottering forth on the staff of age, and plucking their gray beards with grief; the skeleton infant hanging on a breast that famine and sorrow have dried; mothers with terror-stricken children clinging to their sides, or worse, with tender daughters imploring their protection from these rude and ruffian soldiers; a few gallant men, the brave survivors of the fight, wasted by famine, bleeding from unbandaged wounds, their arms bound, and anger flashing through the tears that stream from their eyes as they are turned on matrons and maidens shrieking, struggling, fainting, in the arms of brutal passion. How they strain at their bonds! how bitterly they envy their more fortunate compatriots who lie in the bloody breach, nor have survived to see the horrors of that day! The piety that abhors the sins of this people is not incompatible with the pity that sympathizes with their sorrows. We could sit down and weep with Jeremiah, as resting on a broken pillar of God's temple, desolation around him, no sound in his ear but that long wild wail of the captive band, he wrings his hands, and, raising them to heaven, cries, "Oh that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people."

Dr. Guthrie.

10,018. JEWS, Christ and the. A learned Rabbi of the Jews, at Aleppo, being dangerously ill, called his friends together, and desired them seriously to consider the various former captivities endured by their nation, as a punishment for the hardness of their hearts, and their present captivity, which was continued sixteen hundred years, "the occasion of which," said he, "is doubtless our unbelief. We have long looked for the Messiah, and the Christians have believed in one Jesus, of our nation, who was of the seed of Abraham and David, and born in Bethlehem, and for aught we know, may be the true Messiah; and we may have suffered this long captivity because we have rejected him. Therefore my advice is, as my last words, that if the Messiah, which we expect, do not come at or about the year 1650, reckoning from the birth of their Christ, then you may know and believe that this Jesus is the Christ, and you shall have no other."

Whitecross.

10,019. JEWS, Determined Blindness of the. At a solemn disputation which was held at Venice, in the seventeenth century, between a Jew and a Christian—the Christian strongly argued, from Daniel's prophecy of the seventy weeks, that Jesus was the Messiah whom the Jews had long expected from the predictions of their prophets: the learned Rabbi who presided at this disputation, was so forcibly struck by the argument, that he put an end to the business by saying, "Let us shut up our Bibles, for if we proceed in the examination of this prophecy, it will make us all become Christians."

Bp. Watson.

10,020. JEWS, Power of the. The Jews, although scattered over the face of the earth, yet maintain a secret and indissoluble bond of union and common interest. In every country they are, as it were, the servants; but the time may come when they will virtually be the masters in their turn. Even at the present time are they not, to a great extent, the arbiters of the fate of Europe? Maintaining, on the one hand, the bond between the different states, by the mysterious power of wealth which they possess; and on the other, loosening the ties of social life, and introducing or fostering ideas of change and revolution among various peoples? In the Jewish nation stirs the Nemesis of the destiny of Europe.

Baron von Haxthausen.

10,021. JEWS, Wailing Place of the. The only point at which the Jews are permitted to approach their ancient temple is at a spot known as the Jews' wailing-place. There is a fragment of the old wall still left standing—a road's length of cyclopean blocks piled stone upon stone—by whom? No one can tell, but certainly dating back to the time of Herod. Once each week the devout Jews assemble before that wall, sit down humbly, take out their Hebrew Scriptures from their bosoms, and read the appropriate psalms and pray. It is pitiful indeed to witness that scene. Cast out, degraded, calling to remembrance their songs of ancient days, they sit and weep, and dream of the old times, when as yet the spoiler had not spoiled their sanctuary, nor laid waste their precious things. They sit and rock themselves in weeping, hoping still, hoping ever for better days. You see women, mere girls sometimes, sobbing out prayers into the very chinks of the old wall, as if thereby to waft them sooner entrance into the holy place. The hard stones are even polished with the touch of tender flesh that for ages has lovingly caressed them. Such earnestness of grief is affecting beyond measure to him who sees it. On this weekly day of wailing, I believe, the Jews here are unweary in their devotions by Moslem intrusion. On other days, however, it is not so, for children straying into the place are hissed at and insulted. Sunday at Home.

10,022. JOKE, Fatal. Antigonus commanded Eutropion, his master-cook, to go to Theocritus and settle some accounts with him. When he had called frequently about the business, Theocritus said, "I know that thou hast a mind to dish me up raw to that Cyclops;" reproaching at once the king with the want of his eye, and the cook with his employment. Eutropion replied, "Then thou shalt lose thy head, as the penalty of thy loquacity and madness." He was as good as his word; for he departed and informed the king, who sent and put Theocritus to death.

10,023. JOKING, Caution Necessary in. Never risk a joke, even the least offensive in its nature, and the most common, with a person who is not well bred, and possessed of sense to comprehend it.

La Bruyère.

10,024. JOKING, Danger of. I have never forgotten what happened when Sydney Smith—who, as everybody knows, was an exceedingly sensible man, and a gentleman, every inch of him—ventured to preach a sermon on the duties of Royalty. The Quarterly, "so savage and tartarly," came down upon him in the most contemptuous style, as "a joker of jokes," a "diner-out of the first water," in one of his own phrases; sneering at him, insulting him, as nothing but a toady of a court, sneaking behind the anonymous, would ever have been mean enough to do to a man of his position and genius, or to any decent person even. If I were giving advice to a young fellow of talent, with two or three facets to his mind, I would tell him by all means to keep his wit in the background, until after he had made a reputation by his more solid qualities.

Holmes.

10,025. JOSEPH as a Type. Joseph is the eldest son of Jacob's younger and best beloved wife. Here, again, we get the two wives, as in a former instance, bringing out the same truth, though with some additions. Leah, the elder wife, has all her children before Rachel, the younger, has any. The Jewish dispensation had all its children before the Christian dispensation had any. Christ, the first-born from the grave, was the first son of the Rachel dispensation. This son, the beloved of his father, is cast out by his brethren, the children of the elder wife, and cast into Egypt, the constant type of the Gentile world. There, after a season of suffering and shame, he is exalted to be head over the kingdom, his wife is given him from out of the Gentiles, and then his brethren, the children of the first wife, know him. This type, I think, needs no explanation; if explanation be needed, the eleventh of Romans will supply it. The sin of the Jews, the elder brethren, is made the riches of the Gentiles for a season, until the elder brethren in need are brought to know and worship their brother, and are reconciled to him. A. Jukes.

10,026. JOSHUA, Character of. Joshua was, in every sense of the word, a great character, a saintly hero—the man not only of his age, but of many ages. If his name do not shine so conspicuously mid the galaxy of patriarchs and ancient worthies, it is very much because, as has been said of him, “the man himself is eclipsed by the brilliancy of his deeds;” like the sun in a gorgeous western sky, when the pile of amber-clouds, the golden linings and drapery with which he is surrounded, pale the lustre of the great luminary. Macduff.

10,027. JOY, Believer's. There is more joy in the penitential mournings of a believer than in all the mirth of a wicked man. I appeal to you that have had melted hearts, whether you have not found a secret content and sweetness in your mourning? So far from wishing to be rid of your meltings, you rather fear the removal of them. Crisp.

10,028. JOY, Biblical Emblems of. Light from heaven, pure, cheering, diffusive, often eclipsed, sweetest after gloom and darkness. Singing and music, the natural expression of cheerfulness and joy, especially at times of festivity and rejoicing. God giveth his beloved “songs in the night;” Zion's pilgrims “sing in the way;” “the ransomed of the Lord shall . . . come to Zion . . . with songs.” Dancing, leaping, shouting for joy, Jer. 31: 13; Ps. 30: 11; Isa. 35: 6; Ezra 3: 12; Luke 6: 23; Acts 3: 8. Seed sown in the earth, awhile hidden, but, by its nature, in due time bursting into beauty, Ps. 97: 11. The gladness of nature in her times of joy. The singing of birds in early spring, Cant. 2: 12. A desert land blooming with beautiful and fragrant flowers, Isa. 35: 1, 2. A watered garden, Jer. 31: 12. The joy of festivity,—wine, Ps. 104: 15; Cant. 1: 2; Isa. 25: 6; Zech. 10: 7. Christ's first miracle had a symbolical reference, doubtless, to the joy of his kingdom, John 2: 10. Oil—“the oil of gladness,” Ps. 45: 7; “the oil of joy for mourning,” Isa. 61: 3; the festive anointing, Ps. 23: 5. White garments, Eccles. 9: 8; Rev. 3: 5. The joy of the bride and bridegroom, Isa. 61: 10; 62: 5; Jer. 33: 11. Rev. 21: 2. The joy of harvest, Isa. 9: 3;

Deut. 12: 7; Ps. 126: 5, 6, rejoicing in a finished work; joy natural, grateful, social. The joy of victory, “when men divide the spoil,” Isa. 9: 3; Ps. 119: 162; 1 Sam. 30: 16. The joy of a treasure found, Matt. 13: 44. A father's joy in receiving home a long-lost son, Luke 15: 22–24; the joy of reconciliation. Bowes.

10,029. JOY Cometh in the Morning. Just as a man who has traveled in the dark, looks back at break of day from some lofty eminence on the way that he has gone, and admires the beauty and magnificence of objects that he passed, aware only of their existence and not their claims, or even deeming them objects of fear and not of delight, so the disciples, when enlightened from above, recalled the scenes and events of their Master's life, and rejoiced in much which at the time they had not understood, or which had even perplexed and grieved them. Thus was it especially with the death and departure of Christ. They were to his followers like the fabled statue of Memnon, which sent forth sounds, mournful in the night, but melodious at the rising of the sun: when God's morning light arose, how sweet the notes those facts, once only sad, emitted! Morris.

10,030. JOY, Cured by. Pope Julius II. was very ill of a fever, but on receiving a message that auxiliary forces were coming to him from the king of Spain, to help in an emergency, he was entirely cured.

10,031. JOY, Death from. We have the examples of the Roman lady who died for joy to see her son safe returned from the defeat of Cannæ; and of Sophocles, and Dionysius the tyrant, who died of joy; and of Talva, who died in Corsica, reading news of the honors the Roman senate had decreed in his favor. We have moreover one, in the time of Pope Leo the Tenth, who upon the news of the taking of Milan, a thing he had so ardently and passionately desired, was wrapt with so sudden an excess of joy that he immediately fell into a fever and died. Montaigne.

10,032. JOY of Discovery. New discoveries of science have been followed by overpowering joy. Columbus was thrilled with rapture as indications of land began to appear in the Saragassa sea. Sea-weeds came drifting across the track of the ships; land birds of beautiful plumage circled around the masts; the air became mild and fragrant; “it wanted but the song of the nightingale to make it like the month of April in Andalusia.” All the October night before the shadows lifted on the new world, the pulses of the Spaniards throbbed with expectant joy. In the gold of the sunrise Columbus fell upon the earth and kissed it. Tears of joy streamed from his eyes when the banner of Castile was unrolled in the breeze. Te Deums rose with the morning songs of the birds. A new world had rewarded the prayers and toils and struggles of a great adventurer. Morning Star.

10,033. JOY, Ecstasy of. Mithridates, king of Asia, became interested in an old musician who had performed at a feast for him. One morning on awaking, the old man saw the tables in his house covered with vessels of silver and gold, a number of servants around him, who offered him rich garments, and a horse standing at the door, as it was usual among the king's friends. He was astonished, and would fain have fled out of the house. But the servants detained him; and told him that the inheritance of a rich man had been conferred upon him by the king, and that these were but the first-fruits of his fortune. At last, believing the reports, he put on the purple robe, mounted the horse, and as he rode through the city, cried out, "All these are mine! All these are mine!" Greater treasures are the gift of Christ to every believer. Shall he not rejoice evermore?

10,034. JOY, Eternal. The sufferings of the just may well be likened to fleeting shadows or passing dreams. As soon as the bright morning of eternity begins to dawn, the shadows of mortality are forever dissipated; and they forget at once, in the glorious light of God's majesty, the tribulations which they have endured for his cause. The unspeakable joys of which they partake so absorb all their faculties, that there is no room left for sorrow or suffering. If, indeed, their past trials are remembered by them, it is but to swell with fresh rapture, and to tune their voices to louder anthems in the praise of him who has given them, in exchange for the cross, such an exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Massillon.

10,035. JOY, Fatal. Diagoras, of Rhoades, had three sons, young men, who were all crowned victors in the Olympic games in one day. The sons came and embraced their aged father, and each placed their wreath upon his head. He was so overcome with excess of delight, that he fell into their arms and died.

10,036. JOY, Health from. Joy is one of the greatest panaceas of life. No joy is more healthful, or better calculated to prolong life, than that which is to be found in domestic happiness, in the company of cheerful and good men, and in contemplating with delight the beauties of nature. A day spent in the country, under a serene sky, amidst a circle of agreeable friends, is certainly a more positive means of prolonging life than all the vital elixirs in the world.

Hukeland.

10,037. JOY in Religion. Some people are afraid of anything like joy in religion. They have none themselves, and they do not love to see it in others. Their religion is something like the stars, very high and very clear, but very cold. When they see tears of anxiety, or tears of joy, they cry out, Enthusiasm! enthusiasm! "I sat down under his shadow with great delight." Is this enthusiasm? "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing." If it be really in sitting under the shadow of Christ, let there be no bounds to our joy. Oh! if God would but open our eyes and give us simple childlike faith to look to Jesus, to sit under his shadow, then would songs of joy arise from all our dwellings.

"Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, Rejoice."

M. Cheyne.

10,038. JOY, Spiritual. The Christian has a fons perennies within him. He is satisfied from himself. The men of the world borrow all their joy from without. Joy wholly from without is false, precarious, and short. From without it may be gathered, but like gathered flowers, though fair and sweet for a season, it must soon wither and become offensive. Joy from within is like smelling the rose on the tree, it is more sweet and fair, and I must add, it is immortal.

Salter.

10,039. JOY, Testimony of. Bapa Padmanji, one of the native converts in India, said in a private letter, "How I long for my bed! Not that I may sleep—I lie awake often and long! but to hold sweet communion with my God. What shall I render unto him for all his revelations and gifts to me? Were there no historical evidence of the truth of Christianity, were there no well-established miracles, still I should believe that the religion propagated by the fishermen of Galilee is divine. The holy joys it brings to me must be from heaven. Do I write this boastfully, brother? Nay, it is with tears of humble gratitude that I tell of the goodness of the Lord."

10,040. JUDGE, No Man His Own. One of the first motives to civil society, and which becomes one of its fundamental laws, is that no man should be judge in his own cause. By this each person has at once divested himself of the first fundamental right of uncovenanted man, that is to judge for himself and to assert his own cause. He abdicates all right to be his own governor. He inclusively in a great measure abandons the right of self-defence, the first law of nature. Men cannot enjoy the rights of an uncivil and a civil state together. That he may obtain justice, he gives up the right of determining what it is in points the most essential to him. That he may secure some liberty, he makes a surrender in trust of the whole of it.

Burke.

10,041. JUDGMENT, Book of. It is possible that all thoughts are in themselves imperishable; and that if the intelligent faculty should be rendered more comprehensive, it would require only a different and duly proportioned organization—the body celestial instead of the body terrestrial—to bring before every human soul the collective experience of its whole past existence. And this—this, perchance, is the dread Book of Judgment, in whose mysterious hieroglyphics every idle word is recorded. Yea, in the very nature of a living soul, it may be more possible that heaven and earth should pass away, than that a single act, a single thought, should be loosened or lost from that living chain of causes, to all whose links, conscious or unconscious, the free will, our only absolute self, is co-extensive and co-present.

Coleridge.

10,042. JUDGMENT, Excuses at the. I wish every man who argues against the Christian religion would take this one serious thought along with him, that he must one day, if he believes that God will judge the world, argue the case once more at the judgment-seat of God; and let him try his reasons accordingly. Do you reject the gospel, because you will admit nothing that pretends to be a revelation? Consider well. Is it a reason that you will justify to the face of God? Will you tell him that you had resolved to receive no positive commands from him, nor to admit any of his declarations for law? If it will not be a good reason then, it is not a good reason now; and the stoutest heart will tremble to give such an impious reason to the Almighty, which is a plain defiance to his wisdom and authority.

Sherlock.

10,043. JUDGMENT, First in the. There is a tradition among the Mohammedans that the Jews will be the first to be judged—that God will reproach them before the assembled world, and condemn them, and order them to hell.

10,044. JUDGMENT, Indifference to the. When Channing was a boy of ten years, he heard Dr. Hopkins preach a forcible sermon on the reasonableness of a future judgment. He was deeply impressed, and expected his father, who was a deacon of the Congregational church, to speak to him about his soul's salvation. He did not utter a word in regard to the sermon, or his danger, but, on reaching home, sat down to read. Dr. Channing says, "I made up my mind that my father did not believe one word that he had heard. He was not alarmed, why should I be? and I dismissed the whole subject from my thoughts." His father's thoughtlessness drove him into the ranks of heterodoxy, and he became the champion of Unitarianism.

10,045. JUDGMENT, Legend of. Moses, a monk of Scete in Egypt, was called upon to judge a brother overtaken in a fault. He refused; but being again called, filled a basket with sand, and placing it upon his back, went to the court. They asked, "O Father! what art thou doing?" He answered, "My sons, all my sins are behind my back following me, and I see them not, and shall I judge this day the sins of another man?"

10,046. JUDGMENT, Lesson of the. A young man who graduated at West Point said, so intense was the feeling and anxiety felt with regard to the final examination at the close of the course, that the first scholar in his class fainted and fell at the first question asked him. He felt that his standing in the profession he had chosen was now at stake, that his future position depended upon the manner in which he acquitted himself. If the loss or gain of a little worldly distinction could so move a man, what must be the feeling of the soul as it stands alone at the bar of God? We shall be judged as individuals. West Point honors are but for the little moment of time here, but the results of this final examination are for eternity. The cadet keeps this examination constantly in view. He studies and drills with the wrestler's earnestness to attain a high standing at the close. How strange that we so lose sight of this solemn hour! There are often mistakes made in worldly judgment, but there will be no mistake there. S. S. Times.

10,047. JUDGMENT, Prejudice in. Nero thought no person chaste, because he was so unchaste himself. Such as are troubled with the jaundice see all things yellow. Those who are most religious, are least censorious. "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant!" Those who are fellow creatures with men, should not be fellow judges with God. Secker.

10,048. JUDGMENT, Question of the. "Will my case be called to-day?" said an eager client to his lawyer. "Are you sure that nothing is left undone? If judgment is pronounced against me, I am a ruined man." The lawyer was a Christian man, and he inquired, "What if my case come on to-day before the eternal judge, whose sentence there is no reversing! am I prepared?"

10,049. JUDGMENT, Reversal of. Philip, king of the Macedonians, fell asleep while hearing a case. Suddenly awakening, he gave an unjust sentence. The injured person cried out, "I appeal." The king, with indignation, asked, "To whom?" He replied, "From yourself sleeping to yourself waking." The king reheard the case and reversed the judgment.

10,050. JUDGMENT, The Sinner at the. At the day of judgment, the attention excited by the surrounding scene, the strange aspect of nature, the dissolution of the elements, and the last trump, will have no other effect than to cause the reflections of the sinner to return with a more overwhelming tide on his own character, his sentence, his unchanging destiny; and amidst the innumerable millions who surround him, he will mourn apart. It is thus the Christian minister should endeavor to prepare the tribunal of conscience, and turn the eyes of every one of his hearers on himself.

Robert Hall.

10,051. JUDGMENT, Slighting the. A man would be counted a fool to slight a judge before whom he is to have a trial of his whole estate. The trial we have before God is of otherwise importance; it concerns our eternal happiness or misery; and yet dare we affront him?

Bunyan.

10,052. JUDGMENT, Storm of. As that storm roars the loudest which has been the longest gathering, so God's reckoning day with sinners, by being long coming, will be the more terrible when it comes.

Guthrie.

10,053. JUDGMENT, The Worldling at the. Chosroes, King of Persia, in conversation with two philosophers and his vizier, asked, "What situation of man is most to be deplored?" One of the philosophers maintained that it was old age, accompanied with extreme poverty; the other, that it was to have the body oppressed by infirmities, the mind worn out, and the heart broken by a heavy series of misfortunes. "I know a condition more to be pitied," said the vizier, "and it is that of him who has passed through life without doing good, and who, unexpectedly surprised by death, is sent to appear before the tribunal of the sovereign Judge."

Whitecross.

10,054. JUDGMENT-DAY, Anticipating the. Philip the Third, of Spain, whose life was free from gross evils, professed, "that he would rather lose his kingdom than offend God willingly;" yet being in the agony of death, and considering more thoroughly of his account he was to give to God, fear struck into him, and these words brake from him: "Oh! would to God I had never reigned. Oh that those years that I have spent in my kingdom, I had lived a solitary life in the wilderness! Oh that I had lived a solitary life with God! How much more securely should I now have died! How much more confidently should I have gone to the throne of God! What doth all my glory profit me, but that I have so much the more torment in my death?" God keeps an exact account of every penny that is laid out on him and his, and that is laid out against him and his; and this in the day of account men shall know and feel, though now they wink and will not understand. The sleeping of vengeance causeth the overflowing of sin, and the overflowing of sin causeth the awakening of vengeance. Abused mercy will certainly turn into fury. God's forbearance is no quit-tance. The day is at hand when he will pay wicked men for the abuse of old and new mercies. If he seem to be slow, yet he is sure. He hath leaden heels, but iron hands. The farther he stretcheth his bow, or draweth his arrow, the deeper he will wound in the day of vengeance. Men's actions are all in print in heaven, and God will, in the day of account, read them aloud in the ears of all the world, that they may all say Amen to that righteous sentence that he shall pass upon all despisers and abusers of mercy. Brooks.

10,055. JUDGMENT-DAY, Appeal to the. I am content to wait till the judgment-day for the clearing up of my character; and, after I am dead, I desire no other epitaph than this, "Here lies George Whitefield." What sort of a man he was the great day will discover. Whitefield.

10,056. JUDGMENT-DAY, Certainty of the. The bringing into judgment is a thing which is known by reason, and is clear by the light of nature; wherefore, in Austria, one of the nobles dying, who had lived fourscore and thirteen years, and had spent all his life in pleasures and delights, never being troubled with any infirmity, and this being told to Frederick the emperor, "From hence," saith he, "we may conclude the soul's immortality; for if there be a God that ruleth this world, as divines and philosophers do teach, and that he is just no one denieth, surely there are other places to which souls after death do go, and do receive for their deeds either reward or punishment; for here we see that neither rewards are given to the good, nor punishment to the evil." Brooks.

10,057. JUDGMENT-DAY, Disclosures of the. The philosophic historian is expected not only to tell us that certain events occurred, but also to trace them to their origin, and tell how it was they were brought about; the skillful physician is expected not only to discern the marks of disease, but also to trace it to its source, and tell us what functions are deranged; but, in arguing from the seen and known to the unseen and the unknown, how often, how grievously do they err. A time, however, is coming when there shall be a great bringing together of causes and effects, of motives and actions, and when no mistake shall be made—that time is the judgment day; then it shall be seen not only what men did, but why they did it. Power.

10,058. JUDGMENT-DAY, Discoursing on the. When Jonathan Edwards preached at Enfield, there was "such a breathing of distress," that he was compelled to stop, and request the people to retain their composure. He discoursed on the judgment to come, as if he were standing on "the sides of eternity," and the people heard him as if they were listening to the sound of "the last trump," or to their own sentences of condemnation from the lips of the Son of God. Turnbull.

10,059. JUDGMENT-DAY, Impartiality of the. All the senates that ever were convened, and all the assemblies that ever met upon business or pleasure; all the armies that were ever conducted into the field, and all the generals who conducted them; in a word, all the men and women that shall have lived, from the first pair to their last born son and daughter, are to appear together, and to take their respective trials at the day of the great assize. High and low, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, will then be distinguished only by their virtues and their vices; so that the whole world shall perceive and acknowledge that "God is no respecter of persons." The injured virgin, the afflicted widow, and the oppressed orphan, shall then see those, face to face, who have spoiled them of their innocence, their reputation, or their substance. There men shall meet all those who seduced them, or whom they have seduced, into the ways of sin; and all those who have directed and encouraged them, or whom they have directed and encouraged, to proceed in the paths of righteousness. From the former they shall turn away with shame and fear; the latter they shall behold with joy and rejoicing. There they shall view the wisdom of religion in the persons of the righteous, and wonder why they did not see it before, and get themselves up to the study of it; there they shall clearly behold the folly of irreligion, in the persons of the wicked, and be astonished at their insensibility in following so hard after it. Amidst all this unimaginable multitude there shall not be one idle and unconcerned spectator; not one that shall have leisure to trouble himself with the affairs of his neighbor. Every man will have a cause to be heard, and how will he be straitened until it be determined! Bishop Horne.

10,060. JUDGMENT-DAY, Lessons of the. Methinks neither the voice of the archangel, nor the trump of God, nor the dissolution of the elements, nor the face of the Judge itself, from which the heavens will flee away, will be so dismayed and terrible to these men as the sight of the poor members of Christ; whom, having spurned and rejected in the days of their humiliation, they will then behold with amazement united to their Lord, covered with his glory, and seated on his throne. How will they be astonished to see them surrounded with so much majesty! How will they cast down their eyes in their presence! How will they curse that gold which will then eat their flesh as with fire, and that avarice, that indolence, that voluptuousness, which will entitle them to so much misery! You will then learn that the imitation of Christ is the only wisdom: you will then be convinced it is better to be endeared to the cottage than admired in the palace; when to have wiped the tears of the afflicted, and inherited the prayers of the widow and the fatherless, shall be found a richer patrimony than the favor of princes.

Robert Hall.

10,061. JUDGMENT-DAY, Methods of the. Memory will answer the books which shall be opened at the Judgment, recording the deeds done in the body, as face answers face in a mirror. There will be a perfect correspondence between the subjective and the objective record. The finest lines, the most delicate light and shade, will be identical in each picture. God's omniscience treasures eternally, unchangeably, every lightest thought and intent of every created mind. There is an absolute record of all finite activity, outside the agent. We cannot conceive how it is kept, but we know that it is exact, infallible, exhaustive, because it is God's record. At the Judgment, the human soul, willing or unwilling, will take the witness-stand. Memory will identify every deed done in the body. The drowning recall everything. Lines written with invisible ink become legible when exposed to light. Earthly life will be read again, not a line or word erased. Conscience will acknowledge the perfect justice of God's law. Human reason will approve of the exact application of that law to the precise facts in the life of every individual. Sin will be compelled "to the teeth and forehead of its faults to give in evidence." Every knee shall bow, every mouth shall be stopped. The lustre of the great white throne will throw its beams to illuminate the remotest universe. In the response of memory to God's eternal record, the soul will walk down a hall of mirrors, where every act of its earthly life was not on one side, but on all sides, at every instant photographed, to be preserved forever. The transient shall be made permanent. Earthly life shall be the base, the pedestal on which the future eternal life shall rise. According to the foundation shall be the superstructure. Every pillar in the temple of God will remind us of earth. As it rises upward and upward, still it shall reveal the lines first sketched in time. The inconceivable future beyond Resurrection will ever refer back to the twofold but identical records, the memory of man, and the judgment books of God.

Dr. Boardman.

10,062. JUDGMENT-DAY, Separation at the. The Seer in the Shepherd of Hermas is shown a number of trees, all which, while it is winter, are alike without their leaves, and seeming, therefore, to him all alike dead; and he is told that as the dry and the green trees are not distinguishable from one another in the winter, while all alike are leafless and bare, so neither in the present age are the just from sinners. The second time he is shown the trees, but now some of them are putting forth leaves, while others are still remaining bare. Thus shall it be in the future age, which for the just shall be a summer, and they shall be declared openly, while their hidden life shall then manifest itself; but for the sinners it shall still be winter, and they, remaining without leaf or fruit, shall as dry wood be cut down for the burning.

R. C. Trench.

10,063. JUDGMENTS, Divine. The whole design of men's preservation hath been beaten in pieces by some unforeseen circumstance, so that judgments have broken in upon them without control, and all their subtleties been outwitted: the strange crossing of some in their estates, though the most wise, industrious, and frugal persons, and that by strange and unexpected ways; and it is observable how often everything contributes to carry on a judgment intended, as if they rationally designed it: all these loudly proclaim a God in the world; if there were no God, there would be no sin; if no sin, there would be no punishment.

Charnock.

10,064. JUDGMENTS, Uncharitable. We cannot be guilty of a greater act of uncharitableness than to interpret the afflictions which befall our neighbors as punishments and judgments. It aggravates the evil to him who suffers, when he looks upon himself as the mark of divine vengeance, and abates the compassion of those towards him who regard him in so dreadful a light. This humor of turning every misfortune into a judgment, proceeds from wrong notions of religion, which in its own nature produces good will towards men, and puts the mildest construction upon every accident that befalls them. In this case, therefore, it is not religion that sours a man's temper, but it is his temper that sours his religion.

Addison.

10,065. JUSTICE, Advantage of. The surest and most pleasant path to universal esteem and true popularity is to be just; for all men esteem him most who secures most their private interest, and protects best their innocence. And all who have any notion of a Deity believe that justice is one of his chief attributes; and that, therefore, whoever is just is next in nature to him, and the best picture of him, and to be revered and loved.

Mackenzie.

10,066. JUSTICE, Appeal for. An imprisoned minister instructed a nobleman to make his appeal for justice as follows: "I desire you to make known my lamentable case to Her Majesty's honorable Privy Council, or to Her Majesty herself, that the cause of my imprisonment may be examined, and that I may be delivered from this hard usage. For I desire justice, and not mercy, being conscious of my own innocency. My old adversary, the archbishop (Whitgift), hath treated me more like a Turk or a dog, than a man, or a minister of Jesus Christ."

10,067. JUSTICE, Appeal from. King Canute, of Denmark, undertook to clear his realm of robbers and pirates. Of these last he had captured several, and when they were about to be executed one of them cried out that he was of royal blood, and related to Canute. The king replied that, to honor his extraction, he should be hung from the top of the highest mast of his ship, which was done.

10,068. JUSTICE, Definition of. Justice, as defined in the institutes of Justinian, nearly two thousand years ago, and as it is felt and understood by all who understand human relations and human rights is: "Constans et perpetua voluntas, juxta suum cuique tribuere"—a constant and perpetual will to render to every one that which is his own.

J. Q. Adams.

10,069. JUSTICE, Doing. One hour in the execution of justice is worth seventy years of prayer.

Mohammed.

10,070. JUSTICE, Execution of. Spitigneus, Prince of Bohemia, was stopped while riding out by a woman who implored him to listen to her plea. He told her to await his return. She told him it would prove dangerous to her, for that she was to make her appearance in an hour or else forfeit her bond. The prince endeavored to refer the woman to other judges, but she cried out, "That he himself, and not others, was the judge whom God had appointed her." He alighted from his horse, and with great patience, for two hours, gave attention to the cause of the poor woman.

10,071. JUSTICE, First. When about to take a collection, Rowland Hill said: "From the great sympathy I have witnessed in your countenances, and the strict attention you have honored me with, there is only one thing I am afraid of, that some of you may feel inclined to give too much. Now it is my duty to inform you that justice, though not so pleasant, yet should always be a prior virtue to generosity; therefore, as you will all immediately be waited upon in your respective pews, I wish to have it thoroughly understood that no person will think of putting anything into the plate who cannot pay his debts."

10,072. JUSTICE, Hand of. Slow goes the hand of justice, like the shadow on the sundial; ever moving, yet creeping slowly on, with a motion all but imperceptible. Still stand in awe. The hand of justice has not stopped. Although imperceptible, it steadily advances; by and by it reaches the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth hour. And now the bell strikes. Then, unless you have fled to Christ, the blow, which was so slow to fall, shall descend over the head of impenitence with accumulated force.

Dr. Guthrie.

10,073. JUSTICE, Hatred of. When the Athenians were fully bent to banish Aristides by ostracism, an illiterate country-fellow came to him with his shell, and asked him to write in it the name of Aristides. "Friend," said he "do you know Aristides?" "Not I," said the fellow; "but I do not like his surname of Just." He said no more, but wrote his name in the shell and gave it him. Thus the truest man in Athens was banished from the city, because of the popular hatred of virtue.

10,074. JUSTICE, Inexorable. How astonishing was the rigid justice of Brutus the Elder, who, in spite of all the passions of a father, passed sentence of death upon his own sons, for conspiring against the liberty of their country! While the amiable youths stood trembling and weeping before him, and hoping their tears would be the most powerful defence with a father; while the senate whisper for the moderation of the punishment, and that they might escape with banishment; while his fellow-consul is silent; while the multitude tremble and expect the decision with horror;—the inexorable Brutus rises, in all the stern majesty of justice, and turning to the lictors, who were the executioners, says to them, "To you, lictors, I deliver them." In this sentence he persisted, inexorable, notwithstanding the weeping intercession of the multitude, and the cries of the young men, calling upon their father by the most endearing names. The lictors seized them, stripped them naked, bound their hands behind them, beat them with rods, and then struck off their heads; the inexorable Brutus looking on the bloody spectacle with unaltered countenance. Thus the father was lost in the judge; the love of justice overcame all the fondness of the parent; private interest was swallowed up in regard for the public good, and the honor and security of government. This, perhaps, is the most striking resemblance of the justice of Deity that can be found in the history of mankind. But how far short does it fall! How trifling were the sufferings of these youths, compared with those of the Son of God! They, too, were criminals—he was holy and free from sin. How insignificant the law and government for which they suffered, to that of the divine!

Davies.

10,075. JUSTICE, Interest in. Solon, being asked what city was best modeled, replied. "That, where those who are not injured are no less ready to prosecute and punish offenders than those who are."

10,076. JUSTICE, Motto of. The Emperor Maximilian's motto was, "Fiat justitia ruat cælum;" "Let justice be done, though the heavens fall."

10,077. JUSTICE, Mal-administration of. If they which employ their labor and travail about the public administration of justice, follow it only as a trade, with unquenchable thirst of gain, being not in heart persuaded that justice is God's own work, and themselves his agents in this business—the sentence of right, God's own verdict, and themselves his priests to deliver it; formalities of justice do but serve to smother right; and that which was necessarily ordained for the common good is, through shameful abuse, made the cause of common misery.

Hooker.

10,078. JUSTICE, March 21. God's justice on offenders goes not always in the same path nor the same pace; and he is not pardoned for the fault who is for a while reprieved from the punishment. "Yea, sometimes the guest in the inn goes quietly to bed before the reckoning for his supper is brought to him to discharge."

Fuller.

10,079. JUSTICE, Memorial of. Near Potsdam (Prussia), in the reign of Frederick King of Prussia, was a mill which interfered with a view from the windows of Sans Souci. Annoyed by this inconvenience to his favorite residence, the king sent to inquire the price for which the mill would be sold by the owner. "For no price," was the reply of the sturdy Prussian; and in a moment of anger, Frederick gave orders that the mill should be pulled down. "The king may do this," said the miller, quietly folding his arms, "but there are laws in Prussia;" and forthwith he commenced proceedings against the monarch, the result of which was, the court sentenced Frederick to rebuild the mill, and to pay besides a large sum of money as compensation for the injury which he had done. The king was mortified, but had the magnanimity to say, addressing himself to his courtiers, "I am glad to find that just laws and upright judges exist in my kingdom." A few years ago, the head of the honest miller's family, who had in due course of time succeeded to the hereditary possession of his little estate, finding himself, after a long struggle with losses occasioned by the war, which brought ruin into many a house besides his own, involved in pecuniary difficulties that had become insurmountable, wrote to the then king of Prussia, reminding him of the refusal experienced by Frederick the Great at the hands of his ancestors, and stating that if his majesty now entertained a similar desire to obtain possession of the property, it would be very agreeable to him, in his present embarrassed circumstances, to sell the mill. The king immediately wrote, with his own hand, the following reply: "My dear neighbor:—I cannot allow you to sell the mill; it must remain in your possession as long as one member of your family exists; for it belongs to the history of Prussia. I lament, however, to hear that you are in circumstances of embarrassment; and therefore send you 6000 dollars (about £1000 sterling) to arrange your affairs, in the hope that this sum will be sufficient for the purpose. Consider me always your affectionate neighbor, Frederick William."

10,080. JUSTICE, Regard for. Mahomet II. executed his own son, Mustapha, for adultery. The emperor Otho the First caused the head of a man, who had committed a rape, to be cut off, though the woman had condoned the crime by marrying the man. The emperor said, "A collusion among yourselves cannot make void the law."

10,081. JUSTICE, Sacrifice for. Phocion would not so much as appear in behalf of his son-in-law, Charicles, when he was accused for having taken money of Harpalus; but having said, "Only for acts of justice have I made you my son-in-law," went his way. And Timoleon, the Corinthian, when he could not by admonitions or requests dissuade his brother from being a tyrant, confederated with his destroyers.

Putarch.

10,082. JUSTICE in Sodom. When Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, came to the city of Sodom, he saw an inhabitant of that city maltreating a stranger and robbing him of his clothes. "Why dost thou rob the poor stranger?" exclaimed Eliezer, enraged; "how darest thou commit such a crime?" "Art thou," asked the robber, "this man's brother, or our judge?" Eliezer made no reply, but went about to assist the stranger. Thereupon the robber picked up a stone, hurled it at Eliezer, and struck him on the forehead. The blood began instantly to flow from the painful wound, and Eliezer stood perplexed, unable to stop the streaming blood. He thought the villain would regret his rash misdeed, but the latter saucily cried, "How beautifully the blood is trickling down—how beautifully!" "Thou hast wounded," exclaimed Eliezer, "nay, thou hast almost killed me, and dost thou even deride me? I shall obtain justice! I am going directly to the court!" "That is just the place where I wish to go with thee," cried the audacious villain. A vast crowd of the inhabitants had in the meantime gathered around them; they seized the screaming Eliezer, and dragged him to the residence of the judge. "Stranger," exclaimed the latter, "why dost thou raise such a tumult in our peaceful city?" "I am a peaceable man," replied Eliezer; "I saw a stranger in thy city robbed, and when I wished to help him this man cast a stone at my forehead, mocked me, and in connection with his associates dragged me hither. Behold what a wound he has struck; see how the blood flows." "Then," said the judge gravely, "thou must pay him eight silver shekels, for this is the price which the surgeons of this city charge for blood-letting!" Such was the decision of the judge of Sodom.

Hood.

10,083. JUSTICE, True. The Thebans represented true justice as having neither hands nor eyes, for the judge should neither receive bribes nor respect persons. The English for similar reasons picture her with a sword in one hand, scales in the other, and bandaged eyes. Whatever doubt there may be as to the justice of the earthly judge, there can be none as to that of the heavenly.

10,084. JUSTICE, Unspotted. The idea that the judicial officer is supposed to be vested with ermine, though fabulous and mythical, is yet more eloquent in its significance. We are told that the little creature called ermine is so sensitive to its own cleanliness that it becomes paralyzed and powerless at the slightest touch of defilement upon its snow-white fur. When the hunters are pursuing it, they spread with mire the pass leading to its haunts, to wards which they then draw it, knowing that it will submit to be captured rather than defile itself. And a like sensibility should belong to him who comes to exercise the august functions of judge. John S. T. Sneed.

10,085. JUSTIFICATION, Attendant of. Justification regards something done for us; sanctification something done in us. The one is a change in our state, the other in our nature. The one is perfect, the other gradual. The one is derived from the obedience of the Saviour, the other from his spirit. The one gives us a title to heaven, the other a meetness for it. Suppose you had a son—you forbade him to enter a place of contagion on pain of losing all you could leave him. He goes, and is seized with the infection. He is guilty, for he has transgressed your command, but he is also diseased. Do you not perceive that your forgiving him does not heal him? He wants not only the father's pardon, but the physician's aid. In vain is he freed from the forfeiture of his estate, if he be left under the force of the disorder. Jay.

10,086. JUSTIFICATION, Constituents of. Justification consists of these two parts—remission and acceptance. Remission of sins takes away our liability to death; acceptance of our persons gives us a title unto life. Now, to be free from our obnoxiousness to death, and instated in a right to eternal life, these two constitute a perfect justification. For, to be accepted of God in Christ, is no other than for God, through the righteousness and obedience of Christ imputed to us, to own and acknowledge us to have a right to heaven. Hopkins.

10,087. JUSTIFICATION, Means of. "How do you think you are to be justified before God?" said an Irish clergyman to a man in his parish. "How, sir? By the righteousness of Christ, to be sure!" "Well, but I want you to inform me what you understand by the righteousness of Christ," rejoined the clergyman. The man hesitated for a moment, and then replied: "Suppose, sir, I want to go to Limerick. I go down to the railway station, and try to get into a carriage. A porter comes up to me and asks for my ticket. I am obliged to tell him I have none, and have no money to buy one. He pushes me back, and says I must not go. A kind, rich man is standing by; he says to me, 'I will purchase a ticket for you.' This he does, and hands it to me. I show it to the porter, who then allows me to get into a carriage, and away I go to Limerick. In the same way I want to go to heaven. I have no way of purchasing the title to it. Jesus sees my anxiety to go; he died to pay the debt of my sins; he gives me his righteousness; I show this to God; and as the railway ticket admitted me to the train, this gives me a title to heaven which of myself I did not possess, and by my own power I could never have obtained."

10,088. KEEPER, The Lord Our. A pious friend of the late Duncan Matheson, dying, ordered the following to be put on his tombstone: "J. McP—. Born, ——. Died, ——. Kept."

10,089. KINDNESS, Acts of. In the intercourse of social life, it is by little acts of watchful kindness recurring daily and hourly—and the opportunities of doing kindnesses, if sought for are forever starting up,—it is by words, by tones, by gestures, by looks, that affection is won and preserved. He who neglects these trifles, yet boasts that, whenever a great sacrifice is called for, he shall be ready to make it, will rarely be loved. The likelihood is, he will not make it; and if he does, it will be much rather for his own sake than for his neighbor's. Many persons, indeed, are said to be penny-wise and pound-foolish! but they who are penny-foolish will hardly be pound-wise; although selfish vanity may now and then for a moment get the better of selfish indolence; for wisdom will always have a microscope in her hand. Sala.

10,090. KINDNESS, Biblical. Rahab—amply rewarded for preserving the life of the spies by the preservation of herself and family, Joshua 2: 18. Jonathan's kindness to David, which led to his children's preservation, 2 Sam. 9: 7; 21: 7. The centurion's anxiety for the welfare of his sick servant, was the cause of his own faith being confirmed. He built the Jews a synagogue, and they interceded for him to Christ, Luke 7: 2-10. The good Samaritan—an example of genuine kindness shown to a stranger, without regard to personal claim, race or religion, Luke 10: 30-37. Cornelius, Acts 10: 4. The barbarous people of Melita, very fully repaid for their kindness to the shipwrecked mariners, Acts 28: 1-10. Bowes.

10,091. KINDNESS, Christ's Approval of. I shall never forget my own feelings when, distant once in the land of Palestine, I was ill, and knew not when I should return. In that distant land I received a letter from my family, and in that letter it was stated that a dear friend had given a token of regard to my youngest child, then a comparative infant, and my heart swelled more with affection for that friend than had he sent a token of affection to me. It was given to the smallest of my children, the little one, and he had done it unto me; and my heart, half across the globe, swelled with affection to a friend I could not see, because he had remembered a little one. So the great Father has his little ones scattered all over our land, in hovels, in cellars, in garrets, and abodes of affliction, and in scenes of poverty, and he sees when an act of kindness is done to one of the least of them, and in the heaven of heavens he says, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Bp. Simpson.
10,092. KINDNESS, Duty of. The great duty of life is not to give pain; and the most acute reasoner cannot find an excuse for one who voluntarily wounds the heart of a fellow-creature. Even for their own sakes, people should show kindness and regard to their dependents. They are often better served in trifles, in proportion as they are rather feared than loved; but how small is this gain compared with the loss sustained in all the weightier affairs of life! Then the faithful servant shows himself at once as a friend, while one who serves from fear shows himself as an enemy.

Frederika Bremer.

10,093. KINDNESS, Greatest. I regard it as a singular kindness to man that he is selected to be the instrument of saving his fellow-men. The God of salvation, the Author and Finisher of our faith, might have arranged it otherwise. Who shall limit the Holy One of Israel? The field is the world. And as the husbandman ploughs his fields and sows his seed in spring by the same hands that bind the golden sheaves of autumn, God might have sent those angels to sow the gospel, who shall descend at the judgment to reap the harvest. But though these blessed and benevolent spirits, who are sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation, take a lively interest in the work; though watching from on high the progress of a Redeemer's cause, they rejoice in each new jewel that adds lustre to his crown, and in every new province that is won for his kingdom; and though there be more joy even in heaven than on earth when man is saved, a higher joy among these angels over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons, yet theirs is little more than the pleasure of spectators. Theirs is the joy of the crowd who, occupying the shore, or clustered on its heights, with eager eyes and beating hearts follow the bold swimmer's movements, and watching his head as it rises and sinks among the waves, see him near the drowning child, and pluck from the billows their half-drowned prey; and, trembling lest strength should fail him, look on with anxious hearts, till, buffeting his way back, he reaches the strand, and amid their shouts and sympathies restores her boy to the arms of a fainting mother.

Dr. Guthrie.

10,094. KINDNESS, Jewels of. Wandregisl was of noble blood, but desired to leave the court of king Dagobert, and become a monk. The king would not give his consent, and summoned him into his presence. The young man started for the palace and passed near the gate a poor man, struggling to right his cart, which had been upset in the mud. The courtiers passed by with no sympathy or proffer of aid, but with curses for encumbering the road. Wandregisl laid hold of the cart, righted it, set the poor man on his way, and became much soiled with mud in the good work. In this condition he went boldly into the presence of the king, and the courtiers greeted his appearance with derisive laughter. There, in answer to the king's question, he explained the reason of his soiled condition. The king was satisfied. The laughter of the courtiers ceased. To them the king said,

"Look and fix your gaze on the soiled raiment;
So the world its heroes pays with a sorry payment."

But to me these mud-stains are jewels fair and Sent by one who dwells afar, to his servant loyal."

So he won the king's permission to devote himself to the monastic life, and became the "patron saint of peasants."

10,095. KINDNESS, Mistaken. Once upon a time, there was a very kind-hearted little boy who owned a dog. He was deeply attached to the animal, and yet, notwithstanding his love, our little friend became convinced—such are the strange contradictions in human nature—that the dog's tail needed shortening. To be sure, the operation would occasion a deal of pain; but the tail was unsatisfactory (to the boy), and that was sufficient; it must come off. But here the tender-heartedness of the child rose beautifully to view. He felt that to cut it off all at once would occasion too much pain; and so, because he shrank from unnecessarily hurting the feelings of the dog, he concluded to cut it off an inch a day, till the desired length was "gradually" attained. Now I fearlessly affirm that if that dog's tail had to come off, it would have been far less exasperating to have it off at once, and not at the rate of an inch a day. Verbum sap!

Evangelist.

10,096. KINDNESS, Motive to. A man came to Poemen and said, "I have got a neighbor, and I am continually doing him little acts of kindness, yet I always find that there is self-satisfaction or some mean, unworthy motive mixed up with my interest. Shall I forbear?" Poemen answered, "There were two men who had fields. The one sowed corn and with it tares; the other sowed nothing, and his field was soon covered with weeds. He who had sowed corn and tares reaped a mixed crop, some good and some bad; but he saved the corn by sorting it from the tares. Which acted the best?" There could be but one answer.

10,097. KINDNESS Reciprocated. A lion was sleeping in his lair, when a mouse, not knowing where he was going, ran over the mighty beast's nose and awakened him. The lion clapped his paw upon the frightened little creature, and was about to make an end of him in a moment, when the mouse, in a pitiable tone, besought him to spare one who had so unconsciously offended, and not stain his honorable paw with so small a prey. The lion, smiling at his little prisoner's fright, generously let him go. Now it happened no long time after, that the lion, while ranging the woods for his prey, fell into the toils of the hunters; and finding himself entangled without hope of escape, set up a roar that filled the whole forest with its echo. The mouse, recognizing the voice of his former preserver, ran to the spot, and without more ado set to work to nibble the knot in the cord that bound the lion, and in a short time set the noble beast at liberty; thus convincing him that kindness is seldom thrown away, and that there is no creature so much below another but that he may have it in his power to return a good office. Æsop.

10,098. KINDNESS, Recompense of. The earnestness of a little girl in offering her chestnuts arrested the attention of a young man, and he gave her a shilling. She ran home with it to her sick mother. So small a gift made joy in the house. Years after a poor man called upon a rich bank director to ask for a position as messenger. The director's wife recognized him as he passed out as the donor of the shilling to her. She learned his business with her husband, and said, "Give him the situation." "Why?" said he. "Because I ask it as a favor, and you have promised me never to deny me a favor." He promised it, and that night sent a note to the applicant notifying him of his appointment. His wife explained the reason for her request to her husband, and he replied, "That is right, my little wife; never forget one who was kind to you in the days when you needed help most." The clerk received the note as he sat beside his sick wife. Opening it, he exclaimed, "Good news, wife! We shall not starve. Here is a promise of a situation." His wife called his attention to something which fell out upon the floor. It was a fifty-pound note, folded in a paper bearing the inscription, "In grateful remembrance of the silver shilling which a kind stranger bestowed on a little chestnut-girl twenty years ago."

10,099. KINDNESS, Record of. Mr. Cathcart kept a diary which was, "A memorial of acts of kindness, that as memory is liable to fail, and as the kindness and friendship of former times may be forgotten, the remembrance of friendly offices done to the writer or his family, or to his particular friends, might be preserved, in order that he may himself repay the debt in grateful acknowledgments while he lives, and that his family after him might know to whom their father owed obligations, and might feel every debt of gratitude due by him as an obligation on themselves."

10,100. KINDNESS, Requital of. There will come a time when three words uttered with charity and meekness, shall receive a far more blessed reward than three thousand volumes written with disdainful sharpness of wit. But the manner of men's writing must not alienate our hearts from the truth, if it appear they have the truth.

Hooker.

10,101. KINDNESS, Self-Approbation of. Good and friendly conduct may meet with an unworthy, with an ungrateful, return; but the absence of gratitude on the part of the receiver cannot destroy the self-approbation which recompenses the giver: and we may scatter the seeds of courtesy and kindness around us at so little expense. Some of them will inevitably fall on good ground, and grow up into benevolence in the minds of others; and all of them will bear fruit of happiness in the bosom whence they spring. Once blest are all the virtues; twice blest sometimes.

Jeremy Bentham

10,102. KINDNESS, Testimonial to. There were a brother and sister who loved one another very much. He was the older, and was taken ill and died. They laid him out on his own little bed, and his mother took his little sister to look at him. She stood and looked at his sweet face, as white and cold as marble, and she wept very much. At last she said:

"Mother, may I take hold of his hand?" She placed it in hers, when the sister, lifting it up and stroking it gently, said: "This little hand never struck me!"

10,103. KINDNESS, Trifling. After Luther had returned from his trial before the emperor at Worms, much exhausted, to his hotel, the Roman Catholic Duke Eric, of Brunswick, sent him a glass of beer which he had first tasted. After drinking, Luther said, "As this day Duke Eric has remembered me, so may our Lord Jesus Christ remember him in the hour of his struggle." The servant reported the prayer to the Duke. When in old age the Duke came to die he ordered a servant to read the Bible to him. He opened and read, to the dying man's great comfort, "Whosoever shall give a cup of cold water to drink, in my name, verily I say unto you he shall not lose his reward."

10,104. KING, Exalted to be. After Alexander had deposed Strato, king of Sidon, he caused a new king to be appointed, and Abdalonimus, a remote descendant of the royal line, was fixed upon. The peculiarity of his case was his deep poverty, which was known to have been caused by his unswerving honesty. Alexander's agents found him weeding his garden. They saluted him king, and one of them, addressing him, said, "You must now change your tatters for the dress I have brought you. Put off the mean and contemptible habit in which you have grown old. Assume the garments of a prince; but when you are seated on the throne, continue to preserve the virtue which made you worthy of it. And when you shall have ascended it, and by that means become the supreme dispenser of life and death over all your citizens, be sure never to forget the condition in which, or rather for which, you were elected." Abdalonimus looked upon the whole as a dream, and, unable to guess the meaning of it, asked if they were not ashamed to ridicule him in that manner. He made a great resistance, but they themselves washed him, and threw over his shoulders a purple robe, richly embroidered with gold; then, after repeated oaths of their being in earnest, they conducted him to the palace. The news of this was immediately spread over the whole city. Most of the inhabitants were overjoyed at it, but some murmured, especially the rich, who, despising Abdalonimus's former abject state, could not forbear showing their resentment in the king's court. Alexander commanded the newly-elected prince to be sent for; and after surveying him attentively a long while, spoke thus: "Thy air and mien do not contradict what is related of thy extraction, but I should be glad to know with what frame of mind thou didst bear thy poverty?" "O king," replied he, "these hands have procured me all I desired; and whilst I possessed nothing, I wanted nothing." This answer gave Alexander a high idea of Abdalonimus's virtue; so that he presented him not only with all the rich furniture which had belonged to Strato, and part of the Persian plunder, but likewise annexed one of the neighboring provinces to his dominions.

10,105. KING, Parable of the Disguised. There was once a wise and powerful king, who, that he might the better acquaint himself with the actual condition of his people, determined to travel through his realm in disguise. So, laying aside his jeweled crown and his robes of state, and assuming the plain attire of a common peasant, he set out unobserved and unattended upon his journey. Of the many who met him day by day, few gave him more than a passing glance; for none suspected that beneath this ordinary and homely exterior was hid the form of their great sovereign, who had exchanged his crown for a cap, his scepter for a staff, and his palace for such chance lodging-places as he might find by the way. It happened that he stopped at a wayside inn for rest and food. On entering, he found that many other travelers had arrived before him, and among them he observed a knight whom he quickly recognized as a resident at his distant court. Scarcely any notice was taken of the disguised king, and at first not even the host himself seemed disposed to pay any attention to so humble a guest; until presently the king, advancing to the host as he sat the centre of a noisy knot of gossipers, made known his wants, when of a sudden the knight just mentioned, who had only momentarily glanced at the stranger to resume immediately the polishing of his scabbard, started at the sound, and springing to his feet, came forward with the exclamation, "Who is this?" "Only some beggarly peasant," replied the innkeeper, contemptuously eyeing the object of remark. For a moment the hum of voices hushed, and all eyes turned toward him whose appearance had provoked such a question and such an answer, while the knight drew still nearer to the mysterious stranger, as if to remove or confirm some suspicion that filled his mind. And before another word could be uttered the knight cried out, in tones which brought every one in the room to his feet: "This may be the dress of a peasant and of a beggar, but the voice is that of my lord the king!" Krummacher.

10,106. KINGDOM OF CHRIST, Belonging to the. The King of Prussia visited a village school, and was welcomed by the children. After their speaker had made a speech for them, he thanked them. Then taking an orange from a plate, he asked, "To what kingdom does this belong?" "The vegetable kingdom, sire," said a little girl. The king took a gold coin from his pocket, and, holding it up, asked, "And to what kingdom does this belong?" "To the mineral kingdom," said the little girl. "And to what kingdom do I belong, then?" asked the king. The little girl did not like to say "The animal kingdom." Just then it flashed into her mind that "God made man in his own image," and, looking up with a brightening eye, she said, "To God's kingdom, sire." The king was deeply moved. A tear stood in his eye. He placed his hand on the child's head, and said, most devoutly, "God grant that I may be accounted worthy of that kingdom." Thus did the words of a little child move the heart of a king. Little children, learn from this that even your words may do both good and harm. A pert word may wound the heart of a mother; a loving one may make it glad. My little children, let your words be kind, true, and right.

10,107. KINGDOM OF CHRIST, Feature of the. The Lord founded a kingdom, very unlike any other kingdom. He founded it without drum, or trumpet, or banner, or scepter, or throne, or crown. He founded it without geographical limits, without fortress, without fleets. He founded it as a kingdom whose foundations were laid in thought; as a kingdom whose wars were to be carried on in thought; as a kingdom whose instruments were those of thought; whose sword was not the sword in hand, but the sword that "proceedeth out of the mouth of God;" whose charter was the power of the Word; whose battle-field was only and ever the battle-field of thought. Into this world of thought Christ's kingdom came, to attack all who opposed; and in its own calm, searching, but irrepressible way, with a word, with a message, with an invitation, with an argument, with an exhortation, with an entreaty, with a continuous pointing upward, upward, as if it had a distinct connection with invisible powers, which it had; and "bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ;" thoughts high, thoughts deep, thoughts old, thoughts built upon the foundations, as men supposed, of everlasting principles; thoughts certainly reared up with all the elaborate beauty of human genius and of vast national toil; thoughts consolidated by the suffrage of ages, and thoughts adorned and enriched by the splendor of empires! What was the result? Of all other powers none has the hold upon human thought that Christ has at this moment, and there is none advancing year by year as in the kingdom of the Lord Christ. The world has been always talking of its feebleness and failure, but where is the power that will venture at this moment to say: "I will sweep Christ out of human thought."

Dr. Wm. Arthur.

10,108. KINGDOM OF GOD, Preparation for the. Almost every one has been taught to pray daily, "Thy kingdom come." If you do not wish for his kingdom, don't pray for it. But, if you do, you must do more than pray for it; you must work for it. And to work for it, you must know what it is; we have all prayed for it many a day without thinking. Observe, it is a kingdom that is to come to us; we are not to go to it. Also, it is not to be a kingdom of the dead, but of the living. Also, it is not to come all at once, but quietly; nobody knows how. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." Also, it is not to come outside of us, but in the hearts of us: "The kingdom of God is within you." And being within us, it is not a thing to be seen, but to be felt; and though it brings all substance of good with it it does not consist in that: "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost;" joy, that is to say, in the holy, healthful, and helpful spirit. Now, if we want to work for this kingdom, and to bring it and enter into it, there's just one condition to be first accepted. You must enter into it as children, or not at all: "Whosoever will not receive it as a little child, shall not enter therein."

Ruskin.

10,109. KINGDOM OF GRACE, Entering the. Major-General Burn relates that he had a dream shortly after the death of a brother, which changed the whole course of his life. He thought that they sat together on the old church-yard wall, when his brother asked him to go with him into the church. They started, passed through the porch, and the brother entered the door into the inner room, when it slid down, leaving the general out. He attempted to enter by stooping, but could not, as the door continued to slide down. Grieved at being left behind, he got down and tried to crawl through beneath the door with his clothes on, but failed. Then he threw off all his clothing but an embroidered silk waistcoat, bought in France, of which he was very proud, and tried to bore his way like a worm under the door, but could not get in. At last, in desperation, he drew off the waistcoat and forced his head under the door, and pressing his body so hardly upon the stones as to draw blood, he got safely through. He was at once clothed in white and surrounded by his brother and a goodly company of saints. With them he received the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, and was filled with unspeakable ecstasy. He awoke singing the praises of God. From this dream he dates his conversion. The resolution and renunciation of all things necessary to salvation are herein illustrated.

10,110. KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, Closing the. A very high church clergyman of Brooklyn was recently called to attend a dying boy. He induced him to confess that he had attended a Methodist prayer-meeting, and to advise his irreligious father to be confirmed in the Episcopal church. After his death, this clergyman went about warning the children to keep away from the Methodist Sunday-school and prayer-meeting by the fate of this boy. "Ye neither enter yourselves nor suffer them that are entering to go in." Matt. 13: 13.

10,111. KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, Shutting the. A girl nine years old had attended a school, in which the children of Roman Catholics are taught by Protestants to read the Bible. She was taken very ill, and when there seemed no hope of her getting better, her parents sent for a popish priest. When he came, he said to her: "Child, you are in an awful state; you are just going to die. I beg you, before you depart, to make your dying request to your father and mother, that they will not send your brothers and sisters to the school that you went to." The little girl raised herself up in bed, and said, "My dear father and mother I make it my dying request, that you will send my brothers and sisters to that school; for there I was first taught that I was a sinner, and that I must depend alone upon Jesus Christ for salvation." She soon expired.

10,112. KING'S SON, Parable of the. There was once a king's son, who heard that the people in one of the king's countries a long way off used to be afraid of the king, and used to say that the king did not care for them. So he thought to himself, "I will go and teach them better." But he said, "If I go with my fine robes and crown, they will say, 'What do you know about a poor man's life? You do not know what it is to be cold and half naked and hungry.' I will put off my royal dress, and I will wear clothes like the poor people, and live and eat as they do." So he changed his clothes and left his palace, and went to that distant country, and there he lived among the poor, leading a harder life than any of them. And yet, though he was often hungry and cold, and sometimes did not know where to find a night's lodging, he never complained and never broke the laws. After he had lived in that country for some time, he went back to the king at home. It happened that soon afterward the people of the country sent messengers to the king to complain that the laws were too hard. The king's son then said to these messengers: "Believe me, the laws are all for the best, and the king loves you as though you were his own children." "Ah," said the messengers, "but you do not understand our way of life, how poor and miserable we are, and how hard it is to live." "You are wrong," said the prince; "I understand your life quite well, for I lived myself as a poor man among you for a long time. I know you have to suffer a good deal; every one of your troubles is known to me, for I have suffered the same things. Yet still I assure you that the king is very fond of you, and will make you perfectly happy in the end." Then the people, when they heard that the king's son had lived among them and knew all about their troubles, began to be more hopeful, for they said, "He knows what it is to suffer, and he will surely help us." The king's son is Jesus, who is the Son of God the Father. Jesus was, as we are, tempted to do wrong. He knew what it was to be poor and hungry and homeless; he felt the bitterness of death. More than this, he knew what it was to be persecuted by enemies, and to be misunderstood and deserted by his dearest friends.

10,113. KNOCKING, Custom of. Orientals give warning of their approach at the outer gate or entrance, either by calling or knocking. To stand and call is a very respectful and common mode. Thus it was in Bible times, and to it there are many very interesting allusions. Moses commanded (Deut. 24: 10) the holder of a pledge to stand without, and call to the owners thereof to come forth; this was to avoid the insolent intrusion of cruel creditors. Peter stood knocking at the outer door, and so did the three men sent to Joppa by Cornelius.

Thomson

10,114. KNOT, The Gordian. According to ancient history, this knot was made in the harness of a chariot by Gordius, King of Phrygia, which knot was so intricate as to baffle every attempt to untie it, or even to find out where it began or ended. The oracle of the day having declared that he who succeeded in solving the complication should be the conqueror of the world, Alexander the Great determined to effect it if possible. Aware that if he failed his followers would be dispirited, he determined to separate it with his sword, and with one blow he cut the knot which was fraught with such interest to the whole world. The expression "cutting the Gordian knot," has consequently been used to signify eluding any difficulty or task by bold or unusual means.

10,115. KNOWLEDGE, Advantage of. In England, a man of small fortune may cast his regards around him, and say, with truth and exultation, "I am lodged in a house that affords me conveniences and comforts which even a king could not command some centuries ago. There are ships crossing the seas in every direction to bring me what is useful to me from all parts of the earth. In China, men are gathering the tea-leaf for me; in America, they are planting cotton for me; in the West India Islands, they are preparing my sugar and coffee; in Italy, they are feeding silkworms for me; in Saxony, they are shearing the sheep to make me clothing; at home, powerful steam-engines are spinning and weaving for me, and making cutlery for me, and pumping the mines, that the materials useful for me may be procured. My patrimony was small, yet I have post-coaches running day and night, on all the roads, to carry my correspondence; I have roads, and canals, and bridges, to bear the coal for my winter fire; nay, I have protecting fleets and armies around my happy country to secure my enjoyments and repose. Then I have editors and printers, who daily send me an account of what is going on throughout the world among all these people who serve me. And in a corner of my house, I have books! the miracle of all my possessions, for they transport me instantly, not only to all places, but to all times. By my books, I can conjure up before me, to vivid existence, all the great and good men of antiquity; and for my individual satisfaction, I can make them act over again the most renowned of their exploits; the orators declaim for me; the historians recite; the poets sing; in a word, from the equator to the pole, and from the beginning of time until now, by my books, I can be where I please." Dr. Arnott.

10,116. KNOWLEDGE Alone. Naked knowledge will be as unserviceable to the soul in a dying day, as a painted fire would be to the frozen body in a cold day. As some articles are tanned by the same sun in which others are whitened; so are some professors hardened under the same gospel by which others are softened. As it is lost labor to smite the flint, if it propagate no sparks; so it is fruitless toil to furnish our heads with light, if it refine not our hearts. Satan may as well put out our eyes, that we should not see the truth; as cut off our feet, that we should not walk in the truth. Naked knowledge may make the head giddy; but it will never make the heart holy Secker.

10,117. KNOWLEDGE, Benefit of. As the power of acquiring knowledge is to be ascribed to reason, so the attainment of it mightily strengthens and improves it, and thereby enables it to enrich itself with future acquisitions. Knowledge in general expands the mind, exalts the faculties, refines the taste of pleasure, and opens numerous sources of intellectual enjoyment. By means of it we become less dependent for satisfaction upon the sensitive appetites, the gross pleasures of sense are more easily despised, and we are made to feel the superiority of the spiritual to the material part of our nature. Instead of being continually solicited by the influence and irritation of sensible objects, the mind can retire within herself and expatiate in the cool and quiet walks of contemplation. Robert Hall.

10,118. KNOWLEDGE, Christian. If any man's head or tongue should grow apace, and all the rest of his body not grow, it would certainly make him a monster; and they are no other that are knowing and talkative Christians, and grow daily in these respects, but not at all in holiness of heart and life, which is the proper growth of the children of God. Salter.

10,119. KNOWLEDGE, Concealment of. "Whoever concealeth the knowledge which God shall give him," says Mohammed, "God shall put on him a bridle of fire on the day of resurrection."

10,120. KNOWLEDGE, Cultivation of. I make not my head a grave, but a treasury of knowledge; I intend no monopoly, but a community in learning; I study not for my own sake only, but for theirs that study not for themselves; I envy no man that knows more than myself, but pity them that know less. I instruct no man as an exercise of my knowledge, or with an intent rather to nourish and keep it alive in mine own head, than beget and propagate it in his; and, in the midst of all my endeavors, there is but one thought that dejects me—that my acquired parts must perish with myself, nor can be legacied among my honored friends. Broune.

10,121. KNOWLEDGE, Desire for. The desire of knowledge, like the thirst of riches, increases ever with the acquisition of it.—Sterne.—Knowledge always desires increase: it is like fire, which must be first kindled by some external agent, but which will afterwards propagate itself. Johnson.

10,122. KNOWLEDGE, Discolored. Knowledge indeed is as necessary as light, and in this coming age most fairly promises to be as common as water, and as free as air. But as it has been wisely ordained that light should have no color, water no taste, and air no odor, so knowledge also should be equally pure, and without admixture. If it comes to us through, the medium of prejudice, it will be discolored; through the channels of custom, it will be adulterated; through the Gothic walls of the college, or of the cloister, it will smell of the lamp. Colton.

10,123. KNOWLEDGE, Divine and Human. An old preacher compares the divine knowledge to a sheet almanac upon which all the days and weeks of a year past or to come, can be seen, uno intuitu, at one view. Could this be extended to cover all the years of time and eternity, and be made to embrace the records of all worlds, and all beings, it would represent the extent of the divine knowledge. Man's knowledge is represented by a book almanac, which has a leaf for a day, for it is only by the moment that we learn anything, and our knowledge is limited to a few things, and to the past and present.

10,124. KNOWLEDGE, Extent of. Strabo was entitled to be called a profound geographer eighteen hundred years ago. A geographer who had never heard of America would now be laughed at by the girls of a boarding-school. What would now be thought of the greatest chemist or geologist of 1746? The truth is that in all science mankind is constantly advancing. Every generation has its front and its rear rank; but the rear rank of a later occupies the ground which was occupied by the front rank of a former. Macaulay.

10,125. KNOWLEDGE, Figures of. The tree of knowledge, Gen. 2: 9; 3: 6. Pleasant and promising. The test of man's obedience, and the occasion of man's fall. It was significant that our first parents longed more for the tree of knowledge than for the tree of life. "They would rather be learned than holy." (Leighton.) "The key of knowledge," Luke 11: 52, to open or shut the cabinet of truth. A crown, Prov. 14: 18, encircling the brow of the prudent. A sweet savor or perfume; so the apostle compares the knowledge of Christ to the perfumes scattered in ancient triumphal processions, 2 Cor. 2: 14. Bowes.

10,126. KNOWLEDGE, First Step to. A mouse that had lived all its life in a chest, says the fable, chanced one day to creep up to the edge, and, peeping out exclaimed with wonder, "I did not think the world was so large." The first step to knowledge is, to know that we are ignorant. It is a great point to know our place: for want of this, a man in private life, instead of attending to the affairs of his "chest," is ever peeping out, and then he becomes a philosopher! He must then know everything, and presumptuously pry into the deep and secret councils of God: not considering that man is finite, he has no faculties to comprehend and judge of the great scheme of things. We can form no other knowledge of spiritual things, except what God has taught us in his Word, and where he stops we must stop. Cecil.

10,127. KNOWLEDGE, Glorifying in. In 1201, Simon Tournay, after he had excelled all his contemporaries at Oxford, in learning, and became so eminent in Paris as to be made the chief doctor of the Sorbonne, grew so proud, that while he regarded Aristotle as superior to Moses and Christ, he considered him as but equal to himself! He became such an idiot at length, as not to know one letter in a book, or one thing he had ever done. Whitecross.

10,128. KNOWLEDGE, How to Obtain. Properly, there is no other knowledge but that which is got by working; the rest is yet all a hypothesis of knowledge; a thing to be argued of in schools; a thing floating in the clouds, in endless logic-vortices, till we try and fix it. Carlyle.

10,129. KNOWLEDGE, Importance of. Nothing is so costly as ignorance. You sow the wrong seed, you plant the wrong field, you build with the wrong timber, you buy the wrong ticket, you take the wrong train, you settle in the wrong locality, or you take the wrong medicine, and no money can make good your mistake. Dr. Fowler.

10,130. KNOWLEDGE, Prayer and. Prayer is a proper means for the increase of knowledge. Prayer is the golden key that unlocks that treasure. When Daniel was to expound the secret contained in the king's dream, about which the Chaldean magicians had racked their brains to no purpose; what course did Daniel take? "He went to his house," Dan. 2: 17, 18, "and made the thing known to Hananiah, Michael, and Azariah, his companions; that they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning his secret." And then was the secret revealed to Daniel. Luther was wont to say, "Three things made a divine; meditation, temptation, and prayer." Holy Mr. Bradford was wont to study upon his knees. If Christ be our teacher it becomes all his saints to be at his feet. John Flavel.

10,131. KNOWLEDGE, Pride of. The Apostle Paul says, "Knowledge puffeth up." I have seen boys and girls very proud over their lessons and examinations, who had not wisdom enough to mend their clothes, or make a fire, or sweep a carpet, or harness a horse, or live two days without help. Wisdom is useful; knowledge is the raw stuff out of which we make wisdom. Thomas K. Beecher.

10,132. KNOWLEDGE, Profitable. There is no kind of knowledge which, in the hands of the diligent and skillful, will not turn to account. Honey exudes from all flowers, the bitter not excepted; and the bee knows how to extract it. Bishop Horne.

10,133. KNOWLEDGE, Pursuit of. In the pursuit of knowledge, follow it wherever it is to be found; like fern, it is the produce of all climates, and like coin, its circulation is not restricted to any particular class. We are ignorant in youth from idleness, and we continue so in manhood from pride: for pride is less ashamed of being ignorant than of being instructed, and she looks too high to find that which very often lies beneath her. Mr. Locke was asked how he had contrived to accumulate a mine of knowledge so rich, yet so extensive and so deep: he replied that he attributed what little he knew, to the not being ashamed to ask for information; and to the rule he had laid down, of conversing with all descriptions of men of those topics chiefly that formed their own peculiar professions or pursuits. Colton.

10,134. KNOWLEDGE, Safe. Even Indians never use poisoned arrows for killing their game. Christian parents ought to use as much discretion in the treatment of their children. Dr. Fowler.

10,135. KNOWLEDGE, Safeguard of. "My child," said St. Columbian to Luanus, when he saw how ardently he devoted himself to learning, "Thou hast asked a perilous gift of God. Many, out of undue love of knowledge, have made shipwreck of their souls." "My father," replied the boy, "If I learn to know God, I shall never offend him, for they only offend him who know him not." "Go, my son," said the abbot, "remain firm in that faith, and true science shall conduct you on the road to heaven."

10,136. KNOWLEDGE, Sorrow of. A Brahmin, whose religion prohibited the use of anything which would destroy life, was shown a glass of water through the microscope. The water was alive with loathsome reptiles. He had destroyed hundred of lives at a single draught, and was filled with apprehension. He asked the missionary to let him take the wonderful instrument. After examining it, he asked, "Are there more in this country?" "No, this is all," said the missionary. The Brahmin struck it upon a stone and broke it in pieces, saying, "You have destroyed my peace of mind. I shall never know joy any more, but you shall not harm my people. They will not believe what you say. They will cleave to their religion, and die in the comfort that it offers." He laid his sorrow to his increased knowledge, but received not the comforts of Christianity to repay his loss.

10,137. KNOWLEDGE, Summary of. The greater part of the sciences comprise but one single word—perhaps; and the whole history of mankind contains no more than three—they are born, suffer, and die. Dabshelim.

10,138. KNOWLEDGE, Superficial. When we talk of men of deep science, do we mean that they have got to the bottom or near the bottom of science? Do we mean that they know all that is capable of being known? Do we mean even that they know in their own especial department all that the smatterers of the next generation will know? Why, if we compare the little truth that we know with the infinite mass of truth which we do not know, we are all shallow together; and the greatest philosophers that ever lived would be the first to confess their shallowness. Lord Macaulay.

10,139. KNOWLEDGE, Thirst for. The tree of knowledge cannot be ascended without considerable labor. The fruit, when gathered, though perhaps sweet at first, is not without its attendants, anxiety and care; nay, too often is it an occasion of pride and consequence. Prometheus, who according to fable, was the great inventor of arts and philosophy, is represented as having an eagle or vulture perpetually gnawing his liver, to denote those continual cares and anxieties of mind which knowing and inquisitive men are exposed to. Buck.

10,140. KNOWLEDGE, Tree of. The tree of knowledge is grafted upon the tree of life; and that fruit which brought the fear of death into the world, budding on an immortal stock, becomes the fruit of the promise of immortality. Sir H. Davy.

10,141. KNOWLEDGE, True. When the worldly-wise have dived into the bottom of Nature's sea, they are able to bring up from thence, instead of these pearls of price, nothing but handfuls of shells and gravel. Knowledge, indeed, and good parts managed by grace are like the rod in Moses' hand, wonder-workers, but turn to serpents when they are cast upon the ground, and employed in promoting earthly designs. Learning in religious hearts, like that gold in the Israelites' ear-rings, is a most precious ornament; but if men pervert it to base wicked ends, or begin to make an idol of it, as they did a golden calf of their ear-rings, it then becomes an abomination. Arrowsmith.

10,142. KNOWLEDGE, Useful. There is a fountain in London that is opened by a spring. A man wanted to drink, but no one could tell him how to open it. At last a little dirty boot-black steps up and touches the spring, and the water gushes out. He knew more than the Bishop of London about it. Moody.

10,143. KNOWLEDGE, Use of. The whole body of knowledge tends, in consequence of the existence of difficulties, to the elucidation of Scripture; the cultivation even of the merely ornamental parts of learning, is requisite to the defence of revelation, and consequently, justifiable in a still larger extent than it would otherwise have been. The minutest branches of philosophy, and the most trivial recreations of the mind, thus become important in a religious point of view. We are evidently, therefore, deeply indebted to the difficulties of Scripture, because by making every species of knowledge subservient to the illustration and vindication of religious truth, they have dignified and sanctified, as it were, the scientific amusements of our leisure hours, and heightened the pleasure of studying the subordinate branches of literature, by teaching us that we may be usefully employed, even in our intellectual relaxations. Benson.

10,144. KORAN, Reverence for the. The Koran is held in the greatest reverence and esteem among the Mohammedans. They dare not so much as touch it without being first washed or legally purified; which lest they should do by inadvertence, they write these words on the cover label, "Let none touch it but they who are clean." They read it with great care and respect, never holding it below their girdles. They swear by it, consult it on the weighty occasions, carry it with them to war, write sentences of it on their banners, adorn it with gold and precious stones, and knowingly suffer it not to be in the possession of any of a different persuasion. George Sale.

10,145. LABOR, Blessings of. Labor, though

It was at first inflicted as a curse, seems to be the gentlest of all punishments, and is fruitful of a thousand blessings: the same Providence which permits diseases, produces remedies; when it sends sorrows, it often sends friends and supporters; if it gives a scanty income, it gives good sense, and knowledge, and contentment, which love to dwell under homely roofs; with sickness come humility, and repentance, and piety; and affliction and grace walk hand in hand. Jortin.

10,146. LABOR, Eminence and. When we read the lives of distinguished men in any department, we find them almost always celebrated for the amount of labor they could perform. Demosthenes, Julius Cæsar, Henry of France, Lord Bacon, Sir Isaac Newton, Franklin, Washington, Napoleon, different as they were in their intellectual and moral qualities, were all renowned as hard workers. We read how many days they could support the fatigues of a march; how early they rose; how late they watched; how many hours they spent in the field, in the cabinet, in the court; how many secretaries they kept employed; in short, how hard they worked. Everett.

10,147. LABOR, Faithful in. Bonaventura, the Seraphic Doctor, was general of the Franciscan Order, one of whose rules required a rotation of work among the members. Gregory X. sent him a cardinal's hat by two nuncios, who found him in the kitchen washing the plates after dinner. The nuncios were amazed. The Seraphic Doctor, without a blush, excused himself from attending to their business till he had finished his dishes. So the Cardinal's hat was hung on a dog-wood tree near the kitchen door, till the dishes were finished and the new Cardinal's hands were dried.

10,148. LABOR, Healthfulness of. There is a story in the Arabian Nights' Tales of a king who had long languished under an ill habit of body, and had taken abundance of remedies to no purpose. At length, a physician cured him by the following method: He took a hollow ball of wood, and filled it with several drugs; after which he closed it up so artificially that nothing appeared. He likewise took a mall, and after having hollowed the handle, and that part which strikes the ball, he closed in them several drugs after the same manner as in the ball itself. He then ordered the Sultan, who was his patient, to exercise himself early in the morning with these rightly prepared instruments till such time as he should sweat; when, as the story goes, the virtue of the medicaments perspiring through the wood had so good an influence on the Sultan's constitution, that they cured him of an indisposition which all the compositions he had taken inwardly had not been able to remove. This Eastern allegory is finely contrived to show us how beneficial bodily labor is to health, and that exercise is the most effectual physic. Addison.

10,149. LABOR, Honors to. Statues in every public place should record its wonders; oratorios should be composed in its honor; its insignia—the plough, the spade, and the loom—should decorate state carriages, and ornament churches and public halls; while its successful votaries should wear the honored decoration of "The Order of Industry." J. Johnson

10,150. LABOR, Incessancy of. The more we accomplish, the more we have to accomplish. All things are full of labor; and, therefore, the more we acquire, the more care and the more toil to secure our acquisitions. Good men can never retire from their works of benevolence; their fortune is never made. I never heard of an apostle, prophet, or public benefactor, retiring from their respective fields of labor. Moses, and Paul, and Peter, died with their harness on. So did Luther, and Calvin, and Wesley, and a thousand others as deserving, though not so well known to fame. We are inured to labor. It was first a duty; it is now a pleasure. Still there is such a thing as overworking man and beast, mind and body. The mainspring of a watch needs repose, and is the better for it. The muscles of an elephant, and the wings of a swift bird, are at length fatigued. Heaven gives rest to the earth because it needs it; and winter is more pregnant with blessings to the soil than summer with its flowers and fruits. But in the war for truth and against error, there is no discharge. A. Campbell.

10,151. LABOR, Law of. There is nothing truly valuable which can be purchased without pains and labor. The gods have set a price upon every real and noble pleasure. If you would gain the favor of the Deity, you must be at the pains of worshiping him; if the friendship of good men, you must study to oblige them; if you would be honored by your country, you must take care to serve it. In short, if you would be eminent in war or peace, you must become master of all the qualifications that can make you so. Addison.

10,152. LABOR, Life-character of. Labor is life: from the inmost heart of the worker rises his God-given force—the sacred celestial life-energy breathed into him by the Almighty God! Carlyle.

10,153. LABOR, Need of. King Antigonus, when he had not for a long time seen Cleanthes, the philosopher, said to him, "Dost thou yet, O Cleanthes, continue to grind?" "Yes, sir," replied Cleanthes, "I still grind, and that I do to gain my living, and not to depart from philosophy." How great and generous was the courage of this man, who, coming from the mill and the kneading-trough, did with the same hand which had been employed in turning the stone and moulding the dough, write of the nature of the gods, moon, stars, and sun. Piutarch.

10,154. LABOR, No Rest from. Miserable is he who slumbers on in idleness, miserable the workman who sleeps before the hour of his rest, or who sits down in the shadow while his brethren work in the sun. There is no rest from labor on earth. There are always duties to perform and functions to exercise, functions which are ever enlarging and extending in proportion to the growth of our moral and mental station. Man is born to work, and he must work while it is day. "Have I not," said a great worker, "an eternity to rest in?"

Tynman.

10,155. LABOR, Place for. See the spider casting out her film to the gale, she feels persuaded that somewhere or other it will adhere and form the commencement of her web. She commits the slender filament to the breeze, believing that there is a place provided for it to fix itself. In this fashion, should we believably cast forth our endeavors in this life, confident that God will find a place for us. He who bids us play and work will aid our efforts and guide us in his Providence in a right way. Sit not still in despair, O son of toil, but again cast out the floating thread of hopeful endeavor and the wind of love will bear it to its resting place.

Spurgeon.

10,156. LABOR, Power for. Karamsin, the Russian traveler, having observed Lavater's diligence in study, visiting the sick, and relieving the poor, greatly surprised at his activity, said to him, "Whence have you so much strength of mind and power of endurance?" "My friend," replied he, "man rarely wants the power to work, when he possesses the will; the more I labor in the discharge of my duties, so much the more ability and inclination to labor do I constantly find within myself."

10,157. LABOR, Prayer and. Labor is of noble birth; but prayer is the daughter of heaven. Labor has a place near the throne, but prayer touches the golden sceptre. Labor, Martha-like, is busy with much serving; but prayer sits with Mary at the feet of Jesus. Labor climbs the mountain-peak with Moses; but prayer soars upward, with Elijah, in a chariot of fire. Labor has the raven's wing, yet sometimes goes forth in vain; but prayer has the pinions of the dove, and never returns but with the olive-leaf of blessing! W. H. Groser.

10,158. LABOR, Prayer with. Anthony the hermit, was sitting in his cell in the wilderness, grievously tempted with importunate thoughts, and fell into sadness and darkness. Then he prayed, "Lord, I desire to be saved, but my thoughts are a hindrance to me. What shall I do in my present affliction? How shall I be saved?" Soon after he went outside of his cell and saw a man sitting and working, then leaving his work to pray, afterwards sitting down to his work twisting a palm rope, and after a time engaging again in prayer. He concluded this to be an angel sent from God to instruct him in duty. Then the angel addressed him and said, "Do so, and thou shalt be saved." Thereafter the great hermit and all his followers were diligent in labor and in prayer.

10,159. LABOR, Value of. God is constantly teaching us that nothing valuable is ever obtained without labor; and that no labor can be honestly expended without our getting its value in return. He is not careful to make everything easy to man. The Bible itself is no light book; human duty no holiday engagement. The grammar of deep personal religion, and the grammar of real practical virtue, are not to be learned by any facile Hamiltonian methods.

Binney.

10,160. LABORERS, Hiring. Morier, in the record of his second journey through Persia, mentions having noted in the market-place at Hamadan, a custom like that alluded to in the parable of the laborers. "Here we observed every morning before the sun rose, that a numerous band of peasants were collected with spades in their hands, waiting to be hired for the day, to work in the surrounding fields. This custom struck me as a most happy illustration of our Saviour's parable, particularly when, passing by the same place late in the day, we found others standing idle, and remembered his words, 'Why stand ye here all the day idle?' as most applicable to their situation, for on putting the very same question to them, they answered us, 'Because no man hath hired us.'" Josephus says that Ananus paid the workmen who were employed in the rebuilding or beautifying of the temple, a whole day's pay, even though they should have labored but a single hour.

10,161. LABORERS, Parable of the. Lightfoot quotes from the Talmud concerning a celebrated rabbi, who died at a very early age, as follows: "To what was R. Bon Bar Chaiza like? To a king who hired many laborers, among whom there was one hired who performed his task extraordinarily well. What did the king? He took him aside, and walked with him to and fro. When even was come, those laborers came that they might receive their hire, and he gave him a complete hire with the rest. And the laborers murmured, saying, 'We have labored hard all the day, and this man only two hours, yet he hath received as much wages as we.' The king said to them, 'He hath labored more in those two hours than you in the whole day.' So R. Bon plied the law more in eight and twenty years than another in a hundred years."

10,162. LADIES, Education of. Most ladies who have had what is considered as an education, have no idea of an education progressive through life. Having attained a certain measure of accomplishment, knowledge, manners, etc., they consider themselves as made up, and so take their station; they are pictures which, being quite finished, are put in a frame—a gilded one, if possible, and hung up in permanence of beauty!—permanence, that is to say, till Old Time, with his rude and dirty fingers, soil the charming colors. J. Foster.

10,163. LADIES, Influence of. Man is but a rough pebble without the attrition received from contact with the gentler sex: it is wonderful how the ladies pumice a man down into a smoothness which occasions him to roll over and over with the rest of his species, jostling but not wounding his neighbors, as the waves of circumstances bring him into collision with them.

Capt. Marryat.

10,164. LAITY, Influence of the. Leaders are not independent of the masses. Nay, we may make these masses lead us, and these leaders be obliged to become followers. After the storming of the heights of Spichenen, the commander of the Prussian battalion was arrested for having charged without orders, without having waited for artillery to clear his way and for reserves to cover his flank. His defense was this: "I had nothing to do with that attack, neither had my subordinate officers; but when we came to that attacking line, every one of my men rushed forward, and all we could do was to follow on, keep order, and hold the height they won." Anon.

10,165. LAMBS, Carrying the. As I stood among the tombs in the suburbs of Jerusalem, there came a flock of sheep who made for the tomb; but, finding it occupied, turned into another one for shelter. Coming after the sheep was a little boy—a shepherd boy. He was clad in the garb the shepherd boys wore, and the only garment he had was a cotton one, folded around him, lapped over and fastened with a girdle. He was coming slowly, through the storm, and, as he drew near, I saw that his bosom was very full. And I looked, and as he got almost to me, I saw he had a little lamb, very young, that he had picked up, in one side of his bosom; and on further regarding him, I found that he had still another on the other side. They could not keep up with the flock in the storm, and to shelter them from the weather he had put them in his bosom. I had often thought of it before, but it never struck me so forcibly that my Saviour was carrying his lambs in his bosom. I was in very poor health, and did not know that I should ever see my home again, and I thought, at that moment, of my little ones whom I had left in the bosom of that home. And I looked through the storm on the hills of Judea, and thought of the Mediterranean Sea, and of the Atlantic Ocean, and of the eastern shore of my own country, and of the Alleghany Mountains; and away over those mountains I thought of my home and my little children I had left there—my little lambs. I said to myself, at that moment, "I trust to my Saviour. If I shall fail to pass over all this distance, and if I never shall see the loved ones of my home again, I shall meet them in heaven: for he will carry the lambs in his bosom, and I shall meet them in the day of eternity." Oh, what joy thrilled through my heart! And when I see a mother weeping and a father weeping for the little ones taken away, I think of Jesus—that he has taken them to his bosom, out of the storm and out of the tempests of this world—they are safe in the mansions of glory and of God. Oh, yes, we shall see our little ones and our loved ones, at last, angels of God! Are you, mothers, and you, fathers, and you, dear friends, prepared to meet them in glory? They are singing yonder, to-day! Listen to them! Are you prepared to sing there with them? They see the face of our Saviour! Can you look up and say, "I see his face?" Can you feel, to-day, that "before the throne our Saviour stands, your name is written on his hands?"

Bp. Simpson.

10,166. LAMP, Foot. The streets of Jerusalem are very narrow, and no one is allowed to go out at night without a light. Throw open your lattice in the evening and look out, you will see what seem to be little stars twinkling on the pavement. You will hear the clatter of sandals, as the late traveler rattles along. As the party approaches, you will see that he has a little lamp fastened to his foot, to make his step a safe one. In an instant the verse comes to your memory, written in that same city three thousand years ago, "Thy Word is a lamp to my feet, and a light to my path." Anon.

10,167. LAMP, Lesson from a. One so anxious about his soul that he could not rest, took a lamp and went to see his pastor, in order to gain instruction and help. He started to return home in much the same state of mind as when he went. All was so dark ahead that his way was closed up. Said the minister, "Why do you carry that lamp?" "To light the way," he replied. "But as you stand there can you see all the way home?" asked the minister. "O no; it looks very dark a little before me," he replied. "Of what use then is it?" persisted the questioner. "Why, I'll take it with me, and it will light my path all the way," answered the man. As he did so, the illustration helped him to see at what he stumbled. There in the street he believed to the saving of his soul, and went on his way rejoicing, walking in the light which dispelled the darkness.

G. R. Snyder.

10,168. LANGUAGE, Feebleness of. If a poet were to come into the world endowed with a genius, suppose ten times more sublime than Milton's, must he not abandon the attempt at composition in despair, from finding that language, like a feeble tool, breaks in his hand—from finding that when he attempts to pour any of his mental fluid into the vessel of language, that vessel in a moment melts or bursts; from finding that, though he is Hercules every inch, he is armed but with a distaff, and cannot give his mighty strength its proportional effect without his club?

John Foster.

10,169. LAUGHTER, The Advantages of. Laughter is a most healthful exertion; it is one of the greatest helps to digestion with which I am acquainted; and the custom prevalent among our forefathers of exciting it at table by jesters and buffoons, was founded on true medical principles.

Dr. Hufeland.

10,170. LAUGHTER, Death from. Philemon, a comic poet, when an old man, saw an ass eating up some figs that a boy had laid down. When the boy returned, he said to him, "Go and fetch the ass some drink." He was so pleased with his own jest that he died laughing. Zeuxis Heracleotes, the most excellent painter of his age, painted an old woman. She was represented as a short, dry, toothless, bloodless thing, with hollow eyes, hanging cheeks, chin pointing out, her mouth bending inward, her nose fallen and bowing; altogether, it was so ridiculous a picture that he was seized with a fit of laughter, and he died upon the spot.

10,171. LAUGHTER, The Power of. By means of laughter absolute monarchs have been controlled upon their thrones, demagogues have been checked in their career, and even Demos himself has been made to laugh at his own follies, till he was almost shamed into good sense. Neaves.

10,172. LAW, Definition of. Law, in its most general and comprehensive sense, signifies a rule of action; and is applied indiscriminately to all kinds of action, whether animate or inanimate, rational or irrational. Thus, we say, the laws of motion, of gravitation, of optics, or mechanics, as well as the laws of nature and of nations. And it is that rule of action which is prescribed by some superior, and which the inferior is bound to obey. Blackstone.

10,173. LAW, Dignity of. Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy. Hooker.

10,174. LAW, Execution of. Diocles made a law that no man should come armed into a public assembly. Through inadvertency he chanced to break the law himself, and it was said, "He has broken a law he has made himself." He turned to his accuser and said with a loud voice, "No the law shall have its sanction," and drawing his sword killed himself.

10,175. LAW, Expedients of. An old barrister was giving advice to his son, who was just entering upon the practice of his father's profession. "My son," said the counselor, "if you have a case where the law is plainly on your side, but justice seems to be clearly against you, urge upon the jury the vast importance of sustaining the law. If, on the other hand, you are in doubt about the law, but your client's case is founded on justice, insist on the necessity of doing justice, though the heavens fall." "But," asked the son, "how shall I manage a case where law and justice are dead against me?" "In that case," replied the old man, "talk round it."

10,176. LAW, Folly of Going to. To go to law, is for two persons to kindle a fire at their own cost to warm others, and singe themselves to cinders; and because they cannot agree as to what is truth and equity, they will both agree to unplume themselves, that others may be decorated with their feathers. Feltham.

10,177. LAW and Gospel. The doctrine of the gospel is the revelation of the Son of God. This is a doctrine quite contrary to the law, which revealeth not the Son of God, but sheweth forth sin—it revealeth death, the wrath and judgment of God, and hell. The gospel, therefore, is such a doctrine as admitteh no law; yea, it must be as separate from the law as there is distance between heaven and earth. The gospel teacheth me, not what I ought to do—for that is the proper office of the law—but what Jesus Christ the Son of God hath done for me. Luther.

10,178. LAW, Higher. I know no human being exempt from the law. The law is the security of the people; it is the security of every person that is governed, and of every person that governs. There is but one law for all, namely, that law which governs all law, the law of our Creator, the law of humanity, justice, equity—the Law of Nature and of Nations. So far as any laws fortify this primeval law, and give it more precision, more energy, more effect by their declarations, such laws enter into the sanctuary, and participate in the sacredness of its character. Burke.

10,179. LAW, Obligation of the Moral. 1 Cor. 9: 21.—The moral law is still a rule of life to us. Those that think they have done with the law shall find that the law has not done with them. It is a striking fact, that while infidels have presumed to mock the Lawgiver, and him who has redeemed us from the curse of the law, they have never attempted to touch the law itself. The perfection of the Ten Commandments stands before the civilized world unimpeached, as a perfect rule of right and wrong. Bowes.

10,180. LAW, Observance of. A deacon of good repute kept a grocery store in old times. He sold rum by the quart, but was prohibited by the law from selling it in smaller quantities. A man entered and wanted a pint of rum. The deacon refused to sell a pint. The man asked his reason. He said, "Because it is contrary to the law." Looking the deacon squarely in the eye, the man said, "Deacon Bartlett, if you are no better than the law makes you, you will go to hell sure." Dr. Holme.

10,181. LAW, Obstructions to. Suppose into a piece of complicated machinery an obstruction is thrown. The whole force of the propelling power will be directed to the obstruction, and one of two things will occur—either the obstruction will be removed or crushed, or the machinery will break down. If I tie a band closely around my arm the whole force of the system of circulation will be directed to the band, and either it will be broken or the system of circulation will be so far destroyed. Now, mark, not only one of the two results will follow, but the whole propelling power will be directed to the obstruction, and the system breaks down only through inherent weakness or insufficiency of power to remove the obstruction. But when this is applied to the divine government, natural or moral, it can never fail through lack of executive power or inherent weakness. Dr. J. A. M. Chapman.

10,182. LAW, Quarrels of. A lion and a bear found the carcass of a fawn, and had a long fight for it. The contest was so hard and even, that, at last, both of them, half-blinded and half-dead, lay panting on the ground, without strength to touch the prize which was stretched between them. A fox coming by at the time, and seeing their helpless condition, stepped be tween the combatants and carried off the booty. "Poor creatures that we are," cried they, "who have been exhausting all our strength and injuring one another, merely to give a rogue a dinner!"

Æsop.
10,188. LAW, Requisites for Going to. Wisely has it been said that he who would go to law must have a good cause, a good purse, a good attorney, a good advocate, good evidence, and a good judge and jury—and having all these goods, unless he has also good luck, he will stand but a bad chance of success.

Trusler.
10,184. LAW, Spiritual. To preach up justification by the law, as a covenant, is legal; and makes void the death and merits of Jesus Christ; but to preach obedience to the law, as a rule, is evangelical: and it savors as much of a New-Testament-spirit, as they phrase it, to urge the commands of the law, as to display the promise of the gospel.

Hopkins.
10,185. LAW, The Sword and the. In all governments, there must of necessity be both the law and the sword: laws without arms would give us not liberty, but licentiousness; and arms without laws would produce not subjection, but slavery. The law, therefore, should be unto the sword what the handle is to the hatchet; it should direct the stroke, and temper the force.

Colton.
10,186. LAW, Violation of. The violation of law tends to the ruin of the violator or law by action or reaction. There are general laws governing the material world, the violation of which would be followed by the most disastrous consequences. But as their subjects are not moral agents, they are exempt from such a possibility; yet this alters not the fact. If the sun, in violation of law, should withhold its light and heat; if the evaporation of water should cease, and there be no former and latter rain; if the gases of the atmosphere should combine in different proportions; if a planet should deviate a single inch from its orbit, or lag behind a single minute, what ruinous results would follow! This is true also in regard to the laws of our physical nature. If I thrust my hand into the burning embers, or leap from a house-top and dislocate a joint; if I refrain from eating and drinking; if I violate any law of health and life, the penalty follows more or less quickly upon the heels of the violation. The same principle is illustrated in civil government. If a law is violated, and the penalty is not inflicted, it in so far breaks down the government; if the penalty is inflicted, it is so far ruinous to the violator. One or the other of these results must inevitably follow. If there be power and soundness enough in the government, the law will be executed; if not, it breaks down at that point.

Dr. J. A. M. Chapman.

10,187. LAWS, Divine. Laws, written, if not on stone tables, yet on the azure of infinitude, in the inner heart of God's creation, certain as life, certain as death! I say, the laws are there, and thou shalt not disobey them. It were better for thee not. Better a hundred deaths than yes! Terrible "penalties" withal, if thou still need penalties, are there for disobeying!

Carlyle.

10,188. LEADER, Christ our. The Lord Jesus leads his people, as the pillar of cloud and of fire went before Israel for guidance and protection, Exod. 13: 21, 22; 40: 36-38; Neh. 9: 12, 19. The ark led them over Jordan, Joshua 3. A shepherd leads his flock, Ps. 23: 2, 3; Isa. 40: 11; John 10: 3, 4. A standard-bearer among the Church's hosts, Cant. 5: 10 (marg.); see Isa. 11: 10; cf. the type, 2 Sam. 18: 3. A forerunner, Heb. 6: 20. Joshua led the children of Israel into Canaan, Deut. 1: 38. Isa. 55: 4—"A leader and commander." Not every commander is a leader, but the Lord Jesus heartens his soldiers by going before. "He is commander by his precept, and a leader by his example; our business is to obey and follow him."

10,189. LEAF, Fading. Already the tints of autumn are stealing upon the forest. Here and there we see a falling leaf; and in many which are yet on their branches, the full green of summer is passing into a paler hue. How gradually does the change come on! We scarcely perceive a difference from day to day, but after the interval of a week it is distinctly seen; and then the breeze of autumn snaps the link by which the shred was joined to its branch, and wafts it to its resting place under the parent tree. And such is the strength of man. "We all do fade as a leaf." The freshness of youth soon passes into the maturity of manhood; and thus by gradual but rapid steps, the feebleness of age comes on. Thus is our strength but labor and sorrow, so soon passeth it away, and we are gone. Let it not steal on us unawares; nor let it be said of us, "Gray hairs are on him here and there, yet he knoweth it not." In youth and health let us think on our common frailty, and put away from us "the pride of life;" remembering that we must soon return to the dust from whence we came. The leaves with which the earth is strewn will know no second spring. Our great Redeemer has won for us a resurrection from the grave. So live, that your hope at last may be full of immortality.

Bp. Trower

10,190. LEARNING, Advancement of. I have ever observed it to have been the office of a wise patriot, among the greatest affairs of the state, to take care of the commonwealth of learning. For schools they are the seminaries of state, and nothing is worthier the study of a statesman than that part of the republic which we call the advancement of letters.

Ben Jonson.

10,191. LEARNING, Always. Cardinal Farnese discovered the great genius Michael Angelo walking alone amid the ruins of the Coliseum. He expressed his surprise at finding him so occupied. The modest artist answered, "I go to school that I may continue to learn." The growing men and the greatest men are always at school.

10,192. LEARNING, Intention of. Every artificer and profession endeavors to make the thing fit and to answer the end for which it is attended. Those that till the ground, or that break in horses, or train dogs, their business is to make the most of things, and drive them up to the top of their kind; and what other view has learning and education but to improve the faculties, and to set them the right way to work.

Antoninus.

10,193. LEARNING Little by Little. The story is told of St. Isadore, of Seville, that he found it so hard to learn, and study such drudgery that he ran away from school. In the heat of the day he sat down to rest beside a little spring that trickled over a rock. He noticed that the water fell in drops and only one drop at a time, yet they had worn away a large stone. It recalled him to his lessons. Diligent application overcame his dullness and made him one of the first scholars of his time. God's messengers to him were little drops of water. "Those drops," says his biographer, "gave to Spain an historian and to the Church a doctor."

10,194. LEARNING, Men of. Dante was, perhaps, more than any man of his age skilled in the learning of his times. He sustained at the University of Paris, an argument against fourteen disputants. He was conqueror in all. Michael Angelo was the architect of St. Peter's; he also painted the roof of the Sistine Chapel; his sculptured monuments are amongst the greatest efforts of genius; and as a poet and philosopher he was excelled by none of his time. We are told some extraordinary things relative to the acquisitions of James Crichton—surnamed the Admirable Crichton. Before his twentieth year he had run through the whole circle of the sciences; could speak and write ten languages; was distinguished for his skill in singing and playing upon all sorts of instruments. In Paris he disputed in Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, Latin, Spanish, French, Italian, English, Dutch, Flemish, and Sclavonic; and, what is still more extraordinary, in either prose or verse. Biography tells us of Sir William Jones, who died comparatively young, and yet acquired a critical knowledge of eight languages—English, Latin, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, Persian, and Sanscrit; he also knew eight others less perfectly, but was able to read them the occasional use of a dictionary—Spanish, Portuguese, German, Runic, Hebrew, Bengalee, Hindostanee, Turkish; and he knew so much of twelve other tongues, that they were easily attainable by him, had life and leisure permitted his application to them—Tibetan, Pali, Phalavi, Deri, Russian, Syriac, Ethiopic, Coptic, Welsh, Swedish, Dutch, and Chinese.

J. Johnson.

10,195. LEARNING without Religion. Without religion, learning is only a lamp on the outside of a palace. It may serve to throw a gleam of light on those that are without, while the inhabitant sits in darkness.

Salter.

10,196. LEARNING, Time for. It matters not what sea a ship is to sail. Its keel must be securely laid, its masts firmly set, its rigging of the toughest fibre, in order to sail any sea in safety. One hour's tussle with the tempest will test the fiber of its timbers, which were toughened by a hundred years' wrestle with Norwegian blasts. The student whose special work in life is yet unchosen should be made to feel that in some work he will have need of the completest possible discipline of all his powers and the largest attainable acquisitions. Now is the time to get ready. When the storm bursts, there will be no time to set the mast or hang the rudder. President Foss.

10,197. LEGENDS, Irish. The Lives of the Saints abound in incidents, both marvelous and amusing. Judging from these the Irish must have been from the first the greatest liars in the world. Not one of their saints but is characterized by the most absurd marvels. A thief stole and eat up one of St. Patrick's pet goats. The saint going out into the fields called the pet, when it sent forth its answering bleat from the stomach of the thief. There came up out of the sea thirty sea-green horses, and galloped to Lamera, where the abbot, Ruadan, presented them to king Dermot, and the king won a race with one of them. After a while these marvelous sea-horses returned to the sea. A woman visits a battle-field in search of her husband. She finds his head only. She pronounces the name of the Holy Trinity and the headless trunk of her husband walks up to her. She places the head upon the body and it instantly adheres so perfectly that no scar remains. The man comes to life and survives many years. In dealing with the Irish their credulity and superstition has been largely operated upon.

10,198. LEISURE, Compulsory. A gentleman called upon a merchant to engage him in Christian work. He excused himself, saying he was too busy. He really was a very busy man. He allowed his business to engross all his time and talents. Sickness next looked into that merchant's counting-room, and found him too busy to be sick. A little exercise of his power, and the merchant closed up his ledgers, laid down his pen, and called an assistant to help him home. Then in spite of the pressure of business, death laid his cold hand on his brow and said, "Go with me." Sickness and death do not wait our leisure. Religion and its duties are postponed at our eternal peril.

10,199. LEPERS, Description of. Never can we forget a company of miserable lepers sitting in a row by the wayside as we entered the Jaffa gate. More disgusting objects in human flesh can hardly be imagined. The hair and eyebrows had fallen off; the faces were livid, bloated, and covered with festering ulcers; and the eyes bloodshot or blind. The nose of one was half eaten off, the upper lip of another entirely gone. The hands of one were fingerless, the arms of another handless. As we passed them, they extended their diseased hands towards us, and in a dry, husky, gasping voice, cried, "Howadji, Allah, backsheesh;" that is, Traveler, in the name of God, money. O, how vividly did those pitiable objects bring to mind the expression, "The leprosy of sin," and what an illustration were they of the power of that Jesus who could say to a leper

"I will; be thou clean!" This malady is beyond the reach of medical skill. Some years ago a French physician, supposing he had found a cure, went to Jerusalem to try the value of his discovery; but instead of helping the lepers, he became a victim of the dreadful disease, and died within three months. It is not, however, generally considered contagious, but is transmitted from parent to child. It is common to see a frightfully diseased mother with a bright healthy child in her arms; but the little one inherits the curse, and in a few years is sure to be a leper. Strange that marriages among them are not prohibited.

S. W. Brown.

10,200. LETTER, An ill-tempered. An ill-tempered letter, once sent, will embitter a life-time. We once saw an old gentleman, with a wise, fine head, calm face, and most benevolent look, but evidently thin-skinned and irascible, beg of a post-master to return him a letter which he had dropped into the box. To do so, as everybody knows, is illegal; but won over by the old gentleman's importunity, the post-master complied, upon full proof, in comparing the writing, etc., being given. Then, with a beaming face, the old gentleman tore the letter into fragments, and scattering them to the wind, exclaimed, "Ah! I've preserved my friend." The fact is, he had written a letter in a state of irritation, which was probably unjust and hurtful, but which he had wisely recalled. "Written words remain," is not only a proverb, but a very grave caution; and hence the advice—never to write in anger, or at any rate, to keep your letter till you are cool.

Friswell.

10,201. LIARS, Evil of. Epametus said that liars were the cause of all the villainies and injustice in the world.

10,202. LIARS, Fate of. In the general post-office sorting room there is a hole in the wall, darkened by a grating, through which a frequent watch is kept upon the letter-sorters. Notwithstanding this, deceit often goes undetected by man, but never undetected by the eye of God. A confirmed liar is like a crooked, knotty tree, fit only for the fire. We despise and discard a watch that never tells the true time, a ruler that will not enable you to rule a straight line, a portrait that is not faithful; so God will, at the Judgment-day, dismiss from his presence "all liars." Dr. J. H. Vincent.

10,203. LIARS, Punishment of. I am charmed with many points of the Turkish law, particularly the punishment of the convicted. They are burnt on the forehead with a hot iron when they are proved the authors of any notorious falsehood.

Lady Montague.

10,204. LIBERALITY, Christian. You will say, here is a marvelous doctrine, which commandeth nothing but give, give: if I should follow this doctrine, I should give so much, that at the length I shall have nothing left for myself. These be the words of infidelity: he that speaketh such words is a faithless man. And I pray you tell me, have ye heard of any man that came to poverty because he gave unto the poor? have you heard tell of such a one? No, I am sure you have not. And I dare lay my head to pledge for it, that no man living hath come, or shall hereafter come to poverty, because he hath been liberal in helping the poor. For God is a true God, and no liar: he promiseth us in his word that we shall have the more by giving to the needy. Therefore the way to get is to scatter that you have. Give, and you shall gain. If you ask me how I shall get riches, I make thee this answer—scatter that thou hast; for giving is gaining. But you must take heed and scatter it according unto God's will and pleasure: that is, to relieve the poor withal, to scatter it amongst the flock of Christ; whosoever giveth so shall surely gain, for Christ saith, "give and it shall be given unto you." It shall be given unto you—this is a sweet word, we can not well away with that; but how shall we come by it?—Give.

Bishop Latimer.

10,205. LIBERTY, False Application of. The word liberty has been falsely used by persons who, being degenerately profligate in private life, and mischievous in public, had no hope left but in fomenting discord.

Tacitus.

10,206. LIBERTY, Joy of. When all Greece had assembled to behold the Isthmian games, silence was ordered by the sound of a trumpet, when the crier proclaimed, "The senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quinctius Flaminus, their general, do give liberty and immunity to all the cities of Greece that were under the jurisdiction of King Philip." At first there was a deep silence, as if the people heard nothing, and the crier repeated the same words. At this, there went up such a strong and universal shout of joy that the birds that flew above their heads fell down as if amazed among them. Livy said that "the joy was greater than the minds of men were able to comprehend, so that they scarce believed what they heard; they gazed upon one another as if they thought themselves deluded by a dream."

10,207. LIBERTY, News of. When Wilberforce was trying to get a bill through Parliament to liberate all the slaves under the British flag, away off in the islands subject to the British rule there was great excitement. They were anxious to get their liberty. When they were expecting the vessel which would bring the news that the bill had failed or succeeded, thousands of people went down to the shore to get the first news. The captain of the coming vessel knew how anxious they were to get it. As soon as the vessel was in sight, and he saw the multitude on the shore watching for him, he shouted the words, "Free! free! free!" and they all took up the cry, and it spread through the island.

10,208. LIBERTY, Sacrifice for. The burning of Moscow at the approach of Napoleon, is accounted the greatest sacrifice for patriotism which modern history records. But what is this devotion of wealth, or the destruction of a city, to the thousands of lives that have been laid cheerfully down in defence of liberty, of which history makes no personal mention.

Not a few families know best their own sacrifices.

10,209. LIBERTY, Transformation of. Ariosto tells a pretty story of a fairy, who, by some mysterious law of her nature, was condemned to appear at certain seasons in the form of a foul and poisonous snake. Those who injured her during the period of her disguise were forever excluded from participation in the blessings which she bestowed. But to those who, in spite of her loathsome aspect, pitied and protected her, she afterwards revealed herself in the beautiful and celestial form which was natural to her, accompanied their steps, granted all their wishes, filled their houses with wealth, made them happy in love and victorious in war. Such a spirit is liberty. At times she takes the form of a hateful reptile. She grovels, she hisses, she stings. But woe to those who in disgust shall venture to crush her! And happy are those who, having dared to receive her in her degraded and frightful shape, shall at length be rewarded by her in the time of her beauty and her glory! Macaulay.

10,210. LIBERTY, Waiting for. When a prisoner first leaves his cell, he cannot bear the light of day; he is unable to discriminate colors or recognize faces. But the remedy is, not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. The blaze of truth and liberty may at first dazzle and bewilder nations which have become half blind in the house of bondage. But let them gaze on, and they will soon be able to bear it. In a few years men learn to reason. The extreme violence of opinion subsides. Hostile theories correct each other. The scattered elements of truth cease to contend, and begin to coalesce. And at length a system of justice and order is educed out of the chaos. If men are to wait for liberty till they become wise and good in slavery, they may, indeed, wait forever. Macaulay.

10,211. LIBERTY, Working for. In 1813, the plague raged fearfully in Malta. There were not enough well persons to bury the dead and care for the sick. In the emergency, they had recourse to a number of French and Italian prisoners, promising them their liberty, when the plague should subside, for their services. They gladly accepted the offer, and labored most faithfully in their perilous work, and seemed to be under the special protection of Providence while so engaged, and won their freedom.

10,212. LIBRARY, Miracle of a. What a happiness is it, that without all offence of necromancy, I may here call up any of the ancient worthies of learning, whether human or divine, and confer with them of all my doubts! that I can, at pleasure, summon whole synods of reverend fathers and acute doctors from all the coasts of the earth, to give their well-studied judgments in all points of question which I propose! Neither can I cast my eye casually upon any of these silent masters but I must learn somewhat. It is wantonness to complain of choice. No law binds us to read all; but the more we can take in and digest, the better-liking must the mind needs be. Blessed be God, that hath set up so many clear lamps in his Church! Now, none but the wilfully blind can plead darkness. And blessed be the memory of those his faithful servants that have left their blood, their spirits, their lives, in these precious books; and have willingly wasted themselves into these during monuments, to give light unto others. Bishop Hall.

10,213. LIE, Erasure of a. A little boy told a lie. His mother was grieved, and told him how much she was distressed; and, what was far more important, that God was displeased with him, that God kept a big book, and his name was written in that book, and over against the name of Alexander McPheeters there was a big black mark, for the story he had told. She noticed that the little fellow seemed serious and thoughtful all the afternoon, and that night when he was about to go to bed, he got down on his knees, and before saying his usual prayer, with great earnestness he exclaimed, "O Lord! please lub it out." That big black mark had been troubling him all day, and he wanted it rubbed out.

10,214. LIE, Fatal. A little boy, for a trick, pointed with his finger to the wrong road when a man asked which way the doctor went. As a result, the man missed the doctor, and his little boy died, because the doctor came too late to take a fish-bone from his throat. At the funeral, the minister said that the boy was killed by a lie, which another boy told with his finger. Anon.

10,215. LIES, Avoiding. I saw a singular specimen of earnest Hindooism in church this morning—a religious mendicant, or fakir, who never speaks, having embraced the singular idea that by remaining silent at all times he would never lie, and consequently become very holy. J. D. Brown.

10,216. LIES, Half. Satan rarely tries to do mischief by a pure, unvarnished, palpable lie; for, fallen as humanity is, a lie manifestly so is not palatable: an alloy needs to be amalgamated with some gold—the great lie requires a sprinkling of a great truth—Satan's brass must have stuck upon it the stamp and superscription of Jesus, before it can have currency or circulation among mankind. Dr. Cumming.

10,217. LIFE, Arithmetic of. Do you remember the inexorable logic of that remarkable arithmetical speech which Thomas De Quincey made to himself and to some imaginary friend, when standing precisely where you are standing to-day, at the beginning of his work of life? "My friend, you make very free with your days; pray, how many do you expect to have? What is your rental as regards the total harvest of days which this life is likely to yield? Let us consider." Then follows his arithmetic, which I give without his language. Seventy years of life yield 25,550 days. Remember, now, that twenty years have gone before beginning—before having attained any skill or system, or any definite purpose in the distribution of time. Deduction No. 1, for twenty years before beginning, 7,300 days; remainder, 18,250 days. Out of this remainder you have to deduct one third at a blow for one item, sleep. Deduction No. 2, 6,080 days, leaving remainder No. 2, 12,170 days. Once more De Quincey says, on account of illness, of recreation, and the serious occupations spread over the surface of life, it will be little enough to deduct another third. In the case of the minister it will be more, rather than less; for, as I understand him, the time occupied in public speaking comes in here—but call it one-third. Deduction No. 3, 4,060 days, leaves remainder No. 3, 8,110 days. Finally, he says for the single item which the Roman armies grouped under the phrase "corpus curare," attendance upon the animal necessities—eating, drinking, washing, bathing and exercise—deduct the smallest proper amount from the last remainder of 8,110 days, and you will have less than 4,000 days in a long life left for the direct development of all that is most august in the nature of man. After that comes the night, when no man can work. Four thousand days—one solid mass of time, amounting to eleven and a half continuous years. This, brethren, is your intellectual and spiritual working life to-day. Does it look small? It is priceless. Its value is incomputable. To what could I compare it? To the sparkling crown jewels of the Tower of London? To the glittering treasures of the Saxon Green Vault? To the massive jewelry of the walls, even of the Apocalyptic City? They cannot represent its value. Nothing can so well picture its worth as the Master's own Parable of the Pounds. This is the glorious inheritance which, in the name of that Master, I commit to your hands to-day, with his own great charge, "Occupy till I come."

Dr. Henry Smith.

10,218. LIFE, Boundary of. I compare life to a little wilderness, surrounded by a high dead wall. Within this space we muse and walk in quest of the new and happy, forgetting the insuperable limit, till, with surprise, we find ourselves stopped by the dead wall: we turn away, and muse and walk again, till, on another side, we find ourselves close against the dead wall. Whichever way we turn—still the same.

John Foster.

10,219. LIFE, Brevity of. We need no reed, no pole, no measuring line, wherewith to take the dimensions of our days; nor any skill in arithmetic, wherewith to compute the number of them. No; we have the standard of them at our fingers' ends; and there is no multiplication of it; it is but one hand-breath in all.

Henry.

10,220. LIFE, Brief. And surely, if we deduct all those days of our life which we might wish un-lived, and which abate the comfort of those we now live, if we reckon up only those days which God hath accepted of our lives, a life of good years will hardly be a span long; the son in this sense may outlive the father, and none climacterically old.

Browne.

10,221. LIFE, Christian. It is by going on to new problems that the mathematician perfects himself in science; it is by copying new scenes that the artist perfects himself in art; it is by practising new pieces that the musician perfects himself in song; and it is by new manifestations of Jesus that the believer also makes his advances.

Power.

10,222. LIFE, Circle of. Vice-President Wilson is reported as saying a few months before his death: "Our lives, after all, are a great deal like a circle, which commences at our birth, and as the circle draws nearer to its close we, in our mind's eye, can see clearer our childhood and our earlier life, with its triumphs, its hardships, its pleasures, its sorrows, and its lost opportunities. I don't know, however, as I would wish to live my life over, for everything has been ordered by a good Providence. Oh, yes—our lives are just like a circle."

10,223. LIFE, Close of. Life's evening, we may rest assured, will take its character from the day which has preceded it; and if we would close our career in the comfort of religious hope, we must prepare for it by early and continuous religious habit.

Shuttleworth.

10,224. LIFE, Darkened. The mass of Christians make a little dark world of their own, and live there. They build the walls of their houses out of their troubles and sorrows. They put stained glass in their windows. They keep the doors locked. It is all dark about them. No sunshine comes into their chambers, and no fire burns on the hearth. They have no pictures on their walls but the pictures of their dead joys. And there they live, from year to year, in gloom and sadness, because they will not let God's sunshine in. I meet many persons who can talk for hours of their troubles, sorrows and cares, who seem to forget that God ever made a flower, or a star, or a sunbeam, or did a single kind, tender thing for them.

J. R. Miller.

10,225. LIFE, Desire of. We are naturally desirous to live; and though we prize life above all earthly things, yet we are ashamed to profess that we desire it for its own sake, but pretend some other subordinate reason to affect it. One would live to finish his building or clear his purchase; another to breed his children and see them well matched; one would fain outlive his trial at law; another wishes to outwear an emulous co-rival; one would fain outlast a lease that holds him off from his long-expected possessions; another would live to see the times amend, and a re-establishment of a public peace. Thus we would seem to wish life for anything but itself.

Bishop Hall.

10,226. LIFE, Dissatisfied with. The godly have oft a satiety of life: as willing they are to leave the world, as men are wont to be to rise from the board when they have eaten their fill. They feign that when Tithonus might have been made immortal, he would not, because of the miseries of life. This made Plotinus the Platonist account mortality a mercy, and Cato protest that if any god would grant him if old to be made young again, he would seriously refuse it. "As for me," said Queen Elizabeth, in a certain speech, "I see no such great cause why I should be fond to live, or afraid to die." While I call to mind things past, behold things present, and expect things to come, I hold him happiest that goeth hence soonest. Trapp.

10,227. LIFE, Division of. I highly approve the end and intent of Pythagoras's injunction; which is, to dedicate the first part of life more to hear and learn, in order to collect materials out of which to form opinions founded on proper lights, and well-examined sound principles, than to be presuming, prompt, and flippant in hazarding one's own slight crude notions of things, and thus exposing the nakedness and emptiness of the mind, like a house opened to company before it is fitted either with necessities or any ornament for their reception and entertainment. Earl of Chatham.

10,228. LIFE, Doubling. A good man doubles the length of his existence; to have lived so as to look back with pleasure on our past existence is to live twice. Martial.

10,229. LIFE, Effort to Prolong. Amestres, the wife of the great monarch Xerxes, buried alive in the ground twelve persons, as an offering to Pluto, for the prolonging of her own life.

10,230. LIFE, Embroidering. Life is like a roll of costly material passing swiftly through our hands, and we must embroider our pattern on it as it goes. We cannot wait to pick up a false stitch, or pause too long before we set another. Only, if we keep our eye ever on our great Exemplar, we shall find, when he finishes off our work, and smooths out its rumples, and cuts away its frayed ends, then even its spots and mistakes fall into a purpose in its plan. Edward Garrett.

10,231. LIFE, Ending. Augustus, a few minutes before his death, asked his friends who stood about him, if they thought he had acted his part well; and upon receiving such an answer as was due to his extraordinary merit, "Let me, then," says he, "go off the stage with your applause;" using the expression with which the Roman actors made their exit at the conclusion of a dramatic piece. I could wish that men, while they are in health, would consider well the nature of the part they are engaged in, and what figure it will make in the minds they leave behind them; whether it was worth coming into the world for; whether it be suitable to a reasonable being; in short, whether it appears graceful in this life, or will turn to advantage in the next. Addison.

10,232. LIFE, Estimate of. There appears to exist a greater desire to live long than to live well! Measure by man's desires, he cannot live long enough; measure by his good deeds, and he has not lived long enough, measure by his evil deeds, and he has lived too long. Zimmerman.

10,233. LIFE, Eternity and. Think of "living!" Thy life, wert thou the "pitifullest of all the sons of earth," is no idle dream, but a solemn reality. It is thy own; it is all thou hast to front eternity with. Work, then, even as he has done, and does, "like a star, unhaasting, yet unresting." Carlyle.

10,234. LIFE, Evanescent. Children frequently write their names in the white sand by the sea shore, only to see them washed out again by the incoming wave; or in the snow, from which they quickly disappear before the rays of the sun. Where have you written? on the face of the transient earth, or on the tablets of the immortal soul? It is well to test our work by this question.

10,235. LIFE, Examples of. It is the greatest and first use of history to show us the sublime in morals, and to tell us what great men have done in perilous seasons. Such beings, and such actions, dignify our nature, and breathe into us a virtuous pride which is the parent of every good. Wherever you meet with them in the page of history, read them, mark them, and learn from them how to live and how to die; for the object of common men is only to live. The object of such men as I have spoken of, was to live grandly, and in favor with their own difficult spirits; to live, if in war, gloriously; if in peace, usefully, justly and freely! S. Smith.

10,236. LIFE, Exercise in. Too often neglected and allowed to lapse into wickedness, trained and exercised, life will quicken into grandeur. "It is better to wear out than rust out," says a homely proverb, with more meaning than people commonly suppose. Rust consumes faster than use. To "wear out," implies life and its pleasures; to "rust," the stagnation of death. Grindon.

10,237. LIFE, Failure in. Many men fail in life from the want, as they are too ready to suppose, of those great occasions wherein they might have shown their trustworthiness and their integrity. But all such persons should remember, that in order to try whether a vessel be leaky, we first prove it with water before we trust it with wine. The more minute, trivial, and we might say vernacular opportunities of being just and upright, are constantly occurring to every one; and it is an unimpeachable character in these lesser things that almost invariably prepares and produces those opportunities of greater advancement, and of higher confidence, which turn out so rich a harvest, but which those alone are permitted to reap who have previously sown. Colton.

10,238. LIFE, Frailty of. My life is a frail life; a corruptible life: a life, which the more it increaseth, the more it decreaseth: the farther it goeth, the nearer it cometh to death. A deceitful life, and like a shadow, full of the snares of death: now I rejoice, now I languish; now I flourish, now I wither; now I live, and straight I die; now I seem happy, always miserable; now I laugh, now I weep: thus all things are subject to mutability, that nothing continueth an hour in one estate: oh, joy above joy, exceeding all joy, without which there is no joy, when shall I enter into thee, that I may see my God that dwelleth in thee! St. Augustine.

10,239. LIFE, Glory of. A medical student went to Faslé, in the sixteenth century, to obtain the degree of M. D. When his studies were nearly completed he was stricken with mortal sickness. The prize he sought was constantly before his mind. He could not die easily without it. So, in his bed, and on the verge of eternity, he was made a doctor, to his great satisfaction; and then died like any plebeian.

10,240. LIFE, Guarded. Our passage through life is like that of the children of Israel through the Red Sea. Doubt and darkness are before us, unless God enlighten our path: the enemy presseth upon us behind, unless God check his pursuit: the waters stand in heaps on each hand of us; if they open a path to us, it is through the word of his power, which were he to recall, the water-flood stands ready to overflow us, the deep to swallow us up, the pit to shut her mouth upon us. Amidst perils, which thus encompass us round on every side, what continual need have we to look up to the Almighty for aid and support! Townson.

10,241. LIFE, Happiest Period of. Probably the happiest period in life most frequently is in middle age, when the eager passions of youth are cooled, and the infirmities of age not yet begun; as we see that the shadows which are at morning and evening so large, almost entirely disappear at mid-day. Dr. T. Arnold.

10,242. LIFE, Hidden. A great preacher compares the hidden life of the Christian to the telegraph wires, from which the wailing of the winds is often heard, while at the same time it may be some messages of love or peace are passing through them. Sorrow may range without, but the child of God is receiving grace, strength and hope, unseen by the keenest observer.

10,243. LIFE, Human. This life is a season of probation, assigned to us for the purpose of making our choice between everlasting happiness or misery. This life, considered as it is in itself, is an object of contempt. We may say of it, with the sacred writer, that it is a shadow that passeth away; a vanity which has nothing real or solid; a flower which fadeth; grass which withereth and is cut down; a vapor which dissolves into air; a dream which leaves no trace after the sleep is gone; a thought which presents itself to the mind, but abideth not; an apparition; a nothing before God. But when we contemplate this life in its relation to the great end which God proposes to himself in bestowing it upon us, let us form exalted ideas of it; let us carefully compute all its subdivisions; let us husband with scrupulous attention all the instants of it, even the most minute and imperceptible; let us regret the precious moments which we have irrecoverably lost. For this shadow which passeth, this vanity which hath nothing real or solid, this flower which fadeth, this grass which is cut down and withereth, this vapor which melteth into air, this forgotten dream, this transient thought, this apparition destitute of body and substance, this nothing, this span of life so vile and contemptible,—is time which we must redeem, a time of visitation which we must know, a time accepted; a day of salvation which we must improve, a period of forbearance and long-suffering which we must embrace, a time beyond which there shall be time no longer, because, after life is finished, tears are unavailing, sighs impotent, prayers are disregarded, and repentance is ineffectual. Saurin.

10,244. LIFE, An Infidel's. I now found myself, in the decline of life, a prey to tormenting maladies, and believing myself at the close of my career without having once tasted the sublime pleasures after which my heart panted. Why was it that, with a soul naturally expansive, whose very existence was benevolence, I have never found one single friend with feelings like my own? A prey to the cravings of a heart which have never been satisfied, I perceived myself arrived at the confines of old age, and dying ere I had begun to live. I considered destiny as in my debt for promises which she had never realized. Why was I created with faculties so refined, yet which were never intended to be adequately employed? I felt my own value, and revenged myself of my fate by recollecting and shedding tears for its injustice. J. J. Rousseau.

10,245. LIFE, Joy and Sorrow in. Ha is the interjection of laughter; ah is the interjection of sorrow. The difference betwixt them very small, as consisting only in the transposition of what is no substantial letter, but a bare aspiration. How quickly, in the age of a minute, in the very turning of a breath, is our mirth changed into mourning! T. Fuller.

10,246. LIFE, Lengthening. Mycerinus, son of Cleops, king of Egypt, caused the temples of the gods to be re-opened, which his father had ordered closed, and gave liberty to the oppressed of his people. But the oracle sent him word from the city of Buti, that he should live but six years, and die in the seventh. Indignant at the idea, he determined to deceive the oracle if possible, by causing many lamps to be made and lighted at night. By these he indulged his genius, and kept in constant action night and day, intending in this way to lengthen his six years to twelve.

10,247. LIFE, Living. "In my opinion, he only may be truly said to live, and enjoy his being, who is engaged in some laudable pursuit, and acquires a name by some illustrious action or useful art." Thus the heathen Sallust places life in activity. Rousseau, the infidel, could find no reason for his existence, and felt himself mocked by destiny. The philosopher Locke declared that there is no satisfaction, except in doing well, and the hopes of a future life.

10,248. LIFE, a Loan. Some men make a womanish complaint that it is a great misfortune to die before our time. I would ask, What time? Is it that of nature? But she, indeed, has lent us life, as we do a sum of money, only no certain day is fixed for payment. What reason, then, to complain if she demands it at pleasure, since it was on this condition you received it? Cicero.

10,249. LIFE, Measure of. They report that about Pontus, there are some creatures of such an extempore being that the whole time of their life is confined within the space of a day; for they are brought forth in the morning, are in the prime of their existence at noon, grow old at night, and then die. Dost thou not think that if these had the soul and reason of a man, that they would be so affected, and that things would happen to them after the same manner as to us?—that those who died before the meridian would be lamented with tears and groans—and that we should call them happy who lived their day out? For the measure of a man's life is the well spending of it, and not the length. Plutarch.

10,250. LIFE, Mingled. The web of our life is of a mingled yarn, good and ill together: our virtues would be proud, if our faults whipped them not; and our crimes would despair, if they were not cherished by our virtues. Shakspeare.

10,251. LIFE, Nearing the End of. "We are traveling," says John Newton, in writing to a friend, "in the coach of time; every day and hour brings us nearer home, and the coach wheels whirl round apace when we are upon the road; we seldom think the carriage goes too fast; we are pleased to pass the milestones; I call new-year's day, or my birth-day, a milestone. I have now almost reached my seventy-third year by mile-stones; what dangers have I escaped or been brought through? If my heart would jump to be within three miles of you, why does it not jump from morning till night, to think that I am probably within three years of seeing the Lamb upon the throne, and joining in the praises of the blessed spirits of the redeemed, who behold him without a veil or a cloud, and are filled with his glory and love!"

10,252. LIFE, Object of. There are almost as many interests in the world as there are men. Every one you meet in the streets is going after something. You see it in his face, his quick eye, and his rapid walk. Either it is political, or literary, or mercantile, or scientific, or fashionable, or simply ambitious, or dishonest. Still, whatever it is, every man has wedded the interest of his choice, and is doing his duty to it. He works hard for it all day; he goes to bed with the thought of it, and he wakes with it in the morning. Even on Sunday, it is rather his hand that is resting than his head or his heart; they are full of his interests. Look what men will do, singly or banded, to put down slavery, or to get free trade, or to compete for a large order, or to carry the mails, or to make new railroads. It is plain men have interests enough in the world, that they love them dearly, and work for them manfully. Oh, that it were all for God—the good, the merciful, the eternal God. F. W. Faber.

10,253. LIFE, Parable of. A parable says that there was a great king who employed his people to weave for him. The silk and woof, and patterns were all given by the king, and he looked for diligent working people. He was very indulgent, and told them when any difficulty arose to send to him, and he would help them; and never to fear troubling him, but to ask for help and instruction. Among many men and women busy at their looms was one little child whom the king did not think too young to work. Often alone at her work, cheerfully and patiently she labored. One day, when the men and women were distressed at the sight of their failures—the silks were tangled, and the weaving unlike the pattern—they gathered round the child and said, "Tell us how it is that you are so happy in your work. We are always in difficulties." "Then why do you not send to the king?" said the little weaver; "he told us that we might do so." "So we do, night and morning." "Ah," said the child, "but I send as often as I have a little tangle."

10,254. LIFE, Passing through. When men travel in stage coaches in grand mountain countries, some ride in the inside with the curtains fastened down. They see nothing of the beauty of the scenes through which they pass. Others ride outside, and see every grand thing by the way. This illustrates the way different persons go through God's world. Many pass through shut up inside a dark, dismal coach, with all the curtains drawn tight, themselves shut in, and all of God's joy and beauty shut out; others ride outside, and catch a glimpse of every fair and lovely thing by the way. They breathe the fresh air, hear the joyous songs of the birds, see the fields, brooks, rivers, mountains and skies, and quaff delight everywhere. J. R. Miller.

10,255. LIFE, Pendulum of. At every swing of the pendulum a spirit goes into eternity. Between the rising and the setting of every sun, 43,000 souls are summoned before their Creator. Death is ever busy, night and day, at all seasons, and in all climes. He is supplied with a boundless variety of darts and arrows, with which he accomplishes his work. Could all the forms in which death comes to man be written together, what a long and fearful catalogue would it make! Think of the innumerable number of diseases, all at the command of death. And, as though these were not sufficient, see how man is exposed to fatal accidents on every hand, and at every moment. Flavel said, that "the smallest pore in the body is a door large enough to let in death. The least gnat in the air may choke one, as it did Adrian, a pope of Rome. A little hair in milk may strangle one, as it did a councillor in Rome. A little skin of a raisin may stop one's breath, as it did the lyric poet, Anacreon."

Teachers' Treasury.
10,256. LIFE, Phases of. At twenty years of age, the will reigns; at thirty, the wit; and at forty, the judgment. Gratian.

10,257. LIFE, Pivots in. Biography is full of illustrations of the turning of the tide of men's lives by the most insignificant (yet mightily significant) occurrences. The current of John Fletcher's life was turned by the spilling of a pot of coffee.

Dr. Foss.

10,258. LIFE, Portraits of. By the discoveries of modern science, the rays of the sun are made to form the exact portrait of him on whom they shine. We are all living in the sunlight of eternity, which is transferring to plates more enduring than brass, the exact portrait of the soul in every successive act, with all its attendant circumstances. Interesting to the antiquary is the moment when he drags out from the sands of Egypt some obelisk on which the "pen of iron, and the point of a diamond," have graven the portraits, the attitudes, the dresses, and the pursuits of men who lived and died three thousand years ago. But none can utter the interest of that moment, when from the silence of eternity shall be brought out tablets thick set with the sculptured history of a sinful soul, and men and angels, with the sinner himself, shall gaze appalled on the faithful portraiture of a life of sin. Wm. Jones.

10,259. LIFE, Prolonging. The philosopher Descartes suggested to Sir Kenelm Digby that he would employ himself better in seeking to discover some means of prolonging human life, than in philosophical speculations. Descartes assured him that he had reflected long upon the subject, and though he dared not promise immortality, he was certain he had the power of enabling men to attain the age of the patriarchs. This conceit of his was well known in Holland. His pupil, Abbe Picot, believing this, discredited the report of his death.

10,260. LIFE, Purpose of. I have read of an author, who, whilst he was writing a book he was about to publish, would every now and then look back to the title to see if his work corresponded thereto, and if it answered the expectation raised thereby. Now, the use I would make hereof, and would recommend to you, is for thee, O sinner, to look back every now and then, and consider for what thou wast created; and for thee, O saint, to look back every now and then, and consider for what thou wast redeemed. Ashburner.

10,261. LIFE, Race for. A hound, having started a hare from a bush, chased her for some distance, but the hare had the best of it, and got off. A goatherd, who was coming by, jeered at the hound, saying that puss was the better runner of the two. "You forget," replied the hound, "that it is one thing to be running for your dinner, and another for your life." Æsop.

10,262. LIFE, Record of. According to the Koran, the angel AL SHAM keeps a complete record of every man's life, embracing thoughts and deeds, good and bad. At a man's death, the scroll is rolled up and preserved, to be reproduced at the resurrection.

10,263. LIFE, Register of. One of the Rev. John Fletcher's parishioners in Madeley, says that when a young man, he was married by Mr. Fletcher, who said to him, as soon as the service was concluded, and he was about to make the accustomed entry, "Well, William, you have had your name entered into our register once before this." "Yes, sir, at my baptism." "And now your name will be entered a second time; you have no doubt thought much about your present step, and made proper preparations for it in a great many different ways." "Yes, sir." "Recollect, however, that a third entry of your name—the register of your burial—will sooner or later take place. Think, then, about death, and make preparation for that also, lest it overtake you as a thief in the night."

10,264. LIFE, Re-Lived. The little boy—son of Lady Duncan—beautifully dressed in the Highland dress, was carried to Vicky, and gave her a basket with fruit and flowers. I said to Albert I could hardly believe that our child was traveling with us; it put me so in mind of myself when I was the "little Princess." Albert observed that it was always said that parents lived their lives over again in their children, which is a very pleasant feeling. Queen Victoria.

10,265. LIFE, Re-Living. Though I think no man can live well once but he that could live well twice, yet for my own part I would not live over my hours past, or begin again the thread of my days: not upon Cicero's ground, because I have lived them well, but for fear I should live them worse. Sir T. Browne.

10,266. LIFE, Results of. It was the boast of Augustus that he found the city of Rome built of brick, and that he left it built of marble.

10,267. LIFE, Riddle of. How true is that old fable of the sphinx who sat by the wayside, propounding her riddle to the passengers, which if they could not answer, she destroyed them! Such a sphinx is this life of ours to all men and societies of men. Nature, like the sphinx, is of womanly celestial loveliness and tenderness; the face and bosom of a goddess, but ending in claws and the body of a lioness. There is in her a celestial beauty, which means celestial order, pliancy to wisdom; but there is also a darkness, a ferocity, a fatality, which are infernal. She is a goddess, but one not yet disimprisoned; one still half imprisoned,—the inarticulate, lovely, still encased in the inarticulate, chaotic. How true! And does she not propound her riddles to us? Of each man she asks daily, in mild voice, yet with a terrible significance, "Knowest thou the meaning of this day? What thou canst do to-day, wisely attempt to do." Nature, universe, destiny, existence, howsoever we name this great unnameable fact in the midst of which we live and struggle, is as a heavenly bride and conquest to the wise and brave, to those who can discern her behests and do them; a destroying fiend to those who cannot. Answer her riddle, it is well with thee. Answer it not, pass on regarding it not, it will answer itself: the solution of it is a thing of teeth and claws. Nature is a dumb lioness, deaf to thy pleadings, fiercely devouring. Carlyle.

10,268. LIFE, Rule of. While Thomas Paine resided in Bordentown, N. J., he met the Rev. Dr. Staughton. After some remarks of a general character, Paine observed, "Mr. Staughton, what a pity it is that man has not some comprehensive and perfect rule for the government of his life!" The doctor replied, "Mr. Paine, there is such a rule." "What is that?" Paine inquired. Dr. S. repeated the passage, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself." Abashed and confused, Paine replied, "Oh, that's in your Bible," and immediately walked away.

10,269. LIFE, Serious. Inscriptions were common upon old-time English houses. One, still standing in Cheshire, has the following inscription: "Fleres si scires unum tua tempora mensem; ridis cum non scis si sit forsitan una dies." You would weep if you knew that your life was limited to one month; yet you laugh when you know not but that it may be restricted to a day.

10,270. LIFE, a Sermon. Our every life is a sermon. Our birth is the text from which we start. Youth is the introduction to the discourse. During our manhood we lay down a few propositions and prove them. Some of the passages are dull, and some are sprightly. Then come inferences and applications. At seventy years we say, "Fifthly and lastly." The doxology is sung. The benediction is pronounced. The book is closed. It is getting cold. Frost on the window-pane. Audience gone. Shut up the church. Sexton goes home with the key on his shoulder.

Talmage.

10,271. LIFE, Shortness of. "A man is a bubble," said the Greek proverb, which Lucian represents to this purpose, saying, "All the world is a storm, and men rise up in their several generations like bubbles descending from God, and the dew of heaven, and some of these instantly sink into the deluge of their first parent, and are hidden in a sheet of water, having had no other business in the world but to be born, that they may be able to die; others float up and down two or three turns, and suddenly disappear, and give their place to others; and they that live longest upon the face of the waters are in perpetual motion, restless and uneasy, and being crushed with a great drop of the cloud, sink into flatness and a froth; the change not being great, it being hardly possible it should be more a nothing than it was before." Homer calls a man "a leaf," the smallest, the weakest piece of a short-lived, unsteady plant. Pindar calls him "the dream of a shadow;" another, "the dream of the shadow of smoke."

Jeremy Taylor.

10,272. LIFE, Stream of. Beneath me flows the Rhine, and, like the stream of time, it flows amid the ruins of the past. I see myself therein, and know that I am old. Thou, too, shalt be old. Be wise in season. Like the stream of thy life runs the stream beneath us. Down from the distant Alps, out into the wide world, it bursts away, like a youth from the house of his fathers. Broad-breasted and strong, and with earnest endeavors, like manhood, it makes itself a way through these difficult mountain-passes. And at length, in old age, it falters, and its steps are weary and slow, and it sinks into the sand, and through its grave passes into the great ocean, which is its eternity. Thus shall it be with thee.

Longfellow.

10,273. LIFE Too Short. Themistocles, a renowned Grecian general, lived to the advanced age of one hundred and seven. Seeing that his end was hastening, he grieved that he must die, saying, "It is but now chiefly that I began to grow wise."

10,274. LIFE, Tragedy of. Act. 1.—Young man starting from home. Parents and sisters weeping to see him go. Wagon passing over the hill. Farewell kiss thrown back. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop. Act 2.—Marriage altar. Bright lights. Full organ. White veil trailing through the aisle. Prayer and congratulations, and exclamations of "How well she looks!" Ring the bell and let the curtain drop. Act 3.—Midnight. Woman waiting for staggering steps. Old garments stuck into broken window panes. Many marks of hardship on the face. Biting the nails of bloodless fingers. Neglect, cruelty, disgrace. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop. Act 4.—Three graves in a very dark place. Grave of a child, who died from want of medicine; grave of a husband and father, who died of dissipation; grave of a wife and mother, who died of a broken heart. Plenty of weeds, but no flowers! Oh, what a blasted heath, with three graves! Ring the bell and let the curtain drop. Act 5.—A destroyed soul's eternity. No light; no music; no hope! Despair coiling around the heart with unutterable anguish. Blackness of darkness forever! Woel! woel! woel! I cannot bear longer to look. I close my eyes at this last act of the tragedy. Quick! quick! Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Talmage.

10,275. LIFE, True. The mere lapse of years is not life. To eat, and drink, and sleep, to be exposed to darkness and the light, to pace round in the mill of habit, and turn thought into an implement of trade, this is not life. In all this but a poor fraction of the consciousness of humanity is awakened; and the sanctities will slumber which make it worth while to be. Knowledge, truth, love, beauty, goodness, faith, alone can give vitality to the mechanism of existence. The laugh of mirth that vibrates through the heart; the tears that freshen the dry wastes within; the music that brings childhood back; the prayer that calls the future near; the doubt which makes us meditate; the death which startles us with mystery; the hardship which forces us to struggle; the anxiety that ends in trust; are the true nourishment of our natural being.

James Martineau.

10,276. LIFE, Use of. You have seen the tiny blossom of the fruit-trees opening in early spring. After basking a few days in the sun, it fades and falls. A germ is left behind on the branch, but it is scarcely discernible among the leaves. It is a green speck that can hardly be felt between your fingers. If a hungry man should pluck and eat it, the morsel would not satisfy; the germ as to present use is a sapless, tasteless nothing. Grasped now as your object and end, it is the most worthless of all things; but left, and cherished as the germ of fruit, it is the most precious. This life is the bud of eternity; if plucked, and used as the portion of the soul, that soul will be empty now and empty forever. But, while thus abused it is worthless, rightly used it is beyond all price. Here is generated, cherished, ripened, the life that will never die.

Arnot.

10,277. LIFE, Wanted. The old Spartan, who tried to make a corpse stand upright, but found that it would fall, said, "Ah, it wants something inside!" Yes, it wanted life.

S. Coley.

10,278. LIFE, Way of. The way is good, says Chrysostom, if it be to a feast, though through a dark and miry lane; if to an execution, not good, though through the fairest street of the city. Non qua sed quo. Not the way, but the end, is to be mainly considered.

Anon.

10,279. LIFE, Work of. On the day before his death, Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, made the following entry in his journal: "The day after tomorrow is my birthday, if I am permitted to live to see it—my forty-seventh birthday since my birth. How large a portion of my life on earth is already passed! And then what is to follow this life? How visibly my outward work seems contracting and softening away into the gentler employments of old age. In one sense, how nearly can I now say 'Vixi,' and I thank God that, as far as ambition is concerned, it is I trust fully mortified. I have no desire other than to step back from my present place in the world, and not to rise to a higher. Still there are works which, with God's permission, I would do before the night cometh; especially that great work, if I might be permitted to take part in it. But, above all, let me mind my own personal work, to keep myself pure and zealous and believing, laboring to do God's will, yet not anxious that it should be done by me rather than by others, if God disapproves of my doing it." He woke next morning, between five and six, in pain. At eight o'clock he was dead!

10,280. LIGHT, Divine. "God is light." 1 John 1: 5. Clothed with light as with a garment, Ps. 104: 2; dwelling in light inaccessible to mortal frames, 1 Tim. 6: 16; "the Father of lights," James 1: 17; "the light dwelleth with him," Dan. 2: 22. CHRIST is "the light of the world," John 8: 12; 12: 46; "the true light," 1: 9; "the light of men," 1: 4; "a light to lighten the Gentiles," Luke 2: 32; the light of the holy Jerusalem, Rev. 21: 23; "the bright and morning star," Rev. 22: 16; "the Sun of righteousness," Mal. 4: 2; typified by the pillar of fire in the wilderness, and the golden candlestick in the Tabernacle and Temple.

Bowes.

10,281. LIGHT, Guiding. A fisherman off the coast of Scotland was overtaken by a storm before which he drifted at the mercy of the winds. He would have made for the harbor whence he came, but dense darkness came on, and there was no light by which he could shape his course. His frail fishing-smack began to leak badly, and could not long stand the storm, if she was not quickly driven upon the rocks. The fisherman prayed silently for deliverance. Soon after his son cried, "Father, I see a light." It was even so. The father saw it, shaped his course by it, and gained in safety the very harbor he desired to reach. The light which saved him was in his own house, and was lighted by one of his boys, and set by accident in the window. The fisherman during the rest of his life kept a light in that window, which was succeeded after his death by the Rocky Shore Island Light. "Let your light so shine."

10,282. LIGHT, Mental and Moral. Science and art may invent splendid modes of illuminating the apartments of the opulent; but these are all poor and worthless compared with the light which the sun sends into our windows,—which he pours freely, impartially, over hill and valley, which kindles daily the eastern and western sky; and so the common lights of reason, and conscience and love, are of more worth and dignity than the rare endowments which give celebrity to a few.

Dr. Channing.

10,283. LIGHT, More. When one of the Reformers had acquitted himself in a public disputation with great credit to his Master's cause, a friend begged to see the notes which he had been observed to write, supposing that he had taken down the arguments of his opponents, and sketched the substance of his own reply. He was greatly surprised to find that his notes consisted of these ejaculatory petitions, "More light, Lord,—more light, more light!"

10,284. LIGHT, Omniscience and. What an emblem is light of omniscience! We question it of the atom and the distant world, and it answers us with its full revelations. God says his eyes are on the ways of men, and he seeth all their doings; there is no darkness nor shadow of death where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves. The figure is, that God uses light as the means of his omniscience.

Dr. H. W. Warren.

10,285. LIGHT, Reflection of. If the sun shines on a dull brick or stone, they reflect none of its beams, there is nothing in them capable of this, nor is there in an ungodly man any natural power of reflecting the light of God. But let the sun shine upon a diamond, and see what rays of sparkling beauty it emits. Just so the Christian who has the graces of the Spirit. When God shines on his soul, beams of celestial loveliness are reflected by him on the world.

Rowland Hill.

10,286. LIGHT, Rekindled. St. Gudula was accustomed just before daybreak to visit an oratory about two miles from her father's castle to pray. One wild night, says the legend, the Prince of the power of the air extinguished the light which a servant maid carried before her. She was on a desolate heath, and the darkness was so dense that she could not find the path. She knelt and prayed to God for help, and the light in her lantern was rekindled, to her great relief and joy. Paintings of this saint represent her as carrying a lantern. She lived in Brabant in the seventh century.

10,287. LIGHT, Shining. The sun's rays go alike above, below, on all sides, and in all directions. It looks every way, and in every way sends forth what it has received. A candle, too, sends its light equally into all corners of the room; wherever you stand, its light comes to you alike. So, from a Christian, light should go forth in all directions, and at all times, naturally, not by impulsive emissions, but by regular irradiations. Morse.

10,288. LIGHT, Shunning the. Some people retire to conceal their defects. Too much light discovers the wrinkles, which makes them choose to sit out of the sun. Collier.

10,289. LIGHT, A Small. A man said, "I have no more influence than a farthing rushlight." "Well," was the reply, "a farthing rushlight can do a good deal; it can set a haystack on fire; it can burn down a house—yea, more, it will enable a poor creature to read a chapter in God's book. Go your way, friend; let your farthing rushlight so shine before men, that others, seeing your good works, may glorify your Father which is in heaven."

10,290. LIGHTS, The Lower. A vessel was coming into Cleveland harbor on a stormy night. The pilot saw the upper lights on the bluff burning, but not the lower, and asked the captain if he had better put out into the lake again. The captain was afraid of the storm on the lake, and thought they had better try to make the harbor. They did so, but were wrecked, and many lives lost, all because the lower lights had been put out by the storm. The upper lights of heaven are burning as brightly as ever, but the lower lights are out or dimly burning. God wants us to keep them burning, so as to keep people from stumbling over us, or being lost because our light is out. Moody.

10,291. LIGHTNING, Effect of. Arago found it related somewhere that lightning, which fell one day into the shop of a Suabian cobbler, respected the person of the artisan himself, but had the singular effect of magnetizing all his tools. The fantastic book in which the learned secretary of the academy found this account represents the cobbler in great dismay. His hammer, his pincers, his awl, attracted all the nails and needles of the establishment, and caused them to adhere firmly to the tools. The poor fellow thought everything in his shop had been bewitched, or that he was dreaming. Fonvielle.

10,292. LIKENESS, Necessary to Liking. A collier, who had more room in his house than he wanted for himself, proposed to a fuller to come and take up his quarters with him. "Thank you," said the fuller, "but I must decline your offer; for I fear that as fast as I whiten my goods you will blacken them again."

10,293. LILIES, Oriental. "Our camels," says a traveler in Palestine, "were scattered on the mountain slopes in search of food. On these heights the lilies abounded, with grass and low shrubs between. I noticed that the camels did not touch the lilies at all, but cropped what lay between. It reminded me of the words, 'He feedeth among the lilies'—among, but not on the lilies; for, while the lily furnishes no acceptable food for flocks and herds, it seems, by the shade of its high, broad leaves, to retain the moisture, and so to nourish herbage wherever it grows. The place of lilies would thus be the place of the richest pasture, as Solomon evidently indicates, when, again using the figure, he speaks of the 'young roes which feed among the lilies.'" In the course of his travels in the East, Dr. Bonar informs us that he came to immense beds of lilies and hyacinths of various kinds. They grew thickly together, and covered miles of sand. "They grow," he tells us, "in almost incredible numbers and luxuriance—often where nothing else flourishes—reminding one of the prophet's allusion, 'He shall grow as the lily.'"

10,294. LITERATURE, Divine Protection of. The first national library founded in Egypt seemed to have been placed under the protection of the divinities, for their statues magnificently adorned this temple, dedicated at once to religion and to literature. It was still further embellished by a well-known inscription, forever grateful to the votary of literature; on the front was engraven "The nourishment of the soul;" or, according to Diodorus, "The medicine of the mind." I. Disraeli.

10,295. LITERATURE, Pleasures of. How I pity those who have no love of reading, of study, or of the fine arts! I have passed my youth amidst amusements and in the most brilliant society; but I can assert with perfect truth, that I have never tasted pleasures so true as those I have found in the study of books, in writing, or in music. The days that succeed brilliant entertainments are always melancholy, but those which follow days of study are delicious; we have gained something; we have acquired some new knowledge, and we recall the past day not only without disgust and without regret, but with consummate satisfaction. Madame de Genlis.

10,296. LITTLE FOXES, Danger from. I remember that when I was shown one, it was with the greatest difficulty I could persuade myself that the little, very little creature—not larger than a jerboa, or our common kitten—playing with deft foot-fall and kindly-intelligent eye about its cage, really was the destructive spoiler represented. It so happened, however, that the keeper of the gardens where it was, on coming round to arrange its crib, made a discovery that satisfied me of the character, or no character, of the very "little" deceiver before me. Lifting up the floor straw, he discovered a deep-burrowed hole that went right beneath the separating wall of the adjoining den—a tiger's; and with a start, examining it, the keeper found that another hour of secret working would have overthrown the wall, and let loose the fierce beast of prey. The whole had been done within a few hours. Those "little," grayish-white feet, licked pure and clean of all betraying soil, and that "little" sharp nose, so innocent and "pitiful" looking, had done their stealthy work: and appalling might have been the issue. I remember well how, as the littered, concealing straw was raised, the consciously guilty "little" hypocrite slunk back with drooped brush into the corner.

Grosart.

10,297. LITTLE SINS, Fable of. A watch, of which better things were expected, behaved badly and was taken to the watchmaker for correction. He examined it with a powerful glass, and discovered a single little grain of sand. As he was about to remove it, it cried out, "Let me alone! I am but a small thing, and take up so little room. I cannot possibly injure the watch. Twenty or thirty might do harm, but I cannot; so let me alone." The watchmaker replied, "You must come out, for you spoil my work; and all the more so that you are so small, and but a few people can see you." Little sins ruin the most promising characters, and taint the best efforts.

10,298. LITTLE SINS, Growth of. "In the gardens of Hampton Court you will see many trees entirely vanquished and well nigh strangled by huge coils of ivy, which are wound about them like the snakes around the unhappy Laocoon: there is no untwisting the folds, they are too giant-like, and fast fixed, and every hour the rootlets of the climber are sucking the life out of the unhappy tree. Yet there was a day when the ivy was a tiny aspirant, only asking a little aid in climbing; had it been denied then, the tree had never become its victim; but by degrees the humble weakling grew in strength and arrogance, and at last it assumed the mastery, and the tall tree became the prey of the creeping, insinuating destroyer." Vice, intemperance, lust, avarice, anger, like the vines twine about a man, extract the life from him, and leave him a wreck.

10,299. LITTLE SINS, Treachery of. A vessel will sink, whether filled with heavy stones or with sand. Fine grains of sand will bury travelers in the desert. Fine flakes of snow, so light that they seem to hang in the air and scarce to fall, will, if they gather over the sleepy wayfarer, extinguish life; if they drift, they will bury whole houses and their dwellers. Fine, delicate sins, as people think them, will chill the soul and take away its life.

Dr. Pusey.

10,300. LITTLE THINGS, Damage of. A single pin fell upon a web of cloth as it was being passed over a drum. It cut a hole in the cloth with every revolution of the drum, and damaged it to the extent of three hundred dollars. Little sins, exaggerations, lies, dishonesty, are pins on the drum, that damage the web of character beyond computation.

10,301. LITTLE THINGS, Importance of. Let us not neglect little duties—let us not allow ourselves in little faults. Whatever we may like to think, nothing is really of small importance that affects the soul. All diseases are small at the beginning. Many a death-bed begins with a "little cold." Nothing that can grow is large all at once—the greatest sin must have a beginning. Nothing that is great comes to perfection in a day—characters and habits are all the result of little actions. Little strokes made that ark which saved Noah. Little pins held firm that tabernacle which was the glory of Israel. We too are traveling through a wilderness—let us be like the family of Merari, and be careful not to leave the pins behind. (Numbers 4: 32.)

Ryle.

10,302. LITTLE THINGS, Influence of. A vessel passing through the English Channel was driven ashore at Beachy-head, by a storm, and the whole crew were washed overboard; four only being saved from immediate death, by being thrown on the rocks by which the vessel struck. A terrible fate seemed to await them; for although not under water, the waves appeared to be rapidly gaining on them. The darkness of the night, and the violence of the storm, prevented any help coming to them; and they sat waiting to be engulfed as their shipmates had been. In this terrible moment one of the sufferers, grasping a reed to hold himself more firmly to the rock, at once recognized it as the sapphire; and knowing that the sapphire is never submerged by the sea, he felt assured that he could say to the waves, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther." Encouraged by this, the poor fellows remained stationary until the morning. They were not deceived. The sea gradually retired; light broke on the shipwrecked seamen, and they were rescued from their perilous position.

10,303. LOGIC, Mathematical. A widow woman kept a hen that laid an egg every morning. Thought the woman to herself, "If I double my hen's allowance of barley she will lay twice a day." So she tried her plan, and the hen became so fat and sleek that she left off laying altogether.

Esop.

10,304. LONELINESS, Relief for. An orphan drummer-boy entered the office of the Christian Commission, and said that he had no friends, and had not received a letter in two years. "Would you like to have a letter?" asked the agent. "Oh yes, indeed I would." "Well, my son, I think I have one for you." He went to a bag, and taking out a letter written by a Sunday-school scholar for some lonely soldier, handed it to him. He took it and wept for joy, because he was remembered by somebody.

10,305. LONGING, Emblem of. A young man wanted to be a missionary; but his wealthy and worldly father thought he was too good for that, so he made a merchant of him. The young man went sadly about his daily tasks. Like the statue of Columbus at Genoa, which is made ever to look longingly westward, the heart of the disappointed young man would look longingly toward the ministry—toward the sublime services of that Prince of missionaries, the Lord Jesus Christ. Anon.

10,306. LOOKING BACK: Oriental Custom. When men or women leave their house, they never look back, as "it would be very unfortunate." Should a husband have left anything which his wife knows he will require, she will not call on him to turn or look back; but will either take the article herself, or send it by another. Should a man, on some great emergency, have to look back, he will not then proceed on the business; he was about to transact. When a person goes along the road (especially in the evening), he will take great care not to look back, "because the evil spirits would assuredly seize him." When they go on a journey, they will not look behind, though the palankeen or bandy would be close upon them; they step a little on one side, and then look at you. Should a person have to leave the house of a friend after sunset, he will be advised in going home not to look back: "As much as possible keep your eyes closed; fear not." Has a person made an offering to the evil spirits? he must take particular care, when he leaves the place, not to look back. A female known to me is believed to have got her crooked neck by looking back. Such observations as the following may be often heard in private conversation: "Have you heard that Comáran is very ill?" "No; what is the matter with him?" "Matter! why, he has looked back, and the evil spirit has caught him." Roberts.

10,307. LOQUACITY, Repenting of. Simonides said that he had often repented of talking, but never of being silent.

10,308. LOQUACITY, Restraining. The tongue ought to be environed with reason as with a rampart perpetually lying before it, like a mound, to stop the overflowing and slippery exuberance of impertinent talk; that we may not seem to be more silly than geese, which, when they take their flight out of Cilicia over the mountain Taurus, which abounds with eagles, are reported to carry every one a good big stone in their bills, instead of a bridle or barricade, to restrain their goggling. By which means they cross those hideous forests in the night time undiscovered. Plutarch.

10,309. LORD'S SUPPER, Import of the. A Malay youth, who was being educated in Scotland, as he came out of church one Sunday, was asked, "What have you seen in church to-day?" He answered, "I see people take bread and wine." "And what does that mean?" "The body and blood of Jesus Christ." "Is it really the body and blood of Jesus Christ?" "O, no," said he, "not all same: it keep in mind—keep in mind his body and blood—he die for sinners."

10,310. LORD'S SUPPER, a Memorial. The Lord's supper comes to us like a ring plucked off from Christ's finger, or a bracelet from his arm; or rather like his picture from his breast, delivered to us with such words as these, "As oft as you look on this, remember me."

John Flavel.

10,311. LORD'S SUPPER, Real Presence in the

Rev. Dr. Cumming, of London, says that in the Highlands of Scotland he once met a lady of noble birth, who asked him if he believed in the "real presence." "Certainly I do," he said, "I am very glad," she replied, "but you are the first Protestant clergyman I ever met with who did." "We attach different meanings to the same words," said Dr. Cumming. "I believe in the real presence of our Lord wherever two or three are gathered together in his name. I cannot believe as you do about the real presence, when I consider the words 'In remembrance of me.' Memory has to do with the past, with an absent friend. To eat and drink in remembrance of one who is actually present before one's eyes is an absurdity." A lady who accompanied her was silent; but a few months ago, Dr. Cumming received a letter from her father, saying that when his daughter went to Scotland she was on the verge of Romanism, owing to the influence of this noble friend, and that the words of Dr. Cumming on "In remembrance of me," were blessed by God in preventing her from becoming a Romanist, and that she was converted, and had just died rejoicing in Christ.

10,312. LORD'S SUPPER, Title in the. The Lord's supper being an evident proof that the New Testament is in full force, (it being the cup of the New Testament in his blood, Matt. 26:28,) it tends much to our satisfaction, as the legal execution of the deed by which we hold and enjoy our estate. So that when he saith, "Take, eat," it is as much as if God should stand before you at the table with Christ, with all the promises in his hand; and say, "I deliver this to thee as my deed." John Flavel.

10,313. LORD'S SUPPER, Unfit Array for the. To the table of the Lord many come with garlanded brow to commemorate him whose crown was of thorns; and, unfitly, stretch forth a jeweled hand to receive his sign whose hands the nails did tear. T. Collins.

10,314. LOSSES, Lessons Derived from. A man seems never to know what anything means till he has lost it; and this, I suppose, is the reason why losses, vanishing away of things, are among the teachings of this world of shadows. The substance, indeed, teacheth, but the vacuity, whence it has disappeared, yet more. The full significance of those words, property, ease, health—the wealth of meaning that lies in the fond epithets, parent, child, friend—we never know till they are taken away; till, in place of the bright, visible being, comes the awful and desolate shadow, where nothing is, where we stretch our hands in vain, and strain our eyes upon dark and dismal vacuity. Still, in that vacuity, we do not lose the object that we loved; it only becomes more real to us. Thus do blessings not only brighten when they depart, but are fixed in enduring reality; and friendship itself receives its everlasting seal beneath the cold impress of death. Dewey.

10,315. LOSSES, Philosophic Endurance of. Aristippus lost a very fine farm, at which a feigned friend expressed great sympathy, and complained loudly. Aristippus replied, "Thou hast but one piece of land, but have I not three farms yet remaining? Why, then, should I not rather lament your misfortune, since it is the raving only of a madman to be concerned at what is lost, and not rejoice at what is left?"

10,316. LOSSES, Providence in. A traveler had lost himself in one of those hot, sandy deserts, where it is possible to journey for weeks without seeing a human dwelling. Almost famished by hunger and thirst, he at length reached a shady palm-tree and a spring of fresh water. Near the spring lay a small bag. "God be praised," said the man, when he felt the bag; "perhaps these are peas, which may save me from dying of hunger." He opened the bag eagerly, and was much disappointed when he found that it contained pearls, which, though valuable in themselves, are of no use to a man at the point of death from starvation. However, he took courage, and prayed fervently to God; and presently he saw a Moor riding quickly toward him on a camel, who took pity on him, and gave him bread and fruit. This Moor was seeking his bag of pearls, which he had lost, and upon receiving them from the traveler, he said, "How wonderful are the ways of Providence! I thought it a great misfortune to lose the pearls, and this same loss has afforded me the happiness of saving your life."

S. S. Visitor.

10,317. LOSSES, Riches with. Dr. Poissal tells of an aged friend who had been very rich, but was suddenly reduced to poverty. His wife was anxious lest this reverse should unsettle her husband's faith. She watched him closely for a few days, to see its effect. His patient composure surprised her, and she told him of the fears she had felt for him, and expressed joy at his cheerfulness. With tearful eyes he said, "Wife, I have not lost everything." "Has thee not?" said she, "I thought all was lost." "Nay," said he, "I have yet one old bond left." Desiring to be sure, she asked to see the bond. "Get me the Bible," said he. She began to have visions of treasures hidden among its leaves in more prosperous days. "Open it and read the 13th chapter of Hebrews, fifth verse." She read, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." "Now, husband, I understand thee: God's promise is thy old bond." "Yes," said he. He is rich who has God for his banker, though his name would secure no earthly credit.

10,318. LOSSES, Selfishness in. The little son of a clergyman had two five-cent pieces given him, and was asked what he would do with them. Putting his finger upon one, the boy said: "This one I am going to give to the heathen, and the other I am going to keep myself." After playing with them awhile, one of them was lost, and he could not find it. "Well, my boy," said the father, "which one have you lost?" "Oh," said he, "I have lost the one I was going to give to the heathen."

10,319. LOST, Cry of the. A boy was sent on an errand during a severe snow-storm, and missing his way, wandered about till he was ready to perish. About midnight a gentleman heard a piteous voice crying, "Lost! lost! lost!" He sent out men to search for the lost person, and they soon found and saved the boy. But for his own fear and cry, he must have perished. This symbolizes the case of every sinner.

10,320. LOST, Hunting for the. A lady, observing the loss from her ring of a small but valuable stone, told her servant, who immediately said she would look for it, and left the room; she quickly returned with a lighted oil lamp, a dust-pan and brush. Putting the former on the floor by her side, she commenced sweeping the room all over most diligently; and looking by the light of the lamp carefully through the dust, she soon produced the tiny but precious stone. The eyes of the poor woman brightened when she discovered and restored it; and then, going into the verandah, she told the rest of the servants how she had found the stone which had been lost. Anon.

10,321. LOST, Searching for the. In wild countries, for children, or even men, to lose themselves, in the forests or on the prairies, is not an unfrequent occurrence. Then the alarm is given, "Lost! lost! a child lost, or a man lost," is the cry. The search begins. Man is lost. Christ is searching for him. So are all true Christians.

10,322. LOST, Sympathy for the. A theological student at the Biblical Institute, Concord, N. H., visited a lady who lay upon her dying bed despairing of salvation. No message of his could drive away this awful conviction. She said, "Ten years ago I might have been saved; but now I am lost, lost, lost." The student left her and returned to his books, but could not concentrate his mind upon his studies while that despairing cry, "Lost, lost," ran through his soul. "What business have I with books," he said to himself, "while a soul is perishing?" Again he visited the dying woman only to hear the same cry, "I am lost, lost, lost." The Spirit gave him the word, "Thank God for that, for now I know that you are one that Christ came to save."

10,323. LOVE, Appreciation of. During the chaplaincy of Rev. J. B. Finley at the Ohio penitentiary, a remarkable work of grace occurred in that institution. On visiting one of the happy converts, the chaplain found that in the overflow of his new-found love he had written with a piece of chalk all over the walls of his cell, "God is love! God is love!" O that all eyes might be opened to this heavenly vision.

10,324. LOVE, Baptism of. Frequently at the great Roman games, the emperors, in order to gratify the citizens of Rome, caused sweet perfumes to be rained down upon them through the awning which covered the amphitheatre. Behold the vases, the huge vessels of perfume! But there is naught here to delight you so long as the jars are sealed; but let the vases be opened, and the vessels be poured out, and let the drops of perfumed rain begin to descend, and every one is refreshed and gratified thereby. Such is the love of God. There is a richness and a fulness in it, but it is not per ceived till the Spirit of God pours it out like the rain of fragrance over the heads and hearts of all the living children of God. See, then, the need of having the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost! Spurgeon.

10,325. LOVE, Blindness of. Hiero was upbraided by an enemy on account of his offensive breath, and having returned home demanded of his wife why she had not informed him of it. The innocent woman answered, "I thought all men's breath had that smell." Plutarch.

10,326. LOVE, Christ's. It is like a magnificent temple, Eph. 3: 16-18, whose breadth and length, and depth and height, are symbols of the abounding extent of the love of Christ! The breadth may represent Christ's world-wide love; the length its extent throughout all ages; the depth represents the wisdom; the height its being beyond the reach of any foe—or perhaps, the Saviour's love raising the sinner from the depth of misery to the height of happiness. Bowes.

10,327. LOVE, Climax of. A colored soldier said in a religious meeting, "I love my Saviour, I love the church of Christ, I love the world, I love everybody, I love them that don't love me."

10,328. LOVE Commanded. Deut. 6: 5; 11: 13; Matt. 22: 36-38. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." As if he would not leave out the least sinew or string of the heart; the least faculty or power of the soul; the least organ or action of strength. So Bernard: "'With all my heart,' that is, affectionately; 'with all my soul,' that is, wisely; 'with all my strength,' that is, constantly. Let the zeal of thy heart inflame thy love to God; let the wisdom of thy soul guide it; let the strength of thy might confirm it." (Adams). "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha." 1 Cor. 16: 22.

10,329. LOVE, Conception of. Rowland Hill was endeavoring to convey to his hearers, by a variety of illustrations, some idea of his conceptions of the Divine love; but suddenly casting his eyes towards heaven, he exclaimed, "But I am unable to reach the lofty theme!—yet I do not think that the smallest fish that swims in the boundless ocean ever complains of the immeasurable vastness of the deep. So it is with me: I can plunge, with my puny capacity, into a subject the immensity of which I shall never be able fully to comprehend!"

10,330. LOVE, Demands of. There is no more terrible inquisition than that of affection; for we all belong to it; its treasure is in our heart, and to deprive it of that is to defraud it of its due. Those who love us insist upon reading us. Indifference may be diverted, love cannot; love demands the reason of a sigh—of a pale cheek; and at the same time that it makes our happiness obligatory, it insists upon full confession as equally a duty. Love, like the sun, absorbs all clouds; to suffer in its presence is almost to do it wrong; at least it is to own that it is powerless to fill the heart—unskilled to heal it. There is occasionally a reproach, —there is almost always some concealment, in the sadness of a beloved being. Gasparin.

10,331. LOVE, Demonstration of. The three sons of an eastern queen tried to show their love for their mother, by gifts laid upon her grave. The spectators most applauded one, who made a libation of his own blood. The offering of a few drops in honor of his mother, was counted a great virtue; but Christ poured out his blood for his enemies.

10,332. LOVE, Descent of. Love, it has been said, descends more abundantly than it ascends. The love of parents for their children has always been far more powerful than that of children for their parents; and who among the sons of men ever loved God with a thousandth part of the love which God has manifested to us?

J. C. Hare.

10,333. LOVE, Devoted. Leander, a young man of Abydos, was deeply in love with Hero, a beautiful virgin of Sestos. The narrow sea of the Hellespont lay between the two towns. Leander swam across in the night, guided by Hero's torch, which she held from one of the tower windows. One night on endeavoring to cross, when the waves ran high, he was drowned and his dead body was cast up on the shore at Sestos, where Hero from her tower beheld it. Not able to outlive her great loss, she cast herself headlong from the tower into the sea, and perished.

10,334. LOVE, Efforts of. In Cromwell's time a soldier was condemned to be executed "at the ringing of the curfew." He was engaged to be married to a beautiful lady. This lady pleaded with the judge and with Cromwell for pardon, but in vain. All preparations for the execution were made, and all awaited the signal bell. The sexton, old and deaf, threw himself upon the rope, as was his custom, but no sound. The young lady climbed the belfry stair, caught and held the tongue of the bell at the risk of her own life. At length the bell ceased to swing. The deaf old sexton supposed he had rung the curfew. The brave lady descended, wounded and bleeding. Cromwell came to demand why the bell was silent. She met him, and

At his feet she told her story, showed her hands all bruised and torn;
And her sweet young face, still haggard with the anguish it had worn, Touched his heart with sudden pity, lit his eyes with misty light:
"Go, your lover lives," cried Cromwell: "curfew shall not ring to-night."

10,335. LOVE, Foolishness of. It happened in days of old that a lion fell in love with a woodman's daughter, and had the folly to ask her of her father in marriage. The woodman was not much pleased with the offer, and declined the honor of so dangerous an alliance. But upon the lion threatening him with his royal displeasure, the poor man, seeing that so formidable a creature was not to be denied, hit at length upon this expedient: "I feel greatly flattered," said he, "with your proposal; but, noble sir, what great teeth you have got! and what great claws you have got! where is the damsel that would not be frightened at such weapons as these? You must have your teeth drawn and your claws pared before you can be a suitable bridegroom for my daughter." The lion straightway submitted (for what will not a body do for love?) and then called upon the father to accept him as a son-in-law. But the woodman, no longer afraid of the tamed and disarmed bully, seized a stout cudgel and drove the unreasonable suitor from his door. Æsop.

10,336. LOVE, Generosity of. Love trades not for home returns; it amply pays itself in serving its beloved. It is reported of one who, being asked for who he labored most, answered, "For my friends." And being asked for whom he labored least, he answered, "For my friends." Love doth most, and yet thinks least of what it does. Secker.

10,337. LOVE, Incredible. Mr. Nott, missionary in the South Sea Islands, was reading a portion of the Gospel of John to a number of the natives. One who had listened to the words, interrupted him, and said, "What words were those you read? What sounds were those I heard? Let me hear those words again." Mr. Nott again read the verse, "God so loved the world," etc., when the native rose from his seat, and said, "Is that true? Can that be true? God loved the world, when the world not love him. God so loved the world, as to give his Son to die, that man might not die. Can that be true?" Mr. Nott again read the verse, and said it was true, and that it was the message God had sent to them; and that whosoever believed in him would not perish, but be happy after death. This incredible love won the native's heart.

10,338. LOVE, Indestructible. Asbestos is the most extraordinary of all fossils. It is of the nature of alabaster, but it may be drawn out into fine silken threads of a grayish or silver color. It is indissolvable in water, and remains unconsumed in fire. A handkerchief, made of this material, many years ago, and presented to the Royal Society of England, was thrown into an intensely hot fire, and lost but two drachms of its weight, and when thus heated was laid upon white paper, and did not burn it. Connubial love is like the asbestos. Neither fire nor water can destroy it; for it can neither be dissolved nor consumed. The waves of sorrow will not wash it away; the scorching flames of tribulation will not burn it up. If this be true concerning genuine connubial love, how beautifully does it illustrate the indissolvable love between Christ and his church, which is called "The bride, the Lamb's wife!" (Rev. 21: 9).

Dr. Stryker.

10,339. LOVE, Infinite. If an angel were to fly swiftly over the earth on a summer morning while the pearly dew of heaven rested on the flowers; and go into every garden, the king's, the rich man's, the peasant's, the child's, and were to bring from each one the choicest, loveliest, sweetest flower that blooms in each, and gather them all into one cluster in his radiant hands, what a beautiful bouquet it would be! And if an angel were to fly swiftly all over the earth, into every sweet and holy home, into every spot where one heart yearns over another, and were to take out of every father's heart, and every mother's heart, and out of every heart that loves, its holiest flower of affection, and gather all into one cluster, what a blessed love-garland would his eyes behold! What a holy love would this aggregation of all earth's loves be! Yet infinitely sweeter and holier than this grouping of all earth's holiest affections, is the love that fills the heart of our Father in heaven. J. R. Miller.

10,340. LOVE, Legend of. A legend of St. John the apostle says that when a feeble old man, too weak to walk to the assemblies of the church, he was borne there by his disciples; and addressing the people as he spread abroad his hands, repeated again and again, "Love one another;" and when asked why he said ever the same thing, replied, "Because there is nothing else: attain that, and you have enough."

10,341. LOVE, Longing for. Frank Bragg, a boy of fifteen, one of the bravest of Birges' sharpshooters, was dying in Paducah hospital. As the dew of death gathered on his brow he said, "O, I am going to die, and there is no one to love me. If my sisters were only here! but I have no friends near me now." The nurse told him he had many friends, and greatest of all, God would be his friend. The last thought cheered him. He said his mother taught him to pray when a child, and that he always prayed every day. He said, "I am not afraid to die, but I want some one to love me." His nurse said, "Frankie, I love you. Poor boy, you shall not be left alone." She kissed his pale forehead lovingly. "Kiss me again," he said, "that was given so like my sister." Then, speaking to another nurse, he said, "Mrs. S., won't you kiss me, too? I don't think it will be so hard to die if you will both love me." With his face nestled against his nurses, he fell quietly into his last sleep.

10,342. LOVE, Measureless. Blessed sunshine covers the earth on the sweet summer day. It fills the valleys, spreads over the waters, bathes the fields, paints the flowers. And all this sunshine is from one sun, and the sun himself is greater than all his beams. If all his light could be gathered from the mountains, from the valleys, from the waters, from the forests; and if all that he has poured out in past ages could be gathered up again, the sun himself is immeasurably greater than all this vast ocean of gathered beams. So earth's loves are but beams from God's heart. He made us in his image. Our affections are all kindled at his heart. Father, mother, child, sister, brother, wife, husband, friend, all are but cups which God's own love has filled. And so of all human hearts in the past. And God's heart is immeasurably greater than all its outflowings and creations. If, then, all the love that has ever throbbed in human hearts from Adam's down through all the ages, and all that lives to-day on earth, could be poured into one great ocean heart, God's love is infinitely more than all.

J. R. Miller.

10,343. LOVE, Measure of Christ's. What an excellent, lovely One is Christ! Put the beauty of ten thousand paradises like the garden of Eden into one; put all trees, all flowers, all smells, all colors, all tastes, all joys, all sweetness, all loveliness in one,—oh, what a fair and excellent thing it would be! And yet it should be less, to that fair and dearest, well-beloved Christ, than one drop of rain to the whole seas, rivers, lakes, and fountains of ten thousand earths. Now, for God to bestow the mercy of mercies, the most precious thing in heaven or earth, upon poor sinners, what manner of love is this! John Flavel.

10,344. LOVE, Measure of God's. Pliny declares that Cicero once saw the Iliad of Homer written in so small a character that it could be contained in a nutshell. Peter Bales, a celebrated calligrapher, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, wrote the whole Bible so that it was shut up in a common walnut as its casket. In these days of advanced mechanism even greater marvels in miniature have been achieved, but never has so much meaning been compressed into so small a space as in that famous little word "So," in the text which tells us that "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Spurgeon.

10,345. LOVE, Mother's. In a spring freshet a river rent away a bough whereon a bird had built a cottage for her summer home. Down the white and whirling stream drifted the green branch, with its wicker cup of unfledged song, and fluttering beside it went the mother-bird. Unheeding the roaring river, on she went, her cries of agony and fear piercing the pauses in the storm. How like the love of an old-fashioned mother, who followed the child she had plucked from her heart all over the world. Swept away by passion that child might be, it mattered not; though he was bearing away with him the fragrance of the shattered roof-tree, yet that mother was with him, a Ruth through all his life, and a Rachel at his death. Lamartine.

10,346. LOVE, Ocean of. When one who has never sailed out upon the ocean stands on its shore and watches the trembling waves as they surge and break upon the sands, how little does he know of the majesty and grandeur of the great deep, of its storms, of its power, of its secrets, of its unfathomable chambers, of its unweighed treasures? He sees only the little silver edge that breaks at his feet. So we stand but where the Spirit of God breaks upon the shore of our world. We see its silver edge. We feel the splash of its waves upon our hearts. But of its infinite reaches and outgoings beyond our shores we know almost nothing. Yet blessed are they who even stand by the shore and lave their hearts in even the shallowest eddies of this divine ocean. J. R. Miller.

10,347. LOVE, Parental. A German mother, who often resorted to the graveyard to weep over the graves of her eleven dead children, had yet a living son, whose misconduct was the greatest sorrow of her life. One day he ran away from home: the mother's heart followed him in his prodigal flight. She sent a messenger to search for him. To him she said, "If you find my boy sick, or in prison, or in any want, do all that you can for him, and I will repay you." She charged him to search through the streets and alleys of a great city till he should find him. If parents, "being evil," are so moved, how much more God, who is all love?

10,348. LOVE, Paternal. A steamer was wrecked on Lake Pontchartrain, on which were a father, mother, and their six children. The father was a stalwart man and good swimmer, and resolved to get them all safely to land or perish in the attempt. He told his children not to be afraid, that he would come for them. He then jumped overboard, and his wife after him. Taking her by the hair, he drew her along through the breakers, and landed her safely on shore. Then he plunged into the mad waves, and went back to the ship for his children. One by one he brought them to the shore. Only one remained upon the vessel. The devoted father had not strength to stand up when the last was brought in. Friends expostulated with him against the farther exposure of his valuable life. He said, "Jimmie's aboard, and I promised to come for him." Then he floated back to the ship, and just as it was about to go down, he called to Jimmie to jump into the water. He had strength only to seize his boy, fold his arms about him, and press him to his bosom, and, thus enfolded, they sank together, to rise no more. Such is the love of a father. "As the Father hath loved me, even so have I loved you."

10,349. LOVE, Sacrifice for. Pyramus, a young man of Babylon, was deeply in love with Thisbe, the daughter of one that lived next neighbor. The parents looked upon this with disfavor, and they were not suffered so much as to meet. At last, through a chink in the wall, they appointed a place of meeting outside the city, under a mulberry tree. Thisbe arrived first at the place designated; but being terrified by seeing a lion passing by, she fled into a cave. In her flight she had dropped her veil, which the lioness tossed about with her bloody mouth, and so left it. Soon after Pyramus came, and seeing the veil Thisbe wore all bloody, he rashly concluded that she had been torn to pieces by some wild beast; and, therefore, slew himself. Thisbe came out of the cave when she thought the lioness had gone, with great desire to meet her lover; but finding him slain, she was so overcome with grief, that she threw herself upon his sword, and died with him.

10,350. LOVE, Sameness of. The game of love is the same, whether the player be clad in velvet or in hoddenn gray. Beneath the gilded ceilings of a palace, or the lowly rafters of a cabin, there are the same hopes and fears, the same jealousies, and distrusts, and despondings; the wiles and stratagems are all alike; for, after all, the stake is human happiness, whether he who risks it be a peer or a peasant.

Lever.

10,351. LOVE, Seeking and Following. Professor Tholuck, of the University of Halle, was so devoted to the moral interests of his students, and sought after the erring with so much tenderness and care, that he was called the student-professor. He not only sought, but followed up his seeking. There was a student brought near his heart by a godly mother. He was led away into evil; contrition and return followed; then came another fall. "When he could be found at home at no other time, I sought him more than once at six o'clock in the morning. I visited him in prison, that I might remind him of what he well knew, but always forgot." He now promised again to abandon his associates, and enter upon a new life. Four or five days after, late in the evening, came a card from him: "Tholuck sighs, Tholuck prays, but we will have our drunk out." Still the student-professor perseveres in the love that seeks and follows. And that youth is now a preacher of the gospel of Jesus in the imperial city of Berlin. Hundreds and thousands of youthful hearts have thus been won by this man of God; won from rationalism and infidelity to Christ and the church. How much has this good man been enabled to do by his teaching, his preaching, and his written works! His praise is in all the churches! Hear him as he says, "What I have done in this way is known to the world; but all this I value less than that I have been permitted, though in weakness and imperfection, to exercise that love which seeks and follows. This is a work of which the world knows little, but of which the Lord God knows much."

G. Draper.

10,352. LOVE, Trial of. Sozomon tells of a merchant, whose two sons being taken captives and condemned to die, he offered himself to die for them; and withal promised to give the soldiers all the gold he had. They pitied the poor man, and accepted him for one of his sons, but could not let them both escape, because such a number must be put to death. The man, looking upon and lamenting for both his sons, could not find in his heart to make choice of either, and stood deliberating till they were both slain.

10,353. LOVE, True. True love, like fire, burns hottest when the weather is coldest. Histories make mention of one Ursinus, a physician, that being to die for the gospel, and beginning to waver, Vitalis, a godly man, stepped to him, and though he knew it would cost him his life, encouraged him, saying, "What! have you been so industrious heretofore, to preserve men's bodies, and will you now shrink at the saving of your own soul? Be courageous!" For which faithful counsel he was condemned, and suffered accordingly.

Swinnock.

10,354. LOVE, Unlimited. A gentleman was visiting at a house some time ago. He noticed that the mother seemed agitated and was all the while going out and coming in. He went to her and asked what troubled her. She took him out into another room and introduced him to her boy. There he was, a poor wretched boy, all mangled and bruised with the fall of sin. She said, "I have much more trouble with him than with all the rest. He has wandered far, but he is my boy yet."

10,355. LOVE, Woman's. Oh, the love of woman! the love of woman! How high will it not rise! and to what lowly depths will it not stoop! How many injuries will it not forgive! What obstacle will it not overcome, and what sacrifices will it not make, rather than give up the being upon which it has been once wholly and truthfully fixed! Perennial of life, which grows up under every climate, how small would the sum of man's happiness be without thee! No coldness, no neglect, no harshness, no cruelty, can extinguish thee! Like the fabled lamp in the sepulchre, thou sheddest thy pure light in the human heart, when everything around thee there is dead forever!

Carleton.

10,356. LOVER, Hope of a. A lover's hope resembles the bean in the nursery tale; let it once take root, and it will grow so rapidly, that, in the course of a few hours, the giant Imagination builds a castle on the top, and by-and-by comes Disappointment with the curtal-axe, and hews down both the plant and the superstructure.

Sir Walter Scott.

10,357. LUCK, Good and Bad. I may here, as well as anywhere, impart the secret of what is called good and bad luck. There are men who, supposing Providence to have an implacable spite against them, bemoan in the poverty of a wretched old age the misfortunes of their lives. Luck for ever runs against them, and for others. One, with a good profession, lost his luck in the river, where he idled away his time a-fishing, when he should have been in the office. Another, with a good trade, perpetually burnt up his luck by his hot temper, which provoked all his employers to leave him. Another, with a lucrative business, lost his luck by amazing diligence at everything but his business. Another, who steadily followed his trade, as steadily followed his bottle. Another who was honest and constant to his work, erred by his perpetual misjudgments—he lacked discretion. Hundreds lose their luck by indorsing, by sanguine speculations, by trusting fraudulent men, and by dishonest gains. A man never has good luck who has a bad wife. I never knew an early-rising, hard-working, prudent man, careful of his earnings, and strictly honest, who complained of bad luck. A good character, good habits, and iron industry, are impregnable to the assaults of all the ill-luck that fools ever dreamed of. But when I see a tatterdemalion creeping out of a grocery late in the forenoon; with his hands stuck into his pockets, the rim of his hat turned up, and the crown knocked in, I know he has had bad luck—for the worst of all luck is to be a sluggard, a knave, or a tippler.

Addison.

10,358. LUCK, Knowledge and. There is a man in Berkshire, England, who was in Australia when the first discoveries of gold were made. The miners brought in their nuggets, and took them to the local banks. The bankers were a little nervous about the business, uncertain about the quality of the gold, and waited to see its character established. This man had a taste for natural sciences, and knew something about metallurgy. He tried each test, solid and fluid, satisfied himself of the quality of the gold, and then, with all the money he had or could borrow, he bought as much gold as might be, and showed as profit a hundred thousand pounds in the course of a day or two. His "luck" was observation and knowledge, and a happy tact in applying them.

F. Arnold.

10,359. LUCK, Labor and. Luck is waiting for something to turn up. Labor, with keen eyes and strong will, will turn up something. Luck lies in bed, and wishes the postman would bring him news of a legacy. Labor turns out a six o'clock, and, with busy pen or ringing hammer, lays the foundation of a competence. Luck whines. Labor whistles. Luck relies on chances. Labor depends on character. Luck slips down to indigence. Labor strides upward to independence.

Cobden.

10,360. LUCK, Superstition of. Giacomo, in Venice or the Romagna, a man of many murders, but pious, will cross himself nine times before taking to the road and inserting his stiletto in the first traveler he meets. A young English lady, or an old one, will examine her coffee-cups, throw spilt salt over her left shoulder, and shriek when knives are placed crossways on the dinner-table. Paddy in Connemara will load his old gun with a blessed bullet, before taking aim from behind a hedge at a bailiff. An old nurse in the midland counties will throw a shoe after her daughter when she goes to service or to market. Why do all these do such funny things? Why did Cæsar, tumbling on his nose as he landed nineteen hundred years ago on these shores, tell a lie to persuade his soldiers that is was no bad omen, but an intentional worshiping of the gods? Why do certain pious Christians travel to Loretto or Rome, Mussulmans to Mecca, Hindoos to the Ganges? Why do Pierre and Wilhelm give a larger price for the odd numbers, the 7, 13, 21, and others in a lottery, than for the even? Why did good old Dr. Johnson touch the tops of the posts as he went along Fleet Street, and preserve his orange-pips with a sacred devotion? There is but one answer to all these questions, and to as many more as would fill this page. Because one and all believed in Fortune, Chance, Luck, call it what you will—blind goddess, capricious jade, or discerning deity: Fate, if you wish it, superior to Jupiter, Queen of the gods themselves, stronger far than wisdom, skill, or strength.

The Gentle Life.

10,361. LUKEWARMNESS, Prevention of. An earnest minister drew a lesson from the text, "Stir up the gift which is in thee." "See, this fire needs the poker; if we do not take the poker and stir, it would quickly go out. Although there are all the materials for a good fire there, I must stir the fire to make it burn brightly, and I must take care how to stir it. Mental materials are not only necessary, but activity, to give them life and ventilation. We all have gifts and fires within us; but they all need stirring, or they will never burn. Little heathen boys have minds; little beggar boys have minds; but they have no friends to help them to stir them, and cannot themselves do it. Anna, what gift does God bestow on his people?" "The gift of the Holy Ghost." "Yes; God giveth his Holy Spirit to them that ask and seek him. There is a text which says, 'the spirit of the prophets is subject to the prophets.' God's gift does not move and propel us as that steam carriage is moved by the fire and the steam, without our knowing anything about it. We can resist God's gift. We can quench God's gift. If Christians are cold, it is because they do not stir up the gift that is in them. If preachers are cold, it is because they do not stir up the fire in them. God answers by fire to his people; and if we cannot impart fire to others, it is a proof that we have not stirred up our own fire. Don't forget you all have a fire in you, but it will only burn as you stir it."

10,362. LUST, Apostrophe to. O lust, thou infernal fire! whose fuel is gluttony; whose flame is pride; whose sparkles are wanton words; whose smoke is infamy; whose ashes are uncleanness; whose end is hell. Quarles.

10,363. LUST, Fascination of. Lusts (as to the actings, I mean) are like agues; the fit is not always on, and yet the man not rid of his disease; and some men's lusts, like some agues, have not such quick returns as others. The river doth not move always one way; now 'tis coming anon falling water; and though it doth not rise when it falls, yet it hath not lost its other motion. Now the tide of lust is up, anon 'tis down, and a man recoils, and seems to run from it, but it returns again upon him. Who would have thought to have seen Pharaoh in his mad fit again, that should have been with him in his good mood, when he bid Moses and the people go? But, alas! the man was not altered. Thus, may be when a strong occasion comes, this (like an easterly wind to some of our ports) will bring in the tide of thy lusts so strongly that thy soul, that seemed as clear of thy lust as the naked sands are of water, will be in a few moments covered and as deep under their waves as ever. But the longer the banks have held the better; yet shouldst thou never more satisfy thy lust, yet this is not enough to clear thee from being a hypocrite.

Salter.

10,364. LUSTS Must be Overcome. A Christian hath no such enemies without him as unruly and undisciplined lusts and passions within him; and it is a vain thing to think of overcoming the world without us, until this world within us be brought into subjection; for without the lusts and corruptions within, the world, and the evil men of the world, and the evil one of the world, could not hurt us. Sir M. Hale

10,365. LUXURY, Evils of. Luxury makes a man so soft, that it is hard to please him, and easy to trouble him; so that his pleasures at last become his burden. Whereas the frugal and temperate man can, by fasting till a convenient time, make any food pleasant. The luxurious must at last owe to this temperance that health and ease which his false pleasures have robbed him of; he must abstain from his wines, feastings, and fruits, until temperance has cured him. And I have known many who, after they have been tortured by the tyranny of luxury, whilst they had riches in abundance to feed it, become very healthful and strong, when they fall into that poverty which they had so abhorred.

Dr. Ferguson.

10,366. LUXURY, Proud. It is said that Nero would not fish but with nets of gold attached to purple cords, and that he delighted to dig the earth with a golden spade.

10,367. LYING, Crime of. I really know nothing more criminal, more mean, and more ridiculous, than lying. It is the production either of malice, cowardice, or vanity; and generally misses of its aim in every one of these views; for lies are always detected, sooner or later. If I tell a malicious lie, in order to affect any man's fortune or character, I may indeed injure him for some time; but I shall be sure to be the greatest sufferer myself at last; for as soon as ever I am detected (and detected I most certainly shall be) I am blasted for the infamous attempt; and whatever is said afterwards to the disadvantage of that person, however true, passes for calumny. If I lie, or equivocate—for it is the same thing—in order to excuse myself for something that I have said or done, and to avoid the danger or the shame that I apprehend from it, I discover at once my fear, as well as my falsehood; and only increase, instead of avoiding, the danger and the shame: I show myself to be the lowest and the meanest of mankind, and am sure to be always treated as such.

Lord Chesterfield.

10,368. LYING, Gain of. The gain of lying is nothing else but not to be trusted of any, nor to be believed when we say the truth.

Sir Walter Raleigh.

10,369. LYING, Habit of. Lying supplies those who are addicted to it with a plausible apology for every crime, and with a supposed shelter from every punishment. It tempts them to run into danger from the mere expectation of impunity, and when practiced with frequent success it teaches them to confound the gradations of guilt, from the effects of which there is, in their imaginations at least, one sure and common protection. It corrupts the early simplicity of youth; it blasts the fairest blossoms of genius; and will most assuredly counteract every effort by which we may hope to improve the talents and mature the virtues of those whom it infects.

Dr. Parr.

10,370. LYING, Hatred of. One of the fathers has carried this point so high as to declare he would not tell a lie though he were sure to gain heaven by it. However extravagant such a protestation may appear, every one will own that a man may say, very reasonably, he would not tell a lie if he were sure to gain hell by it; or, if you have a mind to soften the expression, that he would not tell a lie to gain any temporal reward by it, when he should run the hazard of losing much more than it was possible for him to gain.

Addison.

10,371. LYING, Improvement in. Although the devil be the father of lies, he seems, like other great inventors, to have lost much of his reputation by the continual improvements that have been made upon him.

Swift.

10,372. LYING, Resolved against. A little orphan boy having loitered on an errand, recollected himself and ran back to his uncle's workshop with all speed. "What are you running yourself out of breath for?" asked one of the men; "tell your uncle that the people kept you waiting." "Why, that would be a lie." "To be sure it would; but what's the odds?" "I a liar! I tell a lie!" cried the boy indignantly; "no, not to escape a beating every day. My mother always told me that lying was the first step to ruin, and my Bible says that a liar shall not enter heaven."

10,373. LYING, Treatment of. A lie should be trampled on and extinguished wherever found: I am for fumigating the atmosphere when I suspect that falsehood, like pestilence, breathes around me.

Carlyle.

10,374. MAGIC, Notion of. Magic! And what is magic? When the traveler beholds in Persia the ruins of palaces and temples, the ignorant inhabitants inform him they were the work of magicians! What is beyond their own power, the vulgar cannot comprehend to be lawfully in the power of others. But if by magic you mean a perpetual research amongst all that is more latent and obscure in nature, I answer, I profess that magic, and that he who does so, comes but nearer to the fountain of all belief. Knowest thou not that magic was taught in the schools of old? But how, and by whom? as the last and most solemn lesson, by the priests who ministered to the temple.

E. B. Lytton.

10,375. MALACHI, Character of. The word means—"My angel or messenger." Hence some have contended that there was no such person as Malachi, but that Ezra was the author of the book bearing his name. Origen even maintains that the author was an incarnate angel. The general opinion, however, is, that he was a real personage, who flourished about four hundred years before Christ. It was meet that the ancient dispensation should close amid such cloudy uncertainties. It had been all along the "religion of the veil." There was a veil, verily, upon more than the face of Moses. Everything from Sinai—its centre, down to the last bell or pomegranate—wore a veil. Over Malachi's face, form, and fortunes, it hangs dark and impenetrable. A masked actor, his tread and his voice are terrible. The last pages of the Old Testament seem to stir as in a furious wind, and the word "curse," echoing down to the very roots of Calvary, closes the record.

G. Gilfillan.

10,376. MALEVOLENCE, Bitterness of. Malevolence is, in point of fact, a real colocynth juice; for, if it once infect the heart, nothing in a neighbor any longer pleases. If he walk, his gait is proud and haughty; if he laugh, he is derisive; if he weep, he is hypocritical; if he look grave, he is insolent. Every fault swells into magnitude, and every virtue shrinks into littleness. Gothold.

10,377. MAMMON, Delusions of. Do not believe the impotent idol. His golden mountains are but the ocean's foam; his paradises deceptive phantoms. Krummacher.

10,378. MAN, Apostrophe to. The great Man of old, who was clothed in a leopard skin to signify the beautiful variety of things, and the firmament his coat of stars, was but the representative of thee, O rich and various man! thou palace of sight and sound, carrying in thy senses the morning and the night, and the unfathomable galaxy; in thy brain, the geometry of the city of God; in thy heart, the power of love and the realms of right and wrong! Emerson.

10,379. MAN like a Book. Man is like a book; his birth is the title-page to the book; his baptism is the epistle dedicatory; his groans and crying are the epistle to the reader; his infancy and childhood are the argument, or contents of the whole ensuing treatise; his life and actions are the subject or matter of the book; his sins and errors of his life are the errata or faults escaped in the printing; and his repentance is the correction of them. Now amongst books (we know) some are large volumes, in Folio; some little ones, in Decimo sexto; and some are of other sizes, in Octavo or Quarto. Again, some of these are fairer bound, some in a plainer manner; some are bound in strong velame, or leather, and some in thin paper. Some again have piety for their subject, and treat of godliness; others are prophane pamphlets, full of wantonness and folly; but in the last page of every one of them, there stands a word, which is FINIS, implying the end of all. Richard Gove, 1652.

10,380. MAN, A Brainless. A fox had stolen into the house of an actor, and in rummaging among his various properties, laid hold of a highly-finished mask. "A fine looking head, indeed!" cried he; "what a pity it is that it wants brains!" Aesop.

10,381. MAN, Christ's Power over. There is a legend in Iceland which says that when Jesus was a boy, playing with his comrades one Sabbath-day, he made birds of clay; and as these birds of clay were standing upon the ground, an old Sadducee came along, and he was disgusted at the sport, and dashed the birds to pieces; but the legend says that Jesus waved his hand above the broken birds, and they took wing, and went singing heavenward. Of course, that is a fable among the Icelanders; but it is not a fable that we are dust, and that the hand of Divine grace waved over us once, we go singing toward the skies. Talmage.

10,382. MAN, Dependence of. For the continuance of life a thousand provisions are made.

If the vital actions of a man's frame were directed by his will, they are necessarily so minute and complicated, that they would immediately fall into confusion. He cannot draw a breath without the exercise of sensibilities as well-ordered as those of the eye or ear. A tracery of nervous cords unites many organs in sympathy, of which, if one filament were broken, pain, and spasm, and suffocation would ensue. The action of the heart, and the circulation of his blood, and all the vital functions, are governed through means and by laws which are not dependent on his will, and to which the powers of his mind are altogether inadequate. For, had they been under the influence of his will, a doubt, a moment's pause of irresolution, a forgetfulness of a single action at its appointed time, would have terminated his existence. Bell.

10,383. MAN, Enthusiasm of. It is not to taste sweet things, but to do noble and true things, and vindicate himself under God's heaven as a God-made man, that the poorest son of Adam dimly longs. Show him the way of doing that, the dullest day-drudge kindles into a hero. They wrong man greatly who say he is to be seduced by ease. Difficulty, abnegation, martyrdom, death are the allurements that act on the heart of man. Kindle the inner genial life of him, you have a flame that burns up all lower considerations. Not happiness, but something higher: one sees this even in the frivolous classes, with their "point of honor" and the like. Not by flattering our appetites; no, by awakening the heroic that slumbers in every heart, can any religion gain followers. Carlyle.

10,384. MAN, Fallen. In some respects manifestly made for a sphere higher than he fills, he appears to us like a creature of the air which a cruel hand has stripped of its silken wings. How painfully he resembles this hapless object which has just fallen on the pages of a book that we read by the candle on an autumn evening! It retains the wish, but has lost the power to fly. Allured by the taper's glare, it has brushed the flame, and, drooping with a heavy fall, now crawls wingless across the leaf, and seeks the finger of mercy to end its misery. Compare man with any of the other creatures, and how directly we come to the conclusion that he is not, nor can be, the same creature with which God crowned the glorious work of creation! Dr. Guthrie.

10,385. MAN, Glorified. The dynasty of the future is to have glorified man for its inhabitant; but it is to be the dynasty—"the kingdom"—not of glorified man made in the image of God, but of God himself in the form of man. Creation and the Creator meet at one point, and in one person. The long ascending line from dead matter to man has been a progress Godwards—not an asymptotical progress, but destined from the beginning to furnish a point of union; and, occupying that point as true God and true Man—as Creator and created—we recognize the adorable Monarch of all the future! H. Miller.

10,386. MAN a Heavenly Plant. Man is not an earthly and unmovable, but a heavenly plant, the head raising the body erect as from a root, and directed upwards toward heaven.

Plato.

10,387. MAN, Idiosyncrasies of. Men often remind me of pears in their way of coming to maturity. Some are ripe at twenty, like human jargonelles, and must be made the most of, for their day is soon over. Some come into their perfect condition late, like the autumn kinds, and they last better than the summer fruit. And some fruit that like the winter-nelis, have been hard and uninviting until all the rest have had their season, get their glow and perfume long after the frost and snow have done their worst with the orchards. Beware of rash criticisms; the rough and astringent fruit you condemn may be an autumn or a winter pear, and that which you picked up beneath the same bough in August may have been only its worm-eaten wind-falls.

Holmes.

10,388. MAN, Immortality of. Canst thou think it worth the while, that the Maker of the universe should create a soul, and send it down into the world, on purpose to superintend these trivial affairs—to keep alive a silly piece of well-figured earth while it eats and drinks, to move it to and fro in chase of shadows, to hold it up while others bow the knee and do it homage—as if it had not some higher work to mind in reference to another state? Art thou contented to live long in the world to such purposes? What low, worthless spirit is this that had rather be so employed, than in the visions of his Maker's face; that chooses thus to entertain itself on earth rather than partake the effusions of the Divine glory above; that had rather creep with worms than soar with angels; associate with brutes than with the spirits of just men made perfect? Who can solve the phenomena, or give a rational account why there should be such a creature as man upon the earth, aside from the hopes of another world?

Howe.

10,389. MAN, Infelicity of. Our life is painful and full of difficulties; and if it doth not labor with them in its own nature, yet we ourselves have infected it with that corruption. For the inconstancy of Fortune joined us at the beginning of our journey, and hath accompanied us ever since; so that it can produce nothing sound or comfortable unto us; and the bitter potion was mingled for us as soon as we were born. For the principles of our nature being mortal is the cause that our judgment is depraved, that diseases, cares, and all those fatal inconveniences afflict mankind.

Crantor.

10,390. MAN, Inference of. You see a beautiful capital still bearing some of the flowers and some vestiges of the foliage which the sculptor's chisel had carved upon the marble. It lies on the ground, half-buried under rank weeds and nettles, while beside it the headless shaft of a noble column springs from its pedestal. Would you not at once conclude that its present condition, so base and mean, was not its original position? You say the lightning bolt must have struck it down; or an earthquake had shaken its foundations; or some ignorant barbarian had climbed the shaft, and with rude hand hurled it to the ground. Well, we look at man, and arrive at a similar conclusion.

Guthrie.

10,391. MAN, The Last. A strange story is related respecting the great earthquake of 1747. It is said that all the inhabitants of Callao, except one man, lost their lives during this earthquake. This man was standing on the fort which overlooked the harbor, when he saw the sea retire to a great distance, and then come sweeping back like a vast mountain of water. A cry of "Miserere!" arose from all parts of the town, "and then in a moment all was silent"—where the town had once flourished there was a wide expanse of sea. But the same green wave which destroyed the town swept towards him a small boat, into which he leaped, and so escaped.

W. Brock.

10,392. MAN, Life in. Rowland Hill once conversed with a celebrated sculptor, who had been hewing out a block of marble to represent that great patriot, Lord Chatham. "There," said the sculptor, "is not that a fine form?" "Now, sir," said Mr. Hill, "can you put life into it? else, with all its beauty, it is still but a block of marble." God put life into his creation, and man became a living soul. Christ puts new life into dead men.

10,393. MAN, The Melancholy. He is one that keeps the worst company in the world, that is, his own; and though he be always falling out and quarreling with himself, yet he has not the power to endure any other conversation. His head is haunted like a house, with evil spirits and apparitions, that terrify and fright him out of himself, till he stands empty and forsaken.

S. Butler.

10,394. MAN a Miracle. The essence of our being, the mystery in us that calls itself "I,"—ah, what words have we for such things?—is a breath of heaven; the Highest Being reveals himself in man. This body, these faculties, this life of ours, is it not all as a vesture for that Unnamed? "There is but one temple in the universe," says the devout Novalis, "and that is the body of man. Nothing is holier than that high form. Bending before men is a reverence done to this revelation in the flesh. We touch heaven when we lay our hand on a human body!" This sounds much like a mere flourish of rhetoric; but it is not so. If well meditated, it will turn out to be a scientific fact; the expression, in such words as can be had, of the actual truth of the thing. We are the miracle of miracles—the great inscrutable mystery of God. We cannot understand it, we know not how to speak of it; but we may feel and know, if we like, that it is verily so.

Carlyle.

10,395. MAN, Nobility of. Man is but a reed, the feeblest thing in nature; but he is a reed that thinks. It needs not that the universe arm itself to crush him. An exhalation, a drop of water, suffices to destroy him. But were the universe to crush him, man is yet nobler than the universe, for he knows that he dies; and the universe, even in prevailing against him, knows not its power. Pascal.

10,396. MAN, An Obstinate. He is resolved to understand no man's reason but his own, because he finds no man can understand his but himself. His wits are like a sack, which the French proverb says is tied faster before it is full than when it is; and his opinions are like plants that grow upon rocks, that stick fast, though they have no rooting. His understanding is hardened like Pharaoh's heart, and is proof against all sorts of judgments whatsoever. Bp. Butler.

10,397. MAN, A Passionate. He has his type in the rapid river, to whose raging current no precious freight can ever be trusted. It hurls whatever it grasps upon the rocks, and strews the fragments along its banks.

10,398. MAN, Preservation of. That which hath power to give itself being cannot want power to preserve that being. Preservation is not more difficult than creation. If the first man made himself, why did he not preserve himself? He is not now among the living in the world. How came he to be so feeble as to sink into the grave? Why did he not inspire himself with new heat and moisture, and fill his languishing limbs and declining body with new strength? Charnock.

10,399. MAN, Race of. The human race may be compared to an immense temple ruined, but now rebuilding, the numerous compartments of which represent the several nations of the earth. True, the different portions of the edifice present great anomalies; but yet the foundation and the corner-stone are the same. All spring from the same level, and all should be directed to the same end. The walls of the building have been thrown down, and the stones scattered by a great earthquake; yet a mighty Architect has appeared, and his powerful hand is gradually raising the temple-walls. The only difference between one side of the edifice and the other is, that here the restoration is somewhat further advanced, while there it is less forward. Alas! some places are still overgrown with thorns, where not a single stone appears. Yet the great Architect may one day look down on these desolate spots, and there the building may suddenly and rapidly spring up, reaching the summit long before those lofty walls which seem to have outgrown the others, but which are still standing half-raised and incomplete. "The last shall be first." Merle D'Aubigné.

10,400. MAN, Repairing. When Alexander, the crown prince of Russia, was in England, he ordered a watch made. So intricate was its mechanism and peculiar its combinations that when injured not a man in Russia could repair it; and it necessarily had to be returned to its maker for repairs. Howell says, "When Adam was called into existence, angels must have beheld him with delightful surprise. By the attacks of sin and Satan, the image of God was lost, the spirituality of the creature was annihilated. Who can repair the human mechanism? He only who first taught the machine to move in his own image, who is acquainted with all the springs and principles of human action. Pretenders have tried it again and again, but to no purpose. When we open the volume of inspiration, we behold the machine once more in the hands of the Maker. He can repair it; and, not only so, it will be so improved by him as eventually to comprise many glories to which the angels must be strangers forever."

10,401. MAN, Signs of a Wise. These are the signs of a wise man: to reprove nobody, to praise nobody, to blame nobody, nor ever to speak of himself as an uncommon man.

Epictetus.

10,402. MAN, Six Species of. According to Linnaeus and Buffon, there are six different species among mankind. The first comprehends the Laplanders, the Esquimaux Indians, the Samoied Tartars, the inhabitants of Nova Zembla, Borandians, Greenlanders, and the people of Kamtschatka. The second is the Tartar race, comprehending the Chinese and the Japanese. The third are the southern Asiatics, or the inhabitants of India. The negroes of Africa constitute the fourth striking variety in the human species. The natives of America are the fifth race of men. And the Europeans may be considered as the sixth and last variety of the human kind. Buck.

10,403. MAN, Unreliability of a Bad. During the course of my life, I have acquired some knowledge of men and manners, in active life, and amidst occupations the most various. From that knowledge, and from all my experience, I now protest that I never knew a man that was bad fit for any service that was good. There was always some disqualifying ingredient mixing with the compound and spoiling it. The man seems paralytic on that side: his muscles there have lost their tone and natural properties; they cannot move. In short, the accomplishment of anything good is a physical impossibility in such a man. He could not if he would, and it is not more certain than that he would not if he could, do a good or a virtuous action. Burke.

10,404. MAN Well-armed. The bark of a tree contains an oily juice, which, when it is in greater plenty than can be exhaled by the sun, renders the plant evergreen. Such is the state of the man whose virtue is proof against the scorching heats of temptation and persecution; he is "like a green olive tree" in the courts of the temple, "his leaf shall not wither." Bishop Horne.

10,405. MANHOOD, Degradation of. Whatever profession a young man may choose, let him take heed lest he merge his profession of a man in his profession of law, or medicine, or journalism, or whatever it be. A man's profession should always be incidental and subordinate to himself, never the chief thing to be said about him. There was once a cynical Frenchman who, recognizing that he had made the mistake we have warned against, had engraved upon his tomb by way of epitaph: "Born a man; died a grocer." Don't let it be said of you that, born a man, you died a tradesman, no matter what the trade may be, liberal or mechanical.

Springfield Union.

10,406. MANNA, Typology of. That wonderful food, "spiritual meat," 1 Cor. 10: 3; "angels' food," Ps. 78, 25; which God rained down from heaven, Ex. 16: 4—a striking type of the inexhaustible store of grace and mercy which comes through Christ. It is computed that to supply the vast camp of Israel with food would require 15,000,000 pounds of manna every week. But this God gave for forty years and it never failed! Oh! the fullness of Christ! He that sent the manna is the manna that he sent—the hidden manna, Rev. 2: 17.

Bowes.

10,407. MANNERS, Importance of. Manners are of more importance than laws. Upon them, in a great measure, the laws depend. The law touches us but here and there, now and then. Manners are what vex or soothe, corrupt or purify, exalt or debase, barbarize or refine us, by a constant, steady, uniform, insensible operation, like that of the air we breathe in. They give their whole form and color to our lives. According to their quality, they aid morals, they supply them, or they totally destroy them.

Burke.

10,408. MANNERS, Influence of. Almost every man can recall scores of cases within his knowledge where pleasing manners have made the fortune of lawyers, doctors, divines, merchants and in short, men in every walk of life. Polished manners have often made scoundrels successful, while the best of men by their hardness and coldness have done themselves incalculable injury—the shell being so rough that the world could not believe there was a precious kernel within. Civility is to a man what beauty is to a woman. It creates an instantaneous impression in his behalf, while the opposite quality excites as quick a prejudice against him. It is a real ornament—the most beautiful dress that man or woman can wear—and worth more as a means of winning favor than the finest clothes and jewels ever worn. The gruffest man loves to be appreciated; and it is oftener the sweet smile of a woman, which we think intended for us alone, than a pair of Juno-like eyes, or "lips that seem on roses fed," that bewitches our heart, and lays us low at the feet of her whom we afterward marry.

Prof. Mathews.

10,409. MANNERS, Neglected. The manners, which are neglected as small things, are often those which decide men for or against you. A slight attention to them would have prevented their ill judgments. There is scarcely anything required to be believed proud, uncivil, scornful, disobliging—and still less to be esteemed quite the reverse of all this.

La Bruyère.

10,410. MANNERS, Striking. Some questions were asked Robert Hall as to Mrs. More's conversation: He said "So far as I can judge, she talks but little on ordinary occasions; and when she speaks, it is generally to utter some sententious remark." A lady present inquired if there was anything particularly striking in Mrs. More's manners. "Nothing striking, ma'am, certainly not. Her manners are too perfectly proper to be striking. Striking manners are bad manners you know, ma'am. She is a perfect lady, and studiously avoids those peculiarities and eccentricities which constitute striking manners."

Gregory.

10,411. MANNERS, Vulgarity of. A vulgar man is captious and jealous; eager and impetuous about trifles. He suspects himself to be slighted, thinks everything that is said meant at him; if the company happens to laugh, he is persuaded they laugh at him; he grows angry and testy, says something very impertinent, and draws himself into a scrape, by showing what he calls a proper spirit, and asserting himself.

Chesterfield.

10,412. MARRIAGE, Advantages of. Marriage has in it less of beauty, but more of safety, than the single life; it hath not more ease, but less danger; it is more merry and more sad; it is fuller of sorrows and fuller of joys; it lies under more burdens, but is supported by all the strengths of love and charity; and those burdens are delightful. Marriage is the mother of the world, and preserves kingdoms, and fills cities and churches, and heaven itself. Celibacy, like the fly in the heart of an apple, dwells in perpetual sweetness, but sits alone, and is confined and dies in singularity; but marriage, like the useful bee, builds a house, and gathers sweetness from every flower, and labors and unites into societies and republics, and sends out colonies, and feeds the world with delicacies, and obeys the king, and keeps order, and exercises many virtues, and promotes the interest of mankind, and is that state of good to which God hath designed the present constitution of the world.

Jeremy Taylor.

10,413. MARRIAGE, Advice Concerning. Rev. Philip Henry used to say, both to his children and others, in reference to marriage, "Keep within the bounds of profession; look at suitability in age, quality, education, temper," etc. He used to observe, from Gen. 2: 18 "I will make him a help-meet for him," that where there is not meetness, there will not be much help. He commonly said to his children, with reference to their choice in marriage, "Please God, and please yourselves, and you shall never displease me;" and greatly blamed those parents who conclude matches for their children without their consent. He sometimes mentioned the saying of a pious woman, who had many daughters, "The care of most people is how to get good husbands for their daughters; but my care is to fit my daughters to be good wives, and then let God provide for them."

10,414. MARRIAGE, Ceremony at. From the animals offered at the nuptial sacrifices to Juno, the goddess of wedlock, the gall was taken away and cast behind the altar, to signify that betwixt the young couple there should be nothing of bitterness or discontent, but that in their stead, sweetness and love should fill up the whole space of their lives.

10,415. MARRIAGE, Childless. Marriage without children is the world without the sun!

Luther.

10,416. MARRIAGE, Circumspection in. When it shall please God to bring thee to man's estate, use great providence and circumspection in choosing thy wife: for from thence will spring all thy future good or evil. And it is an action of life like unto a stratagem of war—wherein a man can err but once. If thy estate be good, match near home and at leisure; if weak, far off and quickly. Inquire diligently of her disposition, and how her parents have been inclined in their youth. Let her not be poor, how noble soever; for a man can buy nothing in the market with gentility. Nor choose a base and uncomely creature altogether for wealth; for it will cause contempt in others, and loathing in thee. Neither make choice of a dwarf or a fool; for, by the one thou shalt beget a race of pigmies; the other will be thy continual disgrace, and it will yrke thee to hear her talk. For thou shalt find it, to thy great grief, that there is nothing more fulsome than a she-fool.

Lord Burleigh.

10,417. MARRIAGE, Counsels for. Many a marriage has commenced, like the morning, red, and perished like a mushroom. Wherefore? Because the married pair neglected to be as agreeable to each other after their union as they were before it. Seek always to please each other, my children, but in doing so keep heaven in mind. Lavish not your love to-day, remembering that marriage has a morrow and again a morrow. Bethink ye, my daughters, what the word house-wife expresses. The married woman is her husband's domestic trust. On her he ought to be able to place his reliance in house and family; to her he should confide the key of his heart and the lock of his store-room. His honor and his home are under her protection, his welfare in her hands. Ponder this! And you, my sons, be true men of honor, and good fathers of your families. Act in such wise that your wives respect and love you. And what more shall I say to you, my children? Peruse diligently the word of God; that will guide you out of storm and dead calm, and bring you safe into port. And as for the rest—do your best!

Frederika Bremer.

10,418. MARRIAGE, Death at the. During the siege of Charleston, Lieutenant de Rochelle, of the Confederate army, was about to be united in marriage to Miss Anna Pickens, the daughter of Ex-Governor Pickens, at the house of Gen. Bonham. As the clergyman was asking the bride if she was ready, a shell fell upon the roof of the house, penetrated to the room where the company were assembled, burst and wounded nine persons, and among the rest, the bride. When order was restored the bride lay motionless upon the carpet. Her betrothed, kneeling and bending over her was weeping bitterly, and trying to staunch the blood that welled from a terrible wound under her left breast. A surgeon came and declared that Miss Pickens had not more than two hours to live. When informed of this the heroic bride said she would die worthy of her intended soldier-husband. He proposed that the ceremony should proceed. She lay upon a sofa, her bridal robes soiled with her own blood, her hair dishevelled, yet very beautiful. The clergyman asked the questions, to which she assented, while the groom held her hand. Another had even now come for her. The foam was upon her lips as the service ended. Within an hour the bridal chamber was the place of mourning, and death had claimed her for his own bride.

10,419. MARRIAGE, Effect of. An idol may be undefined by many accidental causes. Marriage in particular is a kind of counter-apotheosis, or deification inverted. When a man becomes familiar with his goddess, she quickly sinks into a woman.

Addison.

10,420. MARRIAGE, Ill-assorted. Helen was covetous, Paris luxurious. On the other side, Ulysses was prudent, Penelope chaste. Happy, therefore, was the match between the latter; but the nuptials of the former brought an Iliad of miseries as well upon the Greeks as barbarians.

Plutarch.

10,421. MARRIAGE, Love and. Sir Walter Farquhar calling one day on Mr. Pitt, the Premier observed him to be unusually ruffled, and inquired what was the matter. "Why, to tell you the truth," replied Sir Walter, "I am extremely angry with my daughter. She has permitted herself to form an attachment to a young gentleman by no means qualified in point of rank or fortune to be my son-in-law." "Now, let me say one word in the young lady's behalf," returned the minister. "Is the young man you mention of a respectable family?" "He is." "Is he respectable in himself?" "He is." "Has he the manners and education of a gentleman?" "He has." "Has he an estimable character?" "He has." "Why, then, my dear Sir Walter, hesitate no longer. You and I are well acquainted with the delusions of life. Let your daughter follow her own inclinations, since they appear to be virtuous. You have had more opportunities than I have of knowing the value of affection, and ought to respect it. Let the union take place, and I will not be unmindful that I had the pleasure of recommending it." The father consented, the lovers were united, and no one had any cause to regret the event.

10,422. MARRIAGE, Love in. In wedlock to love is a far greater blessing than to be beloved, since it preserves and keeps people from falling into many errors—nay, all those that corrupt and ruin matrimony.

Plutarch.

10,423. MARRIAGE, Pre-determined. A woman went to the Rev. S. Kilpin, of Exeter, to obtain his opinion on the important subject of marriage. She told her tale, and sought advice. Mr. Kilpin guessed how matters stood, and asked if the day for her marriage was not fixed for Tuesday? "O no, sir, not till Thursday," she replied. This is the usual way. People ask others' advice to get an approval of that which they have pre-determined. They treat God in the same way.

10,424. MARRIAGE, Prevention of. A young lady came from England to marry a young man to whom she had been long engaged. Soon after her arrival she learned that he had formed the habit of drinking to excess. She told him she could not marry him. He protested his love and promised to reform. She answered nobly and firmly, "No, I dare not trust my future happiness to a man who has formed such a habit. I came three thousand miles to marry the man I loved, but rather than marry a drunkard I will travel three thousand back again." She kept her word, and saved herself from a lifelong association with a loathsome drunkard.

10,425. MARRIAGE, Proposal of. One day Deacon Marvin, of Puritan fame, mounted his gray horse and rode to the house where Sarah and Betty Lee lived. Without dismounting he called Betty to him, and told her that the Lord had sent him there to marry her. With equal scripturalness she replied, "The Lord's will be done."

10,426. MARRIAGE, Religion in. Eliza Ambert, a young Parisian lady, discarded a gentleman to whom she was to have been married, because he ridiculed religion. Having given him a gentle reproof, he replied, "A man of the world can not be so old-fashioned as to regard God and religion." She replied, "From this moment, sir, when I discover that you do not regard religion, I cease to be yours. He who does not love and honor God can never love his wife constantly and sincerely." And she adhered to her decision.

10,427. MARRIAGE, Responsibility of. Oh! surely marriage is a great and sacred responsibility. It is a bark in which two souls venture out on life's stormy sea, with no aid but their own to help them; the well-doing of their frail vessel must in future solely rest upon themselves; no one can take part either to mar or make their bliss or misery.

J. Hamilton.

10,428. MARRIAGE, Solemnity of. A canny Scotch girl approached her father on the subject of her marriage. He answered "Janet, it is a solemn thing to be married." "Yes, father," said she, "but it is more solemn not to be."

10,429. MARRIAGE, Stimulus of. To tell the truth, however, family and poverty have done more to support me than I have to support them. They have compelled me to make exertions that I hardly thought myself capable of; and often, when on the eve of despairing, they have forced me, like a coward in a corner, to fight like a hero, not for myself, but for my wife and little ones.

Power.

10,430. MARRIAGE, Uncomfortable. A Roman, who had divorced his wife, to the surprise of everybody—a lady sober, chaste, beautiful and rich—was asked the reason of his conduct. Lifting his foot and showing his buskin, he answered, "Is not this a new, handsome, perfect shoe? Yet no man but myself knows where it pinches me."

10,431. MARRIAGE, Unity of. Two persons who have chosen each other out of all the species, with design to be each other's mutual comfort and entertainment, have in that action bound themselves to be good-humored, affable, discreet, forgiving, patient, and joyful, with respect to each other's frailties and perfections, to the end of their lives. The wiser of the two (and it always happens one of them is such) will, for her or his own sake, keep things from outrage with the utmost sanctity. When this union is thus preserved, the most indifferent circumstance administers delight. Their condition is an endless source of new gratifications.

Sir R. Steele

10,432. MARRIAGE, Unsuitable. Marriages are styled matches; yet amongst those many that are married, how few are there that are matched! Husbands and wives are like locks and keys, that rather break than open, except the wards be answerable.

W. Secker.

10,433. MARTYR, Qualities of a. It is not every suffering that makes a martyr; but suffering for the word of God after a right manner; that is, not only for righteousness, but for righteousness' sake; not only for truth, but out of love to truth; not only for God's word, but according to it; to wit: in that holy, humble, meek manner, as the word of God requireth.

Bunyan.

10,434. MARTYRDOM, Joy at. A Dutch martyr, feeling the flames, said, "Ah, what a small pain is this compared with the glory to come!" John Noyes took up a fagot at the fire, and kissing it, said, "Blessed be the time that ever I was born to come to this preferment."

10,435. MARTYRDOM, Novel. Restituta, an African virgin, in the reign of Valerian, was arrested as a Christian at Carthage, and condemned by a judge named Proculus, to be placed in an old boat filled with pitch and other combustibles, and sent adrift. She was bound fast in the boat, the pitch was lighted, the wind blew off shore, and the martyr sped swiftly in her fiery bark, Elijah-like, toward the sea of eternity.

10,436. MARTYRDOM, Passion for. Eulalia was the daughter of a Christian farmer near Barcelona. She was possessed by the spirit of the times, which coveted martyrdom. When she heard that the persecutions were renewed, she cried: "Thanks do I render thee, Lord Jesus Christ, and glory to thy holy name; for now I behold that which I have desired, and believe that with thy help all my desire shall be accomplished." The next night a frail young girl presented herself before the persecutor, defying him and his gods. He ordered her to be whipped, thinking that her ardor would cool, under the suffering. She rejoiced while the lash lacerated her tender flesh. She was stretched upon the little horse, and her sides were torn with hooks and burned with torches. In great agony, but still resolute, she prayed, "Lord Jesus Christ hear my prayer, perfect thy work in me and bid me be numbered among thine elect in the rest of life eternal." Immediately her soul sped to the paradise of God as a dove to its nest. It was ordered that her body should hang upon the rack to be devoured by the birds, A. D. 303.

10,437. MARTYRS, Decision of. In one of the persecutions of the Protestants in Scotland, Margaret Wilson, a girl of eighteen, and a widow of sixty-three, were sentenced to death by drowning. Stakes were driven into the beach sand while the tide was out, and they were fastened to them and left to perish.

10,438. MARTYRS, Endurance of. When three irons were brought for the purpose of fastening Hooper to the stake, he said, "Trouble not yourselves; I doubt not God will give strength sufficient to abide the fire without these bands; notwithstanding, suspecting the weakness of the flesh, although I have assured confidence in God's strength, do as ye think good." In the fire Hooper stood praying, "O Jesus, son of David, have mercy upon me, and receive my soul." And when the fire was spent, he wiped his eyes with his hands, and mildly, but earnestly, entreated that more fire might be brought. After suffering inexpressible torments for three-quarters of an hour, the martyr, bowing forwards, yielded up the spirit, dying as quietly as a child in his bed. The account of Latimer at the stake shows us how the bowed-down frame can be strengthened for its terrible conflict. We are told that "his mortal frame becoming invigorated at the prospect of the near approach of his journey's end, he no longer appeared a withered, crooked old man, his body crazed and bending under the weight of years, but he stood upright, as comely a father as one would desire to behold."

Power.

10,439. MARTYRS, Number of the. According to the calculation of some, about two hundred thousand suffered death in seven years under Pope Julian; no less than a hundred thousand were massacred by the French in the space of three months; the Waldenses who perished amounted to one million; within thirty years, the Jesuits destroyed nine hundred thousand; under the Duke of Alva, thirty-six thousand were executed by the common hangman; a hundred and fifty thousand perished in the Inquisition, and a hundred and fifty thousand by the Irish massacre; besides the vast multitude of whom the world could never be particularly informed, who were proscribed, banished, burned, starved, buried alive, smothered, suffocated, drowned, assassinated, chained to the galleys for life, or immured within the horrid walls of the Bastille, or others of their church or state prisons. According to some, the whole number of persons massacred since the last few centuries amounts to fifty millions!

Arvine.

10,440. MARTYRS, Record of. It was a custom of the churches as early as 150, to keep a record of such of their members as had suffered martyrdom, though only catechumens of the lowest rank. This record covered the main events of their lives, their conversion, their distinguishing virtues, the miracles they had wrought, and the death they suffered. These lives were called "Acts of the Martyrs." A collection of them was made by Eusebius, the father of ecclesiastical history. Their influence was great, attesting the divinity of the Christian religion and leading many to covet the martyr's crown. It was an early custom for the local churches to celebrate the day on which any of its members suffered martyrdom. It was accounted the birth-day of the martyr, on which he entered upon eternal glory. The book containing the record of these days was called the Calendar. From these early records of the different churches the calendar of the Romish church is made up. It is a field rich in illustrative material of a kind that will gain the attention, though not always historically reliable.

10,441. MARTYRS of Vice. The martyrs to vice far exceed the martyrs to virtue, both in endurance and in number. So blinded are we by our passions that we suffer more to be damned than to be saved!

Colton.

10,442. MARTYRS, Victory of the. During the Diocletian persecution, Firmus and Rusticus were thrown into prison for being Christians. Proculus, the bishop, embraced them, and said, "Be strong in the Lord Jesus, and receive me, my brethren, as your fellow in death." They said, "So be it;" and he took his place with them. When the officer came to bring the martyrs before the judge, he found him there, and said, "What does that old man want among these condemned criminals?" Proculus answered, "They are not condemned criminals, but crowned victors of the Lord; and would that I might share their glory." He held up his hands, and was bound and led before the magistrate with Firmus and Rusticus. His application was explained to the judge. He refused him the honor of martyrdom, and ordered that he should be unbound and sent off.

10,443. MASSES, Discouragement with the. A zealous London clergyman went to preach to the neglected around the Seven Dials. He carried his overcoat on his arm and his gold-headed cane in his hand. A crowd was soon gathered of the roughest kind. One said, "May I hold your reverence's cane?" another, his coat; a third, his hat; which offers were accepted. The preaching done, he looked for his property, but it had all disappeared, never to return. He was indignant, and said, "I come here at great personal inconvenience to do you good. One of you has stolen my hat, another my cane, and a third my overcoat. You are a set of ingrates. I wash my hands of all of you. You may die in your sins if you will. I will have no more to do with you."

10,444. MASTER, Ascertaining the. When you see a dog following two men, you know not to which of them he belongs while they walk together; but let them come to a parting road, and one go one way, and the other another way, then you will know which is the dog's master. So at times will you and the world go hand in hand. While a man may have the world, and a religious profession too, we cannot tell which is the man's master, God or the world; but stay till the man comes to a parting road; God calls him this way, and the world calls him that way. Well, if God be his master, he follows religion, and lets the world go; but if the world be his master, then he follows the world and the lusts thereof, and lets God, and conscience, and religion go.

R. Erskine.

10,445. MASTERS, Duty of. As masters must not be fierce, so neither familiar with their servants. Cato was in both the extremes; one while he would eat and drink, and work naked with them; and when he had worn them out with work, sell them like horses in a market. So the Romans in general, at their feast called Saturnalia, did wait on their servants; the servants sat at the table, and the masters served them: yet possibly, before the year was expired, would kill them as dogs. Swinnock.

10,446. MATURITY, Marks of. Some time after Mr. Newton had published his Omicron's letters, and described the three stages of growth in religion—from the blade, the ear, and the full corn in the ear—distinguishing them by the letters A, B, and C, a conceited young minister wrote to Mr. N., telling him that he read his own character accurately drawn in that of C; Mr. N. wrote in reply, that in drawing the character of C, or full maturity, he had forgotten to add, till now, one prominent feature of C's character, namely—that C never knew his own face. Whitcross.

10,447. MATURITY, Signs of. 1. When the corn is near ripe, it bows the head and stoops lower than when it was green. When the people of God are near ripe for heaven, they grow more humble and self-denying than in the days of their first profession. The longer a saint grows in this world, the better he is still acquainted with his own heart and his obligations to God—both which are very humbling things. Paul had one foot in heaven when he called himself the chiefest of sinners and least of saints. 2. When harvest is nigh, the grain is more solid and pithy than ever it was before; green corn is soft and spongy, but ripe corn is substantial and weighty: so it is with Christians; the affections of a young Christian, perhaps, are more fervent and sprightly, but those of a grown Christian are more judicious and solid: their love to Christ abounds more and more in all judgment (Phil. 1; 9). The limbs of a child are more active and pliable; but as he grows up to a perfect state, the parts are more consolidated and firmly knit. The fingers of the old musician are not so nimble, but he hath a more judicious ear in music than in his youth. 3. When corn is dead ripe, it's apt to fall of its own accord to the ground, and there shed; whereby it doth, as it were, anticipate the harvestman, and call upon him to put in the sickle. Not unlike to which are the lookings and longings, the groanings, hastenings of ready Christians to their expected glory: they hasten to the coming of the Lord; or as Montanus more fitly renders it, they hasten the coming of the Lord, i. e. they are urgent and instant in their desires and cries to hasten his coming; their desires sally forth to meet the Lord, they willingly take death by the hand: as the corn bends to the earth, so do these souls to heaven. This shows harvest to be near. Flavel.

10,448. MEANNESS, Height of. About as mean a position as any man can put himself into, is to work all the time for the devil, and look all the time to the Lord for his pay. Clemmens.

10,449. MEANS, Conduct Respecting. I would neither have you be idle in the means, nor make an idol of the means. Though it be the mariner's duty to weigh his anchor, and spread his sails; yet he cannot make his voyage until the winds blow. The pipes will yield no conveyance, unless the springs yield their concurrence. W. Secker.

10,450. MEANS, Endeavors and. There can be no end without means: and God furnishes no means that exempt us from the task and duty of joining our own best endeavors. The original stock, or wild olive-tree of our natural powers, was not given us to be burnt or blighted, but to be grafted on. Coleridge.

10,451. MEANS, Use of. In vain do the inhabitants of London go to their conduits for supply, unless the man who has the master-key turns the water on. And in vain do we think to quench our thirst at ordinances, unless God communicates the living water of his Spirit. Salter.

10,452. MEANS OF GRACE, Interruptions of. Long interruptions in the use of our religious duties will hinder the fruits of them; when there are gaps and strides between the performance of duties, we lose the benefit of them. As it is with our bodies, if a man make a free and a liberal meal, this will not maintain his body to-morrow and the day after; but he must have constant food, else nature languishes and decays; so if you are delighted to-day, but should neglect to be so for many days after, you will lose the benefit of it, and the soul decays and languishes. If the bird leaves her nest for a long space, the eggs chill, and are not fit for production; but when there's a constant incubation, then they bring forth; so, when we leave religious duties for a long space, our affections chill, and grow cold, and are not fit to produce holiness and comfort to our souls; but when we are constant in this work, then shall we find the advantage of it. Slater.

10,453. MEANS OF GRACE, Neglecting the. A man went to live in a town where he built a house for himself and his family. He next provided a cistern for the reception of the water which he knew he must have for the comfort of his household. Day after day he looked anxiously into the cistern, but no water was there, because he had laid no pipes to carry the water from the reservoir to his house. "What a stupid man!" you say, "surely no one ever acted so unwisely." Perhaps Nathan's announcement to David, "Thou art the man;" may be used to you.

10,454. MEAT-OFFERING, Import of the. The meat-offering consisted of flour, oil, and frankincense. In the burnt-offering the life was offered; in the meat-offering, the fruits. The life God claimed, but the fruits were given to man. Life represents what all owe to God; the fruits of the earth what we owe to man. "In the burnt-offering, the surrender of life represents the fulfillment of man's duty to God; in the meat-offering, the gift of corn and oil represents the fulfillment of man's duty to his neighbor. The burnt-offering is the perfect fulfillment of the laws of the first table; the meat-offering, the perfect fulfillment of the second." The latter was joined with the former; as, "the burnt-offering and its meat-offering." Both were necessary for completeness of symbol. The fine flour of the meat-offering symbolizes Christ, the true "Bread of Life," bruised for us. The oil of the meat-offering poured upon the flour is a type of the Holy Ghost poured upon man. "The bruised corn and the oil are always together." The frankincense of the meat-offering, when burned, sent forth a delightful perfume, and is a type of the abiding fragrance of the sacrifice of Christ. The salt required to season the meat-offering represents the incorruptibility, perpetuity, and saving power of Christ.

10,455. MEDDLESOMENESS Punished. I saw two men fighting together till a third, casually passing by, interposed himself to part them; the blows of one fell on his face, of the other on his back, of both on his body, being the screen betwixt the fiery anger of the two fighters. Some of the beholders laughed at him as well enough served for meddling with matters which belonged not to him.

Thomas Fuller.

10,456. MEDDLING, Danger of. A monkey was sitting up in a high tree, when, seeing some fishermen laying their nets in a river, he watched what they were doing. The men had no sooner set their nets, and retired a short distance to their dinner, than the monkey came down from the tree, thinking that he would try his hand at the same sport. But in attempting to lay the nets, he got so entangled in them that, being well nigh choked, he was forced to exclaim, "This serves me right; for what business had I, who know nothing of fishing, to meddle with such tackle as this."

Æsop.

10,457. MEDIATION, Analogy of. The whole analogy of nature removes all imagined presumption against the notion of a "Mediator between God and man." For we find all living creatures are brought into the world, and their life in infancy is preserved by the instrumentality of others; and every satisfaction of it, some way or other, is bestowed by the like means.

Butler.

10,458. MEDIATION, Conditions of. A bridge flung across the river must touch both shores, or it could not be a medium of passage; and it seems but the language of fair analogy to say that a Mediator between God and man must, in the mystery of his being, touch both natures, or he could not be the medium of intercourse. The yearnings of sinful but penitent humanity find voice in the ancient cry, "O that there were a daysman between us, to lay his hands on both!" We need an intervening person who can reach up to heaven and down to earth; lay a hand of divinity on God, and a hand of humanity on man; for how could he who is only God mediate between God and man; and how could he who is only man mediate between man and God? C. Stanford.

10,459. MEDIATION, Successful. Rev. Thomas Collins possessed a strong sympathy for the little children. One little fellow, the son of his host, had fallen under the displeasure of his parents, and had been sent to bed. Mr. C. says he went away and prayed for him, and then asked permission of his parents to go and visit him in his room. The request was granted. He told the lad of his sin, and of the sorrow it caused him. That it not only separated him from his friends, but also from God. The little fellow wept much, and wanted his parents called that he might ask their pardon. The mediation was accepted, and he was restored to favor. Some hours after, when no eye could see, he clasped Mr. Collins' hand, and pressed it to his lips. Mr. Collins says, "I felt his meaning, and it moved my heart much. There rose within me memory of the woman who came behind the Lord, and wept upon his feet."

10,460. MEDIATOR: Examples. Joseph's brethren tried to make their brother's steward their friend, to come between him and them, Gen. 43: 19-24. Israel desiring Moses to speak for them with God, Exod. 20: 18-21. Moses standing in the breach, Ps. 106: 23. Aaron standing "between the dead and the living," to turn away the plague, Num. 16: 48; see also the design of the Levitical service, "that there be no wrath any more upon the children of Israel," Num. 18: 5. Jonathan coming between Saul, his father, and David, his friend, 1 Sam. 19: 4-7. Abigail intercepting the wrath of David from coming upon Nabal, 1 Sam. 25: 14-35. Joab, by his skillful policy, restoring Absalom to his father's favor, 2 Sam. 14. Blastus, the king's chamberlain, interceding between Herod and the men of Tyre and Sidon, Acts 12: 20. Bowen.

10,461. MEDIATOR, Royal. Sometimes there were more kings than one at Sparta, who governed by joint authority. A king was occasionally sent to some neighboring state in character of a Spartan ambassador. Did he, when so sent, cease to be a king of Sparta because he was an ambassador? No, he did not divest himself of his regal dignity, but only added to it that of public deputation. So Christ, in becoming man, did not cease to be God; but, though he ever was, and still continued to be, King of the whole creation, acted as the voluntary Servant and Messenger of the Father.

Illus. of Truth.

10,462. MEDITATION, Advantage of. Scripture truth becomes more profitable by meditation. The promises are flowers, growing in the paradise of scripture; meditation, like the bee, sucks out the sweetness of them. The promises are of no use or comfort to us till they are meditated upon. For as the roses hanging in the garden may give a fragrant perfume, yet their sweet water is distilled only by the fire, so the promises are sweet in reading over, but the water of these roses—the spirit and quintessence of the promises—is distilled into the soul only by meditation. The incense, when it is pounded and beaten, smells sweetest. Meditating on a promise, like the beating of the incense, makes it most odoriferous and pleasant. The promises may be compared to a golden mine, which then only enricheth when the gold is dug out. By holy meditation we dig out that spiritual gold which lies hid in the mine of the promise, and so we come to be enriched. Cardan saith, “There is no precious stone but hath some hidden virtue in it.” They are called “precious promises.” (2 Peter 1: 4.) When they are applied by meditation, then their virtue appears, and they become precious indeed. T. Watson.

10,463. MEDITATION, Benefits of. By meditation we ransack our deep and false hearts, find out our secret enemies, buckle with them, expel them, arm ourselves against their re-entrance. By this we make use of all good means, fit ourselves to all good duties; by this we desecr our weaknesses, obtain redress, prevent temptations, cheer up our solitariness, temper our occasions of delight, get more light into our knowledge, more heat to our affections, more life to our devotion. By this we see our Saviour with Stephen, we talk with God as Moses did, and by this we are ravished with blessed Paul into Paradise, and see that heaven we are loath to leave, but cannot utter. Bp. Hall.

10,464. MEDITATION, Excellency of. Meditation is a soul-fattening duty; it is a grace-strengthening duty, it is a duty-crowning duty. Gerson calls meditation the nurse of prayer; Jerome calls it his paradise; Basil calls it the treasury where all the graces are locked up; Theophylact calls it the very gate and portal by which we enter into glory; and Aristotle, though a heathen, placeth felicity in the contemplation of the mind. You may read much and hear much, yet without meditation you will never be excellent, you will never be eminent Christians. Brooks.

10,465. MEDITATION, Use of. An old divine says, “Meditation is to the sermon what the harrow is to the seed—it covers those truths which else might have been picked or washed away.”

10,466. MEEKNESS, Biblical. There are many kinds of meekness, all commended as marks of a Christian spirit: The meekness of love, 1 Cor. 13: 5, 7. The meekness of wisdom, James 2: 13. The meekness of teaching, 2 Tim. 2: 25. The meekness of self-restraint, Exod. 23: 4-9; Prov. 6: 32; 19: 11. The meekness of long-forbearing, Prov. 28: 15. Examples of meekness are Joseph, Moses, David, and Christ who when reviled returned it not, and when crucified prayed for his murderers. Rev. 5: 8.—“A Lamb, as it had been slain;” ἀρνίον, a little or delicate lamb. It is singular to find this word, except in John 21, peculiar to the Apocalypse, in which it refers twenty-eight times to the Lamb of God; why does not seem certain, unless to put forward more prominently his meek and gentle nature.

Bowes.

10,467. MEEKNESS, Christian. By the universal voice of his army, Godfrey of Bouillon was saluted king of Jerusalem, upon taking it from the Saracens at the end of the first crusade. A crown of gold was also brought him, sparkling with jewels. He set it aside, saying, “It is most unfit for me, who am a mortal man, a servant and a sinner, to be crowned with gems and gold, where Christ, the Son of God, who made heaven and earth, was crowned with thorns.”

10,468. MEEKNESS, Importance of. Meekness is one of the rarest of virtues. It is more rare than pearls, or than opals, or than diamonds. The gold of Ophir is not to be mentioned by the side of it. Meekness is like the sum of all the rays of light which shine upon the earth, and give to things the qualities which they possess in our sight. It is the substance of the faculties of a man raised up in sweetness and power, and shining out as the sun shines in summer days, with such gentleness as to nourish, and not to singe, the tenderness flowers. Beecher.

10,469. MELANCHOLY Cured. A young man conceived himself to be dead, and desired to be buried before his flesh became offensive. His funeral was held; and on the way to the grave some fellows met the train, and inquired who they were burying. Being told, they said his friends were well rid of him, for if he had lived he would surely have come to the gallows. The listening corpse, now indignant, answered, “You do me great wrong.” They only reviled him the more. The corpse, now lively enough, sprang forth, clad in his shroud, resolved to punish his maligners. In the chase which ensued, his delusion vanished, and he returned home a cured man.

10,470. MEMORIAL, Lasting. Sir Bernard Burke says: “In 1850, a pedigree research led me to pay a visit to the village of Finderne. I sought for the ancient hall; not a stone remained to tell where it had stood. I entered the church; not a single record of a Finderne was there! I accosted a villager, hoping to glean some stray traditions of the Findernes. ‘Findernes!’ said he, ‘we have no Findernes here; but we have something that once belonged to them, we have Findernes’ flowers.’ ‘Show them me,’ I replied; and the old man led me into a field which still retained faint traces of terraces and foundations. ‘There,’ said he, pointing to a bank of ‘garden flowers grown wild,’ ‘there are the Findernes’ flowers, brought by Sir Geoffrey from the Holy Land; and do what we will, they will never die!’”

10,471. MEMORY, Acquisitive. The power of acquisition is usually strongest in early life, is materially diminished in middle age, and is still less in old age. Theodore Parker in youth could repeat a hymn from once hearing it read. He could recite several hundred lines of a poem at once. In mature years, his biographer says, he acquired one hundred and fifty lines of blank verse by a single reading, so as to be able to repeat it. His ease of acquisition seems to have been confined to poetical compositions, and is an exception to the above law.

10,472. MEMORY, Activity of. Joseph Scaliger committed to memory in twenty-one days the whole of Homer's works, the Iliads, containing thirty-one thousand six hundred and seventy verses, and the Odysseys about the same.

10,473. MEMORY, Bad. A gentlemen had so bad a memory, and so circumscribed, that he scarce knew what he read. A friend knowing this, lent him the same book to read seven times over; and being asked afterwards how he liked it, replied, "I think it is an admirable production; but the author sometimes repeats the same things." Thiébault.

10,474. MEMORY, Definition of. Memory is the cabinet of imagination, the treasury of reason, the registry of conscience, and the council-chamber of thought.—Basile.—It is the treasure-house of the mind, wherein the monuments thereof are kept and preserved. Fuller.

10,475. MEMORY, Exact. Carneades, a Grecian, had such a retentive memory, that he was able to repeat the entire contents of a library with as much ease as if he was reading out of the books themselves.

10,476. MEMORY, Good. I could repeat two thousand names in the same order as they were spoken, and when as many as were scholars to my master brought each of them several verses to him, so that the number of them amounted to more than two hundred, beginning at the last I could recite them orderly unto the first; nor was my memory only apt to receive such things as I would commit to it, but was also a faithful preserver of all that I had entrusted it with. Seneca.

10,477. MEMORY, Method with. Memory is like a purse; if it be overfull, that it cannot be shut, all will drop out of it. Marshal thy notions into handsome method. A man will carry twice more weight, trussed and packed up in bundles, than when it lies untowardly flapping and hanging about his shoulders. Fuller.

10,478. MEMORY, Pictures of. A painter, famous for his delineations of natural scenery, domestic life and battle scenes, was compelled, by ill-health, to give over his work and seek rest in the country. There he grew worse, and in his delirium he described the several scenes and groups he had studied and portrayed. His room became a chamber of imagery on whose walls all the studies and paintings of his life re-appeared. What he had contemplated, conceived and forgotten, reappeared under the influence of disease. What pictures of earthly scenes will the day of judgment bring before the mind, which will justify the decision of the righteous Judge!

10,479. MEMORY, Pollution of. Almost twenty years since I heard a profane jest, and still remember it. How many pious passages of far later date have I forgotten! It seems my soul is like a filthy pond wherein fish die soon and frogs live long. Lord, raze this profane jest out of my memory. Leave not a letter thereof behind, lest my corruption (an apt scholar) guess it out again; and be pleased to write some pious meditation in the place thereof. And grant, Lord, for the time to come, (because such bad guests are easier kept out), that I may be careful not to admit what I find so difficult to expel. T. Fuller.

10,480. MEMORY, Powerful. A young Corsican became noted for his power of memory. The judge proposed a test to which he instantly consented. He dictated Latin, Greek and all kinds of barbarous names, not any one of them having any dependence on the other. He became weary with dictating, and the boy tired writing them off. He then told the young man he would be satisfied if he could repeat half of what had been given. In a few seconds he began, and repeated the names in the very same order they were set down, without any hesitation. Then beginning at the last, he recited them all backward to the first. Then he named the first, third, fifth, and in that order repeated all. His memory was so retentive that he could repeat any thing entrusted to it a year after, with perfect accuracy.

10,481. MEMORY, Purifying the. A minister conversing with a woman who was washing wool in a sieve by dipping it in a stream, she said, "I hope I shall have reason to bless God for you to all eternity. I heard you preach at W—, some years back; and hope your sermon was the means of doing me great good." "Indeed, I rejoice to hear it; pray what was the subject?" said he. "Ah, sir, I can't recollect that; mine is such a bad head." "How then can it have done you good, if you don't even remember it?" "Sir, my poor mind is like this sieve; the sieve doesn't hold the water, but it runs through and cleanses the wool: my memory does not keep the words, but, blessed be God, he made them touch the heart: and now I don't love sin; I go whenever I can to hear of Jesus Christ; and I beg him every day to wash me in his own blood."

10,482. MEMORY, Retentive. Porson, when a boy at Eton school, going up for a lesson one day, was accosted by a boy in the same form, "Porson, what have you got there?" "Horace." "Let me look at it." Porson handed the book to the boy, who, pretending to return it, dexterously substituted another in its place, with which Porson proceeded. Being called on by the master, he read and construed Carm. i. x. very regularly. Observing the class to laugh, the master said, "Porson, you seem to me to be reading on one side of the page while I am looking at the other; pray whose edition have you?" Porson hesitated. "Let me see it," rejoined the master; who, to his great surprise, found it to be an English Ovid. Porson was ordered to go on, which he did easily, correctly, and promptly to the end of the ode.

10,483. MEMORY, Sanctified When Alexander the Great had overthrown Darius, king of Persia, he took among the spoils a most rich cabinet full of the choicest jewels that were in all the world; upon which there rose a dispute before him, to what use he should put the cabinet; and every one having spent his judgment according to his fancy, the king himself concluded that he would keep the cabinet, to be a treasury to lay up the books of Homer in, which were his greatest joy and delight. A sanctified memory is a rich cabinet full of the choicest thoughts of God; it is that rich treasury wherein a Christian is still a-laying up more and more precious thoughts of God, and more and more high and holy thoughts of God, and more and more honorable and noble thoughts of God, and more and more awful and reverent thoughts of God, and more and more sweet and comfortable thoughts of God, and more and more tender and compassionate thoughts of God, etc.

Brooks.

10,484. MEMORY, Test of. Voltaire was to read to Frederick of Prussia a poem of considerable length which he had just composed. After he had finished reading, the king remarked only, "That poem is stolen; I have heard it before." "That is impossible," said the poet. Frederick said he could prove it, and he sent for a man who, to the great confusion of Voltaire, repeated the poem word for word. The person had been placed behind a screen, and from once hearing the poem was able to repeat it correctly.

Dr. McCosh.

10,485. MEMORY, Utilizing the. The best way to remember a thing is thoroughly to understand it, and often to recall it to mind. By reading continually with great attention, and never passing a passage without understanding and considering it well, the memory will be stored with knowledge; and things will occur at times when we want them, though we can never recollect the passages or from whence we draw our ideas.

Trusler.

10,486. MEMORY Well Used. It is said of Rev. Thomas Fuller, that he could dictate to five several writers at the same time on as many different subjects. When in the company of a committee of commissioners, they praised him for his great memory. He said it was true that fame had given him a good memory, and he would like to give them an example of it. The committee were delighted, laid aside their business, and asked him to begin. "Gentlemen," he said, "your worshipps have thought fit to sequester a poor but honest parson, my neighbor, from his living, and have committed him to prison. He has a large family of children, his circumstances are indifferent; if you will please to release him out of prison, and restore him to his living, I will never forget the kindness as long as I live." The jest was received with applause, and the parson restored to his living.

10,487. MEN, Christ's Image in. We all know by a recent discovery—the calotype and the daguerreotype—that light writes itself; that the light reflected from an object writes that object by a mysterious power upon the susceptible page that is exposed to it. So we, looking to Christ, and receiving from him, as he is revealed in the Bible, the glorious beams that are radiated from his character, shall have impressed upon our living selves the very likeness of Christ, till men can see Christ in us, and Christ on us, and that we are, indeed, what we should be,—followers of him.

Dr. Cumming.

10,488. MEN, Classes of. It is with men as with animals—you may divide them into two classes, vertebrated and invertebrated. Animals remarkable for dignity, and elevation in the scale of existence, are vertebrated or backboneed; their backbones give them eminence and place: all animals to which we apply the term "inferior" want this backbone, and they can only crawl or creep, because they are invertebrated. We have often thought, when looking among men, that this is the great distinction we notice between them—the successful and the unsuccessful, the principled and the unprincipled, the true and the false. We recoil instinctively from the touch of the spider and the wasp, the leech and the slug; and we recoil as instinctively from that large class of persons of whom these little creatures are a sort of moral analogy, because they have no backbone. They can sting sometimes; they can weave a brittle web sometimes; they leave here and there a slimy trail; they can draw blood; and the instincts of society and humanity recoil from them. They have no backbone.

Paxton Hood.

10,489. MEN, Insane. Every man is a divinity in disguise, a god playing the fool. It seems as if heaven had sent its insane angels into our world as to an asylum. And here they will break out into their native music, and utter at intervals the words they have heard in heaven; then the mad fit returns, and they moan and wallow like dogs!

Emerson.

10,490. MEN, Rarity of God. If man alone is a wonder, the good and virtuous man must certainly be a double one. He is such a rarity that Diogenes thought the sun at noon scarce a sufficient light to make his discovery by, when he went up and down in quest of such a one, whimsically carrying a candle and a lamp to assist his discovery. "A good man is neither quickly made nor easily understood; for like the Phoenix of Arabia, there is possibly one of them born in the space of five hundred years."

Wanley.

10,491. MEN, Reliable. Napoleon, in his confidential conversations with me, drew a distinction between a man of honor and a conscientious man, giving his preference to the former; because, he said, we know what to expect from a man who is bound simply and purely by his words and his engagements, while in the other case we depend on his opinions and feelings, which may vary. "He does that which he thinks he ought to do, or which he supposes is best. Thus," he added, "my father-in-law, the Emperor of Austria, has done that which he believes conducive to the inter est of his people. He is an honest man, a conscientious man, but not a man of honor. You, for example, if the enemy had invaded France and stood upon the heights of Montmartre, you believe, perhaps with reason, that the welfare of your country commands you to desert me, and you do it; you may be a good Frenchman, a brave man, a conscientious man, but you are not a man of honor." Marmont.

10,492. MEN, Three Classes of. There are but three classes of men: the retrograde, the stationary, and the progressive. Lavater.

10,493. MEN Throw Away. Kings who affect to be familiar with their companions make use of men as they do of oranges; they take oranges to extract their juice, and when they are well-sucked they throw them away. Take care the king does not do the same to you; be careful that he does not read all your thoughts; otherwise he will throw you aside to the back of his chest, as a book of which he has read enough. Alva.

10,494. MEN, Underground. There was never a ray of starlight in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky: only the red glare of torches ever lights its walls. So there are many men whose minds are all underground, and unlighted save by the torches of selfishness and passion. Teachers' Treasury.

10,495. MEN, Variation among. When King Antiochus was coming upon Greece with great forces, and all men trembled at the report of his numbers and equipage, T. Quinctius told the Achaians this story: "Once I dined with a friend at Chalcis; and when I wondered at the variety of the dishes, said my host, 'All these are pork; only in dressing and sauces they differ.' And, therefore, be not you amazed at the king's forces when you hear talk of spearmen, and men-at-arms, and choice footmen, and horse-archers, for all these are but Syrians, with some little difference in their weapons."

10,496. MERCIES, Acknowledgment of. What would a blind man give to see the pleasant rivers, and meadows, and flowers, and fountains, that we have met with! I have been told, that if a man that was born blind, could obtain to have his sight for but only one hour during his whole life, and should, at the first opening of his eyes, fix his sight upon the sun when it was in its full glory, either at the rising or setting of it, he would be so transported and amazed, and so admire the glory of it, that he would not willingly turn his eyes from that first ravishing object, to behold all the other various beauties this world could present to him. And this, and many other like blessings, we enjoy daily; and for most of them, because they be so common, most men forget to pay their praises; but let not us, because it is a sacrifice so pleasing to him that made the sun, and us, and still protects us, and gives us flowers, and showers, and meat, and content. Isaak Walton.

10,497. MERCIES, Computation of. An old divine compares man to a merchant's agent, who has a great store of goods and money in his hands, but is so busy that he can get no time to settle with his principal. The Christian must consider his mercies, and will soon feel that he can never pay the debt of gratitude due to God.

10,498. MERCIES, Continuous. It is by no means pleasant when reading an interesting article in your magazine to find yourself pulled up short by the ominous words, "to be continued." Yet they are words of good cheer if applied to other matters. What a comfort to remember that the Lord's mercy and loving-kindness is to be continued! Much as we have experienced in the long years of our pilgrimage, we have by no means outlived eternal love. Providential goodness is an endless chain, a stream which follows the pilgrim, a wheel perpetually revolving, a star for ever shining, and leading us to the place where he is who was once a babe in Bethlehem. All the volumes which record the doings of divine grace are but part of a series to be continued. Spurgeon.

10,499. MERCIES, God's. The air is not so full of motes, of atoms, as the church is of mercies; and as we can suck in no part of air but we take in those motes, those atoms; so here, in the congregation, we cannot suck in a word from the preacher, we cannot speak, we cannot sigh a prayer to God, but that whole breath is made of mercy. Dr. Donne.

10,500. MERCIES Remembered. Bishop Hut-ton was traveling between Wensleydale and Ingleton, when he dismounted and retired to a particular spot, where he knelt down and continued some time in prayer. On his return, one of his attendants inquired his reason for this act. The bishop informed him, that when he was a poor boy, he traveled over that cold and bleak mountain without shoes or stockings, and that he remembered disturbing a cow on the identical spot where he prayed, that he might warm his feet and legs on the place where she had lain. His feelings of gratitude would not allow him to pass the place without presenting his thanksgivings to God for his mercies to him.

10,501. MERCIES, Yearly. An English preacher takes a hungry man into a hall with plates laid for 1,460 persons. Here are supplies of all kinds in bountiful profusion. The man would like to sit down at one of these plates. "Ah!" says his guide, "would you be thankful? then you shall have your breakfast, something quite as good as anything here; only just wait until I tell you something. You can't have these, for they are the ghosts of what you have already had. They are the 365 breakfasts, the 365 dinners, the 365 teas, and the 365 suppers you had last year. They make 1,460 in all." "You don't mean to say I had all those?" "Yes; and many baskets full of odds and ends beside." And now, we will dismiss our friend to eat his meal, we trust with some new feelings dawning upon him of what heaps of mercies he has had even in this one matter of food. Buck.

10,502. MERCY, Abuse of. It is said of the original Indians of Florida, that when they could not pay their debts, they took a short method of settling the account, by knocking their creditors on the head. Sinners in a state of unregeneracy, though partly sensible that they do not keep the law of God, yet think to knock God's justice on the head, by pleading absolute mercy. Salter.

10,503. MERCY, Door of. The door of mercy has hinges, and it may be shut, and then locked with the adamantine key of justice.

Dr. Raleigh.

10,504. MERCY, Emblems of Divine. The rainbow, Gen. 9:13; Ezek. 1:28; Rev. 4:3; 10:1; the divinely appointed token of the covenant of mercy, beautiful in its simplicity, blessed in its perpetuity, the bright bow formed on the dark cloud. The mercy-seat or propitiatory, Exod. 25:17-22; the lid of the ark, made of pure gold, of one piece with the cherubim; the appointed meeting-place of Jehovah with his people. A beautiful temple, "built up forever," Ps. 89:2; rising, in spite of opposition, stone by stone, to perfection and completion. A father's pity, Ps. 103:13. A pioneer or harbinger, Ps. 89:16; going before to mark out the way. A girdle that compasses the righteous man on every side, Ps. 32:10. A prop or support, Ps. 94:18. Bowes.

10,505. MERCY, God's. We must tell concerning God's mercy as we do concerning God himself, that he is that great Fountain of which we all drink, and the great Rock of which we all eat, and on which we all dwell, and under whose shadow we all are refreshed. God's mercy is all this; and we can only draw the great lines of it, and reckon the constellations of our hemisphere, instead of telling the number of the stars. We only reckon what we feel and what we live by; and though there be, in every one of these lines of life, enough to engage us forever to do God service, and to give him praises, yet it is certain there are very many mercies of God on us, and towards us, and concerning us, which we neither feel nor see nor understand as yet; but yet we are blessed by them, and are preserved and secure; and we shall know them when we come to give God thanks in the festivities of an eternal Sabbath.

Jeremy Taylor.

10,506. MERCY, Instinctive Cry for. In the battle of Bull Run, a wounded soldier, as he fell, cried, "God have mercy on my soul." The cry became contagious. One after another took it up till the chorus became general in that section, "God have mercy upon my soul." Irreligious men repeated it, and dated their religious experience from it. O, that this cry might sweep the land!

10,507. MERCY, Limitless. The freshness of grace is set forth by the expressions used, as, Isa. 55:1; 52:3, buying "without money and without price;" redeemed when "without strength," Rom. 5:6 (the very word used in Greek for the "impotent folk" and "the impotent man," John 5:3, 7); without limit on God's part, to "whosoever will call on the name of the Lord," Joel 2:32; "whosoever will take of the water of life freely," Rev. 22:18. Richard Baxter used to say, "I conceive there could be no word so strong as the 'whosoever' in the gospel offer. If God had put my own name in his word, and made it an express revelation that Richard Baxter might be saved, it would not have been half so strong, because there might have been many Richard Baxters, and how could I be certified that it was for me especially the word was meant? But when he has said 'whosoever will,' then I can have no doubt. The word is so inclusive, that none need fear exclusion; so gracious, that none need apprehend rejection." Bowes.

10,508. MERCY, Question of. A South Sea Islander of the baser sort went to the missionary with a most important question. With much emotion he said, "You know I am a wicked man. Shame covers my face, and holds me back. To-day I have broke through all fear. I want to know, is there room for me? Can I expect mercy?" When asked how such thoughts came into his mind, he replied, "I was at work putting up my garden fence. Greatly wearied, I sat down on a little bank to rest, and said within myself. All this garden, and death for my soul; all this great property, and death forever! Oh, what shall I do?" He was instructed more perfectly, and God answered his question with the assurance of salvation.

10,509. MERCY, Rejection of. It is horrible pride for a beggar to starve rather than to take alms at a rich man's hands—a malefactor rather to choose a halter than a pardon from his gracious prince; but here is one infinitely surpassing both—a soul pining and perishing in sin, and yet rejecting the mercy of God and the helping hand of Christ to save him.

Gurnall.

10,510. MERCY, Shoreless Ocean of. O this mercy of God! I am told it is an ocean. Then I place on it four swift sailing craft, with compass, and charts, and choice rigging, and skillful navigators; and I tell them to launch away, and discover for me the extent of this ocean. That craft puts out in one direction, and sails to the north; this to the south; this to the east; this to the west. They crowd on all their canvass, and sail ten thousand years, and one day come up the harbor of heaven; and I shout to them from the beach, "Have you found the shore?" and they answer, "No shore to God's mercy!" Swift angels, dispatched from the throne, attempt to go across it. For a million years they fly and fly; but then they come back and fold their wings at the foot of the throne, and cry, "No shore; no shore to God's mercy!" Mercy! Mercy! Mercy! I sing it. I preach it. I pray it. Here I find a man bound hand and foot to the devil; but with one stroke of the hammer of God's truth the chains fall off, and he is free forever. Mercy! Mercy! Mercy! There is no depth it cannot fathom. There is no height it cannot scale. There is no infinity it cannot compass.

Talmage.

10,511. MERCY, Stores of. God hath stores of mercy lying by him; his exchequer is never empty; he keeps mercy for thousands (Exod. 34: 7), in a readiness to deal it upon thousand millions of sins, as well as millions of persons. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all that were before, have not wasted it; and if God were to proclaim his name again, it is the same still, for his name as well as his essence is unchangeable.

Charnock.

10,512. MERCY, Yielding to. I heard once a story from a soldier, who, with his company, had laid siege against a fort, that so long as the besieged were persuaded their foes would show them no favor, they fought like madmen; but when they saw one of their fellows taken and received to favor, they all came tumbling down from their fortress and delivered themselves into their enemies' hands. I am persuaded, did men believe that there is grace and willingness in the heart of Christ to save sinners, as the word imports there is, they would come tumbling into his arms; but Satan has blinded their minds that they cannot see this thing.

Bunyan.

10,513. MERIT, Absence of all. We must be emptied of self before we can be filled with grace; we must be stripped of our rags before we can be clothed with righteousness; we must be unclothed that we may be clothed; wounded, that we may be healed; killed, that we may be made alive; buried in disgrace, that we may rise in holy glory. These words, "sown in corruption, that we may be raised in incorruption; sown in dishonor, that we may be raised in glory; sown in weakness, that we may be raised in power," are as true of the soul as the body. To borrow an illustration from the surgeon's art, the bone that is set wrong must be broken again, in order that it may be set aright. I press this truth on your attention. It is certain, that a soul filled with self has no room for God; and, like the inn of Bethlehem, given to lodge, crowded with meaner guests, a heart pre-occupied by pride and her godless train has no chamber within which Christ may be born "in us the hope of glory."

Dr. Guthrie.

10,514. MERIT, Assumption of. Was ever invalid so bereft of sense as to say, "When I am somewhat better, when this fever burns less fierce, this pulse beats more calm, this running ulcer has a less loathsome and offensive discharge, I will repair to the hospital?" But such is their folly who intend, when they are holier, to go to Jesus. Go to him as you are; just as you are. The worse your case, the higher in a sense may be your assurance of an immediate salvation. Yours is the hope of the maimed and bleeding soldier, whom kind comrades bear from the deadly trench. He knows that the worse his wound the more confidently he can reckon on the surgeon's earliest care; and that from the very couch, where noblest birth or highest rank lies stretched under some less serious injury, that man of humanity, image of the great Physician, will turn to kneel by the pallet of a poor orphan boy, the meanest private, a mutilated enemy, to tie the severed vessel, and stem the tide that pours his life's blood upon the ground.

10,515. MERIT, Baseless. A ship bound for Australia sprung a leak in a storm. On board was a very nervous man, who, the captain feared, would communicate panic to the other passengers. As he came to inquire if their condition was so alarming, the captain confirmed his fears, but told him to say nothing of what he knew, and asked him to help save the ship by holding a rope till he should be released. He stood faithfully at his post, holding the rope tightly, though much wearied, till the storm was over, and he was discharged. He expected to receive the public thanks of passengers and crew for saving the ship, and hinted as much to the captain. He answered, "What, sir, do you think you saved the vessel? I gave you that rope to hold to keep you engaged, that you might not be in such a feverish state of alarm." Men vastly over-estimate their works. They are too insignificant to merit mention, and generally serve only to keep us out of mischief. Whatever we do, we can never merit heaven or save ourselves.

10,516. MERIT, Rewards of. I know not why we should delay our tokens of respect to those who deserve them, until the heart that our sympathy could have gladdened has ceased to beat. As men cannot read the epitaphs inscribed upon the marble that covers them, so the tombs that we erect to virtue often only prove our repentance, that we neglected it when with us.

Bulwer-Lytton.

10,517. METHOD, Importance of. From the cotter's hearth, or the workshop of the artisan, to the palace or the arsenal, the first merit, that which admits neither substitute nor equivalent, is that everything is in its place. Where this charm is wanting, every other merit either loses its name, or becomes an additional ground of accusation and regret. Of one by whom it is eminently possessed, we say proverbially, he is like clockwork. The resemblance extends beyond the point of regularity, and yet falls short of the truth. Both do, indeed, at once divide and announce the silent and otherwise indistinguishable lapse of time. But the man of methodical industry and honorable pursuits does more: he realizes its ideal divisions, and gives a character and individuality to its moments. If the idle are described as killing time, he may be justly said to call it into life and moral being while he makes it the distinct object not only of the consciousness, but of the conscience. He organizes the hours, and gives them a soul; and that, the very essence of which is to fleet away, and evermore to have been, he takes up into his own permanence and communicates to it the imperishableness of a spiritual nature.

Coleridge.

10,518. METHOD, Slaves to. Of method this may be said—if we make it our slave, it is well; but it is bad if we are slaves to method. A gentleman once told me, that he made it a regular rule to read fifty pages every day of some author or other, and on no account to fa!

short of that number, nor to exceed it. I silently set him down for a man who might have taste to read something worth writing, but who never could have genius himself to write anything worth reading. Colton.

10,519. METHOD, Want of. Irregularity and want of method are only supportable in men of great learning or genius, who are often too full to be exact, and therefore choose to throw down their pearls in heaps before the reader, rather than be at the pains of stringing them. Addison.

10,520. METHODISM, Influence of. After the establishment of the American Republic, the institution of Methodism is the greatest event of the eighteenth century, and of all the men who lived in that century there is no one whose influence upon after ages equals that of John Wesley. Of the seventy-five millions who speak the English tongue, about three and a half millions are members of the Methodist Church; four millions more are pupils in their Sunday-schools; and the regular attendants upon Methodist worship cannot be less than as many more—fifteen millions in all. Thus, one-fifth of all who speak our language are directly moulded, for this life and the life to come, by Methodism. We doubt if any other Protestant communion really numbers as many. The established churches of England and Germany indeed nominally include more; but in counting their numbers all who do not formally belong to other communions are put down as Episcopalians or Lutherans. Fully two-thirds of the Methodists are in the United States. To Methodism more than to any other one thing it is owing that our Western States grew up into civilization without passing through a period of semi-barbarism. Southey expressed no more than the bare truth when he said, "I consider Wesley as the most influential mind of the last century—the man who will have produced the greatest effects centuries or perhaps millenniums hence, if the present race of men shall continue so long." This judgment is coming to be acknowledged. Within a few months past a site has been appropriated in Westminster Abbey for a monument to John Wesley. Of all the great Englishmen there commemorated there is no one more worthy of a place. Dr. A. H. Guernsey.

10,521. METHODISM, Preservation of. I asked the Rev. John Wesley, in 1783, what must be done to keep Methodism alive when he was dead, to which he immediately answered: "The Methodists must take heed to their doctrine, their experience, their practice, and their discipline. If they attend to their doctrines only, they will make the people Antinomians; if to the experimental part of religion only, they will make them enthusiasts; if to the practical part only, they will make them Pharisees; and if they do not attend to their discipline, they will be like persons who bestow much pains in cultivating their garden, and put no fence round it, to save it from the wild boar of the forest." Robert Miller.

10,522. METHODISTS, Two Kinds of. A plain Christian, on being called by a profligate worldling, "a Methodist," replied, "Sir, whether you are aware of it or not, you are equally a Methodist with myself." "How? how?" asked the scoffer, with many oaths. "Pray be calm," said the other: "there are but two methods—the method of salvation, and the method of damnation: in one of these you certainly are; in which, I leave you to decide."

10,523. MIND, Abstraction of. An astronomer used to walk out every night to gaze upon the stars. It happened one night that, as he was wandering in the outskirts of the city, with his whole thoughts rapt up in the skies, he fell into a well. On his hallooing and calling out, one who heard his cries ran up to him, and when he had listened to his story, said, "My good man, while you are trying to pry into the mysteries of heaven, you overlook the common objects that are under your feet." Æsop.

10,524. MIND, Classes of. All fact-collectors, who have no aim beyond their facts, are one-story men. Two-story men compare, reason, generalize, using the labors of the fact-collectors as well as their own. Three-story men idealize, imagine, predict; their best illumination comes from above, through the skylight. There are minds with large ground-floors that can store an infinite amount of knowledge; some librarians, for instance, who know enough of books to help other people without being able to make much other use of their knowledge, have intellects of this class. Your great working lawyer has two spacious stories; his mind is clear, because his mental floors are large, and he has room to arrange his thoughts so that he can get at them—facts below, principles above, and all in ordered series. Poets are often narrow below, incapable of clear statement, and with small power of consecutive reasoning, but full of light, if sometimes rather bare of furniture in the attics. Holmes.

10,525. MIND, Failure of the. The failure of the mind in old age is often less the result of natural decay than of disuse. Ambition has ceased to operate; contentment brings indolence; indolence, decay of mental power, ennui, and sometimes death. Men have been known to die, literally speaking, of disease induced by intellectual vacancy.

Sir Benjamin Brodie.
10,526. MIND, Immortality of. Our thoughts, our reminiscences, our intellectual acquisitions, die with us to this world; but to this world only. If they are what they ought to be, they are treasures which we lay up for heaven. That which is of the earth, earthly, perishes with rank, honors, authority, and other earthly and perishable things; but nothing that is worth retaining can be lost. Affections, well-placed and dutifully cherished; friendships, happily formed and faithfully maintained; knowledge, acquired with worthy intent; and intellectual powers that have been diligently improved, are the talents which our Lord and Master has committed to our keeping; these will accompany us into another state of existence, as surely as the soul in that state retains its identity and its consciousness.

Southey.

10,527. MIND, Infancy of. In infancy the mind is peculiarly ductile. We bring into the world with us nothing that deserves the name of habit: are neither virtuous nor vicious, active nor idle, inattentive nor curious. The infant comes into our hands a subject capable of certain impressions, and of being led on to a certain degree of improvement. His mind is like his body; what at first was cartilage, gradually becomes bone. Just so the mind acquires its solidity; and what might originally have been bent in a thousand directions, becomes stiff, unmanageable and unimpressible.

Godwin.

10,528. MIND, Intolerance to Defects of. Whence comes it to pass that we have so much patience with those who are maimed in body, and so little with those who are defective in mind? It is because the cripple acknowledges that we have the use of our legs; whereas the fool obstinately maintains that we are the persons who halt in understanding. Without this difference in the case, neither object would move our resentment, but both our compassion.

Pascal.

10,529. MIND, Irregularity of. A gentleman put into the hands of a watchmaker an exquisite watch, which went irregularly. It was as perfect a piece of work as ever was made. He took it to pieces and put it together again twenty times; no matter of defect was to be discovered, and yet the watch went intolerably. At last, it struck him that possibly the balance-wheel might have been near a magnet. On applying a needle to it, he found his suspicions true; here was all the mischief. The steel works in the other parts of the watch had a perpetual influence on its motions; and the watch went as well as possible with a new wheel. If the soundest mind be magnetized by any predilection, it must act irregularly.

Cecil.

10,530. MIND, Kingdom of. Reason, as the princess, dwells in the highest and inwardmost room; the senses are the guard and attendants on the court, without whose aid nothing is admitted into the presence; the supreme faculties are the Peers; the outward parts and inward affections are the Commons. Bp. Hall.

10,531. MIND in Old Age. The age of a cultivated mind is even more complacent, and even more luxurious, than the youth. It is the reward of the due use of the endowments bestowed by nature; while they who in youth have made no provision for age, are left like an unsheltered tree, stripped of its leaves and its branches, shaking and withering before the cold blasts of winter. In truth, nothing is so happy to itself, and so attractive to others, as a genuine and refined imagination, that knows its own powers, and throws forth its treasures with frankness and fearlessness. Southey.

10,532. MIND, Triumph of. It is interesting to notice how some minds seem almost to create themselves, springing up under every disadvantage, and working their solitary but irresistible way through a thousand obstacles. Nature seems to delight in disappointing the assiduities of art, with which it would rear dullness to maturity; and to glory in the vigor and luxuriance of her chance productions. She scatters the seeds of genius to the winds, and though some may perish among the stony places of the world, and some may be choked by the thorns and brambles of early adversity, yet others will now and then strike root even in the clefts of the rock, struggle bravely up into sunshine, and spread over their sterile birth-place all the beauties of vegetation.

Washington Irving.

10,533. MIND, Writing on. Dr. Payson sent a message to the young men who were studying for the ministry in one of the colleges, as follows: "What if God should place in your hand a diamond, and tell you to inscribe on it a sentence which should be read at the last day, and shown there as an index of your thoughts and feelings. What care and caution would you exercise in the selection? Now this is what God has done. He has placed before you immortal minds, more imperishable than the diamond, on which you are about to inscribe, every day and every hour, by your instructions, by your spirit, or by your example, something which will remain, and be exhibited for or against you at the judgment-day."

10,534. MINDS, Great and Little. Great minds mould things to thoughts; little minds mould thoughts to things.

Theo. Parker.

10,535. MINISTER, Faith of a. The salary of a certain minister was insufficient for the support of his family. But his trust was in God; and he was accustomed to say, "If the Lord sees that the people have crowded me into too short a pasture, he will send some one to throw me a fork-full of fodder over the wall."

10,536. MINISTER, Friendly. In an age when men choose their doctrines by the men that preach them, his credentials as a pastor will be most readily accepted, who shows himself the follower of one who turned and said to his disciples, "But I have called you friends." This should not be forgotten; it is of more value than many rubrics. The proverb says that more flies are caught with sugar than vinegar.

Papers on Preaching

10,537. MINISTER, Helping the. "I am past usefulness," said an old lady to her minister; "the Lord spares my days, but I do no good now." "You are doing a great deal of good," said the minister; "you help me to preach every Sabbath." She was very much surprised. Help her minister to preach! "Why, how?" "In the first place," said he, "you are always in your seat at church, and that helps me. In the second place, you are always wide-awake, looking right up into my face, and that helps me. In the third place, I often see tears running down your cheeks, and that helps me very much."

10,538. MINISTER, Legacy of the. Lying on his death-bed, he bequeaths to each of his parishioners his precepts and example for a leg acy. And they in requital erect every one a monument for him in their hearts. He is so far from that base jealousy that his memory should be outshined by a brighter successor, and from that wicked desire that his people may find his worth by the worthlessness of him that succeeds, that he doth heartily pray to God to provide them a better pastor after his decease. As for outward estate, he commonly lives in too bare pasture to die fat. It is well if he hath gathered any flesh, being more in blessing than bulk.

Fuller.

10,539. MINISTER, Life of the. Oh, study not only to preach exactly, but to live exactly! Let the misplacing of one action in your lives trouble you more than the misplacing of words in your discourses. This is the way to succeed in your embassy, and give up your account with joy.

Flavel.

10,540. MINISTER, Prayers of a. A minister's prayers may be compared to the powder, by firing which, the cannon ball is sent upon its errand; without the prayers, his sermons will be little better than a heap of cannon-balls without powder. There must be prayer from a heart on fire. Some sermons are like a bright artillery-piece for a model; all finished, burnished, shining; everybody says, what a splendid piece of ordnance! People stand and look in its mouth, and measure its breech, and lift the ball it can carry, and admire it without fear, for there is no powder in it. It is not meant to shoot any person, but to attract admiration as a finished piece of ordnance. An elaborate model sermon, without prayer, is a gun that a man might put his ear to the muzzle without fear. And some sermons are like the artillery-pieces that are wheeled into line in a sham fight, and fired with blank cartridges. There must be both powder and ball, if execution is to be done. Above all things, there must be prayer. There must be prayer on fire.

N. Y. Evangelist.

10,541. MINISTER, Praying for the. A person called on his minister to tell him he could not enjoy his preaching as much as he once did. "Well, my brother," said the minister, "before you tell me what you have to find fault with in me, let us pray together; will you kneel down and pray for me?" They knelt down and prayed, and when they arose, the minister said, "Now, dear brother, sit down and tell me what fault you have to find." The man said, "I am ashamed of myself. I have no fault to find at all." "Why, how is that, my brother?" "Why, sir, since you have asked me to pray for you I cannot find fault with you; I believe now, sir, that the fault is in myself; I never prayed for you before, but now I will."

10,542. MINISTERS, Curse upon Idle. Rev. Thomas Shephard, an excellent preacher, took great pains in his preparations for the pulpit. He used to say, "God will curse that man's labor who goes idly up and down all the week, and then goes into his study on a Saturday afternoon. God knows that we have not too much time to pray in, and weep in, and get our hearts into a fit frame for the duties of the Sabbath."

10,543. MINISTERS, Divine Mission of. Men of God have always, from time to time, walked among men, and made their commission felt in the heart and soul of the commonest hearer.

Emerson.

10,544. MINISTERS: Fishers of Men. There are many special fitnesses in this image. The fisher casts in his net, not knowing whether he shall gather—whether many or few, or whether any at all shall reward his labors. Nor is it for nothing that the promise clothes itself in language drawn from the occupation of the fisher rather than from the nearly allied pursuits of the hunter. The fisher does more often take his prey alive; he draws it to him, does not drive it from him—and not merely to himself, but draws all he has taken to one another. The work of the fisher is rather a work of art and skill than of force and violence. And there is indeed an aspect in which the death of the fish which follows on its being drawn out of the waters, has its analogy in the higher spirit world. The man drawn forth from the gospel nets—from the worldly, sinful element in which before he lived and moved—does die to sin, die to the world, but only that out of this death he may rise to a higher life in Christ.

Trench.

10,545. MINISTERS, Godless. It is true that a man may impart light to others who does not himself see the light. It is true that, like a concave speculum, cut from a block of ice, which by its power of concentrating the rays of the sun, kindles touch-wood or explodes gunpowder, a preacher may set others on fire, when his own heart is cold as frost. It is true that he may stand like a lifeless finger-post, pointing the way on a road where he neither leads nor follows.

Dr. Guthrie.

10,546. MINISTERS to be Honored. As Lord Lieutenant of Hampshire, the late Duke of Wellington always made a point of receiving and entertaining the Judges when they arrived in the county on circuit. He felt that the Judges represented the Sovereign; and no claims of society, no call even of duty, was strong enough to hinder him from paying the same marks of respect which his loyalty would have induced him to pay to the Sovereign had she been personally present.

Biblical Treasury.

10,547. MINISTERS, Humbug. A clerical humbug, I conceive, is a minister who expects from his profession what he could not gain from his character as an individual.

Dr. Hodge.

10,548. MINISTERS, Imperfection of. To expect perfection in ministers is to expect against the wisdom of God. In a pipe which conveys water into a house there may be such a flaw as will sometimes admit some dust or earth to mix itself with the water; will you therefore reject the water itself, and say, that if you may not have it just as it ariseth in the fountain, you will not regard it, when you live far from the fountain itself, and can have no water but what is conveyed in pipes liable to such defects?

Salter.

10,549. MINISTERS, Judgment of. An old divine preaching before the clergy, anticipated their final examination with much effect. He represented the Judge asking, "What did you preach for?" "I preached, Lord, that I might keep a good living that was left me by my father; which, if I had not entered the ministry, would have been wholly lost to me and my family." Christ addresses him, "Stand by, thou hast thy reward." The question is put to another, "And what did you preach for?" "Lord, I was applauded as a learned man; and I preached to keep up the reputation of an excellent orator, and an ingenious preacher." The answer of Christ to him also is, "Stand by, thou hast had thy reward." The Judge puts the question to a third, "And what did you preach for?" "Lord," saith he, "I neither aimed at the great things of this world, though I was thankful for the conveniences of life which thou gavest me; nor did I preach that I might gain the character of a wit, or of a man of parts, or of a fine scholar; but I preached in compassion to souls, and to please and honor thee: my design, Lord, in preaching, was that I might win souls to thy blessed Majesty." The Judge was now described as calling out, "Room, men! room, angels! let this man come and sit with me on my throne: he has owned and honored me on earth, and I will own and honor him through all the ages of eternity."

10,550. MINISTERS, Objections to. John Ploughman once said, "I never knew a good horse which had not some odd habit or other, and I never yet saw a minister worth his salt who had not some crotchet or oddity. Now, these are bits of cheese that cavaliers smell out and nibble at: the first is too flowery, and the second is too dull. Dear me, if all God's creatures were judged in this way, we should wring the dove's neck for being too tame, shoot the robins for eating spiders, kill the crows for swinging their tails, and the hens for not giving us milk. When a man wants to beat a dog he can soon find a stick, and at this rate any fool may have something to say against the best minister in England." Spurgeon.

10,551. MINISTERS, Office of. That a man stand and speak of spiritual things to men. It is beautiful;—even in its great obscurity and decadence, it is among the beautifullest, most touching objects one sees on the earth. This speaking man has indeed, in these times, wandered terribly from the point; has, alas, as it were, totally lost sight of the point; yet, at bottom, whom have we to compare with him? Of all public functionaries boarded and lodged on the industry of modern Europe, is there one worthier of the board he has? A man ever professing, and never so languidly making still some endeavor, to save the souls of men: contrast him with a man professing to do little but shoot the partridges of men! I wish he could find the point again, this speaking one; and stick to it with tenacity, with deadly energy; for there is need of him yet! The speaking function—this of truth coming to us with a living voice, nay in a living shape, and as a concrete practical exemplar: this, with all our writing and printing functions, has a perennial place. Could he but find the point again—take the old spectacles off his nose, and looking up discover, almost in contact with him, what the real Satan, and soul-devouring, world-devouring devil, now is.

Carlyle.

10,552. MINISTERS, Perseverance of. Away with those nice novelists that can abide to hear nothing but what is new minted. Ministers meet with many that are slow of heart and dull of hearing; these must have "precept upon precept, line upon line," etc.; many also of brawny breasts and horny heart-strings; that, as ducklings stoop and dive at any little stone thrown by a man at them yet shrink not at the heaven's great thunder, etc. Here a minister must beat and inculcate; turn him self into all fashions of spirits and speech, to win and work upon his hearers. "He must so long pursue and stand upon one and the same point," saith Austin, "till, by the gesture and countenance of his auditors, he perceives they understand and assent to it."

Trapp.

10,553. MINISTERS, Responsibility of. The medical attendant of my brother has just been expressing his surprise to see how much I am worn within this last half-year; I am very sensible of it myself; and expect that I shall be much more worn, if my people continue in such a grievous state. I would that my eyes "were a fountain of tears, to run down day and night." I have been used to read the scriptures to get from them rich discoveries of the power and grace of Christ; to learn how to minister to a loving and obedient people; I am now reading them really and literally to know how to minister to a conceited, contentious, and rebellious people. Two qualities, I am sure, are requisite, meekness and patience, yet, in some cases, I shall be constrained to rebuke with authority; I have been used to sail in the Pacific; I am now learning to navigate the Red Sea, that is full of shoals and rocks, with a very intricate passage. I trust the Lord will carry me safely through; but my former trials have been nothing to this.

Simeon.

10,554. MINISTERS, Right Choice of. For if no prince will send a mechanic from his loom or his shears, in an honorable embassy to some other foreign prince, shall we think that the Lord will send forth stupid and unprepared instruments about so great a work as the perfecting of the saints and edification of the church? It is registered for the perpetual dishonor of that wicked king Jeroboam, who made no other use of any religion but as a secondary by-thing, to be the supplement of policy, that "he made of the lowest of the people," those who were really such as the apostles were falsely esteemed to be, the scum and off-scouring of men, "to be priests unto the Lord."

Bp. Reynolds.

10,555. MINISTRY, Emblem of the. Upon the pulpit of a church in a Tyrolese village, is an emblem of what the ministry should be. It is an extended arm, carved from wood, holding up the cross in the sight of all. Christ cruci-fed must be held up, as the only atonement for sin, and hope for the sinner.

10,556. MINISTRY, Support of the. A missionary traveling over the island of Hayti, found himself preceded by a report which threatened seriously to interfere with his comfort. One of the most intelligent natives said to him: "Minister, they tell me a strange thing about you: they tell me you never eat." Having started early, without breakfast, and traveled far, he had internal evidence of the contrary, and he stoutly denied the statement, demanding that the test should be made. A plain meal was set before him, and lo! he ate like other men, greatly to the surprise of the natives. How near this legend comes to being general, many a minister's lean larder will testify.

10,557. MINISTRY, Thrust into the. A minister advised a young man thus: "The word translated 'send laborers into his harvest,' signifies thrust; and, if God intends you to be a minister of his, he will thrust you out, though earth and hell should oppose; but, if God does not send you, it will be much better to work at any calling than to go into the ministry yourself."

10,558. MINISTRY, Trifling in the. I hope my younger brethren in the ministry will pardon me if I entreat their particular attention to this admonition—not to give the main part of their time to the curiosities of learning, and only a few fragments of it to their great work, the cure of souls, lest they see cause in their last moments to adopt the words of dying Grotius, perhaps with much more propriety than he could use them—"I have lost a life in busy trifling."

Dr. Doddridge.

10,559. MIRACLES, Constant. An Eastern fable says, that a boy challenged his teacher to prove to him the existence of a God by working a miracle. The teacher, who was a priest, procured a large vessel filled with earth, in which he deposited a kernel in the boy's presence, and bade him pay attention. In the place where the kernel was put, a green shoot soon appeared, the shoot became a stem, the stem put forth leaves and branches, which soon spread over the whole apartment. It then budded with blossoms, which dropping off left golden fruit in their place, and in the short space of an hour there appeared a noble tree in the place of the little seed. The youth, overcome with amazement, exclaimed, "Now I know there is a God, for I have seen his power!" The priest smiled at him, and said, "Simple child, do you only now believe? Does not what you have just seen take place in innumerable instances, year after year, only by a slower process? But is it the less marvelous on that account?"

10,560. MIRACLES, Continuation of. God has been working miracles all along the line of Christian history. The day of miracles is not past. It is a great miracle, I know, to open the eye of the blind man, but it is a greater miracle to open the eye of the blind soul and make it see. It is a great miracle to unstop the ear of one that is deaf, so that the vibrations of the atmosphere will produce sound; it is a greater miracle to open the hidden ear of the soul and bid it hear the voice that speaks in the language of the Spirit. It is a great miracle to bring to life one who is dead and had been laid in the grave; it is a greater miracle to bring the soul from spiritual death to a life of righteousness.

Dr. Kynett.

10,561. MIRACLES, Denying. Denying the possibility of miracles seems to me quite as unjustifiable as speculative Atheism.

Prof. Huxley.

10,562. MIRACLES, Legend of. The recovery of lost articles through a fish is a common miracle of hagiology. The wife of king Roderick gave her bridal ring to a knight of the court. The king recovered it from the knight, but cast it into the Clyde. He then went to the Queen and demanded the ring. As she could not produce it, she was cast into prison and ordered to be executed in a few days. St. Kintegern, greatly moved by her case, prayed to God to rescue her. A salmon was caught in the Clyde, and in it the ring was found, which was given to the saint, and by him to the Queen, who thereby was able to meet the king's demand and save her own life. In commemoration of this St. Kintegern is represented in art, holding the episcopal cross in one hand and a salmon with a ring in its mouth in the other.

10,563. MIRACLES, Modern. The daughter of a missionary in Kansas had a shrunken limb; two inches too short, out of joint at the thigh, stiff at the knee; and according to the best medical opinion she was a hopeless cripple. She was twelve years of age, and simple enough to believe the scripture, "The prayer of faith shall save the sick." She told her faith to her mother, and asked her to unite with her in prayer for her cure. The mother reasoned with the girl that this was her cross, and that she ought to have grace to bear it. Her answer was, "Mother, I have faith, and if you have, there will be two of us, and I can be cured." She pressed the case with her mother day after day, saying, "Mother, I want you to pray now to Jesus to cure me." The mother prayed, and became unconscious of all surroundings, till she was aroused by the cry of her little girl, "Mother, wake up! Jesus has cured me! Oh, I am well! I am all well!" The limb is perfect, like the other. The mother says her child has been whole from that hour. The little girl's answer to all is, "The Saviour has cured me."

10,564. MIRACLES, Necessity of. It cannot be questioned that miracles were necessary to moral progress in the time of Christ. No truth, as from God, could have been received without them. All men believed that their divinities granted power to their votaries to work miracles. Either the new religion must be introduced by miracles, or God must, by miracle, destroy the conviction in all minds that miracles could be wrought.

Walker.

10,565. MIRACLES, Papist. In the monas tery at Isenach stands an image which I have seen. When a wealthy person came hither to pray to it (it was Mary with her child), the child turned away his face from the sinner to the mother; but if the sinner gave liberally to that monastery, then the child turned to him again; and if he promised to give more, then the child showed itself very friendly and loving, and stretched out its arms over him in the form of a cross. But this picture and image was made hollow within, and prepared with locks, lines, and screws; and behind it stood a knave to move them—and so were the people mocked and deceived, who took it to be a miracle wrought by Divine Providence! Luther.

10,566. MIRACLES, Reception of. A legend says that the prophet Saleh tried to reclaim the tribe of Thamud from idolatry. The people demanded a miracle to prove his divine commission, and one, pointing to a large rock, asked him to bring a camel big with young out of it. They promised to accept his religion if he did so. Instantly the rock began to heave, its side opened and out of it came a camel meeting the demand in every particular. All were surprised, but very few believed. Instead of this, the people cut the hamstrings of the camel and killed her. God was so much displeased at this conduct that he destroyed the town and its inhabitants three days after by an earthquake, the archangel Gabriel crying aloud, "Die all of you." Mohammed refers to this fable and warns unbelievers by it.

10,567. MIRACLES, Working. A person may be endowed with the gift of miracles, yet may lose his soul. Miracles insure not salvation; they may indeed secure esteem and applause, but what will it avail a man to be esteemed on earth and afterwards be delivered up to hell torments? Fulgentius, 533.

10,568. MIRTH, Cheerfulness and. I have always preferred cheerfulness to mirth. The latter I consider as an act, the former as a habit of the mind. Mirth is short and transient, cheerfulness fixed and permanent. Those are often raised into the greatest transports of mirth who are subject to the greatest depressions of melancholy. On the contrary, cheerfulness, though it does not give the mind such an exquisite gladness, prevents us from falling into any depths of sorrow. Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity. Addison.

10,569. MIRTH, Devotion of. Mirth is the sweet wine of human life. It should be offered sparkling with zestful life unto God. He desires no camuscated or murdered offerings. Beecher.

10,570. MIRTH, Madness of. I think the men on this world, like children in a dangerous storm in the sea, that play and make sport with the white foam of the waves thereof coming in to sink and drown them; so are men making fool's sport with the white pleasures of a stormy world that will sink them. But, alas! what have we to do with their sports which they make? If Solomon said of laughter that it was madness, what may we say of this world's laughing and sporting themselves with gold and silver, and honors, and court, and broad large conquests, but that they are poor souls, in the height and rage of a fever gone mad? Then a straw, a fig, for all created sports and rejoicing out of Christ.

Rutherford.

10,571. MISANTHROPE, Description of the. He is a man who avoids society only to free himself from the trouble of being useful to it. He is a man who considers his neighbors only on the side of their defects, not knowing the art of combining their virtues with their vices, and of rendering the imperfections of other people tolerable by reflecting on his own. He is a man more employed in finding out and inflicting punishments on the guilty, than in devising means to reform them. He is a man who talks of nothing but banishing and executing; and who, because he thinks his talents are not sufficiently valued and employed by his fellow-citizens, or rather because they know his foibles, and do not choose to be subject to his caprice, talks of quitting cities, towns and societies, and of living in dens or deserts.

Saurin.

10,572. MISANTHROPE, Heathen. Timon, the Athenian, was nicknamed the Man-hater. He was once possessed of great wealth, but through too great liberality he lost it all, and was reduced to extreme poverty. In this condition he experienced the malice and ingratitude of those whom he had served. He thereupon became a great hater of mankind, was glad of their misfortunes, and worked the ruin of all he could, with safety to himself. He built him a house in the fields that he might avoid the society of men; allowing only one, Apemantus, a person much like himself, to disturb his solitude. Apemantus said to Timon, "Is not this a fine supper?" He answered, "It would be much better if thou wert absent." Timon gave orders that his sepulchre should be set behind a dunghill, and this epitaph to be written, "Here now I lie, after my wretched fall; ask not my name, the gods destroy you all."

10,573. MISER, Beneficent. Mr. Taylor, a London stock-jobber, who died worth a hundred thousand pounds, Consols, was so penurious that he scarcely allowed himself the necessities of life. A few days before his decease, the officers of the parish in which he resided waited upon him at his request. They found the old man on a wretched bed in a garret, making his dinner on a thin rasher of bacon and a potato. He informed the overseers of the poor that he had left by his will £1,000 sterling for their relief, and inquired if they would not allow him discount for prompt payment. They assented, and he, much delighted, immediately gave them a check on his banker for £950, and soon after breathed his last.

10,574. MISER, The Rich. He has a heart that will serve him to hear a thousand lectures about charity without the least damage to his pocket. As for the pleasure of doing good, he understands it not; he has no notion of the matter: nor will the spectacles with which he tells his money help him to see Jesus Christ in a poor man. As for being rewarded in another world, and lending to God to be hereafter repaid with interest, he is not for this spiritual sort of usury, but looks upon what is lent to God as little better than a desperate debt. The plain truth of it is, he does not like his security, but thinks a mortgage is better.

Norris.

10,575. MISERY, Causes of. Misery is caused for the most part, not by a heavy crush of disaster, but by the corrosion of less visible evils, which canker enjoyment, and undermine security. The visit of an invader is necessarily rare, but domestic animosities allow no cessation.

Johnson.

10,576. MISERY, Happiness and. The misery of human life is made up of large masses, each separated from the other by certain intervals. One year, the death of a child; years after, a failure in trade; after another longer or shorter interval, a daughter may have married unhappily; in all but the singularly unfortunate, the integral parts that compose the sum total of the unhappiness of a man's life are easily counted and distinctly remembered. The happiness of life, on the contrary, is made up of minute fractions; the little soon-forgotten charities of a kiss, a smile, a kind look, a heartfelt compliment in the disguise of playful rillery, and the countless other infinitesimals of pleasurable thought and genial feeling.

Coleridge.

10,577. MISERY, Influence of. Did you ever happen to see that most soft-spoken and velvet-handed steam-engine at the mint? The smooth piston slides backward and forward as a lady might slip her delicate finger in and out of a ring. The engine lays one of its fingers calmly, but firmly, upon a bit of metal; it is a coin now, and will remember that touch, and tell a new race about it, when the date upon it is crusted over with twenty centuries. So it is that a great, silent-moving misery puts a new stamp on us in an hour or a moment—as sharp an impression as if it had taken half a life-time to engrave it.

Holmes.

10,578. MISFORTUNE, Good Fortune. Zeno, who became renowned as one of the seven wise men of Greece, heard that his last ship, with a rich cargo, had been lost in a tempest, and exclaimed, "Fortune, I applaud thy contrivance, who, by this means, hast reduced me to a threadbare cloak and the piazza of the Stoics."

10,579. MISFORTUNE, Overcoming. If a man loses his property at thirty or forty years of age, it is only a sharp discipline generally, by which later he comes to larger success. It is all folly for a man to sit down in mid-life discouraged. The marshals of Napoleon came to their commander, and said, "We have lost the battle, and we are being cut to pieces." Napoleon took his watch from his pocket, and said, "It is only two o'clock in the afternoon. You have lost the battle, but we have time enough to win another. Charge upon the foe!" Though the meridian of life has passed with you, and you have been routed in many a conflict, give not up in discouragement. There are victories yet for you to gain. Anon.

10,580. MISFORTUNE, Test of. A servant of Cæsar censured him for bestowing his gifts on those who had an abundance already, rather than on him who had nothing. Cæsar said that gifts were not for those who deserved well, but for those that were destined by fate. He commanded two boxes to be made of the same size, form, and weight; in the one he put gold, and in the other lead. He then called his faithful servant, and told him to choose between them. He took them up, poised them in his hands, and decided to take the one which contained the lead. The emperor opened the box, and said, "Thou canst plainly see that not my good-will has been wanting, but thy ill-fortune, that hitherto thou hast had no reward from me."

10,581. MISFORTUNES, Conduct in. If misfortunes have befallen you by your own misconduct, live and be wiser for the future. If they have befallen you by the fault of others, live; you have nothing wherewith to reproach yourself. If your character be unjustly attacked, live; time will remove the aspersion. If you have spiteful enemies, live; and disappoint their malevolence. If you have kind and faithful friends (and kindred), live; to bless and protect them. If you hope for immortality, live; and prepare to enjoy it. John Herries.

10,582. MISFORTUNES, Opinions concerning. When misfortunes happen to such as dissent from us in matters of religion, we call them judgments; when to those of our own sect, we call them trials; when to persons neither way distinguished, we are content to impute them to the settled course of things. Shenstone.

10,583. MISFORTUNES, Preference for. If all the misfortunes of mankind were cast into a public stock, in order to be equally distributed among the whole species, those who now think themselves the most unhappy would prefer the share they are already possessed of, before that which would fall to them by such a division.

Socrates.

10,584. MISFORTUNES, Unavoidable. As daily experience makes it evident that misfortunes are unavoidably incident to human life, that calamity will neither be repelled by fortitude, nor escaped by flight; neither awed by greatness, nor eluded by obscurity; philosophers have endeavored to reconcile us to that condition which they cannot teach us to merit, by persuading us that most of our evils are made afflictive only by ignorance or perverseness, and that nature has annexed to every vicissitude of external circumstances some advantage sufficient to over-balance all its inconveniences.

Johnson.

10,585. MISSED or Not. When an oak, or any noble and useful tree, is uprooted, his removal creates a blank. For years after, when you look to the place which once knew him, you see that something is missing. The branches of adjacent trees have not yet supplied the void. They still hesitate to supply the place formerly filled by their powerful neighbor; and there is still a deep chasm in the ground—a ragged pit—which shows how far his giant roots once spread. But when a leafless pole, a wooden pin, is plucked up, it comes easy and clean away. There is no rending of the turf, no marring of the landscape, no vacancy created, no regret. It leaves no memento, and is never missed. Brethren, which are you?

Dr. Hamilton.

10,586. MISSIONARIES, Haste for. A heathen woman went to a missionary in India on the occasion of an anniversary of the mission children, and said, "Why did you not come sooner, that my little boy might have been here?" She explained that she once had a little boy, whom she took into the jungle and slew before the missionaries came. She represents millions who say, "Why did you not come sooner?"

10,587. MISSIONARY, Zeal of a. Winfrid, or Boniface, having laid the axe at the roots of the trees, literally, in Germany, cutting down the oaks sacred to Thor, planting churches and making converts with remarkable success, longed for new fields and fresh conquests. When over seventy-five years of age, he set forth (so strong was his ruling passion) to win pagan Friesland to Christ. He appointed a bishop to succeed him at Mainz, and left everything, as if he did not expect to return. He took with him his shroud and St. Ambrose's treatise on the "Advantage of Death." With a company of eight, he entered upon his work, and met with good success. Many had been baptized. The pagans became alarmed, and went against him with an armed band. Boniface knew too well their bloody intent. He exhorted his followers not to resist, but to await the crown of martyrdom. He himself took a volume of the gospel for a pillow, and, stretching his neck upon it for the blow, received his release in 755. Few are the names of missionary heroes more illustrious than his.

10,588. MISSIONS, Basis for. The Baptist Missionary Society of England owes its existence and success to the unflagging zeal of the shoemaker, school-master and preacher, William Carey, of Nottingham. He preached a powerful sermon from Is. 54: 23, of which the two leading divisions were, "Expect great things from God"—"Attempt great things for God." Under its influence a mission to the heathen was resolved upon. Mr. Carey became its first missionary, sailing for India in 1793. His expectations were not disappointed.

10,589. MISSIONS, Consecrated to. "Is it not a great trial to you to part with your eldest son?" said a missionary secretary to a gentleman who had come to London to take leave of his son, who was to embark the next day for a foreign land. "Yes," was the answer, "it is a great trial, but I have been expecting it for a long time. The day my son was born," he continued, "I attended a missionary meeting, and was greatly impressed with what I heard;

when I went home, I took the babe out of bed, and holding it in my arms, I said to my wife, 'Will you give this boy to the missions?' 'Yes,' she replied, 'I will.' From that time I have been expecting he would go, though he never knew the circumstance till he offered himself for a missionary."

10,590. MISSIONS, Era of. It was not until Christians became inflamed with the zeal of Wesley, who said, "The world is my parish," and Whitefield, who saw in every man a brother, that missions assumed any importance among Protestants. To this epoch the great societies of England, date their origin. "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," the oldest of all, was organized in 1701. "Church Missionary Society," in 1799. "Scotch Missionary Society" in 1796. "London Missionary Society" in 1794. "Baptist Missionary Society" in 1792. "Wesleyan Missionary Society" in 1769. The foregoing are all in Great Britain. "The American Board of Foreign Missions" was organized in 1810. "The American Baptist Missionary Society" in 1814. "The Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society" in 1819. "The Episcopal Board of Missions" in 1820. Various minor societies exist, of later origin. The obstacles attending the beginning of new mission enterprises have been overcome. The great harvest of the heathen world is being rapidly gathered. Soon the inhabitants of heaven will shout, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." Rev. 11: 17.

10,591. MISSIONS, Field of. Dr. Guthrie was looking down upon the degraded people of the Cowgate, Edinburgh, where he went to try the power of the gospel on the heathen at home, when he suddenly met Dr. Chalmers who exclaimed, "A beautiful field, sir; a very fine field of operation." Comparing it with his country charge, Guthrie says, "It is the change from the green fields and woods and the light of nature to the darkness and blackness of a coal pit."

10,592. MISSIONS, Gifts to. Rev. John Williams proposed to his Raitean converts that each family should set apart a pig to be sold for the missionary cause. They gladly accepted the proposal, and the next morning the squealing of pigs was heard as they received the mark in the ear which indicated their designation to this service. The result was a money contribution of £103. An Englishman sent half a pint of beans to a missionary meeting with the request that some one would plant them for three years and give the result to missions. Two farmers took them with this result: first year eleven pints, second year nine bushels, third year two hundred and seventy-six bushels, which netted £81, 14s., 9d. Missionary hens are another device—the setting apart of a hen or more, whose entire products shall be devoted to missions. Bullocks, cows, sheep, ducks, bees, fish-pots, cocoa-nut, cherry and other fruit-trees have been set apart for the same purpose.

10,598. MISSIONS, Gold for. John Sunday, the converted Indian chief of Upper Canada, addressing a missionary meeting in England, in his appeal to the benevolence of the people, previous to collection, said, "There is a gentleman, I suppose, now in this house; he is a very fine gentleman, but he is very modest. He does not like to show himself. I do not know how long it is since I saw him, he comes out so little. I am very much afraid he sleeps a great deal of his time, when he ought to be going about doing good. His name is Mr. Gold. Mr. Gold, are you here to-night? or are you sleeping in your iron chest? Come out, Mr. Gold; come out, and help us to do this great work, to send the gospel to every creature. Ah, Mr. Gold, you ought to be ashamed of yourself, to sleep so much in your iron chest! Look at your white brother, Mr. Silver, he does a great deal of good in the world, while you are sleeping. Come out, Mr. Gold! Look, too, at your brown brother, Mr. Copper, he is everywhere! See him running about doing all the good he can. Why don't you come out, Mr. Gold? Well, if you won't come out and give us yourself, send us your shirt, that is a bank note, and we will excuse you this time."

10,594. MISSIONS, Love for. A late writer says, "Why was Christ's long journey from heaven? Why his long sojourn amidst poverty and scorn? Why his toilsome ministry in Galilee and Judea? Why the journey to Jerusalem, and the known betrayal, rejection and cruel death there? Ah, "the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost." With the Spirit of the Master upon them, thousands have gone forth upon the same errand.

10,595. MISSIONS, Martyrs of. The missionaries' torch has been lighted in every land. Their bones scattered everywhere are the seed of a bountiful harvest, to be gathered when the earth shall be fully ripe. Some fell by the malaria of an inhospitable climate, like Melville B. Cox in Africa. Thousands of true martyrs have thus died for their faith. Rev. William Thielfall was martyred in Namaqualand, in 1825; Rev. J. S. Thomas in Kaffirland, in 1856; Rev. John Williams in Erromanga, in 1838; Rev. J. G. Gordon in the same place, in 1872; Rev. Thomas Baker in Fiji in 1867; Bishop Patterson and Rev. Mr. Atkin, in Malanesia in 1871. The only wonder is, considering the ignorance, superstition and cruelty of the heathen, that so few have been called to shed their blood for Christ.

10,596. MISSIONS, Official Tribute to. The English blue-book, published in 1875, after a summary of missions in India, about half of which are American enterprises, closes with the following tribute: "The government in India cannot but acknowledge the great obligation under which it is laid by these six hundred missionaries, whose blameless example and self-denying labors are infusing new vigor into the stereotyped life of the great population placed under English rule, and are preparing them to be in every way better citizens of the great empire in which they dwell."

10597. MISSIONS, Providence and. Rev. John Thomas, founder of the Friendly Islands Mission, applied to the London Missionary Society for permission to extend his work to the island of Haabai, whose chief desired his coming. He waited with some anxiety for a reply. About that time a box was washed ashore, and carried to one of the missionaries, containing a letter from the society authorizing the establishment of the mission. Neither the vessel to which the letter was entrusted, the crew, nor any of the freight, except the box containing the letter authorizing a new effort for the salvation of the heathen, which came to the right place at the right time, was ever heard from.

10,598. MISSIONS, Result of Love for. A poor Christian mechanic was much chagrined that he could give so little for missions when the subscription was passed among the workmen in the factory. He told his wife of it, and she was inspired to try to earn something for the cause of missions. She secured some silk-twist and a few button-moulds, and began the manufacture of silk buttons. She sent a sample to a New York merchant, saying that, if they would sell, the money was to be her husband's contribution for missions. She received answer, "Make as many as you choose; I can sell a hundred dozen." The wife made her venture unknown to her husband; but now he was let into the secret. Success crowned her efforts. Machinery supplanted hand labor. A large manufactory, extensive business, and ample fortune grew up from and rewarded their love and labor for missions.

10,599. MISSIONS, Societies for. The different missionary societies have been compared to ships, which, though sometimes crowded while in harbor together, will have room enough when they go forth into the broad sea. Now, sir, all I mean to say is, that the Methodist missionary ship is one, among others, of the great fleet, by which it is intended to carry to the ends of the earth the blessings of the gospel; that this ship, like the rest, must be manned, freighted, and provisioned for the voyage; and that our most strenuous efforts, and those of our friends, are necessary to fit it for the sea, and to prepare it for the service on which it is destined to proceed. Other denominations are concerned for their own respective ships, and we must particularly care for ours. But our sincere and ardent prayer is, that God may send them all a safe and prosperous voyage.

Dr. Bunting.
10,600. MISSIONS, Spirit of. When Francis Xavier, the Jesuit, called "The Apostle of the Indies," proposed his mission, his friends tried by every possible representation of the dangers and hardships involved, to deter him from going. He replied, "The most tractable and opulent nations will not want preachers; but this is for me, because others will not undertake it. If the country abounded in odoriferous woods and mines of gold, all dangers would be braved in order to procure them. Should merchants, then, be more intrepid than missionaries? Shall these unfortunate people be excluded from the blessings of redemption? It is true they are very barbarous and brutal, but even were they more so, he who can convert even stones into children of Abraham, cannot he soften their hearts? Should I be instrumental in the salvation of but one of them, I should think myself well recompensed for all the labors and dangers by which you endeavor to affright me."

10,601. MISSIONS, Supplies for. In 1871 the Berlin Missionary Society found itself in debt 10,000 thalers. In 1887 it had received a donation of three square miles land on Vaal River, South Africa. The land was worthless, but diamonds were discovered upon it at this juncture, and enough was realized by a percentage paid by the miners to extinguish the debt.

10,602. MISSIONS, Supporting. The now famous missionary, Carey, when bidding farewell to his friends, in 1793, to go to India, said, "I'll go down into the pit if you'll hold the rope."

10,603. MISSIONS, Support of. One of the Secretaries of the Methodist Missionary Society says that the last words Bishop Jones said to him, a little before his death, were, "The Church of the Lord Jesus Christ must sustain the work of the Lord Jesus Christ!"

10,604. MISSIONS, Temporal Advantage of. Protestant missions have everywhere carried our civilization with them and created a demand for our products of art and manufacture. England estimates that for every pound sterling she has expended in foreign missions she has received back ten. They are thus shown to be a good investment for a people whose only idea is to make money. A thousand per cent. profit ought to attract capitalists. But that is only a trifle of the award to be distributed when the final account shall be made up. Many a man has lived to say, "The most satisfactory investment I ever made is what I gave away."

10,605. MISSIONS, Trophy of. Robert Moffat, the great African missionary, regarded Africaner, the notorious Hottentot chief, as the greatest trophy of his mission work. He was the scourge and terror of that country. The people did not believe it possible that he could be converted, and after he became a Christian they required the ocular demonstration of seeing him in company with the missionary. A more bloody man never tested the power of Christ to save. He went with Mr. Moffat to Cape Town. On the way he mentioned the fact of Africaner's conversion, when a Dutch farmer answered, "I can believe almost anything you say, but that I cannot credit. There are seven wonders in the world; that would be the eighth." Mr. Moffat assured the farmer that the desperado had become a changed man. "Well," said he, "if what you say is true, I have only one wish, and that is to see Africaner before I die; and when you return, as sure as the sun is over our heads, I will go with you to see him, though he killed my own uncle." At this the missionary conducting the farmer to the wagon, pointed to the chief, and said, "This is Africaner." The farmer was astounded. Starting back, he said, "Are you Africaner?" The chief doffed his hat, made a respectful bow, and said, "I am;" at the same time testifying to the truth of the missionary's statement respecting his conversion. Then exclaimed the farmer, "O, God, what a miracle of Thy power. What cannot Thy grace accomplish?" He was much attached to the missionaries, and was a remarkable example of the power of grace.

10,606. MISSIONS, Twenty-fold Return for Gifts to. An English society were endeavoring to bring their gifts up to their usual standard. One of the leaders said, "Let us make another collection. I will give another shilling." George Leal, a farm-laborer, responded, "And so would I, if I had one with me." "I'll lend you a shilling, George," said the leader, as he handed him one to drop into the plate. "Well done, George Leal!" exclaimed the minister, "the Lord will reward you tenfold." This stimulated others; the plate went round a second time, and the deficiency was more than made up. When the meeting was over, the minister greeted George Leal with unusual warmth, remarking, "Remember what I said, George; the Lord will reward you tenfold." The next day, when Leal went into the field to his ploughing, he had not gone many yards when the ploughshare turned up a sovereign. George called to his master, and asked if he knew who had lost a sovereign, quite willing to give it up. "Nay, George," said the farmer, "it must have been in the ground many years. It is thy own good luck, keep it." Thus quickly and twenty-fold did the Lord reward his gift.

10,607. MISTAKES, Important. A Roman army was thrown into a disastrous rout by the inclination of a standard, as was the custom in case of submission. Rome itself was once conquered by Arnulphus, through the boisterous chase of a hare by his soldiers, which was mistaken for a fierce assault by the Romans. Arnulphus, perceiving his advantage, made a successful attack. A mistaken command has lost a battle; a mistaken movement has lost an Empire.

10,608. MISTAKES, No Exemption from. Exemption from mistake is not the privilege of mortals; but when our mistakes are involuntary, we owe each other every candid consideration; and the man who, on discovering his errors, acknowledges and corrects them, is scarcely less entitled to our esteem than if he had not erred. Dr. Pye Smith.

10,609. MISTRUST, Prevalence of. The world is an old woman, that mistakes any gilt farthing for a gold coin; whereby, being often cheated, she will henceforth trust nothing but the common copper. Carlyle.

10,610. MITES, Our Two. Our two mites, a vile body and a sinful soul, are all that he requires, and shall he not have those?

Whitefield

10,611. MODERATION, Importance of. Intemperance is a perfect destruction of wisdom, "a full-gorged belly never produced a sprightly mind," and, therefore, this kind of men are called γαστρίες ἀργαί, "slow-bellies," so St. Paul, concerning the intemperate Cretans, out of their own poet: they are like the tigers of Brazil, which when they are empty are bold and swift, and full of sagacity; but being full, sneak away from the barking of a village dog. So are these men, wise in the morning, quick and fit for business; but when the sun gives the sign to spread the tables, and intemperance brings in the messes, and drunkenness fills the bowl, then the man falls away, and leaves a beast in his room. A full meal is like Sisera's banquet, at the end of which there is a nail struck into a man's head; so Porphyry, "It knocks a man down and nails his soul to the sensual mixtures of the body."

Jeremy Taylor.

10,612. MODERATION, Submissive. He therefore hath cast up his accounts the best, who, confining himself within due bounds, hath such ascendant over his temper, as to bear prosperous and adverse fortune with the same equality, whichever it is that happens to him in this life. He puts on those resolutions as if he were in a popular government where magistracy is decided by lot; if it luckily fall to his share, he obeys his fortune; but if it passeth him, he doth not repine at it. So we must submit to the dispensation of human affairs, without being uneasy and querulous.

Plutarch.

10,613. MODESTY, Absence of. Nothing can atone for the want of modesty, without which beauty is ungraceful and wit detestable.

Addison.

10,614. MODESTY, Abuse of. I have observed that under the notion of modesty men have indulged themselves in a spiritless sheepishness, and been forever lost to themselves, their families, their friends, and their country. When a man has taken care to pretend to nothing but what he may justly aim at, and can execute as well as any other, without injustice to any other, it is ever want of breeding, or courage, to be brow-beaten, or elbowed out of his honest ambition. I have said often, modesty must be an act of the will, and yet it always implies self-denial: for if a man has an ardent desire to do what is laudable for him to perform, and from an unmanly bashfulness shrinks away, and lets his merit languish in silence, he ought not to be angry at the world that a more unskillful actor succeeds in his part, because he has not confidence to come upon the stage himself.

Steele.

10,615. MODESTY, Instinct of. The spirit of suicide became epidemic among the girls of Milesia. Neither prayers nor tears of friends availed anything, and they died daily by their own hands. At last a council sent forth an edict that every girl that laid violent hands on herself should, dead as she was, be carried naked along the market place. The edict had its desired effect. Those that trembled not at death would not endure a wrong to their modesty.

10,616. MODESTY, Test of. A company of Milesians agreed with some Coos fishermen for their draught, whatever it should prove to be. They drew up a table of gold, and a strife commenced between the fishermen and the buyers; terminating in a war between the cities in favor of their citizens. At last it was resolved to consult the oracle Apollo, and he told them to send the table to the man they considered wisest. It was therefore sent to Thales, the Milesian. Thales sent it to Bias, saying, "He was wiser than himself." Bias sent it to another wiser than he, and so it passed from one to another till it returned to Thales again; he sent it at last to Thebes, to be consecrated to the Ismenian Apollo. Thus it passed in turn to seven men, who, thereafter, received the name of the "Seven wise men of Greece."

10,617. MOHAMMED, Religion of. From his earliest youth Mohammed was addicted to religious contemplation: each year, during the month of Ramadan, he withdrew from the world and from the arms of Cadijah: in the cave of Hera, three miles from Mecca, he consulted the spirit of fraud or enthusiasm, whose abode is not in the heavens, but in the mind of the prophet. The faith which, under the name of Islam, he preached to his family and nation, is compounded of an eternal truth, and a necessary fiction—that there is only one God, and that Mohammed is the apostle of God.

Gibbon.

10,618. MOHAMMEDANISM, Dogmas of. The religious dogmas of this strange sect are few and simple, but their superstitious ceremonies are numerous and diversified. The first article in their creed, "There is one God, and Mohammed is his prophet," is perpetually on their lips, and the knowledge of many of their votaries seems to go no further than this. They abstain from wine and strong drink, which appears to be the best feature in their system; they practice polygamy, believe in a sensual paradise after death, and propagate their religious tenets by the power of the sword. They are extremely superstitious, and wear amulets on their persons formed of small portions of the Koran, believing that these will preserve them from danger and promote their well-being.

Moister.

10,619. MOHAMMEDANISM, Secret of the Success of. Mohammed's creed we call a kind of Christianity. The truth of it is imbedded in portentous error and falsehood; but the truth of it makes it be believed, not the falsehood: it succeeded by its truth. A bastard kind of Christianity, but a living kind, with a heart-life in it; not dead, chopping, barren logic merely! Out of all that rubbish of Arab idolatries, argumentative theologies, traditions, subtleties, rumors and hypotheses of Greeks and Jews, with their idle wire-drawings, this wild man of the desert, with his wild sincere heart, earnest as death and life, with his great flashing natural eyesight, had seen into the kernel of the matter. Idolatry is nothing: "These wooden idols of yours, ye rub them with oil and wax, and the flies stick on them; these are wood I tell you! They can do nothing for you; they are an impotent blasphemous pretence: a horror and abomination, if ye knew them. God alone is; God alone has power; he made us, he can kill us and keep us alive; 'Allah akbar.' God is great. Understand that his will is the best for you; that howsoever sore to flesh and blood, you will find it the wisest, best; you are bound to take it so; in this world and in the next, you have no other thing that you can do!" And now, if the wild idolatrous men did believe this, and with their fiery hearts laid hold of it to do it, in what form soever it came to them, I say it is well worthy of being believed. Carlyle.

10,620. MOMENT, Importance of the Present. There is no moment like the present; not only so, but, moreover, there is no moment at all, that is, no instant force and energy, but in the present. The man who will not execute his resolutions when they are fresh upon him, can have no hope from them afterwards; they will be dissipated, lost, and perish in the hurry and skurry of the world, or sunk in the slough of indolence. Miss Edgeworth.

10,621. MONEY, Benefits of. By doing good with his money, a man, as it were, stamps the image of God upon it, and makes it pass current for the merchandise of heaven. Rutledge.

10,622. MONEY, Buried with His. It is related that a certain monk, an anchoress in Nitria, had accumulated one hundred crowns by weaving cloth. After his death his brethren met to decide what should be done with the money. Some proposed to give it to the poor, others to the church. The decision of the leaders, Macarius, Pambo, and Isidore, was that it should be cast into the grave of the deceased, and be buried with him, while the words were pronounced, "May thy money perish with thee." It struck such terror into the monks that none dared lay up any more money.

10,623. MONEY, How to Get. To get money, study and act out the Book of Proverbs.

S. Martin.

10,624. MONEY, Laughter over. A blind fiddler was laughed at, and the boy that led him cried, "Father, let us be gone; they do nothing but laugh at you." "Hold thy peace, boy," said the fiddler; "we shall have their money presently, and then we will laugh at them."

10,625. MONEY, Making. The first of all English games is making money. That is an all-absorbing game; and we knock each other down oftener in playing at that than at football, or any other roughest sport; and it is absolutely without purpose: no one who engages heartily in that game ever knows why. Ask a great money-maker what he wants to do with his money—he never knows. He doesn't make it to do anything with it. He gets it only that he may get it. "What will you make of what you have got?" you ask. "Well, I'll get more," he says. Just as, at cricket, you get more runs. There is no use in the runs, but to get more of them than other people is the game. So all that great foul city of London there—rattling, growling, smoking, stinking,—a ghastly heap of fermented brickwork, pouring out poison at every pore—you fancy it is a city of work? Not a street of it! It is a great city of play; very nasty play, and very hard play, but still play. It is only Lord's cricket-ground without the turf; a huge billiard-table without the cloth, and with pockets as deep as the bottomless pit; but mainly a billiard-table after all. Ruskin.

10,626. MONEY, Necessity for. Pelopidas, the Theban general, neglecting his business affairs, and spending his estate, was admonished that money was a very necessary thing. Pointing to a man who was both lame and blind, he said, "So it is for Nicomedes there."

10,627. MONEY, Profitless. An English merchant, who had accumulated three millions of money, for a long time before he died had a notion that he should die in the work-house. He used to work in his own garden, and one of his own men paid him 18s. a week for his labor.

10,628. MONEY, Rules for. John Wesley says, "Get all you can, save all you can, give all you can. Permit me to speak of myself as freely as I would of any other man. I gain all I can without hurting my body or soul. I save all I can; not wasting anything, not a sheet of paper, nor a cup of water. I do not lay out anything, not a shilling, unless a sacrifice for God; yet, by giving all I can, I am effectually secured from laying up treasures upon earth. Yea, and that I do this, I call upon both friends and foes to testify."

10,629. MONEY, Temptations of. Anaxander, the son of Eurycrates, to one asking him why the Spartans laid up no money in the exchequer, replied, that the keepers of it might not be tempted to be knaves. Plutarch.

10,630. MONEY, Test of. Here is the test, with every man, of whether money is the principal object with him or not. If in mid-life he could pause and say, "Now, have I enough to live upon, I'll live upon it; and having well-earned it, I will also well spend it, and go out of the world poorer as I came into it;" then money is not principal with him; but if, having enough to live upon in the manner befitting his character and rank, he still wants to make more, and to die rich, then money is the principal object with him, and it becomes a curse to himself, and generally to those who spend it after him. For you know it must be spent some day; the only question is whether the man who makes it shall spend it, or some one else. And generally it is better for the maker to spend it, for he will know best its value and use. This is the true law of life. Ruskin.

10,631. MONEY, Worship of. Your god, your great Bel, your fish-tailed Dagon, rises before me as a demon. You, and such as you, have raised him to a throne, put on him a crown, given him a sceptre. Behold how hideously he governs! See him busied at the work he likes best—making marriages. He binds the young to the old, the strong to the imbecile. He stretches out the arm of Mezentius, and fetters the dead to the living. In his realm there is hatred—secret hatred: there is disgust—unspoken disgust: there is treachery—family treachery: there is vice—deep, deadly, domestic vice. In his dominions, children grow unloving between parents who have never loved; infants are nursed in deception from their very birth; they are reared in an atmosphere corrupt with lies. Charlotte Brontë.

10,632. MONITORS, Employment of. Persons of the greatest eminence have anciently had their monitors. Agathocles, a Sicilian prince, has his earthen plate set before him, to remind him that he had been a potter. The Roman triumvirs, in the meridian of their splendor, had a servant behind them, crying to each—"Memento te esse hominem," that is—Remember that you are only a man. W. Secker.

10,633. MONOMANIAC, The Cure of. A. Some people are paralyzed for life by some monomania. They remind us of an invalid who was afflicted by the delusion that he was made of pipe-clay, and if violently struck against any object, he would snap into fragments! He was only cured by a friend, who drove him into a meadow, and managed to upset the vehicle in the right place. The poor monomaniac shrieked frightfully as the carriage went over; but he rose from the ground sound in mind as well as in body. Cuyler.

10,634. MONUMENT, Honorable Deeds a. When King Agesilaus was dying, he gave orders that there should be no fiction or counterfeit, as he called statues, made of him, adding, "For if I have done any honorable exploit, that is my monument; but if I have done none at all, your statues will signify nothing."

10,635. MONUMENT, Want of a. Cato the elder said, "I would rather men should ask why Cato had no statue than why he had one." It was his protest against the rage for statues, then the highest ambition of many worthless men.

10,636. MORALIST, Not Christian. A Christian is one who is positive. A Christian is a fruit-bearer. A moral man is a vine that does not bear fruit. But then it bears everything else—good leaves, a good strong stem, a healthy root, everything that is good and nice in it except the fruit. A Christian man is one that develops graces into positivity. He acts out of himself and upon others. A moral man is one that simply defends himself from the action of evil. A moral man is like an empty bottle, well corked, so that no defilement can get into it—so that it may be kept pure within. Pure? And what is the use of a bottle that is pure, if it is empty and corked up? A moral man, I repeat, is a negative. He does not swear, he does not steal, and he does not murder, and he does not get drunk, and his whole life is not. His language is, "Thou shalt not," and "Thou shalt not," and "Thou shalt not." He is not all over, and nothing more! He is not positive. Beecher.

10,637. MORALITY, Averaging. An irrelig-

ious man used to average his morality thus: "I am doing pretty well on the whole. I sometimes get mad and swear, but then I am strictly honest. I work on Sunday when I am particularly busy, but I give a good deal to the poor, and I never was drunk in my life." He hired a Scotchman to build a fence around his pasture lot, and gave him special instructions to make it strong. In the evening, he said to his man, "Well, Jock, is the fence built, and is it tight and strong?" "I canna say that it is all tight and strong," he replied, "but it's a good average fence, anyhow. If some parts of it are a little weak, other parts are extra strong. I don't know but I may have left a gap here and there a yard wide or so; but then I made up for it by doubling the number of rails on each side of the gap. I dare say, the cattle will find it a good fence on the whole, and will like it, though I canna just say that it is perfect in every part." "What!" cried the man, "Do you tell me that you have built a fence around my lot with weak places in it, and gaps in it? Why, you might as well build no fence at all. If there is one opening, or a place where an opening can be made, the cattle will be sure to find it, and all go through. Don't you know, man, that a fence must be perfect, or it is worthless?" "I used to think so," said the Scotchman; "but I hear you talk so much about averaging matters with the Lord, it seemed to me that we might try it with the cattle. If an average fence won't do for them, I am afraid that an average character won't do in the day of judgment."

10,638. MORALITY, Insufficiency of. The Rev. Father Taylor, of the Boston Sailors' Home, on one occasion preaching of the insufficiency of the moral principles without religious feelings, exclaimed, "Go heat your ovens with snow-balls! What! shall I send you to heaven with such an icicle in your pocket? I might as well put a millstone round your neck to teach you to swim!" Mrs. Jameson.

10,639. MORALS, Christian. The sages of antiquity perceived and announced many moral truths of the highest value, some of them synonymous with those of the New Testament. But what care men for moral truth when it is uttered only by one whom men esteem as a fellow-mortal equal with themselves, one who has no authority to prescribe duty, or to command obedience? Of what avail, in a moral estimate, was the wisdom of Plato, or the morals of Socrates, Seneca, or Tully! The moral precepts of Seneca were given to the Romans at the same time with those of Christ. In an age when the highest intelligence co-existed in the empire with the greatest profligacy, Seneca's morals had no more influence upon the character of those who received and believed them, than they had upon the statues in the Pantheon. Seneca himself was accused of profligacy; and he was both the instructor and the victim of the worst of the Romans. The people believed his precepts and grew worse, while those who believed the teaching weep again, till they gradually withdrew to their homes. The dresses they wore were such as they generally used, white, or any other color; but when they rose up to form a circle together, they put on a black veil over the upper parts of their persons."

10,658. MURDER a Part of Worship. In India there is a class called Thugs, who fancy they shall get an addition to their happiness hereafter for every human being they murder; so that murder is not only their trade, but is actually part and parcel of their daily worship!

Cumming.

10,659. MURDER, Steps to. A man who was condemned to be hung for murder, and awaited execution in prison, drew upon the walls of his cell the sketch of a man upon the gallows with five steps leading to the platform on which it stood. On the first step he wrote, "Disobedience to parents;" on the second step, "Sabbath breaking;" on the third step, "Gambling and drunkenness;" on the fourth step, "Murder;" on the fifth, "The Fatal Platform." It was doubtless a true sketch of his own progress in sin to disgrace and the murderer's doom.

10,660. MURDERER, Detection of a. A murder had been committed, and many persons were brought before the judge, but they all pleaded innocence. He bade them all bare their breasts, and then he laid his hand upon their hearts. Finding one whose heart beat harder than the rest, he said, "Thou art the author of this murder." Conscious of his guilt, his tell-tale heart betrayed him. He confessed the crime and was punished.

10,661. MURDERER, Good Character of a. Burke, a man who had committed sixteen murders, was considered a very respectable man, correct in his habits, affable and affectionate in his family. "A man may smile, and smile, and be a villain."

10,662. MURDERER, Horrors of a. Coleridge tells of an Italian who assassinated a nobleman in Rome, and fled to Hamburg for safety. He had not passed many weeks before, one day, in the crowded street, he heard his name called by a voice familiar to him: he turned short round, and saw the face of his victim looking at him with a fixed eye. From that moment he had no peace: at all hours, in all places, and amidst all companies, however engaged he might be, he heard the voice, and could never help looking around; and whenever he so looked round he always encountered the same face, staring close upon him. The Italian said he had struggled long, but life was a burden which he could now no longer bear; and he was resolved to return to Rome, to surrender himself to justice, and expiate his crime on the scaffold.

10,663. MURMURING, Fight Against. As the King of Syria said to his captains, "Fight neither with small nor great, but with the King of Israel;" so say I, fight not so much against this sin or that, but fight against your murmuring, which is a mother-sin; make use of all your Christian armor, make use of all the ammunition of heaven (Eph. 6: 10, 11), to destroy the mother; and in destroying of her you will destroy the daughters. When Goliath was slain, the Philistines fled; when a general in any army is cut off, the common soldiers are easily and quickly routed and destroyed. So destroy but murmuring, and you will quickly destroy disobedience, ingratitude, impatience, distrust, etc. O kill this mother-sin, that this may never kill thy soul! I have read of Sennacherib, that after his army was destroyed by an angel, and he returned home to his own country, he inquired of one about him what he thought the reason might be why God so favored the Jews. He answered that there was one Abraham their father that was willing to sacrifice his son to death at the command of God, and that ever since that time God favored that people. "Well," said Sennacherib, "if that be so, I have two sons, and I will sacrifice them both to death, if that will procure their God to favor me;" which when his two sons heard, they (as the story goeth) slew their father (Isa. 37: 38), choosing rather to kill than to be killed. So do thou choose rather to kill this mother-sin than to be killed by it.

Brooks.

10,664. MUSIC, Fable of. Maurice Connor, the blind Irish piper, could play an air which would set everything, alive or dead, capering. At the very first note of that tune the brogues began shaking upon the feet of all who heard it, old or young; then the feet began going, going from under them, and at last up and away with them, dancing like mad, whisking here, there and everywhere, like a straw in a storm—there was no halting while the music lasted. One day Maurice piped his tune on the sea-shore, and at once every inch of it was covered with all manner of fish, jumping and plunging about to the music; and every moment more and more would tumble out of the water, charmed by the wonderful tune. Crabs of monstrous size spun round and round on one claw with the nimbleness of a dancing master, and twirled and tossed their other claws about.

10,665. MUSIC, Heaven's Sweet. There are various sounds in nature all plaintive and sad: the voice of winds, the chime of waves, and the song of birds, are all in minor keys, as if all creation groaned, and travailed in pain, waiting for deliverance, that grand deliverance which is the burden of prophecy, when the great Composer shall transpose all her strains from the minor into the major, and the wild wail of nature shall give way to the glad harp of the everlasting jubilee, the joyous strain of which shall reverberate from heaven to earth, and the wide universe be as a whispering gallery, ever repeating its sweet music.

Dr. Cumming.

10,666. MUSIC, Indulgence in. Music is the only sensual gratification which mankind may indulge in to excess without injury to their moral or religious feelings.

Addison.

10,667. MUSIC, Influence of. The meaning of song goes deep. Who is there that, in logical words, can express the effect music has on us!

A kind of inarticulate, unfathomable speech, which leads us to the edge of the infinite, and lets us for moments gaze into that! Carlyle.

10,668. MUSIC, Mystery of. The greatest mystery of all art, perhaps, is music; the soul that leaps from the mere material chords and pipes, and, whilst it emanates from, plays upon the spirit of man: think of the harp, or—if you prefer the more common thing—the piano, the organ; what wonderful writing it is! Words, poems, paintings, marbles are quite coarse in comparison. The artist who performs upon the keys may, perhaps, be a mechanician, little more, and have very little apprehension of the inner spirit which created the wonderful relation of those notes and bars; but think what it was! The great musician himself cannot understand the mystery by which the inner hidden numbers came to represent unimaginable, and except in this way, unexpressible emotions and desires. The instrument is to the soul, perverse piece of wood, or wire, or brass, that it is, what the body of man is to his mind. Hood.

10,669. MUSIC, Spell of. Dr. Worgan has so touched the organ at St. John's, that I have been turning backward and forward over the prayer-book for the first lesson in Isaiah, and wondered that I could not find Isaiah there. The musician and the orator fall short of the full power of their science, if the hearer is left in possession of himself. R. Cecil.

10,670. MUSIC, Undying. Music, once admitted to the soul, becomes a sort of spirit, and never dies. It wanders perturbedly through the halls and galleries of the memory, and is often heard again, distinct and living as when it first displaced the wavelets of the air.

E. B. Lytton.

10,671. MUSIC, Universal. Music forms the universal language which, when all other languages were confounded, the confusion of Babel left unconfounded. The white man and the black man, the red man and the yellow man, can sing together, however difficult they may find it to be to talk to each other: and both sexes and all ages may thus express their emotions simultaneously. Prof. G. Wilson.

10,672. MYSTERIES, Confession of. It is not given to man to discover all the works and ways of God. Perhaps these, notwithstanding all our boasted discoveries and the pride of science, lie as unknown to us as the wide forest to the microscopic insect, whose life is a day, and whose world is a leaf—that narrow territory the scene of its most distant journeys, its country, its cradle, and its grave. With what modesty, then, should the highest intellect bear itself in presence of the Creator! These are sentiments which the great Laplace, unbeliever though he was, echoed in this, one of his last and not least memorable utterances "It is the little that we know; it is the great that remains unknown." Guthrie.

10,673. MYSTERIES, Divine. In the meditation of Divine mysteries, keep thy heart humble and thy thoughts holy: let philosophy not be ashamed to be confuted, nor logic blush to be confounded: what thou canst not prove approve; what thou canst not comprehend, believe; and what thou canst believe, admire; so shall thy ignorance be satisfied in thy faith, and thy doubts swallowed up with wonders. The best way to see daylight is to put out thy candle. Quarles.

10,674. MYSTERY, Key to. A French artisan questioned much the dispensations of Providence in the government of the world. One day, in visiting a ribbon manufactory, his attention was attracted by an extraordinary piece of machinery. Countless wheels and thousands of threads were twirling in all directions; he could understand nothing of its movements. He was informed however, that all this motion was connected with the center, where there was a chest which was kept shut. Anxious to understand the principle of the machine, he asked permission to see the interior, "The master has the key," was the reply. The words were like a flash of light. Here was the answer to all his perplexed thoughts. Yes; the Master has the key. He governs and directs all. It is enough.

10,675. MYSTERY, Reason for. An intelligent sceptic caviled much over the mysteries of Christianity. At length he was soundly converted. A friend asked him, "Well, my dear sir, and what do you think now of the doctrine of the resurrection?" "O, sir," he replied, "two words from Paul conquered me: 'Thou fool!' Do you see this Bible?" (taking up a beautiful copy of the scriptures, fastened with a silver clasp); "and will you read the words upon the clasp that shuts it?" His friend read, engraven on the silver clasp, "Thou fool!" "There," said he, "are the words that conquered me. It was no argument, no reasoning, no satisfying my objections; but God convincing me that I was a fool: and thenceforward I determined I would have my Bible clasped with those words, 'Thou fool!' and never again would come to the consideration of its sacred mysteries, but through their medium. I will remember that I am a fool, and God only is wise."

10,676. NAKED, Clothing the. It is said that a Russian soldier, one very cold night, kept duty between one sentry-box and another. A poor workingman, moved with pity, took off his coat and lent it to the soldier to keep him warm; adding, that he should soon reach home, while the soldier would be exposed out of doors for the night. The cold was so intense that the soldier was found dead in the morning. Sometime afterwards the poor man was laid on his death-bed, and in a dream saw Jesus appear to him. "You have got my coat on," said the man. "Yes, it is the coat you lent to me that cold night when I was on duty and you passed by. I was naked, and you clothed me."

10,677. NAME, A Bad. A good Quaker, who was especially averse to violence and bloodshedding, had a dog that he wished to be rid of, and so he pushed him out into the street, saying as he did so, "I will not kill thee, but

I will give thee a bad name;" and then he shouted aloud, "Mad dog! mad dog!" and so set the whole town upon his track to destroy him. Afterwards, when it was ascertained that the dog was not mad, it was too late to reverse the wrong done.

Dr. Curry.

10,678. NAME, A Good. Consider that the invisible thing called a good name is made up of the breath of numbers that speak well of you; so that, if by a disobliging word you silence the meanest, the gale will be less strong which is to bear up your esteem. And though nothing is so vain as the eager pursuit of empty applause, yet to be well thought of, and to be kindly used by the world, is like a glory about a woman's head; it is a perfume she carries about with her, and leaveth wherever she goeth; it is a charm against ill will. Malice may empty her quiver, but cannot wound; the dirt will not stick, the jests will not take; without the consent of the world, a scandal doth not go deep; it is only a slight stroke upon the injured party, and returneth with the greater force upon those that gave it.

Saville.

10,679. NAME, Inappropriate. Dr. Guthrie reports having read of one Rev. Mr. Scamp, who was, in a sense, always a scamp, yet was much esteemed while he lived, and died greatly lamented.

10,680. NAME, The Mighty. In the days of miracles, the name of Jesus carried with it the idea of his authority and the efficacy of his power. Uttered by the lips of faith, it was a word of resistless might. It healed disease, shed light on the darkness of the blind, and breathed warm life into the cold form of death. It mastered devils, controlled the powers of hell, and commanded the wildest elements of nature into instant obedience. Like Pharaoh's signet on Joseph's hand, he who used that name in faith, was endowed for the time with sovereign power. Powerful as was this sign when used by faith, yet on unbelieving lips no name was more useless. Like a residuum from which the ethereal spirit has been evaporated, or a body bereft of life, it possessed no virtue or power whatever. In mere name there was no charm either to pour light on a blind man's eye-ball, or restore vigor to a withered limb.

Dr. Guthrie.

10,681. NAMES, Importance of. There is much, nay almost all, in names. The name is the earliest garment you wrap round the earth, to which it thenceforth cleaves more tenaciously (for there are names that have lasted nigh thirty centuries) than the very skin. And now from without, what mystic influences does it not send inwards, even to the centre, especially in those plastic first-times, when the whole soul is yet infantine, soft; and the invisible seed-grain will grow to be an all-over-shadowing tree! Names? Could I unfold the influence of names, which are the most important of all clothings, I were a second great Trismegistus. Not only all common speech, out science—poetry itself—is no other, if thou consider it, than a right naming. Adam's first task was giving names to natural appearances. What is ours still but a continuation of the same, be the appearance exotic, vegetable, organic, mechanic, stars, or starry movements (as in science); or (as in poetry) passions, virtues, calamities, God, attributes, gods!

Carlyle.

10,682. NAMES, Need of. He that has complex ideas, without particular names for them, would be in no better case than a bookseller who had volumes that lay unbound and without title, which he could make known to others only by showing the loose sheets. Locke.

10,683. NATION, Prayer for the. During the Revolutionary war, General Washington's army was reduced at one time to great straits, and the people were greatly dispirited. One of them who left his home with an anxious heart, one day, as he was passing the edge of a wood near the camp, heard the sound of a voice. He stopped to listen, and looking between the trunks of the large trees, he saw General Washington engaged in prayer. He passed quietly on, that he might not disturb him; and on returning home, told his family, "America will prevail," and then related what he had heard and seen.

10,684. NATIONS, Crises of. There are brief crisis in which the drift of individual and national history is determined, sometimes unexpectedly; critical moments on which great decisions hang; days which, like a mountain in a plain, lift themselves above the dead level of common days into everlasting eminence. Our Day of Independence was such a day; so was the day of Marathon, and the day of Waterloo. Napoleon admitted that the Austrians fought grandly on the field of Rivoli, and said, "They failed because they do not understand the value of minutes." Humboldt refers the discovery of America to "a wonderful concatenation of trivial circumstances," including a flight of parrots.

Dr. Foss.

10,685. NATURAL MAN, Door to the. The abbot Timothy, told Poemen, of a woman in a neighboring town, who was a sinner; "Yet," said he, "the woman has elements of good in her. She is spoken of as very charitable to the poor." Poemen answered, "If there is a rent in the clouds the sun will shine through." Still later he was informed that the woman was going on in the same way. He said, "Do not be afraid; she will serve God in the end." At last the sinning woman come herself to visit Poemen. His gentleness and boundless charity won her heart. She become thoroughly penitent, poured out floods of tears, and resolved to abandon sin and live to God alone. She afterwards lived a holy life.

10,686. NATURAL MAN, Evidence from the. You might as well try to write with pen and ink on the rubbish from which paper is manufactured as expect legible evidence for the truth of the gospel in the life and spirit of one who has not gotten a "clean heart," who has not been born again.

Arnot.

10,687. NATURAL MAN, Impotence of the. If the ship launched, rigged, and with her sails spread cannot stir, till the wind come fair, and fills them; much less can the timber, that lies in the carpenter's yard, hew and frame itself into a ship. If the living tree cannot grow, except the root communicates its sap, much less can a dead rotten stake in the hedge, which hath no root, live of its own accord. In a word, if a Christian, that hath his spiritual life of grace, cannot exercise this life without strength from above, then surely one void of this new life, dead in sin and trespasses, can never be able to beget this in himself, or concur to the production of it. The state of unregeneracy is a state of impotency. "When we were without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly" (Rom. 5: 6). And as Christ found the lump of mankind covered with the ruins of their lapsed estate (no more able to raise themselves from under the weight of God's wrath, which lay upon them, than one buried under the rubbish of a fallen house, is to free himself of that weight without help), so the Spirit finds sinners in as helpless a condition, as unable to repent or believe on Christ for salvation, as they were of themselves to purchase it.

Gurnall.

10,688. NATURAL MAN, Inability of the. In his lapsed and sinful state, man is not capable, of and by himself, either to think, to will, or to do, that which is really good; but it is necessary for him to be regenerated and renewed in his intellect, affections, or will, and in all his powers, by God in Christ through the Holy Spirit, that he may be qualified rightly to understand, esteem, consider, will, and perform whatever is truly good. I ascribe to divine grace the commencement, the continuance, and the consummation of all good; and to such an extent do I carry its influence, that a man, though already regenerate, can neither conceive, will, nor do any good at all, nor resist any evil temptation, without this preventing and exciting, this following and co-operating grace.

Arminius.

10,689. NATURAL MAN, Spots of the. Every man hath a double spot on him, the heart spot and the life spot; the spot of original, and the spots of actual sins. But Christ was without either. 1 Pet. 1: 19.

John Flavel.

10,690. NATURE, Admiration for. A pious acquaintance, remarkable for the quaint shrewdness of his observations, one day, when walking in a garden, having pulled a flower of exquisite loveliness, after expressing, in his own characteristic way, his admiration of its various beauties, took up a clod of the soil in his other hand, and naively, but emphatically, exclaimed, "What but Almighty power could extract that from this?"

Duncan.

10,691. NATURE alone Antique. It struck me much, as I sat by the Kubbach one silent noontide, and watched it flowing, gurgling, to think how this same streamlet had flowed and gurgled through all changes of weather and of fortune, from beyond the earliest date of history. Yes, probably on the morning when Joshua forded Jordan; even as at the mid-day when Cæsar, doubtless with difficulty, swam the Nile, yet kept his Commentaries dry—this little Kubbach, assiduous as Tiber, Eurotas, or Siloa, was murmuring on across the wilderness, as yet unnamed, unseen: here, too, as in the Euphrates and the Ganges, is a vein or veinlet of the grand world-circulation of waters, which, with its atmospheric arteries, has lasted and lasts, simply with the world. Thou fool! Nature alone is antique, and the oldest art a mushroom; that idle crag thou sittest on is six thousand years of age.

Carlyle.

10,692. NATURE, Beauty of. The various productions of nature were not made for us to tread upon, nor only to feed our eyes with their grateful variety, or to bring a sweet odor to us; but there is a more internal beauty in them for our minds to prey upon, did we but penetrate beyond the surface of these things into their hidden properties.

Bp. Patrick.

10,693. NATURE, Blot in. Ruskin says:—"The Savoyard's cottage, standing in the midst of an inconceivable, inexpressible beauty, set on some sloping bank of golden sward, with clear fountains flowing beside it, and wild flowers, and noble trees, and goodly rocks, gathered round into a perfection as of Paradise, is itself a dark and plague-like stain in the midst of the gentle landscape. Within a certain distance of its threshold the ground is foul and cattle-trampled; its timbers are black with smoke, its garden choked with weeds and nameless refuse, its chambers empty and joyless, the light and wind gleaming and filtering through the crannies of their stones." Man is the blot on the landscape, the discord in the harmony of nature, the stranger and alien, who walks blindly amid God's glorious works.

10,694. NATURE, Calm of. Surely, there is something in the unruffled calm of nature that overawes our little anxieties and doubts: the sight of the deep-blue sky, and the clustering stars above, seems to impart a quiet to the mind.

Edwards.

10,695. NATURE, Cause of. How often might a man, after he had jumbled a set of letters in a bag, fling them upon the ground before they would fall into an exact poem, yea, or so much as make a good discourse in prose! And may not a little book be as easily made by chance as this great volume of the world? How long might a man be in sprinkling colors upon a canvas with a careless hand before they could happen to make the exact picture of a man? And is a man easier made by chance than his picture? How long might twenty thousand blind men, which should be sent out from the several remote parts of England, wander up and down before they would all meet in Salisbury Plains, and fall into rank and file in the exact order of an army? And yet this is much more easy to be imagined than how the innumerable blind parts of matter should rendezvous themselves into a world.

Tillotson.

10,696. NATURE, Confidence from. It is truly a most Christian exercise to extract a sentiment of piety from the works and appearances of nature. Our Saviour expatiates on a flower, and draws from it the delightful argument of confidence in God. He gives us to see that taste may be combined with piety, and that the same heart may be occupied with all that is serious in the contemplations of religion, and be, at the same time, alive to the charms and loveliness of nature.

Chalmers.

10,697. NATURE, Considering. Nothing can be more ungrateful than to pass over the works of God without consideration. To study them is among the highest gratifications the human mind can enjoy, provided the study is conducted upon religious principles. The book of Nature is open to all. "On every leaf, 'Creator, God,' is written."

Mrs. Trimmer.

10,698. NATURE, Delight in. Better for a man never to have seen them, or to see them with the eyes of a brute, stupid and unconscious of what he beholds, than not to be able to say: "The Maker of all these wonders is my friend!" Their eyes have never been opened to see that they are trifles; mine have been, and will be till they are closed forever. They think a fine estate, a large conservatory, a hot-house rich as a West-Indian garden, things of consequence; visit them with pleasure, and muse upon them with ten times more. I am pleased with a frame of four lights, doubtful whether the few panes it contains will ever be worth a farthing; amuse myself with a greenhouse, which Lord Bute's gardener could take upon his back and walk away with; and when I have paid it the accustomed visit, and watered it, and given it air, I say to myself,—"This is not mine; 'tis a plaything lent me for the present; I must leave it soon."

10,699. NATURE, Economy of. In nature, all is managed for the best with perfect frugality and just reserve, profuse to none, but bountiful to all; never employing on one thing more than enough, but with exact economy retrenching the superfluous, and adding force to what is principal in everything.

Shaftesbury.

10,700. NATURE, Exhaustless Beauty of. Nature has scattered around us, on every side, and for every sense, an inexhaustible profusion of beauty and sweetness, if we will but perceive it. The pleasures we derive from musical sounds, and the forms of trees, are surely not given us in vain; and if we are constantly alive to these, we can never be in want of subjects of agreeable contemplation, and must be habitually cheerful.

Basil Hall.

10,701. NATURE, Force of. Nature always springs to the surface, and manages to show what she is. It is vain to stop or try to drive her back. She breaks through every obstacle, pushes forward, and at last makes for herself a way.

Boileau.

10,702. NATURE, Imitation of. Nature imitates herself. A grain thrown into good ground brings forth fruit; a principle thrown into a good mind brings forth fruit. Everything is created and conducted by the same Master: the root, the branch, the fruits; the principles, the consequences.

Pascal.

10,703. NATURE, Intention of. Nature intends that, at fixed periods, men should succeed each other by the instrumentality of death. We shall never outwit Nature; we shall die as usual.

Fontenelle.

10,704. NATURE, Laws of. In the laws of nature we have not blind intellectual fatalities, but expressions of divine volitions. Oersted never wrote a finer truth than that the conception of the universe is incomplete if not comprehended as a constant and continuous work of the Eternally-creating Spirit; nor Emerson, in relation to the same fact, "that it takes as much life to conserve as to create." Because of these great verities is it that to study the laws of nature is in reality to study the modes of God's action; that science is simply a "history of the divine operations in matter and mind; that the world, with all its antiquity, is every moment a new creation—the song of the morning stars unsuspended and unsuspendable to the ear that will listen for it,—a virgin to every wooer of the beautiful and the true.

Grindon.

10,705. NATURE, Lesson from. Nothing surely can be better adapted to turn man's thoughts off his own self-sufficiency than the works of nature. Wherever he rests his attention, whether on matter organized, or unorganized; there he will discover convincing evidence of his own ignorance; and at the same time, the omnipotence of a first great cause will be impressed on his mind, and influence his understanding.

Maunder.

10,706. NATURE, Perfection of. The British Museum possessed in the Portland Vase one of the finest remains of ancient art; and it may be remembered how, some years ago, the world of taste was shocked to hear that this precious relic had been shattered by a maniac hand. Without disparaging classic taste or that exquisite example of it, I will venture to say, that there is not a poor worm which we tread upon, not a rare leaf, that, like a ruined but reckless man, dances merrily in its fallen state to the autumn winds, but has superior claims upon our study and our admiration. The child who plucks a rose to pieces, or crushes the fragile form of a fluttering insect, destroys a work which the highest art could not invent, nor man's best skilled hand construct. That champion of the truth dealt the atheist a crushing blow, who told him that the very feather with which he penned the words, "There is no God," refuted the audacious lie.

Dr. Guthrie.

10,707. NATURE, Sacredness of. To those who believe in God, and try to see God in all things, the most minute natural phenomenon cannot be secular. It must be divine—deliberately divine; and I can use no less lofty word. The grain of dust can no more go from God's presence, or flee from God's Spirit, than you or I can. If it go up to the physical heaven, and float—as it actually often does—far above the clouds, in those higher strata of the atmosphere which the aeronaut has never visited, even there it will be obeying physical laws, which we term hastily laws of nature, but which are really laws of God; and if it go down into the abyss, if it be buried fathoms, miles, below the surface, and become an atom of some rock in the process of consolidation, has it escaped from God, even in the bowels of the earth? Is it not there obeying the will and mind of God? Kingsley.

10,708. NATURE, Study of. It is to be lamented, that many who have made great discoveries, and been justly celebrated for their deep researches into the works of God our Creator, have extolled the work, but forgotten the hand who formed it. With pleasure, however, we can read an instance to the contrary in the great Linnæus. "The deeper he penetrated into the secrets of nature, the more he admired the wisdom of the Creator. He praised this wisdom in his works, recommended it by his speeches, and honored it in his actions. Wherever he found an opportunity of expatiating on the greatness, the providence, and omnipotence of God, which frequently happened in his lectures and botanical excursions, his heart glowed with a celestial fire, and his mouth poured forth torrents of admirable eloquence." This great man died on the 10th of January, 1778. Buck.

10,709. NATURE, Teachings of. When children meet with primroses, nuts, or apples in their way, I see those pleasures are oftentimes occasions to make them loiter in their errands, so that they are sure to have their parents' displeasure, and oftentimes their late return finds a barred entrance to their home; whereas those who meet with dangers in the way, make haste in their journey, and their speed makes them welcomed with commendation. Nature hath sent me abroad into the world, and I am every day traveling homeward. If I meet with store of miseries in my way, discretion shall teach me a religious haste in my journey. And if I meet with pleasures, they shall pleasure me only by putting me in mind of my pleasures at home, which shall teach me to scorn these as worse than trifles. I will never more reckon a troublesome life a curse, but a blessing. A pleasant journey is dear bought with the loss of home. Warwick.

10,710. NATURE, Unchangeable. A certain man bought a Blackamoor, and thinking that the color of his skin arose from the neglect of his former master, he no sooner brought him home than he procured all manner of scouring apparatus, scrubbing-brushes, soaps, and sand, paper, and set to work, with his servants, to wash him white again. They drenched and rubbed him for an hour, but all in vain; his skin remained as black as ever; while the poor wretch all but died from the cold he caught under the operation. No human means avail of themselves to change a nature originally evil. Æsop.

10,711. NATURE, Wrath and Love in. Wrath and threatening are invariably mingled with love, and in the utmost solitudes of nature the existence of hell seems to me as legibly declared by a thousand spiritual utterances as of heaven. It is well for us to dwell with thankfulness on the unfolding of the flower, and the falling of the dew, and the sleep of the green fields in the sunshine; but the blasted trunk, the barren rock, the moaning of the bleak winds, the roar of the black, perilous whirlpools and the mountain streams, the solemn solitudes of moors and seas, the continual fading of all beauty into darkness, of all strength into dust—have these no language for us? We may seek to escape their teachings by reasonings touching the good which is wrought out of all evil, but it is vain sophistry. The good succeeds to the evil as the day succeeds to the night, but so also the evil to the good. Ebal and Gerizim, birth and death, light and darkness, heaven and hell, divide the existence of man and his futurity. Ruskin.

10,712. NECESSITIES, Small. We ought to be thankful to nature for having made those things which are necessary easy to be discovered; while other things that are difficult to be known, are not necessary. Epicurus.

10,713. NECESSITY, Abuse of. The word "necessary" is miserably applied. It disordereth families, and overturneth government, by being so abused. Remember that children and fools want everything because they want judgment to distinguish; and therefore there is no stronger evidence of a crazy understanding than the making too large a catalogue of things necessary. Lord Halifax.

10,714. NEGLECT, Atoning for. Arsenius was the tutor of Arcadius and Honorius, the sons of the Emperor Theodosius, having the responsibility of their education. He lived in great splendor at the court of the emperor in Constantinople, neglecting his great duty to the future emperors. Not a noble lesson did he impress upon his pupils. As emperor Arcadius was characterized by his utter incompetency, and weakness, and Honorius by his frivolity, devoting his attention to poultry breeding instead of governing his empire. Their tutor fled to the desert to escape, if possible, all reminders of his neglected duty. The hermits hailed him as the father of the emperors. It was the keenest sarcasm, but well deserved. He fled from them to seek entire solitude in the wildest waste. There in absolute silence and constant remorse, he spent the long years. Men visited his cave, but could never induce him to speak. He wept till the lashes were worn from his eyelids, hoping by his austerities to atone for his sins of omission which had degraded the Empire, through the faults and weakness of its rulers. Thus he continued till his death.

10,715. NEGLECT, Conduct under. When you meet with neglect, let it rouse you to exertion, instead of mortifying your pride. Set about lessening those defects which expose you to neglect, and improve those excellencies which command attention and respect. S. Smith.

10,716. NEGLECT, A Momentary. Rev. Mr. Ware said that in visiting the Insane Asylum, on Blackwell's Island, he saw a poor man who wrung his hands, and cried, "O, that I only had!" "O, that I only had!" When spoken to, he would always reply with the greatest agony expressed in every feature.

and this was all he was ever known to say month after month, "O, that I only had." Mr. Ware asked the keeper the cause of this self-accusation, and was informed that the man had been a watchman at one of the railroad bridges, and when the bridge was open it was his duty to throw up a signal light to warn any approaching train of danger. One dark night, when the bridge was open, the watchman failed to give the signal, and a whole train was wrecked and many lives were lost. When the authorities looked for him, they found a lunatic whose only cry was "O, that I only had." For a moment he failed to do that which was required of him, and that failure sent many to an untimely grave, and destroyed his own reason. On the other shore the corrupter of souls will see his ruinous work and will find occasion for the wail, "O that I only had."

10,717. NEGLECT, Parable of. A Jewish parable says, that a king invited his servants to a festival. Some of these prepared and adorned themselves, and waited at the door till he should pass in; others said there would be time enough for this, as the feast would be a long time in preparing, and so went about their ordinary business. The latter, when the king demanded suddenly the presence of his guests, had no time to change their apparel; but were obliged to appear before him in sordid garments as they were. He was displeased, and would not allow them to taste of his banquet, but made them stand by while the others feasted.

10,718. NEGLIGENCE, Evil Results of. The best ground untilled, soonest runs out into rank weeds. A man of knowledge that is either negligent or uncorrected, cannot but grow wild and godless.

Bishop Hall.

10,719. NEIGHBOR, Good. Themistocles, according to Plutarch, had a farm for sale. He sent out a crier to proclaim its advantages, and particularly to declare that it had a good neighbor. The point was well made; all want good neighbors. To have such, we must be such. Christianity makes good neighborhood. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Then we shall have no bad neighbors.

10,720. NEIGHBOR, Hatred of. Uladislaus Locticus, King of Poland, went to view the dead on a field of battle. Florianus Sharus, a knight, lay wounded, his hands holding his bowels, to keep them from gushing out. "How great is the torment of this man!" said the king. Sharus replied that "There was a greater torment, and that was to dwell with an illdisposed neighbor, which," he said, "I can testify from experience." "Well," saith the king, "if thou recoverest from thy wound, I will ease thee of thy illneighbor." The man got well, and the king kept his promise, and not only turned out the person complained of, but gave the whole village to Sharus.

10,721. NEIGHBOR, Our. Our neighbor is man! wherever he may be found, whatever may be the color of his skin, into whatever pit of misery and degradation he may have fallen. Neither principalities, nor powers, nor things present or to come, can ever break up that heaven-created relation.

Burritt.

10,722. NEIGHBOR, Power over a. Sextus Marius invited his neighbor, with whom he was offended, to be his guest for two days. On the first of these two days he pulled down his neighbor's farm-house; the second, he had it rebuilt larger and better than before. This he did to show what good or ill he could do them at his pleasure.

10,723. NEIGHBOR, Who is my. Luke 10: 29. The heading of this chapter in our English Bible supplies a good answer: "Christ teacheth the lawyer how to take every one for his neighbor that needeth his mercy." An illustrative answer to the question may be found in the comparison of two Old Testament texts, Exod. 23: 45, with Deut. 22: 1-4; where the Jews were enjoined to pursue the same law of kindness towards an "enemy," one "that hateth thee," as to a brother, one of the same race and kindred. The sight of distress or helplessness is all that true kindness needs to find a neighbor! St. Paul, in Rom. 13: 8, 9, extends the love of our neighbor to the widest limit: "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law," which he makes synonymous with "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

10,724. NERVES, Sympathy of the. When the nerves, from long habit, have been accustomed to transmit their messages from distinct parts, and are suddenly cut off from them, they still retain along their trunks the sympathetic or sensational actions. Thus, a man who has had a leg amputated will feel distinctly along the course of the trunk of the nerve sensations from toes which no longer exist. The mind also is influenced by this; and frequently this peculiar direct nervous action can only be allayed by that which is negative and reflex. A curious instance occurred within my own experience. An old sailor suffered much from this; he retained his diseased foot too long, but at last consented to amputation. I knew him only with a wooden leg. When he had his nervous pains, he always called for hot water, into which he put his wooden stump. If told of his folly in supposing that such a proceeding could do any good, he would become enraged, and his paroxysm of pain would increase; but if gratified he took things easy, and the process actually appeared to do him good, though all must know there could be no real benefit. Still, here is the effect of mind over matter.

Ridge.

10,725. NERVOUSNESS, Influence of. He experiences that nervous agitation to which brave men as well as cowards are subject; with this difference, that the one sinks under it, like the vine under the hail-storm, and the other collects his energies to shake it off, as the cedar of Lebanon is said to elevate its boughs to disperse the snow which accumulates upon them.

Sir Walter Scott.

10,726. NERVOUS SYSTEM, The. So delicate is the fine tracery of the nervous structure, that the damage of a single fibre or a set of fibres destroys the unity of the whole. It is like a grand orchestra, in which one instrument alone out of time or tune disturbs the harmony of the rest, and the finest musical composition in the world is entirely spoiled by its discord. And this serious evil is apparent, not only in old age, but even in the young, in whom the disastrous consequences of injury to the brain, etc., are far more important both to themselves and to the world.

Dr. Forbes Winslow.

10,727. NEUTRALITY, Picture of. When the papists were displeased with Erasmus, on account of his neutrality, they painted him as hanging between heaven and earth; indicating thereby that he belonged to neither, or rather, that he was as unfit to go to heaven as to live upon earth.

Wilson.

10,728. NEW BIRTH, Alternative of the. One evening a pastor spoke to a very cultivated and moral young lady, saying, "Except a man be born again, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. And if not heaven, what then? There is but one other place, and that is hell!" She trusted in her morality and was offended. That night she dreamed that the day of judgment, had come and saw the Judge seated upon the clouds, and felt herself irresistibly drawn towards him. The words, "If not born again, not heaven; and if not heaven, hell," rang in her ears. She awoke in great terror and began to call on God for mercy. Her repentance was thorough, her conversion clear, and her death a few years after triumphant.

10,729. NEW BIRTH, Change by. To hew a block of marble from the quarry, and carve it into a noble statue—to break up a waste wilderness, and turn it into a garden of flowers—to melt a lump of iron-stone, and forge it into watch-springs; all these are mighty changes. Yet they all come short of the change which every child of Adam requires; for they are merely the same thing in a new form—the same substance in a new shape. But man requires the grafting in of that which he had not before. He needs a change as great as a resurrection from the dead. He must become a new creature. Old things must pass away, and all things must become new. He must be born again—born from above—born of God. The natural birth is not a whit more necessary to the life of the body than is the spiritual birth to the life of the soul.

Ryle.

10,730. NEW BIRTH, Change in. Chrysostom ingeniously remarks that the animals which went out of Noah's ark went out the same as they came in. The crow went out a crow, the fox a fox, and the porcupine, all armed with its living arrows, was a porcupine still. But the church transforms the animals she receives into her bosom, not by any change in their substance, but by the extirpation of their sin. Like unto a crow that sinner entered the church, who, having hardened his heart by delaying repentance, ever croaked to the same tune, "To-morrow, to-morrow," now, behold, he goes out mourning like a dove. Like unto a spiteful fox that swindler entered the church, who built his house on the ruin of his competitors; and behold, he goes out more harmless than a lamb, willing to sacrifice his own interests for the welfare of others. And that impatient, quarrelsome man, who made every one smart who touched him, came here like unto a bristly porcupine; and behold, he goes away like a loving spaniel that is tractable and gentle to all. And what new creatures have we here? The magic viands of a Circe formerly metamorphosed men into brutes; but such is not the effect of our gracious food—it rather changes the brutes into true men.

Segneri.

10,731. NEW BIRTH, Death and. Those born once, die twice—they die a temporal and an eternal death. But those who are born twice, die only once; for over them the second death hath no power.

Anon.

10,732. NEW BIRTH, Mystery of the. Rev. George Whitefield, having occasion to write to Dr. Franklin, in a letter, dated August 17, 1752, said, "I find you grow more and more famous in the learned world. As you have made a pretty considerable progress in the mysteries of electricity, I would now humbly recommend to your diligent, unprejudiced pursuit and study, the mystery of the new birth. It is a most important, interesting study; and when, mastered, will richly answer and repay you for all your pains. One, at whose bar we are shortly to appear, hath solemnly declared without it we cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. You will excuse this freedom. I must have something of Christ in all my letters."

10,733. NEW BIRTH, Necessity of the. A Hindoo said to a native priest, "I am sure that if I lead a good life, and do what is right, giving up my bad habits, God will be pleased with me, and receive me into heaven." He replied, "You know the Babool tree (a tree with long and sharp thorns). Now, suppose you break off from its branches a hundred or more of the nasty thorns that it has, will the tree on that account cease to be a Babool tree? Certainly not. Suppose you should apparently succeed in breaking off one or another, or even many of your evil ways and habits, you would yet remain an evil tree, i. e., a naturally bad man. You must have an entire new nature; must become a new man, in order to please God; and only Christ can give you a new heart."

10,734. NEW BIRTH, Need for. It makes but little difference whether a man give up the kingdom of heaven altogether or attempt to enter it without being "born again." In either case he continues dead in trespasses and sins. The difference is that of a corpse with all the offensive accompaniment of death upon it, and that of a dead man embalmed and his nakedness covered with goodly clothing. In the one case he lies in acknowledged lifelessness—in the other, his cadaverous form is clothed in garments, and placed in the attitude of life, so as to exclude the idea of death; but stiffened limbs, and a countenance of death-like expression in the mummy, betray its case.

Salter.

10,735. NEW BIRTH, Nobility of the. Our new birth makes us more honorable than our natural birth, let our birth-right dignities be what they will. The children of nobles are, by nature, the children of wrath, even as others; Omnis sanguis concolor, all blood is of one color: it is all tainted in Adam, and mingled together in his posterity. "There is no king," saith Seneca, "which rose not from a servant; there is no servant which rose not from a king."

Flavel.

10,736. NEW BIRTH, Objections to the, Overcome. Cyprian, of Carthage, was of noble family, and was surrounded with all the advantages of wealth and rank. He rode through the city splendidly attired and attended by a pompous retinue. Heathen as he was, he staggered at the doctrine of the new birth. He wrote to Donatus, "I could not conceive how a man could receive the principles of a new life, cease to be what he was before, and become quite a new person, though retaining the same bodily constitution. How can I leave off, suddenly, old and radical customs? How can one who remains in the midst of the objects which have so long charmed his senses, strip himself of his former inclinations and inveterate habits, closely riveted in the very frame of his being? How rarely does a man become content with plain apparel and unornamented dress, who has been used to sparkle in gold, and jewels, and embroidered garments!" From such thoughts as these Cyprian concluded that any considerable change was impossible to him, despaired of a cure, and hugged the chain of his vicious practices, which had become a part of himself. In spite of all this unbelief the change came. He says, "The Spirit of God descended upon me, and I became a new creature. All my difficulties were surprisingly cleared, my doubts were resolved, and all my former darkness was dispelled. Things appeared easy to me which before I had looked upon as difficult and discouraging. I was convinced that I was able to do and suffer all that which before had seemed impossible. I then saw that the earthly principle which I derived from my first birth exposed me to sin and death, but that the new principle which I had received from the Spirit of God in the new birth, gave me new ideas and inclinations, and directed all my views to God." This shows how strikingly similar is the conversion of a heathen of the third century to that of a sinner of the nineteenth. It was followed by a life of eminent piety and the martyr's death.

10,737. NEW BIRTH, Waiting for the. Rev. C. P. Hard gives an account of a man who, from ten years of age, was profane, intemperate, and unrestrained in sin. Years of dissipation brought on delirium tremens. He then saw his degradation, and prayed earnestly to God for deliverance. Incessantly he prayed. At noon he stood between two large stores in the village street with closed eyes. People said he was drunk or crazy. Some one asked him why he stood there. He answered, "I am waiting to be born again." He was called to dinner, but refused to go. At supper time he stood there still praying and waiting. The transformation had begun. He soon rejoiced as a new creature in Christ, and demonstrated the change by a new life.

10,738. NEW JERUSALEM, Parallel of the. In its general plan, the symbolical city presents a striking resemblance to the description of Echatana, furnished by the father of secular history. "Of this city, one wall encompassed another, and each rose by the height of its battlements above the one beyond it. The ground, which was a circular hill, favored this construction; but it owed still more to the labors bestowed upon the work. The orbicular walls were seven in number; within the last stood the royal palace and the treasures. The largest of the walls nearly equaled the circumference of Athens. The battlements of this outer wall were white; those of the second, black; of the third, purple; of the fourth, blue; of the fifth, orange; all the battlements being thus covered with a pigment. Of the last two walls, the battlements of the one were plated with silver, those of the other with gold. Thus the Median city consisted of seven circular terraces, each distinguished by the color of its wall; whereas the Apocalyptic city is described as a quadrangle of twelve stages or foundations; but the points of coincidence are highly illustrative of the emblematic description. The precious stones of which the walls of the holy city appeared to consist, whatever mystical or symbolical significance may attach to them, are obviously intended to describe the color of each resplendent elevation; and although the colors do not occur in the precise prismatic order, the combination would have the general effect of a double rainbow.

Josiah Conder.

10,739. NEWSPAPERS, Power of. They preach to the people daily, weekly; admonishing kings themselves; advising peace or war with an authority which only the first reformers and a long-past class of popes were possessed of, inflicting moral censure; imparting moral encouragement, consolation, edification; in all ways diligently "administering the discipline of the church." It may be said, too, that in private disposition the new preachers somewhat resemble the mendicant friars of old times; outwardly, full of holy zeal; inwardly, not without stratagem, and hunger for terrestrial things.

Carlyle.

10,740. NEW YEAR, Beginning of the. There exists a very beautiful custom in Germany, which it would be well to imitate everywhere. On the first day of the New Year, whatever may have been the quarrels or estrangement between friends and relatives, mutual visits are interchanged, kindly greetings given and received—all is forgotten and forgiven. Let this custom begin with reconciliation to God, then friendship and fellowship may be found that shall be blessed and lasting.

10,741. NIGHT, Study at. There is a reason why students prefer the night to the day for their labors. Through the day their thoughts are diverted into a thousand streams; but at night they settle into pools which, deep and undisturbed, reflect the stars. But night labor, in time, will destroy the student; for it is marrow from his own bones with which he fills his lamp.

Beecher.

10,742. NIGHT, Tranquillity of. I cannot think without admiration and gratitude on the tender care of Providence to secure us repose at night. When the day closes, a calm is spread over all nature, which proclaims to every creature a rest from labor, and invites mankind to sleep. During the time destined for the repose of man, nature, in favor of him, suspends noise, dazzling light, and every lively impression. All animals whose activity might disturb our sleep have themselves occasion to sleep. The birds seek their nests; the horse, the ox, and our other domestic animals sleep around us. But this tranquillity in the night is not equally agreeable to everybody. Many, who from pain, sickness, and other accidents, pass restless nights, wish this calm, this melancholy silence interrupted. Their sufferings and their uneasiness seem to increase, whilst all are asleep around them. They reckon the hours, and are impatient for day, in the hope that society will be some relief to them. Many wicked people also, who pass the day in continual disorder and dissipation, find the tranquillity of the night painful and troublesome. It awakens their conscience, and the least noise frightens them. Health and peace of mind procure the sweetest sleep. God has disposed all things happily to give us a quiet repose.

Sturm.

10,743. NIGHT, Works of. The day is given us to work in; and, therefore, in the morning, as soon as we have our day before us, we should endeavor "to walk honestly." Night-works are commonly works of uncleanness, violence, dishonor; and, therefore, want a cover of darkness to hide them. Thieves use to come in the night. The eye of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, "No eye shall see me"—and disguiseth himself. In the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night, he goeth to the house of the strange woman. The oppressor diggeth through houses in the dark. For "the morning is to them as the shadow of death." "They that are drunken, are drunken in the night." Sins are of the nature of some sullen weeds, which will grow nowhere but in the side of wells, and of dark places. But works of Christianity are neither unclean, nor dishonorable; they are beautiful and royal works, they are exemplary, and, therefore, public works; they are themselves light! "Let your light so shine before men;" and, therefore, they ought to be done in the light.

Bp. Reynolds.

10,744. NO, Absence of. It was said of the people of Asia that they were all slaves to one man, because they could not pronounce the word "No."

10,745. NO, Advice on. Learn to say—No! and it will be of more use to you than to be able to read Latin.

Spurgeon.

10,746. NO Described. No is a surly, honest fellow, speaks his mind rough and round at once.

Scott.

10,747. NO, Importance of. The monosyllable No, one of the easiest learned by the child, but the most difficult to practice by the man, contains within it the import of a life, and the weal or woe of an eternity.

J. Johnson.

10,748. NOBILITY, Patriotic. Epaminondas, through jealousy, was not chosen general in a war that needed a most skillful leader. One was taken who was little skilled in military arts, and Epaminondas went as a private. Disaster followed the new general, and the army was brought into almost inextricable difficulty. All looked inquiringly for Epaminondas. Regardless of the injury or the repulse they had offered him, he came forth cheerfully and delivered the army from its peril, and conducted it in safety home again.

10,749. NOBILITY, Real. We must have kings we must have nobles; nature is always providing such in every society; only let us have the real instead of the titular. In every society, some are born to rule, and some to advise. The chief is the chief all the world over, only not his cap and plume. It is only this dislike of the pretender which makes men sometimes unjust to the true and finished man.

Emerson.

10,750. NOBODY, Deeds of. The power of Nobody is becoming so enormous in England, and he alone is responsible for so many proceedings, both in the way of commission and omission; he hath so much to answer for, and is so constantly called to account; that a few remarks upon him may not be ill-timed. The hand which this surprising person had in the late war is amazing to consider. It was he who left the tents behind, who left the baggage behind, who chose the worst possible ground for encampments, who provided no means of transport, who killed the horses, who paralyzed the commissariat, who knew nothing of the business he proposed to know and monopolized, who decimated the English army. It was Nobody who gave out the famous unroasted coffee; it was Nobody who made the hospitals more horrible than language can describe; it was Nobody who occasioned all the dire confusion of Balaklava harbor; it was even Nobody who ordered the fatal Balaklava cavalry charge. The non-relief of Kars was the work of Nobody, and Nobody has justly and severely suffered for that infamous transaction. It is difficult for the mind to span the career of Nobody. The sphere of action opened to this wonderful person so enlarges every day, that the limited faculties of anybody are too weak to compass it.

Anon.

10,751. NON-RESISTANCE, Example of. A Swiss Bible peddler entered the cot of a peasant, and offered his wares. The man became enraged and with much abuse struck the peddler a heavy blow upon the cheek. The latter laid down his pack, then uncovered his arm and exhibited remarkably developed muscles, saying, "Look at my hand, its furrows show that I have worked; feel my muscles, they show that I am fit for any work; look me straight in the face. Do I quail before you? Judge then, for yourself, if it is fear that makes me do what I am about to. In this book my Master says, 'When they shall smite you on the one cheek turn to them the other, also.' You have smitten me on one cheek, here is the other; smite!' The man was overcome, his rage subsided, and he bought the Bible which held the secret of such self-control.

10,752. NON-RESISTANCE, Power of. Robert Barclay, the celebrated apologist of the Quakers, was attacked by highwaymen, in England, adhered to his non-resistance principles, and signally triumphed. The pistol was leveled at Barclay, and a determined demand made for his purse. Calm and self-possessed, he looked the robber in the face with a firm but meek benignity, assured him he was his and every man's friend, that he was willing and ready to relieve his wants, that he was free from the fear of death through a divine hope in immortality, and therefore was not to be intimidated by a deadly weapon; and then appealed to him, whether he could have the heart to shed the blood of one who had no other feeling or purpose but to do him good. The robber was confounded; his eye melted, his brawny arm trembled, his pistol fell to his side, and he fled from the presence of the non-resistant hero, whom he could no longer confront. Percy.

10,753. NOTHING, Doing. "Curse ye Meroz. By whose authority? The angel of the Lord's. What has Meroz done? Nothing. Why then is Meroz to be cursed? Because he did nothing. What ought Meroz to have done? Come to the help of the Lord. Could not the Lord do without Meroz? The Lord did do without Meroz. Did the Lord sustain, then, any loss? No, but Meroz did. Is Meroz then to be cursed? Yes, and that bitterly. Is it right that a man should be cursed for doing nothing? Yes, when he ought to do something. Who says so? The angel of the Lord. 'That servant which knew his Lord's will, and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes.' (Luke 12: 47.)" Anon.

10,754. NOVELS, Evils of. Girls learn from such books to think coarsely and boldly about lovers and marrying; their early modesty is effaced by the craving for admiration; their warm affections are silenced by the desire for selfish triumph; they lose the fresh and honest feelings of youth while they are yet scarcely developed; they pass with sad rapidity from their early visions of Tancred and Orlando to notions of good connections, establishments, excellent matches, etc.; and yet they think, and their mammas think, that they are only advancing in "prudence" and knowledge of the world—that bad, contaminating knowledge of the world, which I sometimes imagine must have been the very apple that Eve plucked from the forbidden tree. Alas! when once tasted, the garden of life is an innocent and happy Paradise no more. Sala.

10,755. NOVELS, Injury by. It cannot but be injurious to the human mind never to be called into effort. The habit of receiving pleasure without any exertion of thought, by the mere excitement of curiosity and sensibility, may be justly ranked among the worst effects of habitual novel-reading. Like idle morning visitors, the brisk and breathless periods hurry in and hurry off in quick and profitless succession; each, indeed, for the moment of its stay, prevents the pain of vacancy, while it indulges the love of sloth; but altogether they leave the mistress of the house—the soul, I mean—flat and exhausted, incapable of attending to her own concerns, and unfitted for the conversation of more rational guests. Coleridge.

10,756. NOVELTY, Charms of. Novelty has charms that our minds can hardly withstand. The most valuable things, if they have for a long while appeared among us, do not make any impression as they are good, but give us a distaste as they are old. But when the influence of this fantastical humor is over, the same men or things will come to be admired again, by a happy return of our good taste. Thackeray.

10,757. NOVELTY, Seeking for. Before I translated the New Testament out of the Greek, all longed after it; when it was done, their longing lasted scarce four weeks. Then they desired the books of Moses; when I had translated these, they had enough thereof in a short time. After that, they would have the Psalms; of these they were soon weary, and desired other books. So it will be with the book of Ecclesiastes, which they now long for, and about which I have taken great pains. All is acceptable until our giddy brains be satisfied; afterwards we let things lie, and seek after new. Luther.

10,758. NOW, Opinions about. One of our poets (Cowley) speaks of an "everlasting now." If such a condition of existence were offered to us in this world, and it were put to the vote whether we should accept the offer and fix all things immutably as they are, who are they whose voices would be given in the affirmative? Not those who are in pursuit of fortune, or of fame, or of knowledge, or of enjoyment, or of happiness; though with regard to all of these, as far as any of them are attainable, there is more pleasure in the pursuit than in the attainment. Not those who are at sea, or traveling in a stage coach. Not the man who is shaving himself. Not those who have the toothache, or who are having a tooth drawn. The fashionable beauty might; and the fashionable singer, and the fashionable opera dancer, and the actor who is in the height of his power and reputation. So might the alderman at a city feast. So would the heir who is squandering a large fortune faster than it was accumulated for him. And the thief who is not taken. And the convict who is not hanged; and the scoffer at religion, whose heart belies his tongue. Not the wise and the good. Not those who are in sickness or in sorrow. Not I. Southey

10,759. NOW, Rejecting Christ. A pastor urged a young lady of his congregation and Sabbath-school to come to Jesus now. She impatiently answered, "You are always urging me now, now. I cannot see the need of such great hurry." "I have no authority to preach or teach any other gospel." "O, well, I'll risk it," she defiantly replied, as she started on a summer's pleasure trip. A tragic end in a burning steamer on the Hudson river closed the short chapter of her life.

10,760. OATH, Fidelity to an. John the First, King of France, was overthrown in battle, and made prisoner by Edward the Black Prince, afterwards taken into England. He remained a prisoner four years, and was then suffered to return to France upon certain conditions, which, if he could make his subjects agree to, he should be free; if otherwise, he promised by oath to return. He could not prevail upon them to accept the hard terms that were proffered, so he returned to England, and there died.

10,761. OATHS, Reliable. Louis, the French king, was taken prisoner by Meletisaka, the Sultan; and conditions of peace being concluded between them, for more assurance thereof, the Sultan offered to swear, if he failed in performance of anything, to renounce his Mohammed; requiring likewise of the king to swear, if he failed in anything that he had promised, to deny his Christ to be God: which profane oath the king detesting, and wishing rather to die than give the same, the Sultan, wondering at his constancy, took his word without any oath at all, and so published the league.

10,762. OBEDIENCE, Advantage of. A poor man applied to Stephen Girard, saying that he was ready to do anything that would bring him an honest living. "I will give you a dollar a day," said Girard. "You take that pile of stones that you see in the end of the lot, and carry them to the other side and pile them up in the same manner that they are now." The man did the job and received his dollar. Next morning he reappeared and was sent by his strange employer to replace the stones as he first found them. So the laborer wrought faithfully every day for a week, carrying the stones from one place to another without a murmur or question. On Saturday night the eccentric banker said to him, "I like you, there is no nonsense about you; you do what you are told to do. Many men would have objected to doing the work over and over. You shall have work as long as I have anything for anybody to do." Such servants the Lord wants.

10,763. OBEDIENCE, Angelic. A teacher was explaining to her class the words concerning God's angels, "ministers of his who do his pleasure," and asked: "How do the angels carry out God's will?" Many answers followed. One said: "They do it directly." Another: "They do it with all their heart." A third: "They do it well." And after a pause a quiet little girl added: "They do it without asking any questions."

10,764. OBEDIENCE, Duty of. An officer who had received his orders from the Duke of Wellington, urged the impossibility of executing them. Wellington replied, "I did not ask your opinion; I gave you my orders, and expect them to be obeyed." Implicit obedience is required of every soldier of Christ.

Ours not to reason why;
Ours not to make reply;
Ours but to do or die.

10,765. OBEDIENCE, Enforced. The little son of the commander of an American man-of-war, lying in the Bay of Naples, one day climbed the rigging and stood upon the main truck, at the very top of the mast. The sailors looked at him in amazement. The father coming on deck discovered his peril. Should the boy fall upon deck his death was sure. His father seized a gun, and bringing it to his shoulder, shouted through his speaking trumpet, "Jump into the water, or I'll shoot you!" He obeyed, cleared the ship's side, and was soon rescued by the sailors. His father's apparent cruelty was the truest love, and his only salvation.

10,766. OBEDIENCE, Exceptions to. I hear much of "obedience;" how that the kindred virtues are prescribed and exemplified by Jesuitism; the truth of which, and the merit of which, far be it from me to deny. Obedience, a virtue universally forgotten in these days, will have to become universally known again. Obedience is good and indispensable; but if it be obedience to what is wrong and false, there is no name for such a depth of human cowardice and calamity, spurned everlastingly by the gods. Loyalty! Will you be loyal to Beelzebub? Will you make "a covenant with death and hell?" I will not be loyal to Beelzebub; I will become a nomadic Choctaw rather, a barricading Sans culotte, a Conciliation-hall repealer; anything and everything is venial to that.

10,767. OBEDIENCE, Fruit of. St. John, the dwarf, an anchorite of Scete, was ordered by his superior to plant a dry staff in the ground, and water it daily, till it should bring forth fruit. The river was at a far distance, and the way over the hot sand; but the dwarf obeyed the order implicitly, without a murmur, or speaking one word for three years, when the stick put forth leaves and blossoms, and bore fruit. The hermit who gave the order gathered the fruit, carried it to the church, and gave it to the brethren, saying, "Take and eat the fruit of obedience."

10,768. OBEDIENCE, Happiness of. It is foolish to strive with what we cannot avoid; we are born subjects, and to obey God is perfect liberty: he that does this, shall be free, safe, and quiet; all his actions shall succeed to his wishes.

10,769. OBEDIENCE, Implicit. One of the attendants of the Emperor Tiberius was celebrated for his unflinching obedience to the wishes of his master. He was asked, if he had been ordered to burn the Capitol, whether he would have done it. He answered that Tiberius would never have given him the order; but if he had, he should have thought it right and should have obeyed it, for Tiberius would never have laid such a command on him if it had not been for the advantage of the Roman people. God is infallible, and his commands make right. Obedience to them must characterize his people.

10,770. OBEDIENCE, Light and. Jesus Christ intended, when he opened your eyes, that your eyes should direct your feet. Light is a special help to obedience, and obedience is a singular help to increase your light. Flavel.

10,771. OBEDIENCE, No Substitute for. Pachomius, abbot of the monastery of Tabenna, was informed that no salads or cooked vegetables had been served on the table for a long time, though the rules required it. He sought the cook and inquired, "What is there for dinner to-day?" "Bread and salt." "But the rule commands vegetables and soup." "My father, so many of the monks deny themselves any thing except bread, and it is such trouble preparing the vegetables and salads, and besides it is so disappointing to see them come from the table almost untouched, when I have spent so much time in getting them ready, that I thought I could employ my time more profitably in making mats." Having learned the time of this neglect the abbot said, "Bring all the mats thou hast made and show them to me." So the cook with much pride placed a great pile of them before the abbot. He seized a fire brand and set them all in a blaze, saying, "What! withdraw from some of the monks the opportunity of denying themselves, and those who are sickly the necessary delicacies, and from the young their needful support, because it gives thee a little trouble, and because thou thoughtest to do better by plaiting." To obey is better than sacrifice.

10,772. OBEDIENCE, Order of. There is one commandment that must go foremost, and make a way for all the rest; and this is his commandment, that ye should believe on his Son whom he has sent. To be reconciled unto God through the death of his Son, this is the one thing needful to all true obedience; and so especially this law of God, that in every thing we should pray to him and give thanks, cannot be put in practice by an alienated and suspicious heart. Arnot.

10,773. OBEDIENCE, Oriental. Zuchinius, Emperor of China, was determined to rid himself of Gueio, a high government official. He sent him to visit the tombs of his ancestors; but he had not gone far when he sent him a silver box with a silk halter folded neatly in it. Gueio understood by this that he was commanded to hang himself, which he did accordingly.

10,774. OBEDIENCE, Oriental Proverbs of. "Young man, talk not to me with infant wisdom what are the sayings of the ancients. You ought to obey your parents. Listen: 'The father and the mother are the first deities a child has to acknowledge.' Is it not said, 'Children who obey willingly are as ambrosia to the gods?'"

10,775. OBEDIENCE, Parable of. A fox, seeing the fish in great trouble, darting hither and thither, while the stream was being drawn with nets, proposed to them to leap on dry land. This is put in a Rabbi's mouth, who, when the Graeco-Syrian kings were threatening with death all who observe the law, was counseled by his friends to abandon it. He would say, "We, like the fish in the stream, are indeed in danger now; but yet, while we continue in obedience to God, we are in our element; but if, to escape the danger, we forsake that, then we inevitably perish." R. C. Trench.

10,776. OBEDIENCE, Sacrifice and. Dent. 27: 1-8. The memorial remembrance of the law. The connection is very striking of this ordinance. They were to write the law upon the stones on Ebal, and to build an altar close by, to signify that the law was to be kept before them; and no less that we cannot look upon the law with comfort apart from the altar, which represents sacrifice and atonement.

Bowes.

10,777. OBEDIENCE, Trifling. Dent. 22: 6, 7.—The bird's nest. The Jews say that this is "the least commandment." It is striking that for so small a matter, so weighty a motive should be assigned! Is not this to teach us that the smallest matters should be regulated by the principles of the highest law? As in a map of small dimensions, the prick of a pin may represent the space of a hundred miles, so in the law of God, obedience or neglect of the least commandment may involve the smile or frown of God the Judge! Bowes.

10,778. OBEDIENCE, Unconditional. The Chasians among the Syrians were in the habit of obeying their superiors at the cost of their lives. At the first intimation from their king, they would throw themselves headlong from rocks and towers, leap into the waves, or throw themselves into the fire. When Henry Earl of Campania passed through their country, the Prince of the Chasians wished to show the Earl the strange obedience of his people. Seeing several persons standing on the top of a high tower, he called to one of them by name. At this he threw himself down in their presence, and immediately died. The prince desired to give other commands, but the earl, horrified, begged him to desist.

10,779. OBEDIENCE, Unquestioning. St. John, the dwarf, was the most noted for his unquestioning, uncomplaining and enduring obedience of any in the long roll of monastic worthies. He had a capricious director who laid upon him the most unreasonable tasks. On one occasion he ordered him to throw their dinner out of the window, which was obeyed. At another time the old monk wished to exhibit the docility of his disciple, and commanded John to roll a huge rock up to his door, an impossible task. Without a question John ran to it, put his shoulder against it, and did his best to perform the work, till recalled by his master. This discipline only served to perfect his self-subjugation.

10,780. OBLIGATION, Biblical Figures of. Servants, entrusted with a master's property, Matt. 25: 14-30; Luke 19: 12-27; Mark 13: 34-36. Stewards, Luke 12: 42; 1 Cor. 4: 1, 2; 1 Pet. 4: 10. Husbandmen in charge of the vineyard, Mark 12: 1-9. Debtors, Rom. 1: 14; 8: 12; Gal. 5: 3 (marg). Wives, bound during the husband's lifetime, Rom. 7: 2. Teachers, who must expect a stricter judgment, and if unfaithful, look for a heavier condemnation than other men, James 3: 1 (Greek). Ministers, under shepherds, responsible to the great Master and Head, 1 Cor. 4: 1; Matt. 23: 8; 1 Pet. 5: 4. Bowes.

10,781. OBLIVION, Human. Oblivion is not to be hired: the greatest part must be content to be as though they had not been; to be found in the register of God, not in the record of man. Twenty-seven names make up the first story before the flood; and the recorded names ever since contain not one living century. The number of the dead long exceedeth all that shall live. The night of time far surpasseth the day, and who knows when was the equinox? Every hour adds unto that current arithmetic which scarce stands one moment. And since death must be the Lucina of life—and even Pagans could doubt whether thus to live were to die—since our longest sun sets at right descensions, and makes but winter arches, and therefore it cannot be long before we lie down in darkness, and have our light in ashes—since the brother of death daily haunts us with dying mementos, and time, that grows old in itself, bids us hope no long duration, diturnity is a dream, and folly of expectation.

Browne.

10,782. OBSOURITY, Ministerial. Queen Caroline, consort of George II., in conversation one day with Archbishop Blackburn, asked him if Mr. Butler, the famous author of the "Analogy," while yet a country rector, was dead. "No madam," was the reply. Mr. Butler is not dead, but he is buried!"—alluding to his close retirement in the country parish of Stanhope.

10,783. OBSERVATION, The Pleasures of. What a large volume of adventures may be grasped within this little span of life, by him who interests his heart in everything; and who, having eyes to see what time and chance are perpetually holding out to him as he journeyeth on his way, misses nothing he can fairly lay his hands on! I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba, and cry—"Tis all barren." And so it is; and so is all the world to him who will not cultivate the fruit it offers. "I declare," said I, clapping my hands cheerily together, "that were I in a desert, I would find out wherewith in it to call forth my affections. If I could do no better, I would fasten them upon some sweet myrtle, or seek some melancholy cypress to connect myself to. I would court their shade, and greet them kindly for their protection. I would cut my name upon them, and swear they were the loveliest trees throughout the desert; if their leaves withered, I would teach myself to mourn; and when they rejoiced, I would rejoice along with them."

Sterne

10,784. OBSERVATIONS, General. General observations drawn from particulars are the jewels of knowledge, comprehending great store in a little room; but they are therefore to be made with the greater care and caution, lest, if we take counterfeit for true, our loss and shame be the greater when our stock comes to a severe scrutiny. Locke.

10,785. OBSERVERS, Superficial. There are some persons that never arrive at any deep, solid, or valuable knowledge in any science, or any business of life, because they are perpetually fluttering over the surface of things, in a curious or wandering search of infinite variety; ever hearing, reading, or asking after something new, but impatient of any labor to lay up and preserve the ideas they have gained: their souls may be compared to a looking-glass, that wheresoever you turn it, it receives the images of all objects, but retains none.

Dr. Watts.

10,786. OBSTINACY, Folly of. The American turkey is a silly bird; and the French call a person a dindon (a turkey) whom we, with less propriety, call a goose, that being very far from a silly bird. In America they are said to entrap the wild turkey through their silliness. On a slope, at the edge, of a wood a kind of pen is made with sticks and covered over. At the lowest part an opening is left, sufficient to admit a turkey; and corn is strewn within and without the pen to entice them in. When they have entered, they might escape by simply descending to the entrance, and walking out the way they walked in. But, instead of this, they vainly beat against the sides of the pen till the trapper comes and dispatches them. Many featherless bipeds are like these turkeys. When it is plainly proved that you have formed a rash judgment, or taken an unwise step, the right course manifestly is to confess this, and retract and retrace your steps. But most men are too much of turkeys to do this. Usually, when a man finds himself in a pen, and there is no thoroughfare, rather than descend so far as to own a mistake, and walk out of the error the same way he had walked into it, he will resort to every kind of shuffle. He will insist on it that he was quite right all along, but that there has been a change in some of the people or in the circumstances. Or perhaps he will flatly deny that he ever said so and so, or maintain that he was misunderstood—anything rather than retract and acknowledge an error. And yet a man who does this frankly will usually obtain great applause for his candor and good sense; even more perhaps than he would have had if he had avoided the error from the first. Yet even this will not tempt most men to take take in genuous and wise course. They are too much like the turkeys.

F. F. Trench.

10,787. OBSTINACY, Human. When the dove was weary she recollected the ark, and flew into Noah's hand at once: there are weary souls who know the ark, but will not fly to it. When an Israelite had slain, inadvertently, his fellow, he knew the city of refuge, he feared the avenger of blood, and he fled along the road to the place of safety; but multitudes know the refuge, and every Sabbath we set up the sign-posts along the road, but yet they come not to find salvation. The destitute waifs and strays of the streets of London find out the night refuge and ask for shelter; they cluster round our workhouse doors like sparrows under the eaves of a building on a rainy day; they piteously crave for lodging and a crust of bread; yet crowds of poor benighted spirits, when the house of mercy is lighted up, and the invitation is plainly written in bold letters, "Whosoever will, let him turn in hither," will not come.

Spurgeon.

10,788. OBSTRUCTION, Example of. In Scotland two sailors who had been drinking heavily, took their boat to pull off to the ship; but after rowing some time, as they made no progress, each accused the other of want of effort. Again they tried, but with no better success. Finally after an hour's work, when they had become a little sobered, one of them happened to look over the side, and discovered the difficulty. "Why, Sandy," said he, "we haven't pulled the anchor up!" So here, the sins of many seem to hold them fast; but if they will break off their sins by repentance, they can pull off in safety.

10,789. OBSTRUCTIONIST, A Model. A dog made his bed in a manger, and lay snarling and growling to keep the oxen from their provender. "See," said one of them, "what a miserable cur! who can neither eat hay himself, nor will allow those to eat who can."

10,790. OCCUPATION, Adaptation to. Patrick Henry, after a vagrant boyhood, passed in fishing and hunting, was established in a country store by his father. At the end of the first year he failed. He married at the age of eighteen, and the parents of the young couple gave them a farm. Two years of farming showed his failure as a farmer. Another trial of merchandising proved another failure. He then read law for six weeks, and after an examination before John Randolph, was admitted to the bar. For four years he was a briefless barrister. The case of the "People against the Parsons," brought out his powers, and he rose at once to the first place. He had at last found his vocation. From that time to be eloquent as "Patrick against the Parsons," was the highest compliment that could be paid to an orator. The moral of all this is, "If at first you don't succeed," try something else.

10,791. OCCUPATION, Bias of. There was a city in expectation of being besieged, and a council was called accordingly to discuss the best means of fortifying it. A bricklayer gave his opinion that no material was so good as brick for the purpose. A carpenter begged leave to suggest that timber would be far preferable. Upon which a carrier started up, and said, "Sirs, when you have said all that can be said, there is nothing in the world like leather."

Esop.

10,792. OCCUPATION, Blindness of. An undertaker visited the Centennial Exhibition, which contained a vast collection of the treasures of art and industry, and reported that he saw nothing there but one fine hearse and some nice coffins.

10,793. OCCUPATION, Happiness of. Occupation was one of the pleasures of Paradise, and we cannot be happy without it. Mrs. Jameson.

10,794. OCCUPATION, Idolatry of. A blacksmith, who had been employed one day on the Mission premises in India, took away his tools next morning for the purpose of worshipping them, it being the day on which the Hindoos pay divine honors to the implements of their various trades; the files and hammers of the smiths, the chisels and saws of the carpenter, the diamond of the glazier, the crucible of the goldsmith, etc., etc., all become idols on this anniversary.

Whitecross.

10,795. OCEAN, Descriptions of. A lady, on seeing the sea at Brighton for the first time, exclaimed, "What a beautiful field!" She had never seen such a beautiful green, moving, sparkling, grassy prairie. Mr. Leigh Hunt lavished a page of admiration in The Liberal upon a line of Ariosto's describing the waves as "Neptune's white herds lowing o'er the deep." Anacreon exclaims, in language appropriate to calm seas and smooth sand-beaches, "How the waves of the sea kiss the shore!" Saint-Lambert, in his Saisons, has four lines descriptive of the waves of a stormy sea dashing upon the beach, which have been much admired by writers upon imitative harmony. "Neptune has raised up his turbulent plains, the sea falls and leaps upon the trembling shores. She remounts, groans, and with redoubled blows makes the abyss and the shaken mountains resound."

Household Words.

10,796. OFFENCE, Cherishing. Dogs bark at all persons indifferently; so if thou persecutest everybody that offends thee, thou wilt bring the matter to this pass by thy imprudence, that all things will flow down into this imbecility of thy mind, as a place void and capable of receiving them, and at last thou wilt be filled with nothing but other men's miscarriages.

Plutarch.

10,797. OFFENCE, Common. Dr. Richie, divinity professor in the University of Edinburgh, was thus addressed by one of his hearers, "Sir, you have insulted me to-day in the church. I have been three times in church lately, and on every one of them you have been holding me up to the derision of the audience; so I tell you, sir, I shall never more enter the church of Tarbolton again, unless you give me your solemn promise, that you will abstain from such topics in future, as I am resolved I shall no more furnish you with the theme of your discourse." The faithful preacher often finds his words so applied as to make the hearer think he has learned of his secret sins.

10,798. OFFERING, Savor of. Christ's offering was "a sweet-smelling savor" unto God. The meaning is, that as men are offended with a nauseous smell, and on the contrary delighted with sweet odors and fragrance, so the blessed

God, speaking after the manner of men, is offended, and filled with loathing and abhorrence by our sins; but infinitely pleased and delighted in the offering of Christ for them, which came up as an odor of sweet-smelling savor to him, whereof the costly perfumes upon the laws were types and shadows. Isa. 53: 10.

John Flavel.

10,799. OFFERINGS, Christ in the. Christ is the offering, Christ is the priest, Christ is the offerer. He comes as offerer, but we cannot see the offerer without the offering, and the offerer is himself the offering, and he who is both offerer and offering is also the priest. As man under the law, our substitute, Christ, stood for us toward God as offerer. He took "the body prepared for him" as his offering, that in it and by it he might reconcile us to God. Thus when sacrifice and offering had wholly failed, when at man's hand God would no more accept them, then said he, "Lo, I come." Thus his body was his offering; he willingly offered it; and then, as priest, he took the blood into the holiest. As offerer, we see him man under the law, standing our substitute, for us to fulfill all righteousness. As priest, we have him presented as the mediator, God's messenger between himself and Israel. While as the offering he is seen the innocent victim, a sweet savor to God, yet bearing the sin and dying for it. Thus in the self-same type the offerer sets forth Christ in his person, as the one who became man to meet God's requirements; the offering presents him in his character and work, as the victim by which the atonement was ratified; while the priest gives us a third picture of him, in his official relation, as the appointed mediator and intercessor. Accordingly, when we have a type in which the offering is most prominent, the leading thought will be Christ the victim. On the other hand, when the offerer or priest predominates, it will respectively be Christ as man or Christ as mediator.

A. Jukes.

10,800. OFFERINGS, Sin in Our. Leaven is mixed with the choicest offerings of the most devoted Christians. But our God has foreseen and provided for it. Thus at the offering at Pentecost, and the oblation with the Peace-offering (appointed emblems of the church's offering), leavened cakes were offered to the Lord; but though accepted, they could not be burnt as a sweet savor. No measure of oil, that is, the Spirit, could counteract the effect of leaven. A cake might be anointed again and again, but if there had been leaven in its composition, it could not be put upon the altar. What a lesson for those who are looking for the Spirit in them rather than to Christ for them as the ground of acceptance. A. Jukes.

10,801. OFFICE, Disappointed Seeker of. Paedaretus, when he was not chosen among the three hundred, (which was the highest office and honor in the city), went away cheerfully and smiling, saying he was glad if the city had three hundred better citizens than himself.

Plutarch.

10,802. OFFICE, Love of. Profigiacy in taking office is so extreme, that we have no doubt public men may be found, who for half a century would postpone all remedies for a pestilence, if the preservation of their places depended upon the propagation of the virus.

S. Smith.

10,803. OFFICE-SEEKERS, Hungry. A fox, while crossing a river, was driven by the stream into a narrow gorge, and lay there for a long time, unable to get out, covered with myriads of horse-flies that had fastened themselves upon him. A hedgehog, who was wandering in that direction, saw him; and, taking compassion on him, asked him if he should drive away the flies that were so tormenting him. But the fox begged him to do nothing of the sort. "Why not?" asked the hedgehog. "Because," replied the fox, "these flies that are upon me now, are already full, and draw but little blood, but should you remove them, a swarm of fresh and hungry ones will come, who will not leave a drop of blood in my body."

Æsop.

10,804. OLD, Fear of Growing. Among the various follies by which we increase the natural and unavoidable miseries of life, is the dread of approaching age. The sight of a gray hair has often caused a severer pang than the loss of a child or a husband. After a certain age, every returning birth-day is saluted with silent sorrow, and we conceal the number of our years with as much solicitude as the consciousness of an atrocious crime. Dr. Knox.

10,805. OLD AGE, Decay in. An old man of three-score and ten was cutting down a decayed tree, and was deeply impressed that it represented himself. Body and soul were decayed. The conviction led him to prayer, to Christ and to a good hope of immortal life.

10,806. OLD AGE, Need of Christ in. Mr. Edward Riddell, an aged Christian in Hull, England, remarked, a few days before his death, "Some may suppose that a person at my time of life, and after so long making a profession of religion, has nothing to do but to die and go to heaven; but I find that I have as much need to go to God, through Christ, as a sinner, at the last hour as at the beginning. The blood of Christ, the death of Christ, his victory and fullness, are my only ground of faith, hope and confidence; there is the same need of him to be the Finisher of my faith as there was to be the Author of it."

Whitecross.

10,807. OLD AGE, Redemption of Time in. A sibyl came to Tarquinius Superbus, King of Rome, and brought nine volumes of a book, demanding a high price for them. Thinking it too much, he refused, and she immediately burned three, demanding for the six the price of the nine. He still declined to give it, and she burned three more, asking the full sum for the remaining three. He, thinking there must be something extraordinary in the books, and fearing to lose them all, gave for the three the price he had refused for nine. So time, as it dwindles, grows more valuable. There are three divisions of man's life—youth, manhood, and old age; and ministers advise men to redeem all this time—youth, manhood, and old age; but in youth men conceive the price they are required to pay in self-denial too great, and they spend it in folly. In manhood they are again advised to redeem the remainder, but they still think the price too great. And then, perhaps, when it comes to the last stage of their lives, they are glad enough to redeem what remains; but here the case is different. The sibyl still demanded but the same price for the remaining three which she had asked for all the nine; but the old, if they are induced to redeem the time at all, which is very unlikely, will have to pay more for the last volumes than they were asked for the whole number at the first; the habit of sinning so greatly increases the difficulty of turning to God.

F. F. Trench.

10,808. OLD AGE, Reward in. A military gentleman visiting the Rev. John Martin, who had long been in ill-health, remarked, "If I had power over the pension list, I would put you on half pay for your long and faithful services." Mr. M. replied, "Your master may put you off with half pay in your old age, but my Master will not serve me so meanly. He will give me full pay. Through grace I expect a full reward."

10,809. OLD AGE, Spiritual Growth in. Pliny writes of the crocodile, that she grows to her last day. (Hosea 14: 5-7.) So aged saints; they grow rich in spiritual experiences to the last. An old Christian, being once asked if he grew in goodness, answered, "Yea, doubtless I do; for God hath said, 'The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree.'" (Ps. 92: 12-14.) "Now, the palm tree never loseth his leaf or fruit," saith Pliny; "he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon." "They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing."

Brooks.

10,810. OLD AGE, Temptations in. An old man said, "I am eighty-two years of age, and God has graciously given me, among many mercies, the mercy of being made sensible of his goodness. I remember, in my boyhood, hearing an aged minister declare from the pulpit, that when he was forty years old he considered himself so good, that he believed the temptations of Satan had no power over him; but when he was three-score and ten, he was obliged to confess that Satan had a bait for old birds still. I am eighty-two; and, as the minister found at three-score years and ten, so I find at eighty-two, that I am a poor, weak, worthless creature, totally dependent on God's goodness and grace, feeling every day of my life that Satan has a bait for old birds still."

10,811. OMNIPOTENCE, Divine. Power is that glorious attribute of God Almighty which furnishes the rest of his perfections. 'Tis his omnipotence that makes his wisdom and goodness effectual, and succeed to the length of his will. Thus his decrees are immutable, and his counsels stand; this secures his prerogative, and guards the sovereignty of his being; 'twas his power which made his ideas fruitful, and struck the world out of his thought. 'Twas this which answered the model of the creation, gave birth to time and nature, and brought them forth at his first call; thus, he spake the word, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created. 'Tis the Divine power which is the basis of all things, which continues the vigor of the second causes, and keeps the sun and moon in repair. This holds everything constant to appointment, and true to the first plan; thus, the revolutions of the seasons, the support of animals, the perpetuity of species, is carried on and maintained. Without this, things would soon run riot, and ramble out of distinction; the successors of life would be cut off, and nature drop into decay. Omniscience and goodness without a correspondent power would be strangely short of satisfaction; to know everything, without being able to supply defects and remedy disorders, must prove an unpleasant speculation; to see so many noble schemes languish in the mind and prove abortive, to see the most consummate wisdom, the most generous temper, fettered and disarmed, must be a grievance; but when omnipotence comes into the notion, the grandeur is perfect and the pleasure entire.

Jeremy Collier.

10,812. OMNIPOTENCE, Resisting. If you would shrink from resisting the authority of a sovereign, who has judges, and officers, and armies, and navies, in his control, then, how can you ever dare, how can you ever wish to dare to confront the power and majesty of the Eternal One;—of that One who can envelop the heavens with his thunder clouds, and make you the mark of all their volleyed lightnings; who can array his volcanoes in battalions, and bury you beneath their molten lavas; who can sink you in the earth's central fires, to lie without consuming in that seething cauldron, or imprison you in the eternal solitudes of polar ice; or—unspeakably more terrible than all this—can turn your own soul inward in retrospection upon its past life, to read its own history of voluntary wrong, in its self-recorded Book of Judgment? Nor can you find refuge in non-existence. You may call upon the seas to drown you, but there is not water enough in all the seas. You may call upon the fires to consume you, but the fires will say, we cannot consume remorse. You may call upon arctic frost to congeal the currents of life, but they will say, we have no power over the currents of thought, or the pulses of immortal life. You may call upon the universe to annihilate you, but the universe will respond, "God alone can annihilate; and God will say, live forever."

Horace Mann.

10,813. OMNIPOTENCE, Using. The order of nature is not that we should do things, but that we should make one thing do another. Direct lifting is displeasing to the Supreme intelligence. He furnishes all forces; he has no conceivable poverty of power. All drafts upon Omnipotence leave it undiminished. So he simply wishes us to seize and use his forces. We are not doers, but causers. We are combiners. We are to touch levers, work keys.

open valves, harness energies. This is our work in the world.

Dr. Fowler.

10,814. OMNIPRESENCE, Divine. God is everywhere present by his power. He rolls the orbs of heaven with his hand; he fixes the earth with his foot, he guides all the creatures with his eye, and refreshes them with his influence; he makes the powers of hell to shake with his terrors, and binds the devils with his word, and throws them out with his command; and sends the angels on embassies with his decrees; he hardens the joints of infants, and confirms the bones when they are fashioned secretly in the earth; he it is that assists at the numerous production of fishes, and there is not one hollowness in the bottom of the sea but he shows himself to be the Lord of it, by sustaining there the creatures that come to dwell in it; and in the wilderness, the vulture and the stork, the dragon and the satyr, the unicorn and the elk, live upon his provisions, and revere his power, and feel the force of his almightiness. Let everything represent to your spirit the presence, the excellency, and the power of God.

Jeremy Taylor.

10,815. OMNIPRESENCE, Elevation by. There is something in the thought of being surrounded, even upon earth, by the Majesty on high, that gives a peculiar elevation and serenity of soul. To be assured in the loneliest hour of unknown or neglected sorrow, that every sigh ascends to the eternal Throne, and every secret prayer can be heard in heaven; to feel that, in every act of conscious rectitude, the heart can appeal, amidst all the contradictions of sinners, to One who seeth not as man seeth, produces a peace which the world can never give. Feeling itself, like Enoch walking with God, the heart perceives a spirituality and purity in every joy, a mercy and a balm in every sorrow, and, exalted above the intrusions of an intermeddling world, has its "conversation in heaven."

Mathew.

10,816. OMNIPRESENCE, Escape from. A very little girl was warned of the danger of lying by her mother, and told the fate of Ananias and Sapphira. She thought it easy enough to escape, and said, "I would run up the street." Many larger people act on this foolish idea. Men ask in vain, "Whither shall I flee from thy presence?" They may get beyond the jurisdiction of the laws of states and nations for punishment or extradition, but they cannot cross the boundary of God's empire, or escape for a moment the presence of his Spirit.

10,817. OMNIPRESENCE, Praying to. To God belongeth the east and the west, therefore whithersoever ye turn yourselves to pray, there is the face of God; for God is omnipresent and omniscient.

From the Koran.

10,818. OMNISCIENCE, Emblem of. What would you say, if wherever you turned, whatever you were doing, whatever thinking, whether in public or private, with a confidential friend telling your secrets, or alone planning them—if, I say, you saw an eye constantly fixed on you, from whose watching, though you strove ever so much, you could never escape; and even if you closed your own eye to avoid, you still fancied that to get rid of was impossible, that it could perceive your every thought? The supposition is awful enough. There is such an eye, though the business and struggles of the world too often prevent us from considering this awful truth. In crowds we are too much interrupted, in the pursuit of self-interest we are too much perverted, in camps we are struggling for life and death, in courts we see none but the eye of a human sovereign; nevertheless, the Divine eye is always upon us, and when we least think of it, is noting all, and, whatever we may think of it, will remember all.

De Vere.

10,819. OMNISCIENCE, Forgotten. Cato was so grave and so good a man, that none would behave unseemly in his presence; whence it grew to a proverbial caveat, "Take heed what you do, for Cato sees you!" How reproachful it is to us, that the eyes of a man should have more effect upon our manners, than the penetrating eyes of God!

Secker.

10,820. OMNISCIENCE, Infinitude of. Momus, one of the heathen gods, is said to have complained of Vulcan, that he had not set a grate at every man's breast. God hath a glazed window in the darkest houses of clay: he sees what is done in them, when none other can. To God's omnipotence there is nothing impossible; and to God's omniscience there is nothing invisible. I never look for those persons to swallow gnats, who will easily and greedily swallow camels.

Secker.

10,821. OMNISCIENCE, Records of. As it was said of the Doomsday Book prepared by the Norman king, that nec lacus, nec lucus, nec locus—neither lake, nor grove, nor spot of earth—in all the realm of England, was omitted from the inventory, so he who "knows our thoughts long before" will have in his remembrance every act of our lives, every secret and forgotten sin, and at the last day they will be trumpeted forth from the highest battlement of heaven.

Pilkington.

10,822. OMNISCIENCE, Restraint of. Hans Christian Andersen, the popular Danish writer, when a boy, was out with his mother gleanng, in the fields of a man who was said to be very cruel. They saw him coming, and all started to run away. But Hans's clumsy wooden shoes came off; the stubble, or short stumps of the grain-stalk which had been left by the reapers, hurt his tender feet, so that he could not keep up with the others; and he found that he must be caught. The rough owner of the field was very near, and could now almost reach him with his heavy whip; when Hans, whose hopeless case now suddenly filled him with new courage, stopped and turned, and looking into the man's face said, "How dare you strike me, when God can see you?" The anger of the man was subdued, and instead of striking the boy, he gently stroked his cheeks and gave him some money.

10,823. OMNISCIENCE, Symbol of. Plato says that the king of Lydia had a ring with which, when he turned its head to the palm of his hand, he could see every person, and yet he himself remain invisible. Though we cannot see God while we live, yet he can see how we live. For his eyes are upon the ways of man; and he seeth all his goings. Man may gild over the leaves of a blurred life with the profession of holiness; but God can unmask the painted Jezebel of hypocrisy, and lay her naked to her own shame.

Secker.

10,824. OPINION, Force of. Whenever a painful duty comes before us, we must not think what the world will say, but we must set our faces as a flint, and go through with it. Human respect has been the ruin of many souls. It is the close connection of moral cowardice, that fruitful source of everything that is base and wicked. And it must be remarked that this is especially the sin of civilization. In earlier times, when every man's hand is openly against his neighbor, he cares less what that neighbor thinks of him; but as peace prevails, credit is generated, character assumes a new value, a corporate public opinion begins to act; and then the temptation is to refer things to an enlightened public opinion, rather than to the law of God.

Bishop Forbes.

10,825. OPINIONS, Arbitrary. It is too much stiffness to stand ever on the height, and to give no quarter in matter of opinion; like those peremptory Egyptians, who in several cities would either profess to abhor the crocodile or to deify him. There is a mean, if we could hit on it, in all save fundamental quarrels, worthy to be the scope of all our charitable desires; which, if we could attain and rest in, we and the church of God should be peaceful and happy.

Bishop Hall.

10,826. OPINIONS, Non-Criminality of. Opinions, so far from being under the power of other men's will, are not under a man's own; they are the offspring of his reason, whether he be well or ill-informed. Opinions, therefore, cannot be justly imputed to any man as crimes.

Dr. J. Moore.

10,827. OPINIONS, Vassalage of. There is no greater vassalage than that of being enslaved to opinions. The dogmatist is pent up in his prison, and sees no light but what comes in at those grates. He hath no liberty of thoughts, no prospect of various objects: while the considerate and modest inquirer hath a large sphere of motion, and the satisfaction of more open light; he sees far, and enjoys the pleasure of surveying the divers images of the mind. But the opiniator hath a poor shriveled soul, that will but just hold his little set of thoughts. His appetite after knowledge is satisfied with his few mushrooms.

Glanvill.

10,828. OPPORTUNITY, Emblems of. Morning and evening, Eccles. 11: 6, the time for work. The day-time, John 11: 9, 10; 12: 35, 36, contrasted with the time of night and darkness. To-day, Ps. 95: 7; Heb. 3: 7-15, contrasted with the future. Summer and harvest, Prov. 6: 6-8; 10: 5; Matt. 9: 38. The day of visitation, Luke 19: 44. The day of salvation, Isa. 49: 8; 2 Cor. 6: 2. The acceptable time, Isa. 49: 8; Ps. 69: 13. A time when seeking may expect to find, Isa. 55: 6. Ps. 32: 8, marg. Space to repent, Rev. 2: 22. An open door, Acts 14: 27; 1 Cor. 16: 9; 2 Cor. 2: 12; Col. 4: 3; Rev. 3: 8. Dumb creatures may teach man knowledge. They know their "appointed times;" as the ant, Prov. 6: 6-9; the stork, the crane and the swallow, Jer. 8: 7.

10,829. OPPORTUNITY, Importance of. Opportunity is in respect to time, in some sense, as time is in respect to eternity: it is the small moment, the exact point, the critical minute, on which every good work so much depends.

Sprat.

10,830. OPPORTUNITY, Improvement of. You do well to improve your opportunity; to speak in the rural phrase, this is your sowing time, and the sheaves you look for can never be yours, unless you make that use of it. The color of our whole life is generally such as the three or four first years in which we are our own masters, make it. Then it is that we may be said to shape our destiny, and to treasure up for ourselves a series of future successes or disappointments.

Cowper.

10,831. OPPORTUNITY, Irrecoverable. At the wreck of the London, a young lady was invited to take a place in a boat on the point of leaving the ship. She looked at the stormy sea, and the distance to be jumped, although small, appeared a very great one in her eyes. She hesitated. While she waited, the danger became imminent. "Jump," cried those in the boat; "we must be off. Jump, or you will be too late!" Again she looked, but again she hesitated, and now it was too late, for the boat was moving off; the distance was now really too great. "Stay! come back!" she cried, as a sense of her dreadful situation came to her; "oh, come back!" This was now impossible, and she was lost.

10,832. OPPORTUNITY, Lost. Many solemn and familiar texts stand as beacon lights to warn of this peril: "The door was shut"—"The night cometh when no man can work"—"The kingdom of God shall be taken from you"—"I will remove thy candlestick out of his place." See the doom pronounced upon Jerusalem, because the Jews knew not the time of their visitation; therefore, the things offered for their peace were justly "hid." So upon Chorazin, Bethsaida, etc. Napoleon used to say, "There is a crisis in every battle: ten or fifteen minutes, on which the issue of the battle depends; to gain this is victory; to lose it is defeat."

Bowes.

10,833. OPPORTUNITY, Preciousness of. Opportunity is a golden word, and is itself more precious than rubies.

J. A. James.

10,834. OPPORTUNITY, Trifling with. A very rich man, who owned many houses and broad acres, and besides had much gold stored up in banks, having heard of a single diamond worth all his property, resolved to purchase it. Having converted his real estate into money, he set sail for the land where the wonderful stone was, bought the precious jewel, and started homeward. Day after day he walked the deck of the ship, carrying the diamond in his hand, and frequently, in childish glee, throwing it into the air and catching it. The captain and passengers advised him to be more careful, lest by accident he lose the stone, and nothing but poverty and sorrow await him on his arrival home. But he paid no heed to their cautions, and every day he became more determined in his foolishness. Higher and higher he cast his diamond, laughing as he caught it falling. At last his beloved country was visible, and a few hours more, and he would be on shore. For the last time he cast the stone into the air, and, rather than ever, alas! threw it far out of his reach, and saw all his future happiness and wealth sink beneath the waves as the ship touched the shore. Thus it is that many people trifle with the precious privileges they possess, until at last they are gone forever. Anon.

10,835. OPPOSER, A Habitual. The oracle declared that there was one man in Athens of a contrary opinion to all the rest. Search was made for this man, and Phocion was found. He confessed, saying, "I, Phocion, am the man. I, alone, am pleased with nothing the common people say or do." He once gave an opinion which was approved by the people, and said to a friend, "Have I not unawares spoken some mischievous thing or other?"

10,836. OPPOSITION, Effects of. The effects of opposition are wonderful. There are men who rise refreshed on hearing of a threat; men to whom a crisis which intimidates and paralyses the majority—demanding, not the faculties of prudence and thrift, but comprehension, immovableness, the readiness of sacrifice—comes graceful and beloved as a bride! Emerson.

10,837. OPPOSITION Overcome. A young man was converted, which aroused the wrath of his irreligious father, and he threatened to turn him from home if he continued, and gave him till the morrow to decide. When it arrived he told his father, "I cannot violate my conscience, I cannot forsake my God." "Leave immediately," said the father. Upon the threshold, he asked the father for one favor. As the last it was promised. He asked his father and mother to kneel with him in prayer. They knelt, and the son prayed earnestly. The good Spirit touched the father's heart, and when they rose up he said, "You need not go, John. Come in and stay." All were converted and became members of the church.

10,838. OPPRESSION, Egyptian. While staying at Alexandria, we passed a public building in course of erection. A great number of women and children of both sexes were carrying away the earth excavated for the foundation. Some laborers had loosened the soil, and the poor creatures then scraped it with their hands into circular baskets, which they bore away on their backs; they were barefooted, and very slenderly covered with rags. Several task-masters, who have not ceased out of Egypt since the time of the Pharaohs, stood at intervals holding a scourge of cords, which was not spared if any of the people, as they passed by crouching under their burdens, seemed to slacken in their work. They had all been pressed into the service by the pasha's officers, and were paid the miserable sum of half a piastre a day.

Boat and Caravan.

10,839. OPPRESSION, Resistance to. The poorest being that crawls on earth, contending to save itself from injustice and oppression, is an object respectable in the eyes of God and man. Burke.

10,840. OPPRESSORS, Everywhere. There are sharks in the ocean, and wolves in the forest, and eagles in the air, and tyrants on thrones, and tormentors in cottages. Dr. J. Hamilton.

10,841. ORATOR, The Pulpit. Whitefield's pre-eminence as a pulpit orator is universally acknowledged. He stands alone, without a superior, without an equal; like Saul of old, towering head and shoulders above his fellows; occupying a similar place among pulpit orators to that which Luther does among reformers, Shakspeare and Milton among poets, Michael Angelo among sculptors, Raphael among painters, Haydn and Handel in music, and Newton in astronomy. He rises above other pulpit orators like the lofty tower above some noble edifice. To leave out George Whitefield from among pulpit orators would be like a performance of the tragedy of Hamlet with the character of the Prince of Denmark omitted; like leaving out the name of Washington from our Revolutionary history, or obliterating the sun from the solar system. J. B. Wakeley.

10,842. ORATOR, Treasures of the. A public speaker should lay under tribute all knowledge. Let him, like the Roman general, try to gather spoils and trophies from all nations and from every age, to deck the triumphs of his cause. Nothing which in all his researches he gathers should he despise. What seems useless to-day may prove of greatest value to-morrow. What seems a dull pebble may flash when held up to the light with the brilliancy of the diamond. More than one public speaker has done what the old alchemists failed to do—taken materials which seemed base and insignificant, and by genius and skill transmuted them into gold. Anon.

10,843. ORATORY, Bid for. Garrick once said, "I would give a hundred guineas if I could only say 'O! like Mr. Whitefield.'"

10,844. ORATORY, Effects of. When the Roman people had listened to the diffuse and polished discourses of Cicero, they departed, saying one to another, "What a splendid speech our orator has made!" But when the Athenians heard Demosthenes, he so filled them with the subject-matter of his oration, that they quite forgot the orator, and left him at the finish of his harangue, breathing revenge, and exclaiming, "Let us go and fight against Philip!" Colton.

10,845. ORATORY, Price of. Demosthenes was very desirous to learn oratory, and because he could not give the full price, which was a thousand drachms, he offered Isocrates two hundred, the fifth part, if he would teach him but the fifth part of his art. Isocrates answered, "We do not use, Demosthenes, to impart our skill by halves; but as men sell good fish whole or altogether, so if thou hast a desire to learn, we will teach thee our full art, and not a piece of it."

10,846. ORATORY, Restraints of. Caius Gracchus, the orator, had naturally a harsh voice and violent delivery. He practised his voice with a flute, used by the teachers of the time for the purpose. When he pleaded at the bar one of his servants stood in hearing, and recalled him from his loud vociferation by sounding the proper note.

10,847. ORDEAL, Decision by. Constantine summoned a council of the bishops to meet in Constantinople, in 680, to settle the Monothelite controversy. The majority favored the view of two wills in Christ. Polychronius, one of the minority, vehemently challenged the Council to settle the matter by miracle. Said he, "Let me lay my testimony on the breast of a dead man, and it will revive him." It was agreed to; a corpse was brought into the assembly, and the testimony of Polychronius, sealed up, was laid on its breast. The bishops sat in grave expectancy. Hours passed, but the corpse was lifeless still. The doctrine was declared false by the chosen test. Its originator asked for more time. It was refused, and Monothelite doctrine was declared a heresy, and those who held it were anathematized.

10,848. ORDER, Argument from. Order is an effect of reason and counsel; this reason and counsel must have its residence in some being before this order was fixed: the things ordered are always distinct from that reason and counsel whereby they are ordered, and also after it, as the effect is after the cause. No man begins a piece of work but he hath the model of it in his own mind; no man builds a house, or makes a watch, but he hath the idea or copy of it in his own head. This beautiful world bespeaks an idea of it, or a model: since there is such a magnificent wisdom in the make of each creature, and the proportion of one creature to another, this model must be before the world, as the pattern is always before the thing that is wrought by it. This, therefore, must be in some intelligent and wise agent, and this is God. Charnock.

10,849. ORDER, Interruption of. If nature should intermit her course, and leave altogether, though it were but for awhile, the observation of her own laws; if those principal and mother elements of the world, whereof all things in this lower world are made, should lose the qualities which now they have; if the frame of that heavenly arch erected over our heads should loosen and dissolve itself; if the prince of the lights of heaven, which now as a giant doth run his unwearied course, should, as it were, through a languishing faintness, begin to stand and to rest himself; if the moon should wander from her beaten way, the times and seasons of the year blend themselves by disordered and confused mixtures, the winds breathe out their last gasp, the clouds yield no rain, the earth be defeated of heavenly influence, the fruits of the earth pine as children at the breasts of their mother no longer able to yield them relief: what would become of man himself, whom these things do now all serve? See we not plainly that obedience of creatures unto the law of nature is the stay of the whole world? Hooker.

10,850. ORDER, Wise. When Bishop Andrews first became bishop of Winton, a distant relation, a blacksmith, applied to him to be ordained, and provided with a benefice. "No," said his lordship, "you shall have the best forge in the country; but every man in his own order and station."

10,851. ORDINANCES, Benefit of. The ordinances are like the pool of Bethesda, John 5: 4. At a certain time an angel came down and troubled the waters, and then they had a healing virtue in them. So the Spirit comes down at certain times in the World and opens the heart, and then it becomes the power of God to salvation. So that when you see souls daily sitting under excellent means of grace, and still remaining dead, you may say as Martha did to Christ of her brother Lazarus, "Lord, if thou hadst been here," they had not remained dead. If thou hadst been in this sermon, it had not been so ineffectual to them.

John Flavel.

10,852. ORGANIZATION, Benefit of. "Well, John," said Mr. Whitefield to one of Mr. Wesley's itinerant preachers, "are you still a Wesleyan?" "Yes, sir," replied John, "and I thank God that I have the privilege of being in connection with Mr. Wesley, and one of his preachers." "John," said Mr. Whitefield, "thou art in the right place. My brother Wesley acted wisely. The souls that were awakened under his ministry he joined in class, and thus preserved the fruits of his labor. This I neglected, and my people are a rope of sand."

10,853. ORIGINALITY, Meaning of. People are always talking about originality; but what do they mean? As soon as we are born, the world begins to work upon us; and this goes on to the end. And after all, what can we call our own, except energy, strength, and will? If I could give an account of all that I owe to great predecessors and contemporaries, there would be but a small balance in my favor. Goethe.

10,854. ORIGINALITY Uncommon. Millions of people are provided with their thoughts as with their clothes; authors, printers, book-sellers, and newsmen stand, in relation to their minds, simply as shoemakers and tailors stand, to their bodies. Certain ideas come up, and are adopted, as long-tailed great coats or skeleton petticoats are adopted. No doubt, if we all thought—each man only a little—of the spirit and meaning of each act of life, the business of life would be done with an earnestness quite frightful to be told about; though glorious to think about, if one were by chance to think. Anon.

10,855. ORNAMENT, Guide to. Nature is the true guide in our application of ornament.

She delights in it, but ever in subserviency to use. Men generally pursue an opposite course, and adorn only to encumber. With the refined few, simplicity is the feature of greatest merit in ornament. The trifling, the vulgar-minded, and the ignorant, prize only what is striking and costly,—something showy in contrast, and difficult to be obtained. Moir.

10,856. ORNAMENTS, New Use of. The Rev. Thos. Collins both hated and dreaded worldly conformity. It seemed to him the moth and rust of the church. His exhortations upon this subject inclined many to lay aside jewels and flowers for the Lord's sake. Not a few brought to him the garlands that had decked their brows. They became the ornaments of a missionary May-pole, six feet high, and tastefully wreathed from top to bottom; though it could not be proud, it was exceedingly pretty. A missionary box formed the base of this trophy of crucified vanity. S. Coley.

10,857. ORNAMENTS, Spiritual. Jewels from heaven, set deep within your souls, and glancing at every turn through the transparency of an unaffected life, will do more to make your persons attractive than all the diamonds that ever decked a queen. Teachers' Treasury.

10,858. ORPHANS, Work for. The most remarkable work of any age is that of George Müller, of Bristol, England. He was early employed as a Church missionary in Bristol, but his partiality for neglected orphans made him unpopular, and his support was withdrawn. Then he took six orphans to care for, with no one but God to look to for help, and God adopted his work. His establishment has from this small beginning grown to immense proportions, embracing seven large buildings, each having accommodations for 500 children—3,500 in all. For more than thirty years he has carried on his great work without a patron or a banker save his God. When he needs anything he prays for the article—food, clothes, or money—never resorting to personal appeal. He prays for men by name. The orphans are his nobility. To a lord who applied for admittance out of the usual visiting hours, the keeper replied, "Dukes and lords are of no account; orphans take rank here."

10,859. OSTENTATION, Puffed up with. As you see in a pair of bellows, there is a forced breath without life, so in those that are puffed up with the wind of ostentation, there may be charitable words without works. Bp. Hall.

10,860. OSTENTATION, Rebuke of. When George Faulkner, the printer, returned from London, where he had been soliciting subscriptions for his edition of Dean Swift's works, he went to pay his respects to him, dressed in a lace waistcoat, a bag wig and other fopperies. Swift received him with the same ceremonies as if he had been a stranger. "And pray, sir," said he, "what are your commands with me?" "I thought it was my duty, sir," replied George, "to wait on you immediately on my arrival from London." "Pray, sir, who are you?" "George Faulkner, the printer, sir." "You George Faulkner the printer! why, you are the most impudent, barefaced scoundrel of an impostor I have ever met with! George Faulkner is a plain, sober citizen, and would never trick himself out in lace and other fopperies. Get you gone, you rascal, or I will immediately send you to the house of correction." Away went George as fast as he could, and having changed his dress he returned to the deanery, where he was received with the greatest cordiality. "My friend George," says the Dean, "I am glad to see you returned safe from London. Why, here has been an impudent fellow with me just now, dressed in lace waistcoat, and he would fain pass himself off for you, but I soon sent him away with a flea in his ear."

10,861. OTHERS, Preferring. At an accident in a coal mine a rope broke and precipitated several men to the bottom of the shaft. Two boys caught hold of a stationary chain, and held on till relief came. A man was let down by a rope to rescue them. He first came to Daniel Harding, who cried, "Don't mind me. I can hold on a little longer. Save Joseph Brauer first, who is a little lower down, and nearly exhausted." The rescuer obeyed this instruction, and after twenty minutes returned and saved the boy who risked his own life for another.

10,862. OTHERS, Rewarding. A spelling contest was held in a school, and the prize for the victor was an elegant Bible. The contestants were reduced to two, Lizzie, the daughter of a poor, hard-working widow, and Susie, the daughter of a well-to-do farmer. The sympathy of the school was with the poor girl. Susie misspelled a word, and Lizzie won the coveted prize. Going home the mother said, "Susie, could not you have spelt that word?" "Yes, ma." "Then why did you not do it?" "Lizzie, you know, is a poor little girl, and she has not many presents. She wanted the Bible very much, and she tried so hard for it, I thought I'd let her have it." "What made you do that, Susie?" "My Sunday-school lesson, mother, which said, 'in honor preferring one another.' So I thought I'd try it, and I'm glad I did." A few days after Susie received as a birth-day present a beautiful Bible, and on the fly-leaf was written the text, "In honor preferring one another," the observance of which had made her so happy.

10,863. PAIN, Yielding to. In the middle ages, those who had studied the arts of torture knew well that the man who could face the lion in the amphitheatre, or sit boldly on the heated iron-seat, would be overcome by the simple dropping of water, day by day, on the same place, like the firm rock corroded by the waves of ages. So our own strength must yield to pain. F. W. Robertson.

10,864. PAINTERS, Industry of. When we read the lives of the most eminent painters, every page informs us that no part of their time was spent in dissipation. Even an increase of fame served only to augment their industry. To be convinced with what persevering assiduity they pursued their studies, we need only reflect on their method of proceeding in their most celebrated works. When they conceived a subject, they first made a variety of sketches, then a finished drawing of the whole; after that a more correct drawing of every separate part—heads, hands, feet, and pieces of drapery; they then painted the picture, and after all re-touched it from the life. The pictures thus wrought with such pains, now appear as the effect of enchantment, as if some mighty genius had struck them off at a blow.

Sir J. Reynolds.

10,865. PALM-TREE, Use of the. The palm-tree, from its erect and noble growth and its heavenward direction, is used in Psalm 92: 12, as an illustration of the righteous. Its branches are also used as emblems of victory or triumph. In the heavenly Jerusalem, the great multitude who stood before the throne and before the Lamb, are represented as "clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands."

Prof. Balfour.

10,866. PANTHEISM, Caution against. It is not theism I fear so much in the present time as pantheism. It is not the system which says nothing is true, so much as the system which says everything is true. It is not the system which says there is no Saviour, so much as the system which says there are many Saviours, and many ways to peace. It is the system which is so liberal, that it dares not say anything is false. It is the system which is so charitable, that it will allow everything to be true. It is the system which seems ready to allow honor to others, as well as our Lord Jesus Christ—to hope well of all men, however contradictory their religious opinions may be. Confucius and Zoroaster, Socrates and Mahomet, the Indian Brahmins and the African devil-worshippers, Arius and Pelagius, Ignatius Loyola and Socinus, all are to be treated respectfully, none are to be condemned. It is the system which bids us smile complacently on all creeds and systems of religion, the Bible and the Koran, the Hindoo Vedas and the Persian Zendavesta, the old wives' fables of Rabbinical writers, and the rubbish of Patristic traditions, the Racovian Catechism and the Thirty-nine Articles, the Revelations of Emanuel Swedenborg and the Book of Mormon of Joseph Smith; all are to be listened to; none are to be denounced as lies. It is the system which is so scrupulous about the feelings of others that we are never to say they are wrong. It is the system which is so liberal that it calls a man a bigot if he dares to say, "I know my views are right." This is the system, which is the tone of feeling which I fear in this day. This is the system which I desire emphatically to testify against and denounce.

Ryle.

10,867. PANTHEISM, System of. Pantheism is a system which confounds the infinite and the finite, and which makes God the sum of all things. God, it teaches, is brutal in brute matter, mighty in the forces of nature, feeling in the animal, thinking and conscious only in man. This system is, in its first aspect, more noble than material atheism, but in truth it is not less fatal to all that is noble and good. It indeed makes man, nay, the beasts that perish, nay, the very dung on the earth—divine; but it also makes God human, animal, material. It degrades what is high by exalting what is low. Better to deny God than to debase him! Pantheism is, if possible, a worse atheism.

Bp. Jeune.

10,868. PARABLES, Nature's. The world is a great storehouse of parables of moral truths. The scriptures give us a key to these. David says, "They compassed me about as bees." Isaiah, speaking for God, says, "The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." In short, everything about us is a picture lesson to enlightened eyes, and every voice of nature is the voice of God to hearing ears. A late writer says, "The most fundamental truths of the Bible are put in the form of visions, allegories, parables. It is as a grand symbolic history in many of its parts, in which every character and scene is a shadow-picture addressed to the imagination, revealing, as all such shadows do, the celestial light streaming from the sky windows above. In the words of Christ this kind of teaching is especially prominent. Nature speaks, as it were, with articulate voice. The birds of the air talk of his providence. The lilies of the field blossom with his beauty."

10,869. PARABLES, Old Testament. The prophets made use of parables to give a stronger impression to prince and people of the threatenings or of the promises they made to them. Nathan reproved David under the parable of a rich man that had taken away and killed the lamb of a poor man (2 Sam. 12: 2, 3). The woman of Tekoah, that was hired by Joab to reconcile the mind of the same prince towards his son Absalom, proposed to him the parable of her two sons, that fought together in the field, and one of whom having killed the other, they were going to put the murderer to death, and so to deprive her of both her sons at once (2 Sam. 14: 2, 3). Jotham, son of Gideon, proposed to the men of Shechem the parable of the bramble, whom the trees had a mind to choose for their king (Judges 9: 7, 8). The prophets often reprove the infidelity of Jerusalem under the parable of an adulterous wife. They describe the violence of such princes as are enemies to the people of God under the representation of lions, eagles, bears, etc.

10,870. PARABLES, Scripture. The word "parable" is sometimes used in Scripture in a large and general sense, and applied to short sententious sayings, maxims, or aphorisms, expressed in a figurative, proverbial, or even poetical manner. But in its strict and appropriate meaning, especially as applied to our Saviour's parables, it signifies a short narrative of some event or fact, real or fictitious, in which a continued comparison is carried on between sensible and spiritual objects; and under this similitude some important doctrine, moral or religious, is conveyed and enforced.

Porteus.

10,871. PARABLES, Use of. A man may be so situated that though his life is in imminent danger, he cannot perceive the danger, and consequently makes no effort to escape. Further, his mind may be so prejudiced that he still counts the beam on which he stands secure, although a neighbor has faithfully given warning that it is about to fall; it may be that because he stands on it he cannot see its frailty. Let some friend who knows his danger, but wishes him well, approach the spot and hold a mirror in such a position that the infatuated man shall see reflected in it the under and ailing side of the beam that lies between him and the abyss. The work is done: the object is gained: the confident fool, made wise at length, leaps for life upon the solid ground.

Arnot.

10,872. PARADISE, Adamic. Its trees and fruits, its fields arrayed in verdure and adorned in flowers, the life which breathed in its winds and flowed in its rivers, the serenity of its sky and the splendor of its sunshine, together with the immortality which gilded and burnished all its beautiful scenes, have filled the heart with rapture, and awakened the most romantic visions of the imagination. The poets of the West, and still more those of the East, have, down to the present hour, kindled at the thought of this scene of beauty and fragrance; and the very name of Eden has met the eye as a gem in the verse which it adorned.

Dr. Dwight.

10,873. PARADISE, Heavenly and Earthly. But where is this paradise? what is this paradise? We can say, in answer to these questions, that with this heavenly paradise into which the redeemed at death do enter, the ancient, the earthly paradise is not fit to be compared. In the one, the direct intercourse with God was but occasional; in the other it shall be constant. In the one, the Deity was known only as he revealed Himself in the works of creation and in the ways of his providence; in the other, it will be as the God of our redemption, the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus, that he will be recognized, adored, obeyed—all the higher moral attributes of his nature shining forth in harmonious and illustrious display. Into the earthly paradise the tempter entered; from the heavenly he will be shut out. From the earthly paradise sad exiles once were driven; from the heavenly we shall go no more out for ever. Still, however, after all such imperfect and unsatisfying comparisons, the questions return upon us—Where and what is the paradise of the redeemed? Our simplest and our best answers to those questions perhaps are these—Where is paradise? wherever Jesus is. What is paradise? to be forever with, and to be fully like our Lord.

Hanna.

10,874. PARADISE, Individual. Every man has a paradise around him till he sins, and the angel of an accusing conscience drives him from his Eden. And even then there are holy hours, when this angel sleeps, and man comes back, and with the innocent eyes of a child looks into his lost paradise again—into the broad gates and rural solitudes of nature.

Longfellow.

10,875. PARADISE, Legend of Journeying to. St. Gertrude is the popular patron saint of travelers. She established many large hospices for the entertainment of travelers, and it became a custom to drink to her honor before starting on a journey. After her death it came at length to be a popular superstition that she gave entertainment to souls on the way to paradise. This journey was supposed to occupy three days. The first night the fleeting soul lodged with St. Gertrude, the second with St. Gabriel, and on the third entered paradise. St. Gertrude is regarded by Romanists as the patroness of departed souls.

10,876. PARADISE, Location of. A manuscript in the British Museum says that "Paradise is neither in heaven nor on earth. Noah's flood was forty fathoms high, over the highest hills that are on earth; and paradise is forty fathoms higher than Noah's flood was, and it hangeth between heaven and earth wonderfully, as the ruler of all things made it. And it is perfectly level, both in length and breadth. There is neither hollow nor hill; nor is there frost nor snow, hail nor rain; but there is fons vite, that is, the well of life. When the calends of January commence, then floweth the well so beautifully, and so gently, and no deeper than man may wet his finger on the front, over all that land. And so likewise each month; once when the month comes in the well begins to flow. And there is the copse of wood, which is called Radion Saltus, where each tree is as straight as an arrow, and so high that no earthly man ever saw so high, or can say of what kind they are. And there never falleth a leaf off, for they are evergreen, beautiful and pleasant, full of happiness. Paradise is upright on the eastern part of the world. There is neither heat nor hunger, nor is there ever night, but always day. The sun there shineth seven times brighter than on this earth. Therein dwell innumerable angels of God with the holy souls till doomsday. Therein dwelleth a beautiful bird called Phoenix; he is large and grand, as the Mighty One formed him; he is the lord over all birds."

10,877. PARADISE, Luxuries of. Says Mohammed, "The very meanest in paradise will have eighty thousand servants, seventy-two wives of the girls of paradise, beside the wives he had in this world, and a tent erected for him of pearls, jacinths, and emeralds, of a very large extent." According to another tradition, he will be waited on by three hundred attendants while he eats, will be served in dishes of gold, whereof three hundred shall be set before him at once, containing each a different kind of food, the last morsel of which will be as grateful as the first; and will also be supplied with as many sorts of liquors in vessels of the same metal; and, to complete the entertainment, there will be no want of wine, which will not inebriate.

George Sale.

10,878. PARADISE, Mohammedan. They say it is situate above the seven heavens, (or in the seventh heaven,) and next under the throne of God; and to express the amenity of the place, tell us that the earth of it is of the finest wheat flour, or of the purest musk, or, as others will have it, of saffron; that its stones are pearls and jacinths, the walls of its buildings enriched with gold and silver, and that the trunks of all its trees are of gold; among which the most remarkable is the tree called Tûba, or the tree of happiness. Concerning this tree they fable that it stands in the palace of Mohammed, though a branch of it will reach to the house of every true believer; that it will be laden with pomegranates, grapes, dates, and other fruits of surprising bigness, and of tastes unknown to mortals. So that if a man desire to eat of any particular fruit, it will immediately be presented him; or, if he choose flesh, birds ready dressed will be set before him, according to his wish. They add, that the boughs of this tree will spontaneously bend down to the hand of the person who would gather of its fruits, and that it will supply the blessed not only with food, but also with silken garments, and beasts to ride on, ready saddled and bridled, and adorned with rich trappings, which will burst forth from its fruits; and that this tree is so large, that a person mounted on the fleetest horse would not be able to gallop from one end of its shade to the other in a hundred years.

George Sale.

10,879. PARADISE, Music of. Mohammedans believe that the ravishing songs of the angel Israfil, who has the most melodious voice of all God's creatures, and of the daughters of paradise, and even the trees themselves, will celebrate the divine praises with a harmony exceeding whatever mortals have heard; to which will be joined the sound of bells hanging on the trees, which will be put in motion by the wind proceeding from the throne of God, so oft as the blessed wish for music; nay, the very clashing of the golden-bodied trees, whose fruits are pearls and emeralds, will surpass human imagination. Geo. Sale.

10,880. PARADISE, Search after the. Paludanus relates that Alexander the Great was full of longing desire to behold the earthly paradise, and that he undertook his wars in the East for the express purpose of reaching it. He states that on his nearing Eden, an old man was captured in a ravine by some of Alexander's soldiers, and they were about to conduct him to their monarch, when the venerable man said, "Go and announce to Alexander that it is in vain he seeks paradise; his efforts will be perfectly fruitless, for the way to paradise is the way of humility, a way of which he knows nothing. Take this stone, and give it to Alexander, and say to him, 'From this stone learn what you must know of yourself.'" Now, this stone was of great value, and excessively heavy, outweighing and excelling in value all other gems, but when reduced to powder it was as light as a tuft of hay, and as worthless; by which token the mysterious old man meant that Alexander alive was the greatest of monarchs, but Alexander dead would be a thing of naught. Barring-Gould

10,881. PARADISE, Traditions of. There was a general belief among the ancients in the existence in the West of a great continent called Atlantis. (Vol. I., 2984.) Here Kronos, time, lay asleep, guarded by hundred-handed Briareus. The land was thought to possess every sensuous attraction—a land of groves, flowers, fruits, delightful airs, fountains and streams. It resembled the paradise of Jews and Christians. The fathers tried to drive the heathen fable from the minds of the people, but could not. Christopher Columbus was doubtless stimulated to turn the prow of his ships westward by the same tradition. He thought he had found the Atlantis of the ancients and the paradise of the Christians when he discovered the new world. He wrote, "The saintly theologians and philosophers were right when they fixed the site of the terrestrial paradise in the extreme Orient, because it is a most temperate clime; and the lands which I have just discovered are the limits of the Orient." In 1498, he wrote, "I am convinced that there is the terrestrial paradise."

10,882. PARDON, Appeal for. Some old soldiers, sentenced to be shot, passing by Marshal Turenne on their way to execution, pointed to their many visible scars. This mute appeal had the desired effect. The Marshal prevented the execution by giving them a free pardon. The condemned sinner, on the way to execution, if he point penitently, not to his own scars, but the wounds and blood of Christ, shall have pardon and everlasting life.

10,883. PARDON Detained. In the Isle of Man, as I was one day walking on the seashore, I remember contemplating with thrilling interest an old, gray, ruined tower, covered with ivy. There was a remarkable history connected with the spot. In that tower was formerly hanged one of the best governors the island ever possessed. He had been accused of treachery to the king during the time of the civil wars, and received sentence of death. Intercession was made on his behalf, and a pardon was sent; but that fell into the hands of his bitter enemy, who kept it locked up, and the governor was hanged. His name is still honored by many, and you may often hear a pathetic ballad sung to his memory to the music of the spinning wheel. We must feel horror-struck at the turpitude of that man who, having the pardon for his fellow-creature in his possession, could keep it back, and let him die the death of a traitor. But let us restrain our indignation till we ask ourselves whether God might not point his finger to most of us, and say, Thou art the man. Thou hast a pardon in thine hands to save thy fellow-creature, not from temporal, but from eternal death. Thou hast a pardon suited to all, designed for all. Thou hast enjoyed it thyself, but hast thou not kept it back from thy brother, instead of sending it to the ends of the earth?

Hugh Stowell

10,884. PARDON, Forfeited. Clark Fairbanks

of Massachusetts, was convicted of arson, and sentenced to State Prison for life. After a time of good behavior on the part of the prisoner, and the discovery of some mitigating circumstances of his guilt, a petition was sent to Gov. Claflin for his pardon. This was granted on condition that if he was ever again guilty of a crime he should return and serve out his original sentence. For a while he conducted himself well, but eventually was committed to the House of Correction for assault and battery. On the expiration of this period, the warden of the State Prison claimed him to serve out the sentence, the pardon of which he had forfeited. So it is with pardoned sinners who return again to sin.

10,885. PARDON A Free Gift. A minister, trying to instruct an old man how to get pardon, said, "Now, suppose I were to go to a shop and buy something for you, and pay for it, and tell you to go and fetch it, need you take any money with you?" "No," said the old man, "it would be paid for." "Need you make any promise to pay at some future time?" he then asked. "No," he replied, "I should have it for nothing." "So," he continued, "is it with forgiveness of sins; the Lord Jesus has paid the full price for it. He has had the groans, the sighs, the tears, the wrath, the pain, the punishment; yea, all that sin deserved! He bore it all! He paid the whole! Yes, bought forgiveness with his precious blood, and now he gives it as a gift to all who bring their sins to him." Said the old man, as his eyes filled with tears, "I see it now; it is pardon for nothing! pardon for nothing! Christ has bought it, and he will give it to me!"

10,886. PARDON, Haste for. Among the company awaiting in the ante-room of the White House to see Mr. Lincoln, Gen. Fisk saw an old man, whose sorrowful looks won his pity. From him he learned that he had been there four days, seeking an interview with the President to obtain from him a pardon for his son, who was in Nashville under sentence of death. Gen. Fisk outlined the case on a card, and sent it to Mr. Lincoln with the request that he would see the man. Instantly the order came, and past senators, governors, and generals, the old man was ushered into Mr. Lincoln's presence. He showed his papers, which the President took, and said he would give his answer next day. The father, in agony of fear for the fate of his son, cried aloud, "To-morrow may be too late. My son is under sentence of death. The decision must be made right off." The President took the papers up again, and wrote on them the word "Pardoned." The old man received them amid tears of joy over the salvation of his son.

10,887. PARDON, No Substitute for. If a friend should come to a malefactor on his way to the gallows, put a bouquet into his hands, and bid him be of good cheer, smell on that. Alas! this would bring little joy with it to the poor man's heart, who sees the place of execution before him. But if one comes from the prince with a pardon, which he puts into his hand, and bids him be of good cheer, this, and this only, will reach the poor man's heart, and overcome it with a sudden ravishment of joy. Truly anything short of pardoning mercy is inconsiderable to a troubled conscience, towards any relieving or pacifying it, as that posy in a dying prisoner's hand would be. Gurnall.

10,888. PARDON, Settlement by. James, the brother of Henry Erskine, remarked, "We all need to settle our accounts with God betimes." Henry replied, "I know no way, dear brother, of settling my accounts, but by receiving a free pardon from my Redeemer."

10,889. PARDON, Unexpected. A soldier in the West Indies, condemned by a court-martial, was led out to be shot. His coffin was placed before him, upon which he was requested to kneel; and the regiment to which he belonged was drawn up to witness the affecting scene. A bandage was placed over the eyes of the unhappy culprit, and the chaplain, after commending his soul to God, had left him, when the commanding officer cried, in a solemn but firm tone, "Make ready! Present!" and then, instead of commanding the soldiers to fire, as the unfortunate man expected, he stepped up to him, and said, "The governor pardons you." The soldier, on hearing this, fell from his coffin, and swooned; but on coming to himself, he clapped his hands for joy, and loudly exclaimed, "God bless the governor! He has saved my life! He has saved my life!"

Dr. Robert Young.

10,890. PARENT, A Cruel. It was said that Herod, in slaying the infants of Bethlehem, caused the death of his own son. Augustus Caesar, on hearing this at Rome, said, "It was better to be Herod's pig than his son." This was an allusion to the custom of the Jews, who, not being permitted to eat any swine's flesh, that animal was left to die a natural death.

10,891. PARENT, A Severe. The youngest son of a Mardonian peasant became a libertine. The father did all he could to have him change his course, and as a last resource brought him before King Artaxerxes, and desired his death. The king, amazed at his course, said, "How can you, my friend, endure to see your son die before your face?" He being a gardener by trade, replied, "As willingly as I would pull away leaves from a rank lettuce, and not hurt the root." The king threatened the son with death if he did not do better, and raised the father to the dignity of a judge.

10,892. PARENT, An Unnatural. Pausanias, a Spartan captain, was convicted by the Ephori of a conspiracy with the Persians, against his country. He fled to the temple of Minerva for sanctuary. It being unlawful to force him from thence, the magistrate gave an order to build a wall about him that he might be guarded until he starved to death. His mother brought the first stone that would make her only son a prisoner till death.

10,893. PARENTS, Influence of. The opinions, the spirit, the conversation, the manners of the parent, influence the child. Whatever sort of man he is, such, in a great degree, will be the child; unless constitution or accident give him another turn. If the parent is a fantastic man; if he is a genealogist, knows nothing but who married such an one, and who married such an one; if he is a sensualist, a low wretch, his children will usually catch these tastes. If he is a literary man, his very girls will talk learnedly. If he is a griping, hard, miserly man, such will be his children. This I speak of as generally the case. It may happen that the parent's disposition may have no ground to work on in that of the child. It may happen that the child may be driven into disgust: the miser, for instance, often implants disgust, and his son becomes a spendthrift.

Cecil.

10,894. PARENTS, Memory of. A prison chaplain, after extensive observation, concludes: "The last thing forgotten in all the recklessness of dissolute profligacy, is the prayer or hymn taught by a mother's lips, or uttered at a father's knee; and where there seems to have been any pains bestowed even by one parent to train up a child aright, there is in general more than ordinary ground for hope."

10,895. PARENTS, Responsibility of. And what will parents be able to say to God at the day of judgment, for all their neglect of their children, in matter of instruction and example, and restraint from evil? How will it make your ears tingle when God shall arise terribly to judgment, and say to you, "Behold the children which I have given you; they were ignorant, and you instructed them not; they made themselves vile and you restrained them not. Why did you not have them instructed and trained up in piety and devotion? You have neglected this duty, and now your children, whose souls you have ruined by your neglect, will follow you to hell, to be an addition to your torments there!" Will not your children themselves challenge you at that day and say to you, one by one, "Had you been as careful to teach me the good knowledge of the Lord as I was capable of learning it—had you been as forward to instruct me in my duty as I was ready to have hearkened to it—it had not been with me as it is this day; I had not now stood here trembling, in fearful expectation of the eternal doom which is just ready to be passed upon me?"

Tillotson.

10,896. PARENTS, Rewards of. He that plants a vine in the vernal equinox gathers grapes upon it in the autumnal. He that sows wheat at the setting of the Pleiades reaps it at their rising. Man's education is laborious, his increase slow, his virtue lies at a distance; so that most parents die before their children show their virtue. Neocles never saw Themistocles' victory at Salamis, nor Miltiades the valor of Cimon at Eurymedon; Xanthippus never heard Pericles pleading; nor Aristotle Plato philosophizing; nor did the fathers of Euripides and Sophocles know the victories their sons won, though they heard them stammering and learning to talk.

Plutarch.

10,897. PARENTS, Slighting. To such as have parents I commend the consideration of Prov. 30: 17, which should be to them as the handwriting that appeared upon the wall to Belshazzar. "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the raven of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." That is, they shall be brought to an untimely end, and the birds of the air shall eat that eye that, but for the parent it despised, had never seen the light. It may be you are vigorous and young, they decayed and wrinkled with age; but saith the Holy Ghost, "Despise not thy mother when she is old." Prov. 23: 22. It may be you are rich, they are poor; own and honor them in their poverty, and despise them not. God will requite it if you do.

Flavel.

10,898. PARENTS, Support of. It is a saying frequent among the Jews, "A child should rather labor at the mill than suffer his parents to want." And to the same effect is that other saying, "Your parents must be supplied by you if you have it; if not you ought to beg for them, rather than see them perish." Flavel.

10,899. PARTING, Pangs of. We cannot part with our friends. We cannot let our angels go. We do not see that they only go out that archangels may come in. We are idolaters of the old. We do not believe in the richness of the soul, in its proper eternity and omnipresence. We do not believe there is any force in to-day to rival or re-create that beautiful yesterday. We linger in the ruins of the old tent, where once we had bread, and shelter, and organs, nor believe that the spirit can feed, cover, and nerve us again. We cannot again find aught so dear, so sweet, so graceful, but we sit and weep in vain. The voice of the Almighty saith, "Up and onward for evermore!" We cannot stay amid the ruins. Neither will we rely on the new; and so we walk ever with reverted eyes, like those monsters who look backwards.

Emerson.

10,900. PARTNER, A Stupid. A man or woman with a stupid or perverse partner, but still hoping to see this partner become all that is desired, is like a man with a wooden leg wishing it might become a vital one, and sometimes for a moment fancying this almost possible!

John Foster.

10,901. PARTNERSHIP, Useless. A lion was roaming on the sea-shore, when seeing a dolphin basking on the surface of the water, he invited him to form an alliance with him, "for," said he, "as I am the king of the beasts, and you are the king of the fishes, we ought to be the greatest friends and allies possible." The dolphin gladly assented; and the lion, not long after, having a fight with a wild bull, called upon the dolphin for his promised support. But when he, though ready to assist him, found himself unable to come out of the sea for the purpose, the lion accused him of having betrayed him. "Do not blame me," said the dolphin in reply, "but blame my nature, which, however powerful at sea, is altogether helpless on land."

Aesop.

10,902. PASSION, Allurements of. The legend of Tannhauser is that he was riding through Hoesel Vale, on his way to Wartburg, when, as he was passing a cliff in the Hørselloch, he saw a female figure of unearthly beauty, whom he recognized as Venus. She spoke to him enchanting words, strains of sweetest music meanwhile filling the air, a roseate light glowing around and charming nymphs scattering roses at her feet. He left his horse and followed the charmer, at the tread of whose feet flowers sprang up, till he entered a mountain cave and found himself in the palace of Venus. Here he passed seven years in revelry and debauch, surrounded by all the pleasure and magnificence of the heathen goddess' home. He was filled with satiety and loathing, and longed for the blue sky and fresh breezes of the outside world. In vain he besought from Venus permission to depart. In his despondency he called upon the Virgin Mary, and a passage opened to him, and he stood once more upon the earth. He delighted in all the beauties of rural nature around him. Then the tones of the church bell fell upon his ear so long used only to Bacchanal songs, and he hastened to make his confession. The priest was horror-struck at the recital of his foul crimes, and refused him absolution. He went from one to another to seek relief till he came to the pope himself. Urban IV. listened to his confession of appalling guilt and earnest prayer for absolution. He thrust the penitent indignantly away, exclaiming, "Guilt such as thine can never, never, be remitted. Sooner shall this staff in my hand grow green and blossom, than that God should pardon thee." Tannhauser, disheartened, started to return to the only asylum that would receive him. Three days after his departure Urban discovered that his staff had burst into leaves and flowers. He hastened to send messengers after the penitent with his blessing. They could only discover that a weary man had just entered the Hørselloch.

10,903. PASSIONS, Disappointment of. It is folly to pretend that one ever wholly recovers from a disappointed passion. Such wounds always leave a scar. There are faces I can never look upon without emotion; there are names I can never hear spoken without almost starting.

Longfellow.

10,904. PASSIONS, Dominance of the. There is a fable which represents that the tail of the snake obtained authority over the head and led the way, head following. The tail being altogether blind, dashed against a stone at one moment, and the next against a tree, and at last drowned both itself and the head in the river of death. The moral is, beware of allowing your passions and animal instincts to control your moral and intellectual nature. To disregard this is to rush upon disaster and final ruin.

10,905. PASSIONS, Obstructions of the. How perfectly sweet and gentle that little brook is that runs through the meadow! Put an obstruction six inches high across it, and see how it will complain day and night. Every minute it murmurs its complaint. Build the obstruction higher, and see how its voice increases! Build it still higher, and see how it pours itself, complaining incessantly and loudly. It is not until you lay an obstruction across the passions of men that you know the force of that stream which you are checking. Beecher.

10,906. PASSIONS, Tyranny of the. We say of a man who has no will-mastery, "He is ruled by his passions;" they govern him, not he them. Centuries ago an Arab wrote, "Passion is a tyrant which slays those whom it governs." It is like fire, which, once thoroughly kindled, can scarcely be quenched; or like the torrent, which, when it is swollen, can no longer be restrained with its banks. Call not him a prisoner who has been put in fetters by his enemy, but rather him whose own passions overpowered him to destruction. J. Johnson.

10,907. PASSOVER, Import of the. The elect family, with shoes on their feet, and their loins girt ready for flight from Egypt, are standing by night within the house whose door-posts are sprinkled with blood, while the destroying angel is abroad in judgment, in the death of their first-born, judging the pride of Egypt. And this is the one great truth in Egypt—the sprinkled blood, and its value, and its value as delivering from judgment. In Egypt it is much to know that Israel is redeemed, and that there is safety in the blood of sprinkling. But the blood of Jesus has much more connected with it than mere deliverance from Egypt or salvation; yet this is the only use of it which is known by Israel in the house of bondage. For Israel in Egypt, for the Christian in the world, the one great truth is the Passover, redemption through the blood of the Lamb, salvation, not for our righteousness' sake, but because the blood is on the door-post. A. Jukes.

10,908. PAST, Clinging to the. How very apt we are to outlive in our attitude or energies what has passed. We cling to the shell—to the husk—to the garments—after the kernel, the essence, the life has gone. If only we are looking heavenwards, in the right direction, we do not see that we may be merely "gazing," and nothing more. We are not apt to see how much of emptiness there is in what appears so right in itself. We cling to places, long after those who peopled them are gone—to forms, long after their spirit has died out—to positions, which we ourselves once rightly occupied, when circumstances have been so changed that it is meaningless to stand in that position any more. Power.

10,909. PAST, Future and. The world has arrived at a period which renders it the part of fashion to pay homage to the prospective precedents of the future, in preference to those of the past. The past is dead, and has no resurrection; but the future is endowed with such a life, that it lives to us even in anticipation. The past is, in many things the foe of mankind; the future is, in all things, our friend. For the past has no hope; the future is both hope and fruition. The past is the text-book of tyrants; the future the Bible of the free. Those who are solely governed by the past, stand, like Let's wife, crystallized in the act of looking backward, and forever incapable of looking forward.

Marryat.

10,910. PASTOR, An Enemy to His. When Homer had spent many lines in dispraising the body of Thyrsites, he briefly describes his mind thus: that he was an enemy to Ulysses, a wise and eloquent man. And there can be no more said of a bad man than this: that he is an enemy to his pastor. That is enough to brand him.

Skinner.

10,911. PASTOR, A Faithful. Poemen, the hermit, heard of an old man dwelling at a long distance, who was much troubled in conscience. He made a weary journey over the desert to see him, and had framed three arguments, which he hoped would bring peace to his mind. When he reached him he had forgotten one of his consolations. Returning home, the third point came back to him just as he was about laying his hand on the lock of the door. Without entering his house, he retraced his journey to pour his third consolation into the old man's ear. The man was moved at his solicitude for souls, and said, "Thou art, indeed, a Poemen—a shepherd of the flock of Jesus."

10,912. PASTOR, Perseverance of a. Rev. S. Thornton called to see an irreligious parishioner in his sickness. The old man recognizing his voice, called out from his room, "I don't want you here; you may go away." The next day Mr. Thornton again presented himself, with inquiries after him, and an expressed desire to see him; calling out from the stairs, "Well, my friend, may I come up to you to-day?" Again he was answered, "I don't want you here." Twenty-one days successively did the patient clergyman call with the same request, and on the twenty-second obtained admittance to the bed-side of the sick man. Ever after he was permitted to read God's Word to him, and pray with him. The aged man was converted, recovered, and became a faithful Christian.

10,913. PASTOR, Work of the. A late writer says, "It is written in the annals of art, that sculptors have spent months in wandering from quarry to quarry in search of a block fleckless and crystalline, to worthily embody their ideal; and then have given months and years to the slow shaping of the crudeness of the stone into the grace of outline and loveliness of feature, that reproduced in the imperishable whiteness of the marble the dream of beauty which filled their thought. And surely the work of shaping souls into the symmetry of Christ-likeness has its greater inspirations."

10,914. PASTORS, Advantage of New. When Scipio Junior was appointed to command the Roman army and fight the Numantines, he found it enervated, demoralized, and beaten. He reorganized it and infused his own indomitable spirit into it, and then engaged and routed the enemy. The officers of the foe rebuked their soldiers, and asked why they fled from those they had pursued so often. A

Numantine soldier answered, "The sheep are the same still, but they have another shepherd."

10,915. PATIENCE, Need of. Progress of the best kind is comparatively slow. Great results cannot be achieved at once; and we must be satisfied to advance in life as we walk, step by step. De Maistre says, "To know how to wait is the great secret of success." We must sow before we can reap, and often have to wait long, content, meanwhile, to look patiently forward in hope; the fruit best worth waiting for often ripening the slowest. It is always a mark of short-sightedness and of weakness to be impatient of results. Thus true growth is often baffled; like little children who plant seeds in their garden, and grub them up to see how they grow, and so kill them through their impatience.

Smiles.

10,916. PATIENCE, Offices of. The offices of patience are as varied as the ills of this life. We have need of it with ourselves and with others; with those below and those above us, and with our own equals; with those who love us, and those who love us not; for the greatest things, and for the least; against sudden inroads of trouble, and under our daily burdens; disappointments as to the weather, or the breaking of the heart; in the weariness of the body, or the wearing of the soul; in our own failure of duty, or others' failure to us; in every-day wants, or in the aching of sickness, or the decay of age; in disappointment, bereavement, losses, injuries, reproaches; in heaviness of the heart, or its sickness amid delayed hopes.

Dr. Pusey.

10,917. PATIENCE Prescribed. If thou intendest to vanquish the greatest, the most abominable and wickedest enemy, who is able to do thee mischief both in body and soul, and against whom thou preparest all sorts of weapons, but cannot overcome, then know that there is a sweet and loving physical herb to serve thee, named Patentia.

Luther.

10,918. PATIENCE, Result of. An emperor of China, once passing through his dominions, was entertained in a house in which the master, with his wife, children, daughter-in-law, grand-children, and servants, all lived together in perfect harmony. The emperor, struck with admiration at the spectacle, requested the head of the family to inform him what means he used to preserve quiet among such a number and variety of persons. The old man, taking out his pencil, wrote these three words: "Patience—Patience—Patience."

10,919. PATRIOTISM, Passion of. John Burns, of Gettysburg, in his seventieth year, offered himself to General Wister, commander of what was known as the "Iron Brigade." He was dressed in Continental coat, vest and corduroys which he had worn in the war of 1812. He told the General that he had fought for his country in 1812, and he wanted to fight for it again. The officer looked at him, and seeing that he was in earnest, said, "God bless the old soldier, he shall have a chance." He joined the 7th Wisconsin, and performed a brave man's duty, until the close of the first day's battle, when he was hit four times, and fell into the enemy's hands. His escape from death was marvelous. A pair of old-fashioned spectacles averted the first blow; a truss he wore, the second; the third ball passed through his leg, and the fourth through his arm, but broke no bones. He lay on the field all night, and through a neighbor's kindness was taken to his own house in town. Here a rebel officer visited him, and inquired what part he had taken in the fight, but he made no reply. Shortly after the officer left another ball came through the window, grazed the wounded man's breast and buried itself in the wall. He had just turned over. If he had not, the minie ball would have passed through him.

10,920. PATRIOTISM, Pleasure of. Neither Montaigne in writing his essays, nor Descartes in building new worlds, nor Burnet in framing an antediluvian earth, no, nor Newton in discovering and establishing the true laws of nature on experiment and a sublime geometry, felt more intellectual joys than he feels who is a real patriot, who bends all the force of his understanding, and directs all his thoughts and actions, to the good of his country.

Bolingbroke.

10,921. PATTERNS, Highest. There is no manner of inconvenience in having a pattern propounded to us of so great perfection as is above our reach to attain to, and there may be great advantages in it. The way to excel in any kind is to propose the brightest and most perfect examples to our imitation. No man can write after too perfect and good a copy; and though he can never reach the perfection of it, yet he is like to learn more than by one less perfect. He that aims at the heavens, which yet he is sure to come short of, is like to shoot higher than he that aims at a mark within his reach.

Tillotson.

10,922. PEACE, Christ's. A chaplain related the story of a little girl, who when told that her father had gone to heaven, asked her mother, "If she had not better begin to pack up too, and get ready to go?" A soldier heard it and said, "I am glad you told us that story about packing up, it made the thing so plain to me. I haven't much learning, and I haven't tried to understand these things much; but now I see through it all. I want you to help me pack up. Pray with me, chaplain." While prayer was being offered, the earnest heart cried out, "Oh do Lord, help me! help me!" The Holy Spirit was there. This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and he said, "I am happy now; I have found Jesus," with a face radiant with joy. "What of your body," one asked, "are you suffering now?" He had been shot through the right shoulder and left leg, and had an arm taken off. "Oh," said he, "my wounds are nothing now. I can bear them all. I have peace within."

10,923. PEACE, Ecclesiastical. Constantine, finding that there were many differences existing between the fathers of the church, convened the Nicene Council. He desired them to bring in writing all their accusations and complaints. After he had received all that were proffered, he bound them in a bundle, and saying that he had not so much as looked at them, burnt them before the Council. Constantine then exhorted them to peace and cordial agreement among themselves.

10,924. PEACE, Fable of. Once on a time, the wolves sent an embassy to the sheep, desiring that there might be peace between them for the time to come. "Why," said they, "should we be forever waging this deadly strife? Those wicked dogs are the cause of all; they are incessantly barking at us, and provoking us. Send them away, and there will be no longer any obstacle to our eternal friendship and peace." The silly sheep listened, the dogs were dismissed, and the flock, thus deprived of their best protectors, became an easy prey to their treacherous enemy.

Aesop.

10,925. PEACE, Making. It would be very desirable to follow the example of the excellent Dr. Cotton Mather, who formed a society of peacemakers, whose professed business it was to compose differences, and prevent lawsuits. It was his laudable ambition to be able to say, "He did not know of any person in the world who had done him any ill office but he had done him a good one for it. The Greeks had their αμυστα, whereby they took an order that all wrongs and injuries should be buried and forgotten amongst them. The primitive Christians had their αγαπα, their love-feasts, for the like purpose. In this let us set like good examples.

Buck.

10,926. PEACE, Possible. Is there, in fact, such a thing as an attainable habit of mind that can remain at peace no matter what external circumstances may be? No matter what worries—no matter what perplexities, what thwartings, what cares, what dangers; no matter what slanders, what revilings, what persecutions—is it possible to keep an immovable peace? When suddenly called to die, or to face sorrows worse than death, is it possible to be still at peace? Yes, it is.

Mrs. H. B. Stowe.

10,927. PEACE, Prosperity and. Those that are versed in the keeping and breeding of bees look on that hive to be healthiest and in best condition where there is most humming, and which is fullest of bustle and noise; but he to whom God has committed the care of the rational and political hive will perceive the felicity of the people to consist chiefly in quietness and tranquillity.

Plutarch.

10,928. PEACE, Silence and. Heraclitus was asked to speak on the subject of peace, unity, and concord. Ascending the rostrum, he called for a cup of clear water, upon which he sprinkled some bran or meal, with a little glacon or herb, and then supped it off. This done, without speaking one word, departed: leaving the people to wonder what he meant. He desired to teach them that they must cease from immoderate expenses, and be happy with things cheap and easy to be had; this being a certain way to promote peace and harmony.

10,929. PEACE, Source of. It is the religion of Jesus alone that can give peace to man: it unites him with his Saviour; it subdues his passions, it controls his desires, it consoles him with the love of Christ; it gives him joy even in sorrow; and this is a joy that cannot be taken away.

Fenelon.

10,930. PEARLS, Buying. A gentleman purchased a string of imitation pearls in Paris, for which he paid ninety cents. This necklace he gave to his daughter for one of her dolls. A jeweler called one evening while the child was amusing herself with her new toy. "How foolish you are to let a child have so valuable an object to play with," remarked the jeweler to the father. "Valuable!" responded the latter. "I gave four francs and a half for it the other day." The jeweler took the necklace from the little girl, and examined it minutely. "I do not care what you paid for it," said he; "but this much I do know, the pearls are real!" Further examination proved that the necklace was worth at least two thousand dollars. He who buys virtue gets the priceless pearls, and he who buys pleasure has a wax or glass imitation of no value.

10,931. PEDANTRY Defined. Pedantry consists in the use of words unsuitable to the time, place, and company.

Coleridge.

10,932. PEEVISHNESS, Canker of. Peevishness may be considered the canker of life, that destroys its vigor, and checks its improvement; that creeps on with hourly depredations, and taints and vitiates what it cannot consume.

Johnson.

10,933. PEN, Office of the. The pen is the tongue of the hand—a silent utterer of words for the eye—the unmusical substitute of the literal tongue, which is the soul's prophet, the heart's minister, and the interpreter of the understanding.

Beecher.

10,934. PENANCE, Revolting. According to Cæsar of Heisterbach, a usurer of Cologne was greatly troubled on account of his sins, and confessed to a priest. For penance the priest bade him fill a large chest with bread for the church of St. Gereon. Next day the loaves were found to have been changed into frogs and toads. The priest recalled him to look at his offering. "Behold," said he, "the value of your offering in the sight of God!" The terrified usurer cried out, "Lord, what shall I do?" The priest said to him, "If you wish to be saved, lie this night naked amid the reptiles." Nature could but revolt from the loathsome bed; but so great was the man's contrition, that he consented, choosing rather a bed among worms which perish, than with those which are eternal. He laid down in the chest, and the priest closed it upon him and departed. The next day he returned and opened the chest, but found nothing save the bones of the man. This man chose such a bed to save his soul. The debauchee has a like bed forever.

10,935. PENANCE, Violent. In the eleventh century a voluntary penance was introduced, consisting of violent self-flagellation. The infliction of three thousand stripes, while the votary recited ten psalms, constituted one year of ecclesiastical penance. The recitation of the whole Psalter and the infliction of fifteen thousand lashes, was esteemed equivalent to one hundred years. With this course of discipline was usually combined great abstemiousness, and the usual features of the life of an anchorite. One of these flagellants, St. Dominic, cried with tears, "I am become a sensual man." His explanation was that he had eaten a little raw fennel with his dry bread on Sundays and Thursdays, on account of feeble health.

10,936. PENITENCE versus Penance. A hermit came to the abbot Poemen and said, "My father, I have committed a grievous fault, and must do penance for it for three years." "Three years!" answered Poemen, "that is a very long penance." "What! is that too long?" At least for a year, then." "Too long, too long," said Poemen. One present inquired, "How long would you have him punish himself for his fault—forty days?" "This is too much," said the abbot; "a broken and a contrite heart God will not despise with only three days of penance."

10,937. PENTECOST, First Christian. Next to the day of Christ's death, the day of Pentecost was the greatest day that ever dawned on our world. It was the first day of the last and best dispensation of revealed religion. It was, as it has been well called, "the birthday" of the Christian Church. It was the first day of the new creation, in which the elements which had previously existed in a state of chaotic confusion began to be fashioned and arranged by the plastic power of the Spirit of glory and of God.

Morris.

10,938. PENURIOUSNESS, Fable of. A certain boy put his hand into a pitcher where great plenty of figs and filberts were deposited; he grasped as many as his fist could possibly hold, but when he endeavored to pull it out, the narrowness of the neck prevented him. Unwilling to lose any of them, but unable to draw out his hand, he burst into tears, and bitterly bemoaned his hard fortune. An honest fellow who stood by, gave him this wise and reasonable advice: "Grasp only half the quantity, and you will easily succeed."

Æsop.

10,939. PEOPLE, Power of the. Let no man slight the scorn and hate of the people. When it is unjust, it is a wolf; but when it is just, a dragon. Though the tyrant, seated high, does think he may contemn their malice; yet he ought to remember that they have many hands, while he hath one neck only. If he, being single, be dangerous to many, those many will to him alone be dangerous in their hate. The sands of Africa, though they be but barren dust and lightness, yet, angered by the winds, they bury both the horse and traveler alive.

Feltham.

10,940. PERFECTION, Aiming for. A Wesleyan once asked Rev. Mr. Dunn, of Portsea, whether he thought a state of sinless perfection attainable in this life? Mr. D. replied, "Let us, my friend, seek after it as eagerly as if it were attainable."

10,941. PERFECTION, Boasting of. He who boasts of being perfect is perfect in folly. I never saw a perfect man. Every rose has its thorns, and every day its night. Even the sun shows spots, and the skies are darkened with clouds. And faults of some kind nestle in every bosom. Spurgeon.

10,942. PERFECTION, Emblem of Humana. Pliny informs us that Zeuxis once painted a boy holding a dish full of grapes so well that the birds were deceived, and flew to the grapes to peck at them. Zeuxis, notwithstanding, was dissatisfied with the picture. "For," said he, "had I painted the boy as well as he ought to have been painted, the birds would have been afraid to touch them." Thus does the Christian dwell more on his shortcomings than on his attainments. F. F. Trench.

10,943. PERFECTION, Estimating. Two brothers, Spaniards, spent their lives and fortunes in different ways. One lived in the desert practicing the austerities and charities of an hermit; the other built hospitals and monasteries. When both were dead, the question arose among the monks as to which of them was the most perfect. They appealed to their abbot, Pambo, and he said, "Both were perfect before God; there are many roads to perfection beside that which leads through the desert cell."

10,944. PERFECTION, Example of. It is said in classic history that a statuary, who resolved to cut out of the Parian marble a female figure the most beautiful and graceful the world ever saw or the poet ever dreamed of, induced all the beauties of Greece to come to him in succession, while he selected from each the feature that was in the highest perfection, and transferred it to the marble on which he was working; and when this beautiful thing was finished, it became the admiration of Greece and of the utmost bound of Europe. In order to form a perfect character, we need copy none but Christ. F. F. Trench.

10,945. PERFECTION, Excelling in. God revealed to Macarius, the anchorite of Scete, famed for his austerities, devotions and sanctity, that there were two married women in a neighboring town of greater perfection than himself. He left the desert, staff in hand, in search of them. He found them unknown to fame, unmarked by beauty or fortune, practicing the plain virtues of humility, patience, charity, self-denial and resignation, doing their duty in their domestic relation with cheerfulness, and maintaining a devotional spirit by ejaculatory prayer and frequent consecrations of soul and body to God.

10,946. PERFECTION, Motto of. I once observed the following motto attached to a coat-of-arms on a gentleman's carriage, Tout bien, ou rien, "Everything well, or nothing," and it struck me as being peculiarly expressive of what ought to be the Christian's feeling. F. F. Trench.

10,947. PERFECTION, Objection to. A young man in conversation with the late Alexander Patrick of Airdrie, Scotland, attempted to discredit the doctrine of Christian perfection, as taught by the Wesleyans, and rested his whole objection upon a fact in his own experience, declaring that he was daily tormented with bad thoughts, and could not be free from them. "My bairn," said Mr. P., "ye maunna judge o' others by yourself'. And, ye ken, a bad neebour is no ane o' the family. If ye would just da wi' your ill thoughts as ye da to an ill neebour, that is, dinna gie 'em a stool to sit down on, ye'll no be sae muckle troubled as ye hae been. It is no impossible, mon, to affront 'em all." J. G. Wilson.

10,948. PERFUMES, Oriental Use of. The Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, Hebrews, and in a word all the ancient nations who had attained to civilization, were addicted to the use of perfumes to an extent to which no European people at the present day affords any parallel. But it was not merely as contributing to the luxury of the body that they were prized. Perfumes were largely employed at the solemn rites which were celebrated at the burial of the dead, and lavishly expended at the public religious service. Take the Hebrews, and observe how great was the importance attached by them to the sacred employment of fragrant substances. The altar of incense stood in a most conspicuous part of the temple, and sweet incense was burned upon it every day. The high priest was forbidden to enter "the holiest of all" unless bearing in his hand the censer from which clouds of perfumed smoke rose before the mercy seat. A portion of frankincense, consisting of many sweet-smelling substances, was added to the sacrifices; and a richly perfumed oil was employed to anoint the altars and other equipments of the temple, and the priests themselves, as a mark of their appointment to the service of God.

Prof. G. Wilson.
10,949. PERIL, Unseen. A stranger traveling on foot one intensely dark night, in the Isle of Man, was compelled to feel his way. He came to what seemed a low wall, concluded he had lost his way, and thought to find the road on the other side. He sprang upon the wall and let himself down the length of his arms, but finding no footing drew himself up and returned to the side he had left. He regained the road and reached his destination. The next day he revisited the place where he hung over the wall, and was filled with horror at the awful peril he had escaped. Had he let go, he must have been dashed to pieces on the rocks at the bottom of an awful precipice.

10,950. PERISHING, Rescue the. A neglected soldier shot through the cheeks and roots of his tongue lay in a niche of the fence upon the field of Antietam. A gentleman from Philadelphia discovered him by the light of his lantern, had his wound dressed, and, by special care, saved his life. His gratitude was great. The rescuer was afterwards introduced to the wife of the heroic soldier by her husband, who said, while tears of gratitude filled his eyes, "The man who picked me up at midnight, and dressed my wound, when I had given myself up to die." Souls are wounded, and lie around us waiting for relief, which we can give, and save a soul from death.

10,951. PERJURY, Memento of. Ludovicus, King of Burgundy, was taken prisoner, but was given his liberty upon promising not to make war again. Upon receiving his freedom, he raised a stronger army than before. He was again overcome, and lost all. His eyes were plucked out, and these words were branded upon his forehead: "This man was saved by clemency, and lost by perjury."

10,952. PERJURY, Punishment of. In 1444, Uladislaus, King of Poland, fought against Amurath the Turkish king, and defeated him. A treaty of peace was made, and mutually sworn to by both kings, one swearing upon the Evangelists, and the other on the Koran. But through the influence of the pope, Cardinal Julian was sent to break the league, and absolve Uladislaus from his oath. This renewed the war, and the Turks were being beaten with great slaughter. Amurath seeing the crucifix displayed on the ensigns of the Christians, tore the late treaty from his bosom, and holding it up in his hand, looked up to heaven, exclaiming, "Behold thou crucified Christ, this is the league, thy Christians, in thy name, made with me, which they have without cause violated. Now if thou be God, as they say thou art, revenge the wrong now done unto thy name and me, and show thy power upon thy perjured people, who in their deeds deny thee, their God." The tide of battle turned. Uladislaus was slain, and his head was borne on the end of a lance. The legate, who had instigated the war, was also slain, and his body was treated with great indignity by the Turks.

10,953. PERSECUTION of Bunyan. The bill of indictment preferred against John Bunyan ran thus:—"John Bunyan hath devilishly and perniciously abstained from coming to church to hear divine service, and is a common upholder of several unlawful meetings and conventicles, to the disturbance and distraction of the good subjects of this kingdom, contrary to the laws of our sovereign lord the king." He was convicted, and imprisoned twelve years and six months.

10,954. PERSECUTION, Continuation of. Cain's club is still carried up and down, crimsoned with the blood of Abel. Buckholtzer.

10,955. PERSECUTION, Figures of. The darkness that fell upon Abram when the burning lamp passed between the divided sacrifice, Gen. 15: 9-21. The burning bush, Exod. 3: 1, 2. The wicked husbandmen in the vineyard, Matt. 21: 33-35. The wild boar rooting up the vine, Ps. 80: 12, 13. The bulls of Bashan—fierce dogs, Ps. 22: 12, 13, 16, 20; the lion 2 Tim. 4: 17; grievous wolves, Acts 20: 29. Archers, Gen. 49: 23. A great fight of afflictions, Heb. 10: 32. Bowes.

10,956. PERSECUTION, No Religion in. I love to see a man zealous in a good matter, and especially when his zeal shows itself for advancing morality and promoting the happiness of mankind. But when I find the instruments he works with are racks and gibbets, galleys and dungeons: when he imprisons men's persons, confiscates their estates, ruins their families, and burns the body to save the soul, I cannot stick to pronounce of such a one that (whatever he may think of his faith and religion) his faith is vain and his religion unprofitable.

Addison.
10,957. PERSECUTION Overruled. An Irish girl renounced Romanism, and by order of the priest was turned out of her father's house. A Protestant neighbor took her in, but the priest, jealous of her good fortune, ordered her recall to her father's house, and that an attempt should be made to change her by kindness. This new experiment having been tried in vain, it was resolved to send her to her brother in America, a most bigoted Catholic and violent man. When she met him she resolved to tell him at once of her change of religion. She expected nothing less than the most cruel treatment, and was greatly astonished when he responded by embracing her, and saying, "Mary, it is but three weeks since I too have renounced Romanism, and have peace in coming directly to Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour."

10,958. PERSECUTION, Popular. Before the times of Galileo and Harvey, the world believed in the diurnal immovability of the earth, and the stagnation of the blood; and for denying these, the one was persecuted and the other ridiculed. The intelligence and virtue of Socrates were punished with death. Anaxagoras, when he attempted to propagate a just notion of the Supreme Being, was dragged to prison. Aristotle, after a long series of persecutions, swallowed poison. The great geometricians and chemists, as Gerbert, Roger Bacon, and others, were abhorred as magicians. Virgilius, bishop of Salzburg, having asserted that there existed antipodes, the Archbishop of Mentz declared him an heretic, and consigned him to the flames; and the Abbot Trithemius, who was fond of improving stenography, or the art of secret writing, having published some curious works on that subject, they were condemned, as works full of diabolical mysteries. Galileo was condemned at Rome publicly to disavow his sentiments regarding the motion of the earth, the truth of which must have been abundantly manifest: he was imprisoned in the Inquisition, and visited by Milton, who tells us he was then poor and old. Disraeli.

10,959. PERSECUTION, Riches of. A certain person, on seeing a Christian woman go cheerfully to prison, said to her, "O you have not yet tasted of the bitterness of death." She as cheerfully answered, "No, nor never shall; for Christ hath promised that those who keep his sayings shall never see death." Secker.

10,960. PERSECUTION, Safety in. As long as the waters of persecution are on the earth, so long we dwell in the ark; but where the land is dry, the dove itself will be tempted to a wandering course of life, and never return to the house of her safety. Jeremy Taylor

10,961. PERSECUTION, Support in. In the time of persecution a judge, in the days of Charles II., said to a good old saint who was persecuted, "I will banish you to America." "Very well," said she; "judge, you cannot send me out of my Father's country."

Whitefield.

10,962. PERSECUTION, Surviving. There were ten persecutions in the first hundred years of the Church, during which hundreds of thousands of Christians were destroyed, and the enemies often thought they had crushed out the new religion. Diocletian had a medal struck with the false boast, "The Christian religion is destroyed, and the worship of the gods is restored." Behold! the stone from the mountain so often smitten fills the whole earth.

10,963. PERSECUTION, Useless. The history of persecution is a history of endeavors to cheat nature; to make water run up hill, to twist a rope of sand. It makes no difference whether the actors be many or one, a tyrant or a mob.

Emerson.

10,964. PERSEVERANCE, Christian. It is with Christian work just as with all other work, the chief desideratum is persistent application. Arago says, in his autobiography, that his greatest master in mathematics was a word or two of advice, which he found in the binding of one of his text-books, the words of D'Alembert to a discouraged student: "Go on, sir, go on." Those two little words made Arago the greatest astronomical mathematician of his age. And those two words have made many a life a poem which shall sing forever. Christ abbreviated them into one, and his almighty "Go" (spoken when he stood on the extreme verge of this world, only one step from his throne), drove Paul restlessly around Asia and Europe with the message of mercy, and has been sounding in the ear of the Church ever since as its unrepealed and unrepealable marching order.

Dr. Foss.

10,965. PERSEVERANCE, Effect of. A very little girl undertook to carry a ton of coal, a shovelful at a time, from the sidewalk to a bin in the cellar. An observer asked her, "Do you expect to get all that coal in with that little shovel?" She answered, "Yes sir, if I work long enough." Trifling efforts persisted in will accomplish more than spasmodic endeavors of greater pretensions.

10,966. PERSEVERANCE of Faith. An unbelieving heart may have some flash of spirit and resolution, but it wants free mettle and will be sure to jade in a long journey. Faith will throw in the net of prayer again and again, as long as God commands and the promise encourageth. The greyhound hunts by sight; when he cannot see his game, he gives over running; but the true hound by scent; he hunts over hedge and ditch; though he sees not the hare, he pursues all the day long. Thus an unbelieving heart, may be drawn out upon some visible probabilities and sensible hopes of a coming mercy to pray and exercise a little faith; but when they are out of sight, his heart fails him; but faith keeps the scent of the promise, and gives not over the chase. Salter.

10,967. PERSEVERANCE, Final. When Diogenes had spent the greater part of his life in observing the most extreme and scrupulous self-denial, and was fast verging on ninety years of age, one of his friends recommended him to indulge himself a little. "What!" exclaimed he; "would you have me quit the race close by the goal?"

10,968. PERSEVERANCE, Lesson of. The Chinese tell of one of their countrymen, a student, who, disheartened by the difficulties in his way, threw down his book in despair; when, seeing a woman rubbing a crowbar on a stone, he inquired the reason, and was told that she wanted a needle, and thought she would rub down the crowbar till she got it small enough. Provoked by this example of patience to "try again," he resumed his studies, and became one of the three foremost scholars in the empire.

Matthews.

10,969. PERSEVERANCE, Path of. "Search the Scriptures." There are treasures in them more precious than silver and gold; but they do not lie upon the surface: they must be sought with the miner's perseverance, and the miner's toil. And what is the miner's toil? what is the miner's perseverance? Take as an illustration the touching story told of one lying in the churchyard among the mountains, in Wordsworth's "Excursion." He describes one of a band of miners, who, when others were foiled and gave up—

"Alone,
Urged unremittingly the stubborn work,
Unseconded, uncountenanced; then, as time
Passed on, while still his lonely efforts found
No recompense, derided;"

but still he dug on, unmoved by derision, and unshaken by failure, till at length, after twenty years, he came upon the long-sought prize. The joy of his success was too much for him: his mind gave way under it. But the point for us to notice is the patient, persevering toil with which, "hoping against hope," he labored on till he succeeded. And of this, the poet tells us there is left a record on the rock:

"Conspicuous to this day
The path remains that linked his cottage door
To the mine's mouth; a long and slanting track
Upon the rugged mountain's stony side,
Worn by his daily visits to and from
The darksome centre of a constant hope. . .
And it is named, in memory of the event,
THE PATH OF PERSEVERANCE."

Morse.

10,970. PERSEVERANCE, Power of. Perpetual pushing and assurance put a difficulty out of countenance, and make a seeming impossibility give way.—Jeremy Collier.—That policy that can strike only while the iron is hot, will be overcome by that perseverance which, like Cromwell's, can make the iron hot by striking; and he that can only rule the storm must yield to him who can both raise and rule it. Colton.

10,971. PERSEVERANCE, Resistless. All the performances of human art at which we look with praise or wonder are instances of the resistless force of perseverance. It is by this that the quarry becomes a pyramid, and that distant countries are united by canals. If a man was to compare the effect of a single stroke of a pickaxe, or of one impression of the spade, with the general design and last result, he would be overwhelmed by the sense of their disproportion; yet those petty operations, incessantly continued, in time surmount the greatest difficulties, and mountains are leveled and oceans bounded by the slender force of human beings.

10,972. PERSEVERANCE, Satanic. The Hebrew writers note that the devil's name, Beelzebub, signifieth a great flesh-fly or a master-fly: flee him away never so often, he will still fly thither again. So the devil will never cease molesting us, till the "smoking flax" be quite quenched, and the "bruised reed" clean broken.

Bp. Andrews.

10,973. PERSEVERANCE, Successful. Kepler undertook to solve the laws of the planetary system. 'The Ptolemaic theory of axles and cranks, long and short, by which the planets were strung together and kept in motion, was absurd.' No wonder King Alfonso, of Castile, said of it, "If I had been consulted at the creation, I could have done the thing better than that!" Then came the developments of Copernicus, which considered the sun as the centre of the planetary system, and the earth as revolving upon its own axis once in twenty-four hours. It was found that circular orbits did not conform to the observations. Tycho Brahé studied the heavens, and his secrets furnished Kepler a basis of computation. Comparing his own tables of observations of the planet Mars with those of Brahé, he found a difference of eight minutes of a degree. Then he exclaimed, "Out of these eight minutes we will construct a new theory that will explain the movements of all planets." For eight years he tried to hunt down the secret. He tried nineteen hypotheses in vain, and then the ellipse suggested itself as a possible solution. Seventeen years of unflagging toil won a glorious success. In the enthusiasm of victory hard-earned, he exclaimed, "Nothing holds me. The die is cast. The book is written, to be read now or by posterity, I care not which. It may well wait a century for a reader, since God has waited six thousand years for an observer." Kepler's three laws are a memento of perseverance.

10,974. PERSEVERANCE, Useless. Rev. Wm. Davy, of Lustleigh, England, finished "a system of divinity," embracing twenty-six volumes, after twelve years of unremitting toil. He set up the types, of which he had enough for two pages, and printed forty copies of the first three hundred pages, and fourteen of the remainder of the work. The record of perseverance only remains, which resulted in aggravated poverty and disappointment.

10,975. PERSONAL EFFORT, Lesson of. Rev. F. G. Clark went into the orchard where the workmen were busy picking apples, climbing tall ladders placed against the trees, and plucking off the reluctant fruit. A strong wind the day before had shaken off half the fruit, and it lay on the ground ungathered, apparently perfect. "Look here," said he, "why not put in these apples? They are perfectly sound." "No," said the farmer, "not one of these will answer for winter use. They will show a bruise in thirty days, and will begin to perish. Don't put an apple into the barrel which is not hand-picked. Those are the only ones you can rely upon." In this the doctor saw a sermon for soul-savers. They mistake who wait for some mighty rushing wind to shake down the fruit which they are sent to gather carefully by hand. Fruit for winter must all be hand-picked.

10,976. PERSONAL EFFORT, Unpromising. A minister preached a searching sermon on this subject, and at its close assigned some work to each member of his church, except one servant girl, who he did not expect could do anything. She went to the minister after the service and reminded him that he had not assigned any work for her. "Well, Mary," said he, "I don't know what work to set apart for you, unless you try to convert the family with whom you are living; but the difference in your social stations would, I fear, render it difficult." She began at once to pray for her master and mistress, and spent most of that Sunday night in the attic in that service. That same night the mistress awoke in agony of soul, and desired her husband to send for the minister. He wished to call a doctor. She said she was not sick, but lost. They then thought of their pious servant, and as he went to call her, he heard her praying, "God save master and mistress." Her prayer was heard, and both were converted. Great results in saving souls often follow the most unpromising agents.

10,977. PETER, Martyrdom of St. According to tradition St. Peter was imprisoned in Rome in the time of Nero, and sentenced to suffer death as a Christian. As the day approached, the Christians of Rome besought him with great earnestness to escape. Moved by their tears he started to flee. Escaped from the prison, he was approaching the gate of the city when he met the blessed Master, bearing his cross. "Lord, whither goest thou?" exclaimed the astonished apostle. "I go to be crucified in Rome afresh." Peter at once returned, and gave himself up to his keepers. He is supposed to have been scourged before execution, according to the Roman custom. He was condemned to crucifixion, the most ignominious mode of punishment known to the Romans. He besought his executioners that he might suffer with his head downwards, pleading his unworthiness to die in the same posture as his Lord, which was granted, A. D. 65.

10,978. PHILANTHROPY, Law of. Plato once gave a charity to a degraded wretch, at which his followers greatly wondered. Plato replied, "I show mercy to the man, not as he is wicked, but because he is a man of my own nature." If the philosophic heathen apprehended this law, how much more ought they who recognize the leadership of him who made "all one in Christ Jesus."

10,979. PHILOSOPHY, Death and. The fear of death is so strong, that by it men are kept in bondage all their days. It is an enemy that threatens none whom it does not strike, and there is none but it threatens. Certainly that spectre which Cæsar had not courage to look in the face is very affrighting. Alexander himself, that so often despised it in the field, when passion that transported him cast a veil over his eyes—yet when he was struck with a mortal disease in Babylon, and had death in his view, his palace was filled with priests and diviners, and no superstition was so sottish but he used to preserve himself. And although the philosophers seemed to condemn death, yet the great preparations they made to encounter it argue a secret fear in their breasts. Many discourses, reasonings, and arguments are employed to sweeten the necessity, that cruel necessity, but they are all ineffectual.

Dr. Bates.

10,980. PHILOSOPHY, Impotence of. The heathen philosophers professing themselves to be wise in their speculations, became fools in practice, and were confounded with all their philosophy when they should have made use of it. Some killed themselves from the apprehension of sufferings. Their death was not the effect of courage, but cowardice, the remedy of their fear. Others, impatient of disappointment in their great designs, refused to live. I will instance two of the most eminent among them, Cato and Brutus: they were both philosophers of the manly sect, and virtue never appeared with a brighter lustre among the heathens than when joined with a stoical resolution. And they were not imperfect proficients, but masters in philosophy. Seneca employs all the ornaments of his eloquence to make Cato's eulogy. He represents him as the consummate exemplar of wisdom; as one that realized the sublime idea of virtue described in their writings. And Brutus was esteemed equal to Cato. Yet these, with all the power of their philosophy, were not able to bear the shocks of adversity. Like raw fencers, one thrust put them into such disorders that they forget all their instructions in the place of trial. For, being unsuccessful in their endeavors to restore Rome to its liberty, overcome with discontent and despair, they laid violent hands upon themselves. Cato, being prevented in his first attempt, afterwards tore open his wounds with fierceness and rage. And Brutus, ready to plunge his sword into his breast, complained that virtue was but a vain name. So insufficient are the best precepts of mere rational reason to relieve us in distress. As torrents that are dried up in the heat of summer, when there is most need of them; so all comforts fail in the extremity, that are not derived from the fountain of life.

Dr. Bates.

10,981. PHILOSOPHY, Influence of. The true philosophy is a spring and principle of motion wherever it comes; it makes man active and industrious, it sets every wheel and faculty a-going, it stores our minds with axioms and rules by which to make a sound judgment; it determines the will to the choice of what is honorable and just; and it wings all our faculties to the swiftest prosecution of it. It is accompanied with an elevation and nobleness of mind, joined with a coolness and sweetness of behavior, and backed with a becoming assurance and inflexible resolution. Plutarch.

10,982. PHILOSOPHY, Road to. The road to true philosophy is precisely the same with that which leads to true religion; and from both one and the other, unless we would enter in as little children, we must expect to be totally excluded. Lord Bacon.

10,983. PHILOSOPHY, True. Rest not in the high-stained paradoxes of old philosophy, supported by naked reason and the reward of mortal felicity; but labor in the ethics of faith, built upon heavenly assistance, and the happiness of both beings. Understand the rules, but swear not unto the doctrines, of Zeno or Epicurus. Look beyond Antoninus, and terminate not thy morals in Seneca or Epictetus. Let not the twelve, but the two tables be thy law: let Pythagoras be thy remembrancer, not thy textuary and final instructor; and learn the vanity of the world rather from Solomon than Phocylides. Sleep not in the dogmas of the Peripatus, Academy, or Porticus. Be a moralist of the Mount, an Epictetus in the faith, and Christianize thy notions. T. Broune.

10,984. PHILOSOPHY, Unused. In the Academy the philosophers made a great many excellent discourses, and asked Panthroidas how he liked them. He answered, "Indeed I think them very good; but of no profit at all, since you yourselves do not use them."

10,985. PHOTOGRAPHY, Nature's. We do not know but it may imprint upon the world our features as they are modified by various passions, and thus fill nature with daguerreotype impressions of all our actions that are performed in daylight. It may be, too, that there are tests by which nature, more skillfully than any human photographer, can bring out and fix those portraits, so that acuter senses than ours shall see them, as on a great canvas, spread over the material universe. Perhaps, too, they may never fade from that canvas, but become specimens in the great picture-gallery of eternity. Prof. Hitchcock.

10,986. PHYLACTERIES, Jewish. Phylacteries—the common Greek word for amulets—were worn very generally by the Jews at the commencement of the Christian era. They consist of a narrow strip of parchment, about eighteen inches long, on which are carefully written in vowelized Hebrew four passages from the Old Testament (Exod. 13: 2-17; Deut. 6: 4-9, 13-22). The strip is rolled up, and placed in a little leathern box, one inch and a half square, which is then bound to the left elbow by cowhide straps half an inch wide, and long enough to be wound spirally about the arm down to the base of the middle finger. There is a smaller phylactery for the forehead, the box for which is scarcely an inch square. It has also a leathern fillet, which is tied at the back of the head, and then brought around to the breast. When Christ reproved the Pharisees for making broad their phylacteries (Matt. 23: 5), he doubtless alluded to their custom of increasing this smaller box, so as to make its diameter three or four inches, and conspicuously wearing it over their eyes to attract the attention of the multitude. Except by the Pharisees, who paraded them on all occasions, they were worn only at times of prayer. Subsequently they were put on for charms, like the Koran among the modern Mohammedans, and were supposed to drive away the devil, ward off temptation, and insure long life.

Prof. Hitchcock.

10,987. PIETY, Beauty of Early. No music could ever equal the heaven-born cries of newborn babes. When the snowdrops of youth appear in the garden of the church, it evinces that there is a glorious summer approaching.

Secker.

10,988. PIETY, Confidence in. A Southern Methodist bishop said there was in his neighborhood a slaveholder of fortune, a gay man, who gave himself much to field sports and other amusements. He used often to invite his pastor to dinner and to accompany him in his pleasure-seeking excursions of various kinds. The minister cheerfully accepted his invitations, and a friendship grew up between the pastor and his parishioner, that grew into an intimacy, which continued till the last sickness of this gay man. When his wife was apprised that her husband could live but a short time, she was much alarmed for his soul, and inquired if she should not call in their minister. He replied: "No, my dear; he is not the man for me to see now. He was my companion, as you know, in worldly sports and pleasure-seeking; he loved good dinners and a jolly time. I then enjoyed his society and found him a pleasant companion. But I see now that I never had any real confidence in his piety, and have now no confidence in the efficacy of his prayers. I am now a dying man, and need the instruction and prayers of somebody that can prevail with God. We have been much together; but our pastor has never been in serious earnest with me about the salvation of my soul, and he is not the man to help me now." The wife was greatly affected, and said, "What shall I do, then?" He replied, "My coachman, Tom, is a pious man. I have confidence in his prayers. I have often overheard him pray when about the barn or stables, and his prayers have always struck me as being quite sincere and earnest. I never heard any foolishness from him. He has always been honest and earnest as a Christian man. Call him." Tom was called, and came within the door, dropping his hat and looking tenderly and compassionately at his dying master. The dying man put forth his hand, saying, "Come here, Tom. Take my hand. Tom, can you pray for your dying master?" The slave poured out his soul in earnest prayer.

10,989. PIETY, Effect of Early. Rev. T. Reader, when a child, was deeply impressed with divine truth. A stranger visiting the family, observed that he did not fail to shut himself up alone for prayer. He was powerfully struck with a sense of his own negligence, and said, "Shall a little child be so anxious for a place of retirement to pray, and I never prayed in my life!" From that time he began to be serious, and not only became a Christian, but a very valuable minister of Christ. "I myself," says Mr. Thornton, "have known parents grown gray in the drudgery of sin and Satan, who have been brought, through the pious and affectionate endeavors of their own children, to enjoy the glorious liberty of Christ." Buck

10,990. PIETY, Motives to. We are surrounded by motives to piety and devotion, if we would but mind them. The poor are designed to excite our liberality; the miserable, our pity; the sick, our assistance; the ignorant, our instruction; those that are fallen, our helping hand. In those who are vain, we see the vanity of the world; in those who are wicked, our own frailty. When we see good men rewarded, it confirms our hope; and when evil men are punished, it excites our fear. Bishop Wilson.

10,991. PIETY, Order of. True piety is a principle of order in the soul—a beautiful and strong axis by which it is ever borne up, and on which it turns in harmony with the music of the spheres. It is like the great law of attraction, maintaining the soul's activity, and keeping the soul in its place; wheeling it in quiet but rapid motion, and ever keeping it in a measured circle round the throne of God, its centre and its sun. Stoughton.

10,992. PITY, A Father's. A gray-headed and pious father had a very wicked son. The old man had often wrestled with God on his behalf. But he became worse and worse. Never did the father close his doors against him. One of the father's neighbors said to him, "Why harbor that reprobate son of yours? Why don't you turn him out of doors, and banish him from your house?" "Ay, ay," said the aged saint, "you can all turn him out of doors but his own father."

10,993. PITY, Self-sacrificing. A runaway from the galleys of Toulouse, seeking safety in the country, came upon a cottage whose inmates were in great distress. He learned that they were that day to be turned out of doors for non-payment of rent, and that they had no means of obtaining food or shelter. The galley-slave proposed to the peasant that he should take him back to the galleys and obtain the reward of fifty francs, given for the return of an escaped prisoner. The peasant, astonished, refused the offer. The convict said he would go and give himself up if he did not accept. He yielded, and having returned the prisoner, received his fifty francs reward. He then went to the mayor and told him the whole story, which secured an examination of the prisoner's case. It resulted in his being pardoned.

10,994. PITY, Verbal. Be ye warmed, and be ye filled, is the furthest most professors go. Words are cheap, and cost nothing, and therefore, many can say they pity, and that extremely too, when at the same time their practice shows it is only verbal, and not a real compassion. Whitefield.

10,995. PLACE, Suitable. A monk asked Poeman, the hermit, "Where shall I settle down? What place will be most suitable for me?" He replied, "Any will be suitable where you do not cause annoyance to other people."

Had I better live in community or in solitude?" asked another. "Wherever you find yourself humble-minded, there you may dwell with security. But if you have a great opinion of yourself, nowhere is fit for you," he answered.

10,996. PLAGIARISTS, Fate of. There is a very pretty Eastern tale, of which the fate of plagiarists often reminds us. The slave of a magician saw his master wave his wand, and heard him give orders to the spirits, who arose at the summons. The slave stole the wand, and waved it himself in the air; but he had not observed that his master used his left hand for that purpose. The spirits thus irregularly summoned, tore the thief to pieces instead of obeying his orders. Macaulay.

10,997. PLAINNESS, Demand for. Think of that railway excursion train as it hurries onwards with impetuous speed! A rapid impulse bears forward the whole; one single bystander directs and controls it all. In an unexpected moment a shock, as of a thunderbolt, crushes them together; in the twinkling of an eye the elements of destruction are let loose; each hapless one becomes an instrument of injury or death to his neighbor. What pen can paint the terror, the agony, the anguish of such a scene! They will be remembered for long, long years in mutilated forms, in shaken nerves, in bereaved or orphaned homes; the records will make multitudes shudder by their firesides, or will haunt them in their slumbers. Such have been the effects of one false or mistaken signal! Let us who are ministers of the gospel remember what interests we hold, and by how much the soul is more precious than the body. Let us beware! We are the signalmen! J. G. Miall.

10,998. PLANS, Interrupted. In the heathery turf you will often find a plant chiefly remarkable for its peculiar roots; from the main stem down to the minutest fibre, you will find them all abruptly terminate, as if shorn or bitten off, and the quaint superstition of the country people alleges that once on a time it was a plant of singular potency for healing all sorts of maladies, and therefore the great enemy of man in his malignity bit off the roots, in which its virtues resided. The plant with this odd history, is a very good emblem of many well-meaning but little-effecting people. They might be defined as radicibus præmorsis, or rather inceptis succisis. The efficacy of every good work lies in its completion, and all their good works terminate abruptly, and are left off unfinished. The devil frustrates their efficacy by cutting off their ends; their unprofitable history is made up of plans and projects schemes of usefulness that were never gone about, and magnificent undertakings that were never carried forward; societies that were set agoing, then left to shift for themselves, and forlorn beings who for a time were taken up and instructed, and just when they were beginning to show symptoms of improvement were cast on the world again. Dr. J. Hamilton.

10,999. PLANS, Unsuccessful. Siramnes, a Persian, was much wondered at because he spoke like a wise man, but failed in all his plans. It extenuation he said, "I myself am master of my words, but the king and fortune have power over my actions."

11,000. PLEASURE, Billows of. I have sat upon the shore, and waited for the gradual approach of the sea, and have seen its dancing waves and white surf, and admired that he who measured it with his hand had given to it such life and motion; and I have lingered till its gentle waters grew into mighty billows, and had well-nigh swept me from my firmest footing. So have I seen a heedless youth gazing with a too curious spirit upon the sweet motions and gentle approaches of an inviting pleasure, till it has detained his eye and imprisoned his feet, and swelled upon his soul, and swept him to a swift destruction.

Mrs. Montague.
11,001. PLEASURE, Costly. A pot of honey having been upset in a grocer's shop, the flies came around it in swarms to eat it up, nor would they move from the spot while there was a drop left. At length their feet became so clogged that they could not fly away, and, stifled in the luscious sweets, they exclaimed, "Miserable creatures that we are, who, for the sake of an hour's pleasure, have thrown away our lives!" Æsop.

11,002. PLEASURE, Cost of. An English gentleman was blamed by his business partner for giving so much money for religious objects. He replied, "Your fox-hounds cost more in one year than my religion ever cost me in two."

11,003. PLEASURE, Effects of. It is said that Valentinian II. was fond of pleasures, but he showed, notwithstanding, a noble contempt of them. When his people complained of his too great attachment to them, he ordered all the festivals of the circus to be abolished, and all the wild beasts that were kept for the entertainment of the people to be slain. And what great value should we set upon the pleasures of the world? They pass away as soon as they have wearied out the body, and leave it as a bunch of grapes whose juice hath been pressed out; which made one to say, "I see no greater pleasure in this world than the contempt of pleasure." Julian, though an apostate, yet professed that the pleasures of the body were far below a great spirit. And Tully saith, "He is not worthy of the name of a man that would entirely spend one whole day in pleasures." Voluptas, the goddess of sensual pleasures, was worshiped at Rome, where she had

* temple She was represented as a young and beautiful woman, well dressed, and elegantly adorned, seated on a throne, and having virtue under her feet. This representation is just enough; the love of pleasure is too often attended with the sacrifice of virtue.

Buck.

11,004. PLEASURE, Epochs of. No enjoyment, however inconsiderable, is confined to the present moment. A man is the happier for life from having made once an agreeable tour, or lived for any length of time with pleasant people, or enjoyed any considerable interval of innocent pleasure.

Sydney Smith.

11,005. PLEASURE, Lure of. The town of Hamelin, according to a medieval fable, was fearfully infested with rats in 1284. The people were worried by night and by day. The cook in the kitchen, the babe in the cradle, and the people at church were all disturbed by them. A piper, dressed in a suit of many colors, came to the town, and proposed to rid it of vermin for a consideration. His terms were accepted. Thereupon the piper began to play, and the rats began to come forth from their holes and dens, and to follow the piper. He led them to the river Weser, into which they all plunged, and were drowned. The piper returned, and claimed the stipulated reward; but the townsfolk, being no longer in fear of the rats, refused payment, and justified their refusal by accusing the rat charmer of sorcery. Behold his retribution! On a day in June, the piper re-appeared in the streets of Hamelin town. He put the magic pipe to his lips, and before he sounded three notes all the little boys and girls of the town came skipping to meet him. He led them forth, a merry procession of laughing and dancing children, to the Koppenberg, a mountain outside the town. Its side opened to the piper, and the strange procession passed in, and was seen no more. Two only—one blind, the other dumb—were left to point out the place where the children vanished. Thus perished one hundred and twenty children. Many have been lured to living tombs, a worse fate, by the charmer Pleasure.

11,006. PLEASURE, Mental. When the lovers of the art of painting are so enamored with the charmingness of their own performances, that Nicias, as he was drawing the Evocation of Ghosts in Homer, often asked his servants whether he had dined or no; and when King Ptolemy had sent him three-score talents for his piece, after it was finished, he would neither accept the money nor part with his work; what and how great satisfaction may we then suppose to have been reaped from geometry and astronomy by Euclid when he wrote his dioptrics; by Philippus when he had perfected his demonstration of the figure of the moon; by Archimedes when, with the help of a certain angle, he had found the sun's diameter to make the same part of the largest circle that that angle made of four right angles.

Plutarch.

11,007. PLEASURE, Modification of. Age and maturity pass a real and a marvelous change upon the diet and recreations of the same person; so that no man at the years and vigor of thirty is either fond of sugar-plums or rattles: in like manner, when reason, by the assistance of grace, has prevailed over and outgrown the encroachments of sense, the delights of sensuality are to such an one but as a hobby-horse would be to a counselor of state, or as tasteless as a bundle of hay to a hungry lion. Every alteration of a man's condition infallibly infers an alteration of his pleasures.

South.

11,008. PLEASURE, Palace of. The palace of pleasure has a gorgeous street entrance, adorned with statuary and brilliant with variegated lights, and the passer is lured in by strains of music. The exit is a dark, narrow, concealed rear way, which leads into the fields where swine are kept. They are soon reached, and the votaries of pleasure are glad to feed with the brutish herd.

11,009. PLEASURE, Pursuit of. Pleasures are Junos in the pursuit, and but clouds in the enjoyment. Pleasure is a beautiful harlot sitting in her chariot, whose four wheels are pride, gluttony, lust, and idleness. The two horses are prosperity and abundance; the two drivers are idleness and security; her attendants and followers are guilt, grief, late repentance, if any, and oft death and ruin. Many great men, and many strong men, and many rich men, and many hopeful men, and many young men, have come to their ends by her; but never any enjoyed full satisfaction and content in her.

Brooks.

11,010. PLEASURES, Unsubstantial. Pleasures are not of such a solid nature that we can dive into them; we must merely skim over them: they resemble those boggy lands over which we must run lightly, without stopping to put down our feet.

Fontenelle.

11,011. POETRY, The Best of. The best kind of poetry is ever in alliance with real uncorrupted Christianity; and with the degeneracy of the one always comes the decline of the other; for it is to Christianity that we owe the fullest inspirations of the celestial spirit of poetry.

J. A. St. John.

11,012. POETRY, Elevating Qualities of. Poetry has been to me "its own exceeding great reward;" it has soothed my afflictions; it has multiplied and refined my enjoyments; it has endeared solitude; and it has given me the habit of wishing to discover the good and the beautiful in all that meets and surrounds me.

Coleridge.

11,013. POETRY, Emotions of. There are so many tender and holy emotions flying about in our inward world, which, like angels, can never assume the body of an outward act; so many rich and lovely flowers spring up which bear no seed, that it is a happiness poetry was invented, which receives into its limbus all these incorporeal spirits, and the perfume of all these flowers.

Richter.

11,014. POETRY, Pleasure in. A true reader of poetry partakes of a more than ordinary portion of the poetic nature; and no one can be completely such, who does not love, or take an interest in everything that interests the poet, from the firmament to the daisy—from the highest heart of man to the most pitiable of the low.

Hunt.

11,016. POLICY, Advantage of. Pliny tells of a dolphin attacking a crocodile, and finding his hard scales impenetrable, he dove under him and struck from below, and killed him by penetrating this unprotected spot. Spencer says, "What instinct taught the creature, reason teaches man—to strike the enemy in the weakest part, and leave things impossible unattempted."

11,016. POLITENESS, Advantage of. It is said that a gentleman on a battle-field, happening to bow to an officer who addressed him, a cannon-ball just then went through his hair, and took off the head of the one behind him. The officer, when he saw the marvelous escape, observed that no man ever lost by politeness.

11,017. POLITENESS, Instinctive. Dr. Whewell was one day walking with his little dog, when, by accident, he trod on his tail. Quite instinctively he turned around, made a bow, raised his hat, and gravely said, "I beg your pardon."

11,018. POLITENESS, True. I believe it is best to be known by description, definition not being able to comprise it. I would, however, venture to call it benevolence in trifles, or the preference of others to ourselves, in little daily, hourly occurrences in the commerce of life. A better place, a more commodious seat, priority in being helped at table; what is it but sacrificing ourselves in such trifles to the convenience and pleasure of others? And this constitutes true politeness. It is a perpetual attention (by habit it grows easy and natural to us) to the little wants of those we are with, by which we either prevent or remove them. Bowing, ceremonies, formal compliments, stiff civilities, will never be politeness; that must be easy, natural, unstudied, manly, noble. And what will give this but a mind benevolent, and perpetually attentive to exert that amiable disposition in trifles towards all you converse and live with?

Chesterfield.

11,019. POLITENESS, Unusual. Politeness should be a constant habit. A lady, expecting to have some company, tried to improve her children's neglected manners. She drilled them very carefully in what they were to say, and when the time arrived, placed them in a row in the parlor. The children sat very still until all the company were assembled, when they all jumped up together and repeated, like a lesson, "Yes, ma'am," "No, ma'am," "Yes, sir," "No, sir," "Thank you, ma'am," "Thank you, sir," and then ran off.

11,020. POOR, Advantage of the. Mohammed declares that the poor will enter paradise five hundred years before the rich, and that he had a view of paradise, in which he saw that a majority of its inhabitants were the poor people of this world.

11,021. POOR, Neglect of the. I fancy in some sad abode of this city, some invisible pallet of straw, a man, a Christian man, pining, perishing, without an attendant, looking his last upon nakedness and misery, feeling his last in the pangs of hunger and thirst. The righteous spirit of the man being disembodied, I fancy it to myself, rising to heaven, encircled by an attendance of celestial spirits, daughters of mercy, who waited upon his soul when mankind deserted his body. The attended spirit I fancy rising to the habitation of God, and reporting in the righteous ear of the Governor of the earth, how it fared with him amid all the extravagance and outlay of this city. And saith the indignant Governor of men, "They had not a morsel of bread nor a drop of water to bestow upon my saint. Who of my angels will go for me where I will send? Go, thou angel of famine; break the growing ear with thy wing, and let mildew feed upon their meal. Go, thou angel of plague, and shake thy wings once more over the devoted city. Go, thou angel of fire, and consume all the neighborhood where my saint suffered unheeded and unpitied. Burn it, and let its flame not quench till their pavilions are a heap of smouldering ashes."

Edward Irving.

11,022. POOR, Pillaging the. The nets which we use against the poor are just those worldly embarrassments which either their ignorance or their improvidence are almost certain at some time or other to bring them into; then, just at the time when we ought to hasten to help them, and teach them how to manage better in future, we rush forward to pillage them, and force all we can out of them in their adversity. For, to take one instance only, remember this is literally and simply what we do whenever we buy, or try to buy, cheap goods—goods offered at a price which we know cannot be remunerative for the labor involved in them. Whenever we buy such goods, we are stealing somebody's labor.

Ruskin.

11,023. POOR, Sympathy with the. St. Yoo, of Kermartin, was a lawyer in early life, and was called "the advocate of the poor." As a lawyer he always endeavored to prevent rather than promote quarrels. As a judge he was just and incorruptible. For the poor he felt special interest, and from them would take no fees. One morning a poor, half-naked beggar was found upon his doorstep, who had passed the night there shivering with the cold. The next night he made the beggar sleep in his own bed, and he himself lay upon the doorstep, that he might learn from experience what the sufferings of the poor are, and have always a true sympathy for them.

11,024. POOR, Will of the. What will become of my family? is often an anxious question to the poor. They can do no better than to follow Luther's example, and give them to God. In his last will and testament occurs the following remarkable passage: "Lord God, I thank thee, for that thou hast been pleased to make me a poor and indigent man upon earth. I have neither house, nor land, nor money to leave behind me. Thou hast given me wife and children, whom I now restore to thee. Lord, nourish, teach, and preserve them, as thou hast me."

11,025. POPE, Adoring the. Think of an intelligent person crossing himself before the picture of the pope as devoutly as before a crucifix. Yet it is the custom of Romanists in this day in this land. A traveler found a degraded Japanese worshipping the picture of Napoleon. Which is the greatest idolater?

11,026. POPE, Worshipping the. On the first occasion when a new pope appears in public after his election to the pontificate, he is elevated into an object of adoration in the temple of God. The new pope, wearing his mitre, is lifted up by cardinals, and is placed by them on the high altar of the principal church at Rome—St. Peter's. He is seated there upon the altar of God; and while he there sits, the Roman hierarchy bow down before him, and kiss those feet which tread on the altar of God. This ceremony of adoration is prescribed by the official book of Roman ceremonies, entitled Cæremoniale Romanum; it may be seen described in Lib. iii., sect. 1, of the edition of 1572; and it has been performed on the election of every pope for many centuries in succession. It was performed to the present pope on Wednesday, June 17, 1846. This ceremony is called by Roman writers the Adoratio Pontificis, and it is represented in the Roman coinage with the following remarkable inscription: "Quem creant, adorant"—"whom they create they adore." Whom the Roman hierarchy make by their own votes to be pope, him they adore when made; they worship the work of their own hand. They make an image, and then worship it.

Wordsworth.

11,027. POPERY, Absurdity of. Inquisitive and restless spirits frequently take refuge from their own skepticism in the bosom of a church which pretends to infallibility, and, after questioning the existence of a Deity, bring themselves to worship a wafer.

Macaulay.

11,028. POPERY, Decay of. Popery can build new chapels—welcome to do so, to all lengths. Popery cannot come back, any more than Paganism can, which also still lingers in some countries. But, indeed, it is with these things as with the ebbing of the sea: you look at the waves oscillating hither, thither, on the beach; for minutes you cannot tell how it is going; look in half an hour where it is—look in half a century where your popehood is! Alas, would there were no greater danger to our Europe than the poor old pope's revival! Thor may as soon try to revive.

Carlyle.

11,029. POPULARITY, A Desirable. I do not affect to scorn the opinion of mankind. I wish earnestly for popularity; I will seek, and I will have popularity; that popularity which follows, and not that which is run after.

Mansfield.

11,030. POPULARITY, Test of. Antigonus had taken upon him the name and dignity of King of Macedon. He was told that the people were discontented with this assumption. So he laid down his crown and sceptre, advised them of his conquests, and openly admonished them that, "If they knew any man more worthy of the kingdom than himself, they should, at their pleasure, dispose of the crown and sceptre to that person." The people were so much moved by his address that they besought him to re-assume the reins of government, which he utterly refused to do until the authors of the sedition were punished.

11,031. POPULARITY, Unsatisfactory. It is not the applause of a day, it is not the huzzas of thousands, that can give a moment's satisfaction to a rational being: that man's mind must, indeed, be a weak one, and his ambition of a most depraved sort, who can be captivated by such wretched allurements, or satisfied with such momentary gratification.

Mansfield.

11,032. PORTION, God our. Propriety makes every comfort a pleasurable comfort, a delightful comfort. When a man walks in a fair meadow, and can write mine upon it, and into a pleasant garden, and can write mine upon it, and into a fruitful corn-field, and can write mine upon it, and into a stately habitation, and can write mine upon it, and into a rich mine, and can write mine upon it, oh, how doth it please him? how doth it delight him? how doth it joy and rejoice him? Of all words, this word meum is the sweetest and the comfortablest. Ah! when a man can look upon God, and write meum; when he can look upon God, and say, This God is my portion; when he can look upon God, and say with Thomas, "My Lord and my God" (John 20: 28), how will all the springs of joy rise in his soul! Oh, who can but joy to be owner of that God that fills heaven and earth with his fulness? who can but rejoice to have him for his portion, in having whom he hath all things, in having whom he can want nothing? The serious thoughts of our propriety in God will add much to all our sweets, yea, it will make every bitter sweet.

Brooks.

11,033. POSSESSION, Importance of. An angler who gained his livelihood by fishing, after a long day's toil, caught nothing but one little fish. "Spare me," said the little creature, "I beseech you; so small as I am, I shall make you but a sorry meal. I am not come to my full size yet; throw me back into the river for the present, and then, when I am grown bigger and worth eating, you may come here and catch me again." "No, no," said the man; "I have got you now, but if you once get back into the water, your tune will be, 'Catch me if you can.'" A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.

Æsop.

11,034. POSSESSION, Value of. One's own—what a charm there is in the words! how long it takes boy and man to find out their worth! how fast most of us hold on to them! faster and more jealously, the nearer we are to the general home, into which we can take nothing, but must go naked as we came into the world. When shall we learn that he who multiplieth possessions multiplieth troubles, and that the one single use of things which we call our own, is that they may be his who hath need of them?

Hughes.

11,035. POTTAGE, Oriental. The people of the East are exceedingly fond of pottage, which they call kool. It is something like gruel, and is made of various kinds of grain, which are first beaten in a mortar. The red pottage is made of kurakan and other grains, but is not superior to the other. For such a contemptible mess, then, did Esau sell his birthright. When a man has sold his fields or gardens for an insignificant sum, the people say, "The fellow has sold his land for pottage." Does a father give his daughter in marriage to a low-caste man? it is observed, "He has given her for pottage." Does a person by base means seek for some paltry enjoyment? it is said, "For one leaf (namely, leaf-full) of pottage he will do nine days' work." Has a learned man stooped to anything which was not expected from him? it is said, "The learned one has fallen into the pottage-pot." Has he given instruction or advice to others? "The lizard which gave warning to the people has fallen into the pottage-pot." Of a man in great poverty it is remarked, "Alas! he cannot get pottage." A beggar asks, "Sir, will you give me a little pottage?" Does a man seek to acquire great things by small means? "He is trying to procure rubies by pottage." When a person greatly flatters another, it is common to say, "He praises him only for his pottage." Does a king greatly oppress his subjects? it is said, "He only governs for his pottage." Has an individual lost much money by trade? "The speculation has broken his pottage-pot." Does a rich man threaten to ruin a poor man? the latter asks, "Will the lightning strike my pottage-pot?"
Roberts.

11,036. POTTER, Figure of the. An Oriental traveler says: "I have been out on the shore again, examining a native manufactory of pottery, and was delighted to find the whole biblical apparatus complete, and in full operation. There was the potter sitting at his 'frame,' and turning the 'wheel' with his foot. He had a heap of the prepared clay near him, and a pan of water by his side. Taking a lump in his hand, he placed it on the top of the wheel (which revolves horizontally), and smoothed it into a low cone, like the upper end of a sugar-loaf; then thrusting his thumb into the top of it, he opened a hole down through the centre, and this he constantly widened, by pressing the edges of the revolving cone between his hands. As it enlarged and became thinner, he gave it whatever shape he pleased with the utmost ease and expedition. This, I suppose, is the exact point of those biblical comparisons between the human and the divine potter: 'O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter?' saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hands, so are ye in my hand, saith the Lord,' Jer. 18: 6. When Jeremiah was watching the potter, the vessel was marred in his hand, and 'so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it,' Jer. 18: 4. I had to wait a long time for that, but it happened at last. From some defect in the clay, or because he had taken too little, the potter suddenly changed his mind, crushed his growing jar instantly into a shapeless mass of mud, and beginning anew, fashioned it into a totally different vessel. It is evident, from numerous expressions in the Bible, that the potter's vessel was the synonym of utter fragility; and to say that the wicked should be broken to pieces as a potter's vessel, was to threaten the most ruinous destruction. In this day of strong stone pottery, we should hardly have adopted this language."

11,037. POVERTY, Choice of. St. Francis of Assisi chose a life of poverty. He was a partner with his father in the mercantile business, and besides was the prospective heir of considerable wealth. At the age of twenty-five he went to the bishop of the place, with his father, to make a legal renunciation of his inheritance. He stripped off the robes he wore and gave them to his father, that his renunciation of earthly goods might be complete, saying, "Hitherto I have called you father on earth; but now I say with more confidence, Our Father who art in heaven, in whom I place all my hope and treasure." He wore no shoes or girdle, but contented himself with one poor coat, girt with a cord. He was led to hold poverty in high esteem, because Christ possessed no earthly goods, was born in a stable, subsisted by charity, had no place to lay his head, and died naked upon a cross. He says, "Poverty is the way of salvation, the nurse of humility, and the root of perfection." It was the basis upon which his order of monks was founded. He called poverty his spouse, his queen, his mother, and desired it for his portion.

11,038. POVERTY, Virtuous. St. Guy, known as "The Poor Man of Anderlech," was the child of poor but pious parents, who gave their son the maxim, "We shall be rich enough if we fear God." He considered the lot of poverty as one of great advantage, exempt from many of the temptations of the rich, and especially honored in being chosen by our Saviour on earth. St. Augustine reckoned among the reprobate: first, those who had their comforts on earth; second, those who grieved and murmured because they were deprived of them. He was very benevolent, often fasting himself that he might be able to relieve others. He was once induced to join a merchant in a commercial venture by the prospect of acquiring more for charitable use. The Lord showed him the folly of looking to his own prudence rather than relying upon him. The ship of whose cargo he was part owner, was wrecked in passing out of the harbor of Laken. He considered it a punishment for his rashness in being lured by a specious motive, A. D. 1033.

11,039. POWER, Abstract. Power in itself is an abstraction. We can never see it, we cannot hear it, we cannot feel it, we cannot taste

It, we cannot smell it. We witness its results everywhere. I see now the train moving; it is not power itself, but an evidence of it. I heard the thunder roaring; it was not power in itself, but the consequence of it. I am thrown down by some force; it is the result of some invisible power. The mind may influence, through various mediums, the objects of its operations into tears, laughter, joy or misery: all this is the result of power. All forms of power in themselves are equally invisible; power is alone known in its agents and results.

T. Hughes.

11,040. POWER, Concentration of. The weakest living creature, by concentrating his powers on a single object, can accomplish something. The strongest, by dispersing his over many, may fail to accomplish anything. The drop, by continually falling, bores its passage through the hardest rock. The hasty torrent rushes over it with hideous uproar, and leaves no trace behind.

Carlyle.

11,041. POWER, Conditions of. In driving piles, a machine is used by which a huge weight is lifted up and then made to fall upon the head of the pile. Of course the higher the weight is lifted the more powerful is the blow which it gives when it descends. Now, if we would tell upon our age and come down upon society with ponderous blows, we must see to it that we are uplifted as near to God as possible. All our power will depend upon the elevation of our spirits. Prayer, meditation, devotion, communion, are like a windlass to wind us up aloft: it is not lost time which we spend in such sacred exercises, for we are thus accumulating force, so that when we come down to our actual labor for God, we shall descend with an energy unknown to those to whom communion is unknown.

Spurgeon.

11,042. POWER, Converting. A soldier rose in meeting, during the war, and said, "My friends, I left home an infidel, but I left a praying wife. A week ago I received a letter from her, in which she expressed anxiety for the welfare of my soul, and desired to know if I still held to my old views. I wrote an answer, and in bitter words defended my old position. As I was about to seal the letter, it seemed to me I could not send it. I wrote another, softened down considerably from the first, but when that was done I could not send it. I began another, but such was the power of the Spirit upon my heart that I fell upon my knees and begged for forgiveness before God. I could not finish the letter, until I could say to my dear wife that Christ had forgiven my sins. I have been permitted to write to her that I am to-night rejoicing in her Saviour."

11,043. POWER, Gentle. If we aim a blow with a poker at a fly that perches on the forehead, we run a great risk of knocking out the brains. Coarse dealings with spiritual deficiencies are productive of incalculable ill; they were never adopted by our Lord.

11,044. POWER, Holy Spirit's. At Everton, when the Rev. Mr. Berridge was preaching, Sabbath, May 20, 1759, from, "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof," an eye-witness thus describes the effect: "When the power of religion began to be spoken of, the presence of God really filled the place; and whilst poor sinners felt the sentence of death in their souls, what sounds of distress did I hear! The greatest number of those who cried, or fell, were men; but some women, and several children, felt the power of the same Almighty Spirit, and seemed just sinking into hell. This occasioned a mixture of various sounds—some shrieking and some roaring aloud. The most general was a loud breathing, like that of persons half strangled, gasping for life." Most of the cries were like men dying in anguish. Many wept silently, others fell down as dead, others in violent agitation. Strong and healthy young men fell in convulsions.

11,045. POWER, Individual. Examples might easily be multiplied of the great power one person may exercise, for good or for evil. "One sinner destroyeth much good," Eccles. 9: 18; one traitor within the camp may counteract the valor of thousands of brave men; one evil-disposed child may kindle a fire which twenty strong men cannot quench, and twenty years cannot repair. What power Moses had, single-handed, to face the whole multitude of Israel's hosts! Exod. 32: 26; and Elijah, to confront Ahab and the eight hundred and fifty priests, and the people of Israel, 1 Kings 18: 22, 40; see similarly the examples of Shamgar, slaying with his ox-goad six hundred men, Judges 3: 31; Samson, a thousand men, Judges 15: 16; David becoming the champion of his nation, 1 Sam. 17; the poor wise man who delivered a city by his wisdom, Eccles. 9: 14, 15.

Bowes.

11,046. POWER, Reception of. Mr. Moody attributes his success as an evangelist to the baptism of the Holy Ghost upon his own soul. He had been converted for twenty-one years, and had been teaching a mission-school in Chicago. He felt that he needed power. He says, "My desire was that I might have a fresh anointing. I preached and preached; but it was beating against the air. I requested a good woman and a few others to come and pray with me every Friday at four o'clock. Oh! how piteously I prayed to God that he might fill the empty vessel! After the fire in Chicago I was in New York City, and going into a bank on Wall street it seemed as if I felt a strange and mighty power coming over me. I went up to the hotel, and there in my room I wept before God. I cried: 'Oh, my God, stay thy hand.' He gave me such a fullness, that it seemed more than I could contain. May God forgive me if I should speak in a boastful way, but I do not know a sermon that I have preached since but that God has given me some soul."

11,047. POWER, Spiritual. Electricity has been known for years to be an attracting substance, but its power who estimated? We know, to-day, that electric fluid is in us—in inanimate substances too, as well as animate; that electric fluid penetrates everywhere; and yet we never feel it, save when the equilibrium is disturbed, and we are made to perceive the sudden passage. It is about us, in us, connected with our breath, with the beating of our hearts, the circulation of our blood; it runs along the course of our nerves; to some extent we feel by it—I had almost said, to some extent we think by it; and yet how little is known of its power! That same something in us and around us—call it electricity, magnetism, or what you will—by which we navigate the ocean, drive machinery, apply inventions to the arts, is becoming an immense power; yet who can tell what it is, where it is, where it springs from? God has wrapped it up in everything around us. Put me on that stand, isolated, brought into contact with the electrical machine, and though not aware of its presence, I am full of it, and it comes out of me in all directions; yet I have no consciousness of its tangibility. May it not be an illustration of how spiritual influences may come down and be with us; that they may have great power, which, if properly applied, might transform our natures? Bp. Simpson.

11,048. PRACTICE, Inconsistent. A wolf looking into a hut and seeing some shepherds comfortably regaling themselves on a joint of mutton—"A pretty row," said he, "would these men have made if they had caught me at such a supper!" Æsop.

11,049. PRACTICE, Lesson of. A neighbor near my study persists in practicing upon the flute. He bores my ears as with an auger, and renders it almost an impossibility to think. Up and down his scale he runs remorselessly, until even the calamity of temporary deafness would almost be welcome to me. Yet he teaches me that I must practice if I would be perfect; must exercise myself unto godliness if I would be skilful; must, in fact, make myself familiar with the word of God, with holy living, and saintly dying. Such practice, moreover, will be as charming as my neighbor's flute is intolerable. Spurgeon.

11,050. PRACTICE, Need of. He who hears the law, and does not practice it, is like a man who ploughs and sows, but never reaps.

Jewish Proverb.

11,051. PRACTICE, Precept and. He that gives proper precepts, and then sets improper examples, resembles that foolish person who labors hard to kindle a fire, and when he has done it throws cold water upon it to quench it. Though such a physician may administer the reviving cordial to some fainting disciple, yet he is in danger himself of dying in a swoon. I may say of such professors as was once said of a certain preacher, that when he was in the pulpit it was a pity he should ever leave it, he was so excellent an instructor; but when he was out of it, it was a pity he should ever ascend it again, he was so wretched a liver.

Secker.

11,052. PRAISE, Chorus of. There was a beautiful tradition among the Jews which Lancisus quotes from Philo. It is to this effect: When God had created the world, he asked the angels what they thought of this work of his hands. One of them replied that it was so vast and so perfect that only one thing was wanting to it, namely, that there should be created a clear, mighty, and harmonious voice, which should fill all the quarters of the world incessantly with its sweet sound, thus day and night to offer thanksgiving to its Maker for his incomparable blessings. Thus our thanksgiving should not be an exercise of devotion practiced now and then. It should be incessant, the voice of a love which is ever living and fresh in our hearts. F. W. Faber.

11,053. PRAISE, Effects of. Praise has different effects, according to the mind it meets with; it makes a wise man modest, but a fool more arrogant. Feltham.

11,054. PRAISE, Encouragement of. Praise is the greatest encouragement we chameleons can pretend to, or rather the manna that keeps soul and body together; we devour it as if it were angels' food, and vainly think we grow immortal. There is nothing transports a poet, next to love, like commending in the right place. D. K. Lee.

11,055. PRAISE, Eternal. Rev. John Janeway, on his death-bed, said, "Come, help me with praises; all is too little: come, help me, O ye glorious and mighty angels, who are so well skilled in this heavenly work of praise. Praise him, all ye creatures upon the earth; let everything that hath being help me to praise him. Hallelujah, hallelujah, hallelujah! Praise is now my work, and I shall be engaged in that sweet employment forever."

11,056. PRAISE, God not Affected by. Not that praise can add to God's glory, nor blasphemies detract from it. The blessing tongue cannot make him better, nor the cursing worse—as the sun is neither bettered by birds singing, nor battered by dogs barking. He is so infinitely great, and constantly good, that his glory admits neither addition nor diminution. Adams.

11,057. PRAISE, Grateful. A converted sailor, in the gladness of his first love, was heard to exclaim, "To save such a sinner as I am! He shall never hear the end of it."

11,058. PRAISE in the Heart. Lord, my voice by nature is harsh and untunable, and it is vain to lavish any art to better it. Can my singing of psalms be pleasing to thy ears, which is unpleasant to my own? Yet, though I cannot chant with the nightingale, or chirp with the blackbird, I had rather chatter with the swallow, yea, rather croak with the raven, than be altogether silent. Hadst thou given me a better voice, I would have praised thee with a better voice; now what my music wants in sweetness let it have in sense—singing praises with my understanding. Yea, Lord, create in me a new heart, therein to make melody, and I will be contented with my old voice until, in thy due time, being admitted unto the choir of heaven, I have another, more harmonious, bestowed on me. T. Fuller

11,059. PRAISE, Loud. Noise is what the Hindoos best understand, and he that sings the loudest is considered to sing the best. There are also English congregations that would be puzzled to give as pertinent a reason for their silence as these Hindoo Christians for the opposite. I have occasionally remonstrated with them on the subject, but the reply I once received silenced me forever after. "Sing softly, brother," I said to one of the principal members. "Sing softly," he replied; "is it you, our father, who tells us to sing softly? Did you ever hear us sing the praises of our Hindoo gods? how we threw our heads backward, and with all our might shouted out the praises of those who are no gods! And now do you tell us to whisper the praises of Jesus? No, sir, we cannot—we must express in loud tones our gratitude to him who loved and died for us."

Gorgerly.

11,060. PRAISE, Supernatural. The Talmudists teach, that when David became fatigued by singing psalms, he called the sun, moon, stars, dragons, fire, hail, snow, rain, wind, mountains, hills, trees, beasts, cattle, reptiles, birds and men, and they relieved him in chanting the Creator's praise. This results from a literal interpretation of Ps. 148. It is a beautiful fancy.

11,061. PRAYER, Access in. However early in the morning you seek the gate of access, you find it already open, and however deep the midnight moment when you find yourself in the sudden arms of death, the winged prayer can bring an instant Saviour; and this wherever you are. It needs not that you ascend some special Pisgah or Moriah. It needs not that you should enter some awful shrine, or pull off your shoes on some holy ground. Could a memento be reared on every spot from which an acceptable prayer has passed away, and on which a prompt answer has come down, we should find Jehovah Shammah, "the Lord hath been here," inscribed on many a cottage hearth, and many a dungeon floor. We should find it not only in Jerusalem's proud temple and David's cedar galleries, but in the fisherman's cottage by the brink of the Gennesaret, and in the upper chamber where Pentecost began. And whether it be the field where Isaac went down to meditate, or the rocky knoll where Israel wrestled, or the den where Daniel gazed on the hungry lions, and the lions gazed on him, or the hill-side where the Man of Sorrows prayed all night, we should still discern the ladder's feet let down from heaven—the landing place of mercies, because the starting place of prayer. Dr. J. Hamilton.

11,062. PRAYER, Agency of. Prayer can obtain everything; can open the windows of heaven and shut the gates of hell; can put a holy constraint upon God, and detain an angel till he leaves a blessing; can open the treasures of rain, and soften the iron ribs of rocks till they melt into a flowing river; can arrest the sun in his course, and send the winds upon our errands.

Jeremy Taylor.

11,063. PRAYER, Answer to A minister related the case of a little boy with a sore hand, which had become so bad that the physician decided it must be amputated to save the boy's life. The day was fixed for the operation. On hearing this, the boy went to a retired spot, fell on his knees, and begged God, for Jesus' sake, to save his poor hand. The next day the physician came and examined the hand, when, to the astonishment of all, it was found to be so much better that amputation was unnecessary. The hand got quite well again, the little boy grew up to be a man, "and," continued the minister, holding up his right hand, "this unworthy hand can now be shown to you as a monument of prayer answered through Divine mercy."

11,064. PRAYER, Appropriate. A poor man broke his limb, and could earn nothing for the support of his family. Some good people appointed a prayer meeting at his house at which it was prayed that the misfortune might be overruled to the afflicted man's eternal good. A young man interrupted the meeting by announcing that the squire, a person well known by that designation, had sent his prayers to the meeting in a cart, and asked for help to bring them in. Family supplies, in large store, were soon laid upon the before-empty shelves of the poor man's larder. The meeting ended in a general diffusion of the spirit of this material prayer, many following the example of the thoughtful and liberal squire.

11,065. PRAYER, Ashamed of. I was attending a dying man, who had been a sergeant in the 7th Dragoon Guards. He had ruined his health by drinking spirits. He had been a careless, thoughtless man about his soul. He told me upon his death-bed that when he first began to pray, he was so ashamed of his wife knowing it, that when he went upstairs to pray, he would take his shoes off, and creep up in his stockings. Verily, I am afraid there are many like him! Do not you be one of them. Whatever you are ashamed of, never be ashamed of seeking God.

Ryle.

11,066. PRAYER, Beginning of. In every building the first stone must be laid, and the first blow must be struck. The ark was one hundred and twenty years in building; yet there was a day when Noah laid his axe to the first tree he cut down to form it. The temple of Solomon was a glorious building, but there was a day when the first huge stone was laid at the foot of Mount Moriah. When does the building of the Spirit really begin to appear in a man's heart? It begins, so far as we can judge, when he first pours out his heart to God in prayer.

Ryle.

11,067. PRAYER, Believing. Prayer brings the mind to the immediate contemplation of God's character, and holds it there, till by comparison and aspiration the believer's soul is properly impressed, and his wants properly felt. The more subtle physical processes and affinities become, the better are the analogies which they furnish of processes in the spiritual world. The influence of believing prayer has a good analogy in the recently discovered daguerreotype. By means of this process the features of natural objects are thrown upon a sensitive sheet through a lens, and leave their impression upon that sheet. So when the character of God is, by means of prayer, brought to bear upon the mind of the believer—that mind being rendered sensitive by the Holy Spirit—it impresses there the Divine image. In this manner the image of Christ is formed in the soul, the existence of which the scriptures represent as inspiring the believer with the hope of glory. Walker.

11,068. PRAYER: Brevities. When thou prayest rather let thy heart be without words, than thy words without heart. Prayer will make a man cease from sin, or sin will entice a man to cease from prayer. The spirit of prayer is more precious than treasures of gold and silver. Pray often; for prayer is a shield to the soul, a sacrifice to God, and a scourge for Satan. Bunyan.

11,069. PRAYER, Business and. The greater thy business is, by so much the more thou hast need to pray for God's good-speed and blessing upon it, seeing it is certain nothing can prosper without his blessing. The time spent in prayer never hinders, but furthers and prospers, a man's journey and business; therefore, though thy haste be never so much, or thy business never so great, yet go not about it, nor out of thy doors, till thou hast prayed. Bishop Bayley.

11,070. PRAYER, Children's. Children's prayers are heard. Let us enlist them for our work. The great Melancthon did not despise them. Cast down and disheartened once, we read, that taking an evening walk he heard the voices of children at prayer, and he at once brightened up, and exclaimed to some friends, "Brethren, take courage; the children are praying for us." H. C. Trumbull.

11,071. PRAYER, Concentrated. Not long since I met with a young Christian lady who was compelled against her will to be present at the opera, a place wholly unfit for a child of God, and I suppose in the opinion of most, a very unsuitable one for prayer; but the testimony of that person was, that she never felt herself nearer to God in her life. She was there against her will, and God knew it, and he gave her power wholly to abstract herself from the sights and sounds around, and speak with him. Power.

11,072. PRAYER, Continue in. Sir Walter Raleigh asked a favor of Queen Elizabeth, which he frequently did; to which she replied, "Raleigh, when will you leave off begging?" "When your Majesty leaves off giving," he replied. So long must we continue praying.

11,073. PRAYER, Definiteness in. A Christian lawyer lost some legal papers of great value at a critical time, as they were required in a case at nine o'clock next morning. He hunted the office through in vain. He then resorted to prayer, and asked God to relieve him before the appointed hour. He was at his office early, and a quarter before nine a stranger entered and handed him a parcel, which was found to contain the missing papers.

11,074. PRAYER, Differences of. Mental prayer, when our spirits wander, is like a watch standing still, because the spring is down, wind it up again, and it goes on regularly. But in vocal prayer, if the words run on and the spirit wanders, the clock strikes false, the hand points not the right hour, because something is in disorder, and the striking is nothing but noise. In mental prayer we confess God's omniscience, in vocal prayer we call angels to witness. In the first our spirits rejoice in God, in the second the angels rejoice in us. Mental prayer is the best remedy against the lightness and indifference of affections, but vocal prayer is the aptest instrument of communion. Jeremy Taylor.

11,075. PRAYER, Direction of. We must come to God in the name of Christ, then he will be our bondsman, surety, indorser, intercessor with the Father. He will present our petition, and plead his own merits in our behalf; and he never pleads in vain. As the high-priest, under the Levitical dispensation, entered the Holy of Holies once a year, bearing the names of the chosen tribes on his breastplate, so the great High-Priest of our profession now stands in the holiest of all, bearing the name of every follower and friend on his heart. When you send up your prayers, be sure to direct them to the care of the Redeemer, and then they will never miscarry. M. Henry.

11,076. PRAYER, Discoveries of. A man bought a house and lot for one hundred pounds, which he was to pay by installments. During his life he paid all but ten pounds. His widow managed to raise this balance, and went with it to redeem the estate. She was then informed that she must produce the receipts, or the property would be sold to pay the debt. The distressed widow searched her house through for them, but in vain. Her little son suggested that Jesus could help them in their trouble. So they prayed to him about it. As they rose from prayer a brilliant firefly darted into the window, wheeled around the room, and then settled down under an old chest of drawers. The boy had it pulled out a little, that he might catch the insect, and as it moved out fell the lost receipts. An angel from heaven could not have revealed the receipts more successfully or opportunely than did the straying firefly.

11,077. PRAYER, Diversion in. If a man brought a request to an earthly monarch, but instead of making it, were to turn aside and talk with his neighbor, might not the king be justly displeased? Trench.

11,078. PRAYER, Earnest. Mr. Zeller, who kept a school at Benggen, used to illustrate what a life of prayer is by giving a child the end of a thread, and taking the other into another room. When the thread was pulled tight, the slightest check could be felt; when it was slack, not even the hardest.

11,079. PRAYER, Ease of. Look at the in-redible ease of prayer. Every time, place, posture, is fitting; for there is no time, place, or posture, in and by which we cannot reverently confess the presence of God. Talent is not needed. Eloquence is out of place. Dignity is no recommendation. Our want is our eloquence, our misery our recommendation. Thought is quick as lightning, and quick as lightning can it multiply effectual prayer. Actions can pray; sufferings can pray. There need no ceremonies; there are no rubrics to keep. The whole function is expressed in a word; it is simply this—the child at his father's knee, his words stumbling over each other from very earnestness, and his wistful face pleading better than his hardly intelligible prayer.

F. W. Faber.

11,080. PRAYER, Family. In Greenland, when a stranger knocks at the door, he asks, "Is God in this house?" and if they answer, "Yes," he enters. Reader, this little messenger knocks at your door with the Greenland salutation, Is God in this house? Were you, like Abraham, entertaining an angel unawares, what would be the report he would take back to heaven? Would he find you commanding your children and your household, and teaching them the way of the Lord? Would he find an altar in your dwelling? Do you worship God with your children? If not, then God is not in your house. A prayerless family is a godless family.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

11,081. PRAYER, Fidelity in. Of all the ministers with whom I have ever been associated, from the commencement of my ministry to this hour, and with whom I have been thrown in most intimate relations, Bishop Janes spent most time in private prayer; and I think those who have enjoyed, intimately, his society, and have been thrown where he was, have felt the same thing. He pleaded earnestly, not only for himself and his family, but for the whole Church; and the first year I was associated with him he told me he made it a point of duty to take a list of all the presiding elders he had appointed during the year, and every day to offer for them and their success, personal supplication to Almighty God, and, in addition to all this, as many of the ministers whose peculiar situation and circumstances had commended them specially to his care. And thus he lingered on his knees, while most others would rise, still pleading for the blessing of God upon his brethren and upon the Church.

Bp. Simpson.

11,082. PRAYER, Formality in. We may insensibly get into the habit of using the fittest possible words, and offering the most scriptural petitions, and yet do it all by rote without feeling it, and walk daily round an old beaten path, like a horse in a mill. I desire to touch this point with caution and delicacy. I know that there are certain great things we daily want, and that there is nothing necessarily formal in asking for these things in the same words. The world, the devil, and our hearts, are daily the same. Of necessity, we must daily go over old ground. But this I say, we must be very careful on this point. If the skeleton and outline of our prayers be by habit almost a form, let us strive that the clothing and filling up of our prayers be as far as possible of the Spirit. As to praying out of a book, it is a habit I cannot praise. If we can tell our doctors the state of our bodies without a book, we ought to be able to tell the state of our souls to God. I have no objection to a man using crutches, when he is first recovering from a broken limb. It is better to use crutches than not to walk at all. But if I saw him all his life on crutches, I should not think it matter for congratulation. I should like to see him strong enough to throw his crutches away.

Ryle.

11,083. PRAYER, God in. It appeared to me a wonder that God should regard the prayers of such polluted worms until I discovered in the light of this text, "the Spirit helpeth our infirmities," etc., that it was the Holy Ghost that prayed. I could not help exclaiming, No wonder God hears prayer when it is the Holy Ghost that prays. What an awful place is the Christian's closet! The whole Trinity is about it when he kneels. There is the Spirit praying to the Father through the Son.

Dr. Griffin.

11,084. PRAYER, Honor of. A monarch vested in gorgeous habiliments is far less illustrious than a kneeling suppliant ennobled and adorned by communion with his God. Consider how august a privilege it is, when angels are present, and archangels throng around; when cherubim and seraphim encircle with their blaze the throne; that a mortal may approach with unrestrained confidence, and converse with heaven's dread Sovereign! O, what honor was ever conferred like this!

Chrysostom.

11,085. PRAYER, Incentive to. The worldling plies his prayers as sailors do their pumps when the ship leaks and the storm rages, from fear of the loss of the ship and cargo.

11,086. PRAYER, Memory of a Mother's. A converted gambler said, in a Fulton street meeting, "I have been a very wicked man, and have lived a rough life. My Sabbaths have been chiefly spent in cock-fighting, dog-fighting, and gambling. My companions have been the vilest; yet there has not been a day for ten years that I have not remembered my mother's prayers which she offered for me at the side of my bed. They have followed me, not only reformed me, but made me a Christian."

11,087. PRAYER, Mohammedan. Mohammed called prayer the pillar of religion and the key of paradise. He required his followers to pray five times every twenty-four hours. 1. Before sunrise. 2. A little past noon. 3. Before sunset. 4. After sunset. 5. After dark. At these times the Muezzim cry from the steeples of the mosques, "To prayer, O ye faithful!" Every votary prays towards the temple of Mecca. If clad in costly robes, and adorned with rich jewels, they lay them off before prayer, lest they should seem proud in addressing God. He enjoined the cultivation of the true spirit of prayer, as well as the faithful observance of the form.

11,088. PRAYER, Mother's. Augustine inherited the impetuous nature of his pagan father rather than the gentle traits of his beautiful, Christian mother. His rejection of Christianity and open immorality of life caused his mother great sorrow. For years she had tried to train him in the right way, and had prayed unceasingly for his soul. She went to the bishop with her sorrow. "Wait," said he, "your son's heart is not now disposed to receive the truth. Wait the Lord's good time." And then, to keep her heart from breaking, and keep her instant in prayer, he said, "Go on praying; the child of so many prayers cannot perish." He ran away from home that he might have greater license. She followed him by her prayers, and finally sought him in the distant land, and there saw him converted. Monica died in 387.

11,089. PRAYER, Mother's. The son of a widow, living at a whaling port in New England, shipped on a whaler for a three years' cruise. His mother waited, prayed and watched for his safe return. At last a ship was seen entering the offing, and was soon discovered to be the one on which her son had sailed. Before the ship entered the harbor a fearful storm arose, which drove it upon the rocks and scattered the broken wreck along the beach. All night long the mother prayed for the safety of her boy. At early dawn a knock was heard at her door. On opening it her son rushed into her arms, saying, "Mother, I knew you would pray me home." There are many sons that must be prayed home to heaven.

11,090. PRAYER, No Unanswered. There is no such thing in the long history of God's kingdom as an unanswered prayer. Every true desire from a child's heart finds some true answer in the heart of God. Most certain it is that the prayer of the Church of God since creation has not been the cry of orphans in an empty home, without a father to hear or answer. Jesus Christ did not pray in vain, or to an unknown God, nor has he spoken in ignorance of God or of his brethren, when he says, "Ask and receive, that your joy may be full."

Norman Macleod.

11,091. PRAYER, Power of. At the close of a prayer-meeting, the pastor observed a little girl about twelve years of age remaining upon her knees when most of the congregation had retired. Thinking the child had fallen asleep, he touched her, and told her it was time to return home. To his surprise, he found that she was engaged in prayer, and he said, "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." She looked at her pastor earnestly, and inquired, "Is it so? Does God say that?" He took up a Bible and read the passage aloud. She immediately commenced praying, "Lord, send my father to the church. Lord, send my father here?" Thus she continued for about half an hour, attracting by her earnest cry the attention of persons who had lingered about the door. At last, a man rushed into the church, ran up the aisle, and sank upon his knees by the side of his child, exclaiming, "What do you want of me?" She threw her arms about his neck, and began to pray, "O Lord, convert my father!" Soon the man's heart was melted, and he began to pray for himself. The child's father was three miles from the church when she commenced praying for him. He was packing goods in a wagon, and he felt an irresistible impulse to return home. Driving rapidly to his house, he left the goods in the wagon, and hastened to the church, where he found his daughter crying mightily to God in his behalf, and he was there led to the Saviour.

11,092. PRAYER, Practice in. A youth who had been reared a Roman Catholic was converted in a revival. He was soon called upon to take part in public prayer, in which he proved to be very proficient. His old companions were amazed, and went to the meeting for the purpose of hearing him. At last an idea struck one of them. "I know," he said, "how it is that he prays so well; he practices in private!"

11,093. PRAYER, Presenting. Nehemiah obtained a commission from King Xerxes to rebuild the city and temple of Jerusalem, and also requisitions for aid of all kinds upon Adeus, governor of Syria, and others. Nehemiah took these letters up to Jerusalem with him, there presented them to the Lord, and then sent them on their way. When Sennacherib sent his letter of defiance of the living God to Hezekiah, he spread it out before the Lord, and the Lord answered him by a letter by the hand of Isaiah. It was a literal reply to his petition, and assured his heart. It was followed by the signal overthrow of Sennacherib's host. That night the angel of the Lord passed through the camp of the Assyrians and slew one hundred and eighty-five thousand of them. Nehemiah lays his epistles of encouragement before the Lord when he goes to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, and the Lord gives him success. Hezekiah lays open the proud and boastful Assyrian's letter of insult to the living God, and pleads for vengeance and the preservation of the city, and the Lord sends Sennacherib the most signal defeat in all the annals of war. 2 Kings, 19. (See Cyclopædia of Poetical Illustrations. No. 2934.)

11,094. PRAYER, Relief by. The cashier of a New York bank could not make his account balance by many thousands of dollars. He alone had charge of the books. He had never used a dollar of the bank's funds, nor could he detect any error in the accounts. It was in the era of embezzlements and defalcations. On the morrow the bank examiner would examine his accounts and declare him a defaulter. As the account now stood the result was inevitable. On the following morning in agony of spirit he entered the directors' room, and for one hour upon his knees, urged his case before God. Calm came to his troubled heart. As if led by an invisible hand he went from his knees to the safe, and took out a blotter long unused. It opened upon pages of accounts which had evidently not been copied. This providential discovery made the account balance, vindicated the cashier, and showed the faithfulness of God who has said, "Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will answer thee."

11,095. PRAYER, Silent. At the opening of the Anderson School of Natural History, on Penikese Island, Prof. Agassiz, after alluding to their peculiar surroundings, proposed the observance of "a moment of silence" for asking the divine blessing. Acting upon this suggestion, the students reverently bowed their heads, and the Professor, with devout mien, stood uncovered before them, all united in silent supplication. One says, "We know of few finer pictures than that one on the island of Penikese, when our acknowledged modern king of science, with bared head and reverent mien, amid the scattered stones, and sea-gull's nests, and the rude gatherings of his projected work, stood with his forty pupils, waiting on the Almighty Creator."

11,096. PRAYER, Specific. A lady lay upon her bed suffering violent pain in the head, and while thus suffering, she said to a friend, who was watching by her side, "If only I could get ten minutes' sleep, I should feel better." The friend said nothing, but offered up a silent prayer to God to grant the ten minutes' sleep. True! the petition was feeble, and the faith feeble, but the Lord, who is very tender, did not despise either the feebleness of the faith, or the smallness of the subject of the request. The patient immediately slept, and described her sleep as most delicious. Power.

10,097. PRAYER, Subjects of. Is everything to be a subject of prayer? Certainly. So thought Fowell Buxton even of those amusements with which, in holiday times, he was wont to brace up mind and body for noble labors in the cause of God and his country. So thought that Corsican patriot who never went down to battle till he had gone down on his knees, nor ever leveled a rifle that never missed without praying for the soul he was about to send into eternity. And so speaks Paul, when, linking peace and prayer together, he writes, "Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your request be made known unto God; and the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds, through Jesus Christ."

Dr. Guthrie.

11,098. PRAYER, Submission in. The wife of St. Francis Borgia, duke of Gandia, was suffering under a protracted and severe illness, which threatened her death. The duke, a very pious man, fasted and prayed much for her recovery. One day, while praying in his closet, he heard a voice distinctly say, "If thou wouldst have the life of the duchess prolonged, it shall be granted, but it is not expedient for thee." With an overwhelming sense of the Divine condescension and love, he hastened to free himself from this responsibility, saying, "O God, leave not this which is only in thy power to my will! I am bound in all things to conform my will to thine. Thou alone knowest what is best, and what is for my good. Let not my will be done, but thine with my wife, my children, myself, and all things thou hast given me."

11,099. PRAYER, Substitute for. It is said the Japanese, instead of spending their time in listening to a long sermon, march decorously to the temple wherein their priests are performing service, throw in a printed prayer and a little money, and go about their business with a satisfied conscience.

11,100. PRAYER, Urging. The celebrated John Foster, in a sermon to young people, said, "My dear young friends, I conjure each one of you not to sleep this night without prayer. If you can't pray at least say, Lord Jesus, save my soul! Lord Jesus, save my soul. Let that simple prayer be perseveringly offered, with the desire accompanying the words, and you cannot pray in vain, you cannot fail to receive a glorious answer." Sometime after he received a letter from a young man who heard the sermon, acted upon the counsel, and found it true to the saving of his soul.

11,101. PRAYER, Utility of. Prayer is not a sentiment or a theory; it is a working instrument, which is to do certain things, just as a pen is to write, or a knife to cut.

11,102. PRAYER, Weeping and. As music upon the water sounds further and more harmoniously than upon the land, so prayers joined with tears. These if they proceed from faith, are showers quenching the devil's cannon-shot; a second baptism of the soul, wherein it is rinsed anew, nay, perfectly anew, as the tears of vines cure the leprosy, as the lame were healed in the troubled waters. Trapp.

11,103. PRAYER, What is? A little deaf and dumb girl was once asked by a lady, who wrote the question on a slate: "What is prayer?" The little girl took the pencil and wrote the reply: "Prayer is the wish of the heart."

11,104. PRAYER, Wonders of. Abraham's servant prays, Rebekah appears. Jacob wrestles and prays, and prevails with Christ; Esau's mind is wonderfully turned from the revengeful purpose he had harbored for twenty years. Moses prays, Amalek is discomfited. Joshua prays, Acham is discovered. Hannah prays, Samuel is born. David prays, Abithophel hangs himself. Asa prays, a victory is gained. Jehoshaphat cries to God, God turns away his foes. Isaiah and Hezekiah pray, 185,000 Assyrians are dead in twelve hours. Daniel prays, the lions are muzzled. Daniel prays, the seventy weeks are revealed. Mordecai and Esther fast, Haman is hanged on his own gallows in three days. Ezra prays at Ahava, God answers. Nehemiah darts a prayer, the king's heart is softened in a minute. Elijah prays, a drought of three years succeeds. Elijah prays, rain descends apace. Elisha prays, Jordan is divided. Elisha prays, a child's soul comes back; for prayer reaches eternity. The Church prays ardently, Peter is delivered by an angel. J. Ryland.

11,105. PRAYERS, Work and. A Roman general attributed his victory to the fact that the gods favored him because he begged for success with his drawn sword in his hand, and fought while he cried to heaven for help.

11,106. PRAYERLESSNESS Rebuked. A little boy said his prayers preparatory to retiring for the night, while his prayerless father stood by. Rising from his knees, he said, "Now, father, I have said my prayers; have you said yours? Are you too big to pray?"

11,107. PRAYER-MEETING, Drawing Lots in. A traveler reports attending a prayer-meeting in Stuttgart, Germany. He says, "At the beginning of the meeting each person took a piece of paper from the table. On inquiry, I found it was drawing of lots as to the order of prayers. The papers were numbered. Number one prayed first, and was followed by number two, and by others, according to the numbers they had drawn. The object is to prevent embarrassment and a painful waiting one for another. There are many such gatherings found here. They form what is called the inner circles. The sexes do not meet, but women's prayer-meetings are also held."

11,108. PRAYER-MEETINGS, Objection to. Rev. William Dawson was accosted by an individual, who said he had been present at a certain meeting; that he liked the preaching very well indeed, but was much dissatisfied with the prayer-meeting; adding, that he usually lost all the good he had received during the sermon by remaining in these noisy meetings. Mr. D. replied, that he should have united with the people of God in the prayer-meeting, if he desired to retain or obtain good. "O," said the gentleman, "I went into the gallery, where I leaned over the front, and saw the whole; but I could get no good: I lost, indeed, all the benefit I had received during the sermon." "It is easy to account for that," rejoined Mr. Dawson. "How so?" inquired the other. "You mounted to the top of the house, and, on looking down your neighbor's chimney to see what kind of a fire he kept, you got your eyes filled with smoke. Had you entered by the door, gone into the room, and mingled with the family around the household hearth, you would have enjoyed the benefit of the fire as well as they. Sir, you have got the smoke in your eyes!"

11,109. PREACHER, Blunder of a. A doctor of divinity went to preach in Glenisla, and thought, that being a pastoral parish, the twenty-third Psalm would form a peculiarly suitable subject; and from that, as he was very capable of doing, he delivered an admirable discourse. But there was a "dead fly" in the apothecary's ointment that marred the sermon and lowered the man. Ignorant of the fact that sheep in our moist climate, and amid the dew-covered and green, succulent herbage, are independent of streams, and, indeed, seldom drink water but when sick, he expatiated, as he spoke of "the still waters," on the importance of water to the flocks—a blunder and display of ignorance the stupidest discovered; and as they lingered to light their pipes by the church door, he had the mortification on retiring to hear himself and his sermon treated with contempt; one shepherd saying to another, "Puir bodie! Heard ye ever the like o' yon about the sheep drinkin'?" Guthrie.

11,110. PREACHER, The Distracted. Daniel Webster told the following of old Father Searl, the minister of his boyhood. It was customary then to wear buckskin breeches in cool weather. One Sunday morning, in the autumn, Father Searl brought his down from the garret; but the wasps had taken possession of them during the summer and were having a nice time in them. By dint of effort, he got out the intruders, as he supposed, and dressed for meeting. But while reading the Scriptures to the congregation, he felt a dagger from one of the small-waisted fellows, and jumped about the pulpit slapping his thighs. But the more he slapped around and danced the more he was stung. The people thought him crazy, and were in commotion what to do. He explained the matter by exclaiming, "Brethren don't be alarmed. The word of the Lord is in my mouth, but the devil is in my breeches."

11,111. PREACHER, The Earnest. However highly gifted he may otherwise be, it is a valid objection to a preacher, that he does not feel what he says; that spoils more than his oratory. Once on a time an obscure man rose up to address the French Convention. At the close of his oration, Mirabeau, the giant genius of the Revolution, turned round to his neighbor, and eagerly asked, "Who is that?" The other, who had been in no way interested by the address, wondered at Mirabeau's curiosity. Whereupon the latter said, "That man will yet act a great part;" and added, on being asked for an explanation, "He speaks as one who believes every word he says." Much of pulpit power under God depends on that; admits of that explanation, or of one allied to it. They make others feel who feel themselves.

Dr. Guthrie.

11,112. PREACHER, Industrious. The Rev. Mr. Duchal, an eminent Irish Non-conformist divine, of the beginning of the eighteenth century, was noted for his careful and persevering sermon making. In the last twenty years of his life, he composed over seven hundred sermons of superior excellence.

11,113. PREACHER, Lesson of a. A minister recovering from a dangerous illness, was thus addressed by one of his friends: "Though God seems to be bringing you up from the gates of death, yet it will be a long time before you will sufficiently retrieve your strength, and regain vigor enough of mind to preach as usual." The convalescent answered: "You are mistaken, my friend; for this six weeks illness has taught me more divinity than all my past studies and all my ten years' ministry put together."

11,114. PREACHER, A Pedantic. In the town of Goslar, in the Hartz mountain, there is in the principal square a fountain evidently of mediaeval date, but the peculiarity of its construction is that no one can reach the water so as to fill a bucket or even get a drink to quench his thirst. Both the jets, and the basin into which they fall, are above the reach of any man of ordinary stature; yet the fountain was intended to supply the public with water, and it fulfills its design by a method which we never saw in use before; every person brings a spout or trough with him long enough to reach the top of the fountain and bring the water down into his pitcher. Sixpennyworth of mason's work with a chisel would have made the crystal stream available to all; but no, every one must bring a trough or go away unsupplied. When the preachers of the gospel talk in so lofty a style that each hearer needs to bring a dictionary, they remind us of the absurd fountain of Goslar. Spurgeon.

11,115. PREACHER and People. The tree is known by its fruit—the preacher by his people; for whenever I have found it difficult to awaken and arrest the attention of an audience lolling at their ease, and wearing in their faces an air of dull indifference, I did not need any one to tell me that their usual Sabbaths were a weariness—their minister a poor, uninteresting preacher. And much have they to answer for, who, devoting too little time and labor to their sermons, indulge their taste, some for literature, and others for laziness, at the expense of their people's souls.

Dr. Guthrie.

11,116. PREACHER, A Soul-Saving. Michael Angelo, when painting an altar-piece in the conventual church, in Florence, in order that the figures might be as death-like as possible, obtained permission of the prior to have the coffins of the newly-buried opened and placed beside him during the night; an appalling expedient, but successful in enabling him to reproduce with terrible effect, not the mortal pallor only, but the very anatomy of death. If we would preach well to the souls of men we must acquaint ourselves with their ruined state, must have their case always on our hearts both by night and day, must know the terrors of the Lord and the value of the soul, and feel a sacred sympathy with perishing sinners.

Spurgeon.

11,117. PREACHING, Attraction of. The power of the magnet gains nothing from the gilder's or the graver's art; its attraction lies in itself, and is diminished by foreign accretions. So it is with the greatest of all magnets of which Christ spake when he said: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." We may draw men to ourselves by genius, eloquence, eccentricity, but we can draw men to Christ only by the attraction of the Cross.

J. A. James.

11,118. PREACHING, Attractive. Fishermen throw over the food which the fish like best, and attract them to their nets by thousands. A person with grain or bread crumbs may gather hundreds of sparrows about him in the parks of the city of New York, but if he does not feed them well they will not stay long. Take the lesson, O ye that are appointed to "feed the flock of God." Distribute bountifully the true bread, and hungry souls will gather about you and be satisfied.

11,119. PREACHING, Beginning of. It would be well, if some who have taken upon themselves the ministry of the gospel, would first preach to themselves, then afterwards to others. Cardinal Pole.

11,120. PREACHING, Best Manner of. You know how you would feel and speak in a parlor concerning a friend who was in imminent danger of his life, and with what energetic pathos of diction and countenance you would enforce the observance of that which you really thought would be for his preservation. You could not think of playing the orator, of studying your emphasis, cadences and gestures; you would be yourself, and the interesting nature of your subject, impressing your heart, would furnish you with the most natural tone of voice, the most proper language, the most engaging features, and the most suitable and graceful gestures. What you would thus be in the parlor, be in the pulpit, and you will not fail to please, to affect, and to profit. Garrick.

11,121. PREACHING Christ. When we speak of preaching the gospel, we do not mean reiterating certain truths to the exclusion of all others; our duty is to present, as in a great historical picture, the whole of God's word, every figure in its place and proportion; ever bearing in mind that the great center figure of the group, on which the whole depends, is the Lord Jesus Christ. Stowell.

11,122. PREACHING, Christ's Company in. Robert Bruce, a Scotch minister, failed to appear at the time of worship. The bell ceased and the people waited, but still he did not come. The beadle was sent to learn the cause of delay. He found the preacher's house closed, but heard him say repeatedly, "I protest, I will not go except thou go with me." He supposed he was trying to induce some visitor to accompany him to church. Mr. Bruce soon appeared, and the people knew that he prevailed, for his word was, "In demonstration of the Spirit, and with power."

11,123. PREACHING, Difference in. Vincent Ferrier, the eloquent preaching friar of the fifteenth century, used to prepare his sermons kneeling before a crucifix, looking constantly at the wounds represented. He was called to preach before a high dignitary of state, and took great care to prepare his sermon according to the rules of oratory. It was a signal failure. Next day he preached in his usual style, and electrified his hearers. The prince, who had heard him on both occasions, asked him how he could account for so great a difference in the sermons. He answered, "Yesterday Vincent Ferrier preached, to-day Jesus Christ." He is sometimes represented in art with the name of Jesus written on his breast.

11,124. PREACHING, Dull. Aimless, lifeless, monotonous sermons often suggest Sydney Smith's sarcastic inquiry, "Is sin to be taken from men, as Eve was from Adam, by casting them into a deep slumber?"

11,125. PREACHING, Earnestness in. Professor Lawson, a theological teacher in England, tells of one of his pupils, Andrew Fletcher, who, after completing his theological studies, passed the first two years of his ministry in a colleagueship with his father, a clergyman of Perthshire, Scotland. When the father preached, the listeners were few; when the son discoursed, the house was flooded. The father's sermons elicited no praises, the son's were loudly applauded; whereat the former became jealous and irritable. At length the son borrowed one of his father's sermons, and on the following Sunday preached it from memory with great emphasis and animation. The hearers were louder than ever in praise of the youthful orator, and one worthy remarked, "The old man never in his life preached a sermon equal to that!" So, too, when a friend of Mirabeau complained that the Assembly would not listen to him, that fiery leader asked for his speech, and the next day electrified the Assembly by uttering as his own the words they had refused to hear from another. In either case it was the manner that made all the difference. Talmage.

11,126. PREACHING, Educational Influence of. Sermons certainly are equal in their literary character and in their delivery, taken as a whole, to the discourses which are given to our students in our schools; and if so, why not have the corresponding effect? That boy who begins to attend church at the age of fourteen, when he is capable of understanding these discourses, and is regularly in the house of God on the Sabbath listening to them, when he becomes twenty-one, has spent a whole year in this school; when he is twenty-eight he has spent two years; when he is thirty-five he has spent three years; when he is forty-two he has spent four years—as much time as is employed by a student in going through college; and he has been under as good tuition, his mind has been employed on as interesting questions, his mental exercises have been as strong, as grand, and as consecutive as those which are employed in college. Bp. Janes.

11,127. PREACHING, Energetic. The thinned preacher will bleed at every scratch; and yet, for my part, I have always found those men most respected, and even most followed, who have not paid respect to any person, who have said what they thought, and nailed their colors to the mast. Even the world honors consistency and courage, and the plainest speaker will have, in general, the most hearers. The only part by which a bull can be safely taken is the horns. Power.

11,128. PREACHING, Exchange of. Rev. Dr. Love exchanged pulpits with Dr. Chalmers when the popularity of the latter was attracting great crowds to his church in Glasgow. The audience manifested their displeasure at his appearance by turning away from the church doors, or rising to leave. Dr. Love arose and said, "We will not begin the public worship of God till the chaff blows off." The cure was effectual for that time at least.

11,129. PREACHING, Extempore. When John Wesley first began to preach, he went to a church but had forgotten his sermon. A woman noticed that he was deeply agitated, and inquired, "Pray, sir, what is the matter with you?" He replied, "I have not brought a sermon with me." Putting her hand upon his shoulder, she said, "Is that all? Cannot you trust God for a sermon?" That question had such an effect upon him that he ascended the pulpit and preached extempore, with great freedom to himself and acceptance to the people, and he never afterwards took a written sermon into the pulpit. On visiting the same church years after he mentioned this fact.

11,130. PREACHING, Fanciful. Bp. Reynolds says that Praxiteles made the silly people worship the image of his strumpet, under the title and pretence of Venus. He applied this to those preachers who impose upon weak and incautious hearers the visions of their own fancy, the crude and unnourishing vapors of empty wit for the indubiate truth of God.

11,131. PREACHING, Fidelity in. Bishop Jewell, that blessed minister of the Church of England, on being asked by a gentleman who met his lordship going on foot to preach to a few people, why he, weak as he was, should thus expose himself, received the reply, "It becomes a bishop to die preaching." Whitefield.

11,132. PREACHING, Harmless. Chinese gymnasts exhibit remarkable skill in throwing knives at a person to see how near they can come and not hit. To hit would show great want of skill. To stick the knives in the wall all around and within a hair's breadth of the person is their aim. It has been affirmed that there are preachers who are experts in this art. Their audiences are perfectly safe. However sharp the words they utter, they are so aimed as to be sure not to hit. If any sinner should be pricked in his heart, and go to such a minister for instruction, he would recommend him to travel and shake off his morbid mood.

11,133. PREACHING, Holy Violence in. A holy violence in preachers is but a true zeal for the souls of men, and if they do you violence it is no more than if they pull your arm out of joint, when to save you from drowning, they pull you out of a river; and if you complain, it is no more to be regarded than the outcries of children against their rulers, or sick men against their physicians. Salter.

11,134. PREACHING, Incomprehensible. A young minister preaching for an old one, asked his opinion of his discourse. Said he, "Many of the words you used were beyond the comprehension of your hearers: thus, for instance, the word 'inference,' perhaps not half of my parishioners understand its meaning." "Inference, inference!" exclaimed the other, "why every one must understand that." "I think you will find it not so; there is my clerk now, he prides himself upon his learning, and in truth is very intelligent. We will try him: Zechariah, come hither. My brother here wishes you to draw an inference; can you do it?" "Why I am pretty strong; but John the coachman, is stronger than I, I'll ask him." Zechariah sought the coachman, and returning reported: "John says he has never tried to draw an inference, sir; but he reckons that his horses will draw anything the traces will hold!"

11,135. PREACHING, Insensibility to. A nobleman skilled in music, who had often observed the Rev. Mr. Cadogan's inattention to his performance, said to him one day, "Come, I am determined to make you feel the force of music; pay particular attention to this piece." It accordingly was played. "Well, what do you say now?" "Why, just what I said before." "What! can you hear this and not be charmed? Well, I am quite surprised at your insensibility. Where are your ears?" "Bear with me, my lord," replied Mr. Cadogan, "Since I too have had my surprise. I have often from the pulpit set before you the most striking and affecting truths; I have sounded notes that might have raised the dead; I have said, 'Surely he will feel now;' but you never seemed to be charmed with my music, though infinitely more interesting than yours. I too have been ready to say, with astonishment, 'Where are his ears?'"

11,136. PREACHING, Logical. Sir William Hamilton said to me one day quietly, "Your friend, Dr. Guthrie, is the best preacher I ever heard." I answered I did not wonder at the opinion, but I was surprised to hear it expressed by so great a logician of one not specially possessed of large logical power. He replied, with great emphasis, "Sir, he has the best of all logic; there is but one step between his premise and conclusion." Dr. McCosh.

11,137. PREACHING, Loud. "Were you ever a fisherman?" said an aged man to a student of divinity. "Yes, I have fished with the rod," was his reply. "O, but I mean with the net?" "No, I never did." "Well, you need to learn it. And do you know that when there is thunder the fish go to the bottom of the sea?" "Yes, I know that to be a fact." Many ministers forget that.

11,138. PREACHING, Non-Effective. What excellent preachers were Isaiah and Jeremiah to the Jews! The former spake of Christ more like an evangelist of the New than a prophet of the Old Testament; the latter was a most convincing and pathetic preacher; yet the one complains, "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Isa. 53: 1. The other laments the ill-success of his ministry: "The bellows are burnt, the lead is consumed of the fire, the founder melteth in vain." Jer. 6: 29. Under the New Testament, what people ever enjoyed such choice helps and means as those that lived under the ministry of Christ and the apostles? Yet how many remained still in darkness! "We have piped to you, but ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, but ye have not lamented." Matt. 11: 17. Neither the delightful airs of mercy, nor the doleful tones of judgment, could affect or move their hearts.

John Flavel.

11,139. PREACHING, Original. One of Mr. Bramwell's hearers once asked another, "How is it that Mr. Bramwell always has something new to tell us when he preaches?" The other answered, "Why you see Brother Bramwell lives so near the gates of heaven that he hears a great many things that we don't get near enough to hear anything about."

11,140. PREACHING, Plain. Who expects to find "Bradshaw" full of Latin quotations? You get it as a guide; and you want it to be as plain as possible. You have lost your "way" among some mountains one night, and are overtaken by some classic—who says, "I will tell you 'the way' to get home in sixteen different languages," none of which you comprehend. I think you would reply, "I would rather be told it, sir, in one that I could understand." Or, if some profound professor should inform you that he could explain the geological strata and formation of the soil on which you were standing—I think you would say, "If you could point me to my own abode, I should be more grateful." And I think if some poor ragged girl, or shepherd boy, could tell you of a "way" by which you could escape that wood or yonder precipice, and reach an hospitable shelter, such information would undoubtedly be more profitable to you. Spurgeon.

11,141. PREACHING, Powerful. An irreligious and worldly farmer grumbled because his neighbors wasted their time in attending a protracted meeting. He was ploughing a field near the church and could hear the singing, and occasionally distinguish a word of the sermon. The preacher frequently repeated the text, "Turn ye to the stronghold," Zech. 9: 12. The ploughman understood it. It rang in his ears and sank into his heart. The good Spirit was outside as well as inside the church. The text seemed a personal address to himself. "Turn ye, turn ye." He unyoked his oxen, and in his working clothes presented himself as a seeker with the others at the end of the service. He was saved, and no longer depreciates protracted meetings. "Turn ye to the stronghold" has become the golden text of his family.

11,142. PREACHING, Prayerful. Pray without ceasing. On the old men-of-war the gunners sighted their pieces on their knees. This is true in the divine navy. Dr. C. H. Fowler.

11,143. PREACHING, Seasonable. The bishop sent for John Berridge to reprove him for preaching at all hours and on all days. "My Lord," said he modestly, "I preach only at two times." "Which are they, Mr. Berridge?" "In season and out of season, my lord."

11,144. PREACHING, Searching. Cotton Mather says of the apostle to the Indians, John Eliot, when he began to preach in the Colonies in 1632, "When he preached, he spoke as many thunderbolts as words. He would sound the trump of God against all vice with a most penetrating liveliness, and make his pulpit another Mount Sinai."

11,145. PREACHING, Secret of Successful. Dr. Finney tells of a pastor who enjoyed a revival every year for twelve years, and could not account for it, till one evening, at a prayer-meeting, a brother confessed that for a number of years past he had been in the habit of "spending every Saturday night, until midnight, in prayer for his pastor the next day."

11,146. PREACHING, Test of. I have heard some persons, when leaving a place of worship, admiring the minister, and exclaiming, "What splendid language!" May they rather say, after hearing me, "What sinners we are! What a glorious Christ we have! What a blessed salvation!"

Rowland Hill.

11,147. PREACHING, Truthful. The pious wife of a preacher said to her husband, "Sir, your preaching would starve all the Christians in the world." "Starve all the Christians in the world!" said the astonished preacher; "why, do I not speak the truth?" "Yes," replied she, "and so you would were you to stand in the desk all day, and say my name is Mary. But, sir, there is something beside the letter in the truth of the gospel." The result was, a very important change in the ministerial efforts of the clergyman. This hint should be given to all ministers.

11,148. PREACHING, Verbal. The Lacedæmonian in Plutarch said, when he heard how sweetly the nightingale sang, "O, that I had this bird; surely it is a rare dish;" and after a while, when he had taken it, and ate it, and found but a little picking meat, he concluded with that proverbial saying, Vox et præterea nihil, "Now I see thou art mere voice, and nothing else." And such are they that go up into the pulpit with stentorian voices, that have big words, but small matter, so that the people may be said to hear a sound, but know not what it means.

Fenner.

11,149. PREACHING, Wandering. Wm. Bramwell was preaching in a little village, on one occasion, and the German minister, Trubner, went to hear him. Trubner was a very cultivated scholar, and a profound critic; and when some of Bramwell's friends saw him there, they said, "Alas! alas! for poor Bramwell; how Trubner will criticise him!" He preached the everlasting gospel of Jesus Christ with great power; and when Trubner went out of church, one of his friends said to him, "How did you like him? Don't you think he wanders a good deal in his preaching?" "Oh, yes," said the old Lutheran, "he do wander most delightfully from the subject to de heart."

11,150. PREDESTINATION, Mohammedan. The Mohammedans are taught by the Koran to believe in God's absolute decree and predestination, both of good and evil. For the orthodox doctrine is, that whatever hath, or shall come to pass in the world, whether it be good, or whether it be bad, proceedeth entirely from the divine will, and is irrevocably fixed and recorded from all eternity in the preserved table; God having secretly predetermined not only the adverse and prosperous fortune of every person in this world, in the most minute particulars, but also his faith or infidelity, his obedience or disobedience, and consequently his everlasting happiness or misery after death; which fate or predestination it is not possible by any foresight or wisdom to avoid.

George Sale.

11,151. PREDESTINATION, Restraint of. Give me a village, give me a hamlet, give me a few scattered houses, where the people are in anxiety about their soul's salvation, and I would rather send among them a Wesleyan Methodist, with all his Arminianism, than I would send a sturdy, square-built Calvinist, who is so straight-laced in the rigidity of his system that he cannot present a free gospel to every creature.

Dr. Chalmers.

11,152. PREFACE, Matter for Our. Why are not more gems from our great authors scattered over the country? Great books are not in everybody's reach; and though it is better to know them thoroughly than to know them only here and there, yet it is a good work to give a little to those who have neither time nor means to get more. Let every book-worm, when in any fragrant scarce old tome he discovers a sentence, a story, an illustration, that does his heart good, hasten to give it.

Coleridge.

11,153. PREFACE, Use of a. A good preface is as essential to put the reader into good humor, as a good prologue is to a play, or a fine symphony is to an opera, containing something analogous to the work itself; so that we may feel its want as a desire not elsewhere to be gratified. The Italians call the preface—La salsa del libro—the sauce of the book; and, if well-seasoned, it creates an appetite in the reader to devour the book itself.

I. Disraeli.

11,154. PREJUDICE, Offending. We must take sides in the wrangle of prejudices, and consequently be antagonized by many good and earnest people. It is always right to advocate our side; but never right to advocate the other. People pray the old hunter's prayer: "Lord, help me against the bear; but if you can't help me, don't help the bear."

Dr. Fowler.

11,155. PREPARATION, Advantage of. It is as much our interest as it is our duty to be seasonably awakened out of our pleasant but most pernicious drowsiness. This was exemplified to us by holy Mr. Bradford, the martyr, when the keeper's wife came running into his chamber, saying, "O Mr. Bradford, I bring you heavy tidings, for to-morrow you must be burned, your chain is now buying, and presently you must go to Newgate." He put off his hat, and looking up to heaven, said, "O Lord, I thank thee for it; I have looked for this a long time; it comes not suddenly to me, the Lord make me worthy of it." See in this example the singular advantage of a prepared and ready soul.

Flavel.

11,156. PREPARATION, Providential. An English town-missionary called upon a very fierce man, and asked the privilege of reading the Bible and praying with his family. It was granted on condition of his answering the question correctly, "Is the word girl in any part of the Bible? if so, where is to be found, and how often?" "Well, sir; the word girl is in the Bible only once, and may be found in Joel 3: 3. The words are, 'And sold a girl for wine, that they might drink.'" "Well," replied the man. "I am dead beat; I durst have bet five pounds you could not have told." "And I could not have told yesterday," said the visitor. "For several days I have been praying that the Lord would open me a way into this house, and this very morning, when reading the Scriptures in my family, I was surprised to find the word girl, and got the Concordance to see if it occurred again, and found it did not. And now, sir, I believe that God did know, and does know, what will come to pass; and surely his hand is in this for my protection and your good." The incident led to the conversion of the man, his wife, and two of the lodgers.

11,157. PREPARATION, Thorough. Sir Joshua Reynolds once executed a small sketch, and offered it for sale at fifty guineas. "So much as that, Sir Joshua! Why it was the work of only a few hours." "Not so," was his reply, "it cost me forty years of hard labor." He meant that every stroke of his pencil was done with the skill which forty years imparted.

11,158. PREPARATION, Urged. Be fit for the wall; square, polish, prepare thyself for it; do not limit thyself to the bare acquisition of such knowledge as is absolutely necessary for thy present position: but rather learn languages, acquire useful information, stretch thyself out this way and that, cherishing whatever aptitudes thou findest in thyself; and it is certain thy turn will come. Thou wilt not be left in the way; sooner or later the builders will be glad of thee; the wall will need thee to fill a place in it, quite as much as thou needest a place to occupy in the wall. F. F. Trench.

11,159. PREPARATION, Want of. It is reported that two as famous orators as ever lived, Demosthenes and Alcibiades, were somewhat weak and faulty in this point. The timorousness of the former is known by every school-boy; and as for Alcibiades, though he was as sagacious and happy in his thoughts as any man whatever, yet for want of a little assurance in speaking a thing, he very often miserably lost himself in his pleadings, for he would falter and make pauses in the very middle of his orations, purely for want of a single word or some neat expression that he had in his papers, but could not presently remember. To give you another instance of the prince of poets, Homer: he was so blinded with an over-confidence of his abilities in poetry, that he has slipped a false quantity, and left it on record, in the very first verse of his Iliads. Seeing, then, the learnedest men and greatest artists have failed, and may fail, for want of caution or confidence, it ought more nearly to concern those that earnestly follow virtue; not to slip the least opportunity of improvement.

Plutarch.

11,160. PRESENT, Importance of the. Be every minute, man, a full life to thee! Despise anxiety and wishing, the future and the past! If the second-pointer can be no road-pointer, with an Eden for thy soul, the month-pointer will still less be so, for thou livest not from month to month, but from second to second! Enjoy thy existence more than thy manner of existence, and let the dearest object of thy consciousness be this consciousness itself! Make not the present a means of thy future; for this future is nothing but a coming present; for this future is nothing but a coming present; and the present, which thou despisest

Richter.

11,161. PRESENT, Work for the. If you dwell were on fire, and you stood quiet, unconcerned, men would think that you were insane! But, ah! the souls of men are on fire, and they are quiet, and think nothing of it. It is a time of great seriousness with many. It is a time for recalling the truths of God which were taught in the days of your purity and innocence. It is a time for remembering God, from whom you have wandered away. It is a time for measuring yourself and seeing how far down you have gone. It is a time for sounding to see whether there is not consumption in the soul. It is a time for examining to see if the heart is right. It is a time to look at the spine and see whether you are not decaying there. It is a time for searching inside. It is a time for self-examination. It is a time for casting off insincerity and hypocrisy, and honestly and earnestly, in a manly way, living a new life. Beecher.

11,162. PRESENTIMENT, Evil of. Alas! there are times when foreshadowings of evil, vaporous and undefined, rise up over the soul, like the night mists over the meadow-land, obscuring not only the landmarks of earth, but dimming even the star-guides of heaven. At such periods we find our only safety in solitude and prayer. A. B. Edwards.

11,163. PRESENTIMENT Fulfilled. On the afternoon of the day on which the President was shot, there was a Cabinet Council, at which he presided. While they were waiting for Mr. Stanton, Mr. Lincoln said, with his chin down on his breast, "Gentlemen, something very extraordinary is going to happen, and that very soon." To which the Attorney-General had observed, "Something good, sir, I hope," when the President answered, very gravely, "I don't know, I don't know, but it will happen, and shortly, too." As they were all impressed by his manner, the Attorney-General took him up again. "Have you received any information, sir, not yet disclosed to us?" "No," answered the President; "but I have had a dream, and I have now had the same dream three times—once on the night preceding the battle of Bull Run; once on the night preceding such another (naming a battle also not favorable to the North)." His chin sunk on his breast again, and he sat reflecting. "Might one ask the nature of this dream, sir?" said the Attorney-General. "Well," replied the President, without lifting his head or changing his attitude, "I am on a great, broad, rolling river, and I am in a boat—and I drift and I drift—but this is not business," suddenly raising his face and looking round the table as Mr. Stanton entered, "Let us proceed to business, gentlemen." Mr. Stanton and the Attorney-General said it would be curious to notice whether anything ensued on this; and they agreed to notice. He was shot that sight. Forster.

11,164. PRESUMPTION, Advance of. Every presumption is properly an encroachment, and all encroachment carries in it still a further and a further invasion upon the person encroached upon. It enters into the soul as a gangrene does into the body, which spreads as well as infects, and with a running progress carries a venom and a contagion over all the members. Presumption never stops in its first attempt. If Cæsar comes once to pass the Rubicon, he will be sure to march further on, even till he enters the very bowels of Rome, and break open the Capitol itself. He that wades so far as to wet and foul himself, cares not how much he trashes further. Dr. South.

11,165. PRESUMPTION, Danger of. A scientific gentleman was examining the scene of a fatal explosion. He was accompanied by the under-viewer of the colliery, and as they were inspecting the edges of a goaf (a region of foul air), it was observed that the "Davies" which they carried were "a-fire." "I suppose," said the inspector, "that there is a good deal of fire-damp hereabouts?" "Thousands and thousands of cubic feet all through the goaf!" coolly replied his companion. "Why," exclaimed the official, "do you mean to say that there is nothing but that shred of wire-gauze between us and eternity?" "Nothing at all," said the under-viewer, very composedly. "There's nothing here, where we stand, but that gauze-wire to keep the whole mine from being blown into the air!" The precipitate retreat of the government official was instantaneous. And thus should it be with the sinner: his retreat from the ways of sin, those goafs of poisonous air, should be instantaneous. F. F. Trench.

11,166. PRESUMPTION, Fable of. The pomegranate and the apple had a contest on the score of beauty. When words ran high, and the strife waxed dangerous, a bramble, thrusting his head from a neighboring bush, cried out, "We have disputed long enough; let there be no more rivalry betwixt us." The most insignificant are generally the most presuming. Æsop.

11,167. PRESUMPTION, Folly of. In the strait between Johor and Rhio, there is a small white rock, called the "White Stone," very little elevated above the water, and so exactly in the centre of the passage, that many vessels, unacquainted with it, have been wrecked upon it. A Portuguese merchant passing this strait, in a vessel of his own, richly laden with gold and other valuable commodities, asked the pilot when this rock would be passed; but each moment appearing to him long until he was secure from the danger, he repeated his question so often, that the pilot impatiently told him the rock was passed. The merchant, transported with joy, impiously exclaimed, that "God could not now make him poor." But in a little while, the vessel struck on the White Stone, and all his wealth was engulfed in the abyss: life alone remained to make him feel his misery and his punishment. Whitecross.

11,168. PRESUMPTION, Pagan. Caligula used to talk to the statue of Jupiter Capitolinus as to a living person, sometimes in censure, and again in praise. Being angry because his banquet was disturbed by the thunder and lightning, he challenged the Thunder, Jupiter, to fight with him.

11,169. PRIDE, Answer to. Notker Balbulus was remarkable for his musical ability and knowledge of theology. He became a favorite of Charles the Fat, much to the chagrin of his jealous and proud chaplain. This man thought to humble Notker publicly. So he approached that composer as he was playing on his psaltery, saying to the company, "We will put a puzzling question to this most sapient and profound theologian." Then to Notker, "Master, solve us a point in divinity, we pray, What is God Almighty doing now?" "God Almighty is doing now what he has been doing in past ages, and will do as long as the world lasts: he is casting down the proud and is exalting the humble."

11,170. PRIDE, Baseless. The proud fly, sitting upon the chariot-wheel, which, hurried with violence, huffed up the sand, gave out that it was she which made all that glorious dust. The ass, carrying the Egyptian goddess, swelled with an opinion that all those crouches, cringes, and obeisances were made to him. But it is the case, not the carcase, they gape for. So may the chased stag boast how many hounds he hath attending him. They attend, indeed, as ravens a dying beast. Actæon found the kind truth of their attendance. Adams.

11,171. PRIDE, Checks to. What is the man proud of? Money? It will not procure for him one night's sleep. It will not buy back a lost friend. It will not bribe off approaching death. Land? A very little bit of it will serve him soon. Learning? If he be equal to Newton, he has gathered one little pebble on the ocean's shore, and ever that one he must soon lay down again. Teachers' Treasury

11,172. PRIDE, Compensation of. Some women are proud of their fine clothes, and when they have less wit and sense than the rest of their neighbors, comfort themselves that they have more lace. Some ladies put so much weight upon ornaments that, if one could see into their hearts, it would be found that even the thought of death was made less heavy to them by the contemplation of their being laid out in state, and honorably attended to the grave. Anon.

11,173. PRIDE, Consequences of. Nature teaches us, that those trees bend the most freely, which bear the most fully. As a proud heart loves none but itself; so it is beloved by none but itself. Who would attempt to gain those pinnacles, that none have ascended without fears or descended without falls? It is recorded of Timotheus the Athenian, that when he was giving an account of his government and successes to the state, he frequently asserted with a vaunting air, "In this fortune had no hand." After this he never prospered, was quickly after disgraced and died in exile. Secker.

11,174. PRIDE, Contemptuous. Demetrius, one of Alexander's successors, was so proud and disdainful, as not to allow those who transacted business with him liberty of speech; or else he treated them with so much rudeness, as obliged them to quit his presence in disgust. He suffered the Athenian ambassadors to wait two whole years before he gave them audience; and by the haughtiness of his behaviour, at last provoked his subjects to revolt from his authority, and expel him from his throne. Whitecross.

11,175. PRIDE, Fall of. A tortoise, dissatisfied with his lowly life, when he beheld so many of the birds, his neighbors, disporting themselves in the clouds, and thinking that, if he could but once get up into the air, he could soar with the best of them, called one day upon an eagle, and offered him all the treasures of ocean if he could only teach him to fly. The eagle would have declined the task, assuring him that the thing was not only absurd but impossible; but being further pressed by the entreaties and promises of the tortoise, he at length consented to do for him the best he could. So taking him up to a great height in the air and loosing his hold upon him, "Now, then!" cried the eagle; but the tortoise, before he could answer him a word, fell plump upon a rock, and was dashed to pieces. Æsop.

11,176. PRIDE, How to Humble. You may strip man bare of every earthly possession; you may leave him like a leafless trunk, or a dismantled wreck; you may bereave him of all that is held dear. Affection may weep over him; authority may command; agony may lacerate; poverty may press him to the dust. To all these the law of God may add its terrors; and the dread of an undone eternity, of a lost soul, or a forfeited heaven, may complete the climax of woe; but all will not suffice to humble man. To Christ he must come at last to learn to be meek and lowly. Tweedie.

11,177. PRIDE, Judicious Use of. In beginning the world, if you don't wish to get chafed at every turn, fold up your pride carefully, put it under lock and key, and only let it out to air on grand occasions. Pride is a garment all stiff brocade outside, all grating sackcloth on the side next to the skin. Even kings do not wear the dalmaticum except at a coronation. Lytton.

11,178. PRIDE, Offset to. Take some quiet, sober moment of life, and add together the two ideas of pride and man; behold him, creature of a span high, stretching through infinite space in all the grandeur of littleness. Perched on a speck of the universe, every wind of heaven strikes into his blood the coldness of death; his soul floats from his body like melody from the string; day and night, as dust on the wheel, he is rolled along the heavens, through a labyrinth of worlds, and all the creations of God are flaming above and beneath. Is this a creature to make for himself a crown of glory, to deny his own flesh, to mock at his fellow, sprung from that dust to which both will soon return? Does the proud man not err? Does he not suffer? Does he not die? When he reasons, is he never stopped by difficulties? When he acts, is he never tempted by pleasure? When he lives, is he free from pain? When he dies, can he escape the common grave? Pride is not the heritage of man; humility should dwell with frailty, and atone for ignorance, error, and imperfection. Sydney Smith.

11,179. PRIDE, Removal of. When you pour water into bottles or any other vessels, the air that was in them before presently flies out and gives place to the more substantial body. Even so it is with those that have had many good precepts instilled into them, and their minds replenished with solid truths. They presently find that all empty vanity flies off; that the imposthume of pride breaks; that they do not value themselves for beard and gown only, but bend their actions and endeavors to the bettering of their rational faculties. Plutarch.

11,180. PRIDE, Resisting. St. Macarius, the anchorite, who became famous for his abstemiousness and many mortifications of the body, was greatly tempted to leave his cave in the desert and go to Rome to serve the sick in the hospitals. He decided that this tempter was none other than spiritual pride and vain glory. Being much pressed with this tempter, he said, throwing himself upon the ground in his cell, "Drag me hence, if you can by force, for I will not stir." While he lay thus the tempter was disarmed. When he arose, the temptation was renewed. The saint then filled two large baskets with sand, and putting one on either shoulder, started forth into the wilderness. Meeting an acquaintance, he was asked what it meant. The saint's reply was, "I am tormenting my tormenter." The record says his temptation soon left him.

11,181. PRIDE, Retort upon. After the battle at Chæroneæ, Philip sent Archidamus a haughty letter. The latter returned this answer, "If you measure your shadow, you will find it is no greater than before the victory."

11,182. PRIDE, Roman. Metellus, a Roman general, was so proud of a victory gained over Sertorius in battle that he desired to be called Imperator. He required the people to set up altars and offer sacrifices to him in every city he entered. He wore garlands of flowers upon his head, and a triumphal robe wrapped about him. At banquets, the image of Victory was made to go up and down the room moved by machinery, carrying trophies of gold, and crowns, and garlands; while a number of beautiful boys and girls followed, singing songs composed in praise of Metellus.

11,183. PRIDE, Temptation to. A godly man offered up a prayer without one wandering thought; and afterwards described it as the worst which he had ever offered, because, as he said, the devil made him proud of it. So was it also with the minister, who, upon being told by one more ready to praise the preacher than profit by his sermon, that he had delivered all excellent discourse, replied, "You need not tell me that; Satan told me so before I left the pulpit." Dr. Guthrie.

11,184. PRIDE, Tower of. The Babel-tower of sin is a tower which a man builds in pride, and when its top reaches to heaven, then it is suddenly thrown down. Wordsworth.

11,185. PRIDE, Universal. A lady, laboring among the degraded residents of the Five Points, says that there is pride even there. One refused to associate with another because she had only one chair in her room, while she had two.

11,186. PRIDE, Vagaries of. Pride is an evil that puts men upon all manner of evil. Accius the poet, though he were a dwarf, yet would be pictured tall of stature. Psaphon, a proud Lybian, would needs be a god, and, having caught some birds, he taught them to say "The great god Psaphon." Proud Simon in Lucian, having got a little wealth, changed his name from Simon to Simonides, for that there were so many beggars of his kin, and set the house on fire wherein he was born because nobody should point at it. Brooks.

11,187. PRIDE, Vice of. Pride is so unsocial a vice, and does all things with so ill a grace, that there is no closing with it. A proud man will be sure to challenge more than belongs to him; you must expect him stiff in his conversation, fulsome in commending himself, and bitter in his reproofs. J. Collier.

11,188. PRIDE, Vicious. A bad dog had a pillet of wood attached to his neck to prevent his harming his neighbors. Of this he was very proud, and ran through the market place to display his ornament, shaking his clog to attract attention. A wise friend whispered to him, "The less noise you make the better; your mark of distinction is no reward of merit, but a badge of disgrace." Beware of glorying in your shame.

11,189. PRINCIPLE, True to. In the town where I was born, a little way out of Boston, there was a boy by the name of Henry. When I was twelve years old my father took me to an academy, more than fifty miles from home. But Henry learned a trade. The prospect was that he would be a mechanic, and I should be a scholar. Henry worked well; he talked well; he read and studied evenings; he went to political meetings. A mutual friend of ours encouraged him to speak at these meetings, but with a sob in his heart he said, "How can I ever be anything when my father is a drinking man?" He solemnly signed the pledge of total abstinence; he began to make short speeches; the young men said: "Let us send him to the Legislature." At every step he did his best. Finally Massachusetts sent a petition by him to Congress. John Quincy Adams, from Massachusetts, invited him to dinner. While at dinner, Mr. Adams filled his glass, and, turning to the young mechanic, said, "Will you drink a glass of wine with me?" He hated to refuse; there was the ex-President of the United States; there was a company of great men. All eyes were upon him. And so he hesitated and grew red in the face, and finally stammered out, "Excuse me, sir, I never drink wine." The next day this anecdote was published in a Washington paper. It was copied all over Massachusetts, and the people said, "Here is a man that stands by his principles. He can be trusted. Let us promote him." And so he went up higher. He was made a Congressman, then a Senator, and finally Vice-President of the United States. That boy was Henry Wilson. Dr. Newell.

11,190. PRINTING, Accuracy of. Every royal octavo page of this book contains seven thousand distinct pieces of type metal, from the size of a comma to a capital M. The entire book will require the handling of five million six hundred thousand types. The misplacing of any one of them would cause a blunder. Mechanical perfection has not yet been attained in the art, and the wonder to the initiated will be that so high a degree of accuracy has been secured.

11,191. PRISON, Deliverance from. During the persecutions of the third century, Felix, a priest of Nola in Campania, was cast into a dark dungeon, heavily ironed. One night an angel stood by him and bade him go forth on a mission of mercy. The chains fell from his neck and hands, his feet were disengaged, and the dungeon glowed with a brilliant light. The doors of the prison opened by themselves, and Felix followed his angelic attendant, who showed him the work appointed him. Such deliverance has every saved soul.

11,192. PRIVILEGES, Reminders of Misused. Metawatwees, an Indian chief, related to Zeisberger that he had been thirteen Sundays to Lichtenau, the Moravian settlement, to hear the truth, and that as he had returned, he had cut thirteen notches in the bark of the trees. Now when he passed the trees with his warriors, these notches met his eye at every turn and he paused and wept to think how often he had heard of Christ in vain. J. G. Wilson.

11,193. PROBATION, Dignity of. Considered as a state of probation, our present condition loses all its inherent meanness; it derives a moral grandeur even from the shortness of its duration, when viewed as a contest for an immortal crown, in which the candidates are exhibited on a theatre, a spectacle to beings of the highest order, who conscious of the tremendous importance of the issue, of the magnitude of the interest at stake, survey the combatants from on high with benevolent and trembling solicitude. Robert Hall.

11,194. PROBATION, Foreknowledge and. Among other controversies, that of Fatum is also crept in, and to tie things to come, and even our own wills to a certain and inevitable necessity, we are yet upon this argument of time past: "Since God foresees that all things shall so fall out, as doubtless he does, it must then necessarily follow that they must so fall out." To which our masters reply, "That the seeing anything come to pass, as we do, and as God himself does (for all things being present with him, he rather sees, than foresees) is not to compel an event; that is, we see because things do fall out, but things do not fall out because we see. Events cause knowledge, but knowledge does not cause events. That which we see happen does happen; but it might have happened otherwise; and God, in the catalogue of the cause of events which he has in his prescience, has also those which we call accidental and involuntary, which depend upon the liberty he has given our free will, and knows that we do amiss because we would do so."

Montaigne.

11,195. PROBATION, Improvement of. Man has but one state of probation, and that of an exceeding short continuance; and, therefore, since he cannot serve God long, he should serve him much; employ every minute of his life to the best advantage; thicken his devotions; hallow every day in his calendar by religious exercises, and every action in his life by holy reference and designments; for let him make what haste he can to be wise, time will outrun him.

J. Norris.

11,196. PROBATION, Predestination and. Either predestination admits the existence of free will, or it rejects it. If it admits it, what kind of predetermined result can that be which a simple determination, a stop, a word, may alter or modify, ad infinitum? If predestination, on the contrary, rejects the existence of free will, it is quite another question: in that case a child need only be thrown into its cradle as soon as it is born; there is no necessity for bestowing the least care upon it; for if it be irrevocably determined that it is to live, it will grow though no food should be given to it. You see that such a doctrine cannot be maintained; predestination is a word without meaning.

Napoleon.

11,197. PROCRASTINATION, Continuation of. Uncle Toby, in Tristram Shandy, threatened to oil the latch every day for forty years. Its squeaking every morning appealed to his heart, but he died without doing it.

Dr. Holme.

11,198. PROCRASTINATION, Danger of. A young man in Pennsylvania, who had been deeply convicted during the progress of a revival, was asked by his pastor to come to Christ. He answered, "Not to-night; perhaps I will to-morrow night." The next day the pastor went out into the country, and while on his way perceived at a distance persons gathering in the street, and when he reached the place, he at once saw that this young man to whom he had spoken the previous evening was nearly killed by being thrown from a horse. They carried him into a neighbor's house, where he lived but a few minutes. His last words were, "Lost! lost! and forever lost!" The call of mercy is often followed closely by the summons to judgment.

11,199. PROCRASTINATION, Fatal. A young man in Chicago, to the crime of drunkenness added another for which he was sent to prison, and having served his time resolved to reform. He told a philanthropic gentleman his history, and through him secured a situation. This man exhorted him to seek Christ. He said, "I will when I have built up a character with my employers." In this he succeeded. He was again exhorted to seek Christ, but replied, "The time is not quite come yet." Two days after, the man was suddenly prostrated, and the man who had befriended him was sent for. He whispered, "Your soul, is it safe?" He could only shake his head. The time of death had come to him, and the time for repentance was past forever.

11,200. PROCRASTINATION, Habit of. A bright boy heard and was deeply impressed by the text, "My son, give me thine heart." Satan whispered, "Time enough yet," and he put it off. Ten years later a brilliant young collegian heard the same text under circumstances which seemed to make that the time of his salvation. Again the tempter whispered, "Time enough yet." Twenty years later a statesman of no mean renown listened to the same text from an aged bishop, and felt it to be a message to himself. This time the tempter said, "Visit foreign countries before you give God your heart." A traveler in Paris was stricken with cholera. His greatest suffering was agony of soul because he was not prepared to die, and had not now time to get ready. His last words were, "Too late." The boy, the collegian, the statesman, and the traveler were one. Procrastination is Satan's best game.

11,201. PROCRASTINATION, Lesson of. A pastor drew the following lesson from the fate of a white dove, which got into his chimney and perished in the fire burning in the grate below. "I believe it is no uncommon experience of lost souls, that efforts to 'save themselves' are too late, and that if half the anxiety to escape 'the damnation of hell,' which is felt at the end of their downward course, were felt at the beginning of it, multitudes of souls might be saved. I think there can be no doubt that when this dove first got into the chimney, a few vigorous strokes of its long pinions would have immediately extricated it, and carried it triumphantly into the outer air; and there is still less doubt that if sinners would, on the first perception of their danger, make a vigorous effort to overcome the surrounding obstacles which prevent their going to Christ, they would soon be safe; but their indecision, and their good intentions not being followed up by 'the performance of the same,' like the lazy flapping of the pigeon's wings, only sinks them deeper into sin, while the force of habit increases the difficulty of their ever 'ceasing to do evil and learning to do well.' And thus 't goes on with them, until perhaps in the stinging of a guilty conscience they may (like the pigeon near the bottom of the chimney), be said to feel the very flames of hell before they actually drop into it. Now, dear brethren, there may be some of you who are, compared with others, just at the commencement of the downward course, and I advise you to get out of it at once, let the effort to do so cost you what it may, for most assuredly it can never cost you less than it would now; and take the word of a minister who speaks to you from an open Bible, what you yourselves know to be the truth of God, that as surely as ever the shaft of that chimney led from the cool air above to the fire below, so surely does the way of sin and worldliness lead to hell; and as certainly as that poor little bird, in spite of all its efforts, was conducted from light and liberty above, through the filth and darkness of the chimney, into a blazing fire at the bottom, so surely—unless God should interpose in a manner which you have reason to believe he will not do—so surely may you, before your course is actually terminated, find yourselves irretrievably ruined. If you doubt it, read Proverbs 1: 24-31."

11,202. PROCRASTINATION, Pagan View of. A Pagan moralist hath represented the folly of an attachment to this world almost as strongly as a Christian could express it. "Thou art a passenger," says he, "and thy ship hath put into harbor for a few hours. The tide and the wind serve, and the pilot calls thee to depart, and thou art amusing thyself, and gathering shells and pebbles on the shore, till they set sail without thee." So is every Christian who, being on his voyage to a happy eternity, delays and loiters, and thinks and acts as if he were to dwell here forever. Jortin.

11,203. PRODIGAL, Desperation of the. When the dreams of greatness are over, and the riot of pleasure has ceased, the change to want and degradation is often too sudden, and always too great, to be borne with equanimity. In the earlier moments of desperation, it is not uncommon to see the prodigal betake himself for refuge from the load of humiliation and despair, to poison, the pistol, or the halter. Among those who become suicides, in the possession of their reason, a more numerous list is nowhere found than that which is composed of ruined prodigals. Dr. Dwight.

11,204. PRODIGAL, Hope of the. A painter in London was engaged upon a picture of the Prodigal Son. He had sketched his design, thrown in the accessories, but still wanted a model for his central figure. He went out into the lowest quarters of the city to search for the embodiment of his ideal of the prodigal. At length he met a man with all the marks of dissipation, crime, and poverty upon him. His face was pinched with hunger, his eyes bloodshot, his garments foul and tattered. The painter said to him, "Will you come to me to-morrow? I'll give you a guinea if you will." The engagement was made. At the time and place indicated the vagabond appeared. He had washed himself, and put on better robes. On seeing him, the artist cried, "Go away! I don't want you; I want the man I saw yesterday." So the sinner wants to make himself better, but God wants the prodigal in all his vileness and rags. He proposes to put royal robes on returning prodigals.

11,205. PRODIGAL, Love for the. A lady came to Liverpool to see me. She said she had a boy nineteen years of age, who had left her. She showed me his photograph, and asked me to put it in my pocket. "You stand before many and large assemblies, Mr. Moody. My boy may be in London now. Oh, look at the audiences to whom you will preach; look earnestly. You may see my dear boy before you. If you do see him, tell him to come back to me. Oh, implore him to come to his sorrowing mother, to his deserted home. He may be in trouble; he may be suffering; tell him for his loving mother that all is forgiven and forgotten, and he will find comfort and peace at home." On the back of this photograph she had written his full name and address; she had noted his complexion, the color of his eyes and hair; why he had left home. "When you preach, Mr. Moody, look for my poor boy," were the parting words of that mother. That young man may be in this hall to-night. If he is, I want to tell him that your mother loves you still. I will read out his name, and if any of you ever hear of that young man, just tell him that his mother is waiting with a loving heart and a tender embrace for him. His name is Arthur P. Oxley, of Manchester, England. Such a message God sends to every one of his wandering children. Moody.

11,206. PRODIGAL, Parable of the. I asked a young woman upon the street, "What portion of the scripture did you the most good?" She replied, "That which does all men good, the parable of the Prodigal Son. It is so pleasant, so plain! There stands the father with outstretched arms. It is wonderful, the love of Jesus Christ for the sinner!" Ralph Wells.

11,207. PRODIGAL, Rescue of a. At a camp meeting a young man was seen leaning against a tree, looking sorrowful and forlorn. His clothes were ragged, his feet bare. A minister went to him and asked him if he did not wish to come to Christ. He replied, "I have been thinking about it; I wish I could, but I am ashamed to go and kneel there, people will look at my bare feet." The minister said, "Come just as you are: I remember a young man with tattered robes and bare feet, who was poor and sad as you are, but he thought of his father's house where there was enough and to spare." "Oh," interrupted the young man, "that's in the Bible." "Yes, it's the prodigal coming home to his father, like you, with bare feet and poor clothes." "I'll go to my father," he said going to the altar. In a few moments there was a light in his face as if which you might have kindled a star.

11,208. PRODIGALITY, Roman. Heliogabalus was very lavish in his expenditures. His fish-ponds he filled with rose water. His lamps were supplied with precious balsam, distilled from trees in Arabia. His dining room was strewn with saffron, and his porticoes with the dust of gold. Upon his shoes were pearls and precious stones, and he was never known to wear a garment a second time, though made of the richest material.

11,209. PRODIGALITY, Royal. Paschisyrus, King of Crete, after spending all he had, or could raise, as a last resource sold his kingdom, and retired to private life. He died a miserable death in the city of Amathunta, in Cyprus.

11,210. PROFANITY, Beware of. A very estimable man of sixty was prostrated with brain fever, and in his delirium shocked his friends by his blasphemous profanity. After his recovery he was told of it, and confessed that in youth he was terribly profane. "It is forty years since I uttered a profane word. I supposed the habit was gone from me; but the leprosy is still in my blood. The tiger is chained, but he is alive." Daily grace is the only cure. Beware of profanity in youth.

11,211. PROFANITY, Correcting. A tradesman commencing business was very much distressed at the profanity of many of his customers. He made an effort to stop it, by hanging above his counter, "Friend, don't swear." If an oath was uttered, he kindly showed the party the fearful consequences of breaking the third commandment. Swearing was not only abolished from the store, but also, from many of the homes and manufactories of the place.

11,212. PROFANITY, Correction of. A man said to a dreadful swearer, who was cursing himself in a fearful manner, "Friend, do you not know what Amen means?" "To be sure I do," said he: "it means, So be it." "Then," said he, "how angry you would be if any one should say Amen to the curses you have pronounced against your poor eyes and precious limbs. If God should happen to say Amen, what will become of you?" This rebuke led to his conversion.

11,213. PROFANITY, Covenant against. At a service held in Benton Barracks, St. Louis, with the 33d Missouri Regiment, Dr. Nelson proposed that the soldiers should enter into a covenant to allow Colonel, afterward General, Clinton B. Fisk, to do all the swearing for the regiment. This was unanimously agreed to, the whole regiment rising to their feet to ratify it. At headquarters a card was posted, with the inscription, "Swear not at all. Attention is called to the 3d commandment, and 3d article of war." For months not an oath was heard in this command; but one day the colonel heard hard swearing, and perceived that it was by a teamster of his own regiment, whose mules had run his heavy laden wagon against a stump and broken the pole. Soon after, General Fisk accosted the driver, "John did I not hear some one swearing most dreadfully an hour ago down on the bottom?" "I think you did, General." "Do you know who it was?" "Yes, sir; it was me, General." "Do you not remember the covenant entered into at Benton Barracks, St. Louis, with Rev. Dr. Nelson, that I should do all the swearing for my old regiment?" "To be sure I do, General," said John; "but then you were not there to do it, and it had to be done right off."

11,214. PROFANITY, Reproof of. Dr. Annesley, while dining at a coffee-house, ordered a glass of water to be sent to the gentleman in the next box, whose profane oaths were very annoying. He was surprised, and said he had given no such order. The doctor said, gravely, "I thought to cool your tongue after the fiery language you have been using." The man was offended and challenged him, but he excused himself on account of his cloth. Some years after he met the man, who apologized and thanked him for his reproof, which had cured him of a wicked habit.

11,215. PROFANITY, Saved from. A man of large wealth lived in Illinois, and had everything to make life pleasant to him, but he was a very profane, godless man. He would curse everything and everybody. Even the wife of his bosom had curses showered down upon her, and his children used to be witnesses of his frightful oaths. One day I set out to go to see him. I was near his house when he stepped out of the front door. I stepped up—"This is Mr. P., I believe?" "Yes, sir," in a gruff, unwelcome voice, "that is my name; what do you want?" He knew very well who I was; he mistrusted what I wanted. "I would like to ask you a question," I replied, "Well, what is it?" "I am told," I said, "that you are very wealthy, that God has blessed you with great wealth, that you have a beautiful wife and lovely children, and I just want to know why you treat God in the way you do." The tears came out of his eyes and he said, "Come in, come in." So I entered and he told me that he had tried a thousand times to stop swearing, but he couldn't. I told him to trust to Jesus and he would stop it for him—that's what he came into the world to do; and the result was that he let Christ take the burden. He confessed his sin, had the prayers of all the Christians round about, and in a year he became one of the elders of the church. Moody.

11,216. PROFESSION, Abuse of. He that abuses his own profession will not patiently bear with any one else who does so. And this is one of our most subtle operations of self love; for when we abuse our own profession we tacitly except ourselves; but when another abuses it, we are far from being certain that this is the case. Colton.

11,217. PROFESSION, Exceptions to. Many people are offended with the profession of religion, because all are not religious who make a profession. A little consideration will correct this error. Does the sheep despise its fleece because the wolf has worn it? Who blames a crystal river because some melancholy men have drowned themselves in its streams? The best drugs have their adulterants. And will you refuse an opiate, because some have wantonly poisoned themselves with it? Though you have been cozened with false colors, yet you should not disesteem that which is dyed in grain. He is a bad economist who, having a spot in his garment, cuts off the cloth, instead of rubbing off the dirt. God rejects all religion but his own. Secker.

11,218. PROFESSION, Holding Fast Our. When tempted to desert the truth, or to renounce the cause of Christ, "we may," says Andrew Fuller, "imagine that the martyrs in heaven are calling to us. One may say, 'Hold it fast; I died in a dungeon rather than forego it.' 'Hold it fast,' says another; 'I bled for it.' 'Hold it fast,' says a third; 'I burned for it.'" A dying English girl said, "I cleave to Jesus as the limpets to the rocks."

11,219. PROFESSION, Making no. Some excuse their evil ways by saying, like a certain young lady, "I make no profession; if I did, the case would be different." She seemed to think that fact exempted her from obligation. An irreligious man said, "Thank God, I am not a hypocrite." A Christian answered, appropriately, "He might have said with equal propriety, 'Thank God, I am wicked enough to make no secret of my sin.'" When you have heard of some scandalous professor who has brought reproach on religion, you have secretly thought, "How much better am I!" How much, think you? I own that you are more consistent, but your consistency avails you nothing: it is only consistency in sin; it is only the consistency of being bad altogether, without pretending to be otherwise; and nothing but blindness and self-deception the most determined can lead you to imagine yourself in a fairer way to heaven, than are those who have openly forsaken the path of righteousness. Anon.

11,220. PROFESSOR, The Mere. The mere professor reminds me of a sow that I saw luxuriating in her sty when almost over head and heels in the mire. Now suppose any of you were to take Bess (the sow), and wash her; and suppose, after having dressed her in a silk gown, and put a smart cap on her head, you were to take her into any of your parlors, and were to set her down to tea in company; she might look very demure for a time, and might not even give a single grunt; but you would observe that she occasionally gave a sly look towards the door, which showed that she felt herself in an uncomfortable position; and the moment she perceived that the door was open, she would give you another proof of the fact by running out of the room as fast as she could. Follow the sow, with her silk gown and her fancy cap, and in a few seconds you will find that she has returned to her sty and is again wallowing in the mire. Just so it is with the unrenewed man: sin is his element; and though he may be induced, from a variety of motives, to put on at times a show of religion, you will easily perceive that he feels himself to be under unpleasant restraints, and that he will return again to his sins wherever an opportunity of doing so, unknown to his acquaintances, presents itself to him. Rowland Hill.

11,221. PROFIT, Pleasure and. The two common shrines to which most men offer up the application of their thoughts and their lives, are profit and pleasure; and by their devotions to either of these, they are vulgarly distinguished into two sects, and are called busy or idle men; whether these words differ in meaning, or only in sound, I know very well may be disputed, and with appearance enough; since the covetous man takes as much pleasure in his gains as the voluptuous in his luxury, and would not pursue his business unless he were pleased with it, upon the last account of what he most wishes and desires; nor would care for the increase of his fortunes, unless he thereby proposed that of his pleasures too, in one kind or other; so that pleasure may be said to be his end, whether he will allow to find it in his pursuit or no. Temple.

11,222. PROFIT, Seeking for. All that we see men so very serious and industrious about, which we call business; that which they trudge for in the streets, which they work or wait for in the shops, which they meet and crowd for in the exchange, which they sue for in the hall and solicit for at the court, which they plow and dig for, which they march and fight for in the field, which they travel for on land, and sail for among rocks and storms on the sea, which they plod for in the closet and dispute for in the schools (yea, may we not add, which they frequently pray for and preach for in the church!), what is it but profit? Dr. Barrow.

11,223. PROGRESS, Evidence of. History is full of the signs of this natural progress of society. We see in almost every part of the annals of mankind how the industry of individuals, struggling up against wars, taxes, famines, conflagrations, mischievous prohibitions, and more mischievous protections, creates faster than governments can squander, and repairs whatever invaders can destroy. We see the wealth of nations increasing, and all the arts of life approaching nearer and nearer to perfection, in spite of the grossest corruption and the wildest profusion on the part of rulers. Macaulay.

11,224. PROGRESS, Example of. A boy twelve years old once stopped at a country tavern, and paid for his lodging and breakfast by sawing wood, instead of asking it as a gift. Fifty years later, the same person passed the same inn as George Peabody, the banker.

11,225. PROGRESS, March of. Agesilaus the Great, marching with his army through Thrace, used to inquire whether he passed through the country of an enemy or a friend. He sent the same questions to the King of Macedon; who replied that he would consider it. Hearing this, Agesilaus said, "Let him consider; we will be marching on." The King of Macedon, overawed at this, could do nothing else, and so sent word that he admitted him as a friend.

11,226. PROGRESS, Political. The history of England is the history of progress; and, when we take a comprehensive view of it, it is so. But when examined in small separate portions, it may, with more propriety, be called a his tory of actions and reactions. We have often thought that the motion of the public mind in our country resembles that of the sea when the tide is rising. Each successive wave rushes forward, breaks, and rolls back; but the great flood is steadily coming in. A person who looked on the waters only for a moment might fancy that they were retiring. A person who looked on them only for five minutes might fancy that they were rushing capriciously to and fro. But when he keeps his eye on them for a quarter of an hour, and sees one sea-mark disappear after another, it is impossible for him to doubt of the general direction in which the ocean is moved. Just such has been the course of events in England. In the history of the national mind, which is, in truth, the history of the nation, we must carefully distinguish between that recoil which regularly follows every advance, and a great general ebb. If we take centuries, if, for example, we compare 1794 with 1660 or with 1685, we cannot doubt in which direction society is proceeding.

Macaulay.

11,227. PROGRESS, Safety in. Flying birds are never taken in a fowler's snare. Secker.

11,228. PROGRESS, Spiritual. I find the great thing in this world is not so much where we stand, as in what direction we are moving. To reach the port of heaven, we must sail sometimes with the wind and sometimes against it—but we must sail, and not drift, nor lie at anchor. Holmes.

11,229. PROGRESS, Striving after. I will take heed of quenching the spark, and strive to kindle a fire. He ne'er was so good as he should be, that doth not strive to be better than he is; he never will be better than he is, that doth not fear to be worse than he was. Warwick.

11,230. PROHIBITION, Need of. The old Romans twisted hay around the horns of dangerous cattle to warn the people to run for their lives; but, although we have been for years hanging warnings, and arguments, and persuasions on the arms of the demon intemperance, men do not fly from it, and hence the need of Prohibition. Edwin Holmes.

11,231. PROMISES, Biblical. A man in London had all the promises of God printed together in a little book, and some time after some one in the country sent up for a copy. He received the answer that the "Promises of God" were out of print. At one time in Chicago, when the meetings grew a little dull, I told them we would go through the Bible and look for all the promises given us; and from that time there were no more dull meetings. We had never realized before what promises God has made to those who believe in Jesus Christ. Moody.

11,232. PROMISES, Comforts of. The comforts of the promises are universal, such as agree with every estate, and suit every malady; they are the strong man's meat, and the sick man's cordial, the condemned sinner's pardon, and the justified person's evidence; but the best of the world's comforts are only applicable to some particular conditions, and serve as salve for some few sores. Riches are a remedy against the pressing evils of want and poverty, but this cannot purchase ease to the pained. Armor of proof is a defence against the sword and bullet, but can no way serve to keep off the stings of piercing care; oils and balsams are useful for bruises and broken bones, but they are needless to a hungry man that seeks not after medicines but food. But the comforts of the promises are in their operations and efficacy of an unlimited extent; they flow immediately from the Father of mercies and God of all comfort, and are, therefore, sent to revive and establish, how disconsolate in any kind whatever the condition of a believer is. Spurgeon.

11,233. PROMISES, Date of the. God's promises are dated, but with a mysterious character; and, for want of skill in God's chronology, we are prone to think God forgets us, when, indeed, we forget ourselves in being so bold to set God a time of our own, and in being angry that he comes not just then to us. Gurnall.

11,234. PROMISES, Faith and the. Faith melts promises into arguments as the soldier doth lead into bullets, and then helps the Christian to send them with a force to heaven in fervent prayer; whereas a promise in an unbeliever's mouth is like a shot in a gun's mouth without any fire to put to it. Gurnall.

11,235. PROMISES, Light of the. The railway train, like some vast serpent, hissing as it moves swiftly along, plunges underground. The bright sun is suddenly lost, but the traveler's eye observes, for the first time, perhaps, the railway carriage lamp; and though it was there all the while, yet because the sun made its light needless, it was not observed. God's promises are like that railway light. The Christian traveler has them with him always, though when the sun is shining, and prosperity beaming upon him, he does not remark them. But let trouble come, let his course lie through the darkness of sorrow or trial, and the blessed promise shines out like the railway lamp, to cheer him, and shed its gentle and welcome light most brightly when the gloom is thickest. Champneys.

11,236. PROMISES, Profuse in. The man who is wantonly profuse of his promises, ought to sink his credit as much as a tradesman would by uttering a great number of promissory notes, payable at a distant day. The truest conclusion in both cases is, that neither intend, or will be able to pay. And as the latter most probably intends to cheat you of your money, so the former at least designs to cheat you of your thanks. Fielding.

11,237. PROMISES, Satan's. Alexander, who grew fond of frequent carousals, once invited his friends and officers to supper. He promised a crown to the man who could drink the most wine. One of his guests consumed such an immense quantity that three days after winning the diadem he died. So Satan outwits those to whom he makes promise of rewards and honors. Anon.

11,238. PROMISES. Special Claim to the. A pious son, whose father had died in his absence, returning to his weeping friends said, "Mother, we have a new claim on God to-day. You, my dear mother, have a claim on him for a husband, and my sisters, brother, and myself, have a claim on him for a father."

11,239. PROMISES, Unclaimed. An aged and ragged Indian wandered into one of our western settlements, begging for food to keep him from starving. A bright-colored ribbon, from which was suspended a small, dirty pouch, was seen around his neck. On being questioned, he said it was a charm given him in his younger days; and opening it, displayed a faded, greasy paper, which he handed to the interrogator for inspection. It proved to be a regular discharge from the Federal army, entitling him to a pension for life, and signed by General Washington himself! Here was a name which would be honored almost anywhere, and which, if presented in the right place, would have insured him support and plenty for the remainder of his days; and yet he wandered about hungry, helpless, and forlorn, begging of the charitable bread to keep him from famishing. What a picture of men with all the promises of Jesus in their hands—and of Christians, too, with the charter of their inheritance in full possession—yet starving in the wilderness!

Anon.

11,240. PROMPTNESS, Ministerial. A prompt minister succeeded a very tardy and irregular one. The people were like the priest, and instead of arriving at church at eleven o'clock, assembled about twelve. The new minister began service promptly at eleven, and many of his parishioners found the sermon nearly over on their arrival, to their surprise and chagrin. Others arrived after the benediction. He asked if they wished to change the hour of service, and assured them of his readiness to be present promptly at any time fixed by them. His congregation came to be as prompt as himself. A minister usually has only himself to blame for a tardy congregation.

11,241. PROPERTY, Passion for. Property communicates a charm to whatever is the object of it. It is the first of our abstract ideas: it cleaves to us the closest and the longest. It endears to the child its plaything, to the peasant his cottage, to the landholder his estate. It supplies the place of prospect and scenery. Instead of coveting the beauty of distant situations, it teaches every man to find it in his own. It gives boldness and grandeur to plains and fens, tinge and coloring to clays and fallows.

Paley.

11,242. PROPHECY, Evidence of. Some of the Prince of Oude's friends tried often to disturb his faith in Christianity. He always replied, "You give yourselves a good deal of unnecessary trouble; the dispersion of the Jews will always be an undeniable proof to me of the truth of our holy religion."

11,243. PROPHECY, Fanciful Interpretation of. Interpreters of prophecy during the last few centuries have been most of them led by their fancy. One of them sees in the sublimities of the Revelation the form of Louis Napoleon where two or three hundred years ago half Christendom saw the pope, and the other half Martin Luther. The other day one of the seers saw Sebastopol in the prophecies, and now another detects the Suez Canal, and we feel pretty sure that the Council at Rome will soon be spied out in Daniel or Ezekiel. The fact is, when fancy is their guide men wander as in a maze. Spiritualistic interpreters see, like children gazing into the fire, not what is really before them, but what is in their own heads.

Spurgeon.

11,244. PROPHECY, Profitless. Cassandra's gift of prophecy was of no advantage to the citizens of Troy, who would not believe her.

Plutarch.

11,245. PROPHECY and Providence. Josephus draws an argument against the Epicurians, who deny a divine providence from the fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy foretelling the taking away of the daily sacrifice from the temple, which happened accordingly, many years after, under Antiochus Epiphanes. The same deduction may be drawn from all prophecy. "Hence we discover that the world is not carried along of its own accord, without a ruler and a curator, like ships without pilots, which we see drowned by the winds, or like chariots without drivers, which are overturned; so would the world be dashed to pieces by its being carried without a Providence, and so perish and come to naught."

11,246. PROPOSAL, Graceful. A celebrated doctor of divinity, after a few hours' conversation with a lady, wrote to her thus: "My dear Madam—In a few hours you have obtained a place in my heart, which I could not have expected in as many weeks: indeed, so fully have you possessed yourself that unless you consent to become a tenant for life, not only will our parting be exceedingly troublesome, but I fear that many terms will elapse before I can prepare the premises for another occupant." It is needless to say that the lady came to terms.

11,247. PROSPERITY, Arrogance of. Plato being desired by the Cyrenians to prescribe to them good laws, and to settle their government, refused to do it, saying that it was a hard matter to give them any law whilst they enjoyed so much prosperity, since nothing is so fierce, arrogant, and untamable, as a man that thinks himself to be in a happy condition.

11,248. PROSPERITY, Caution in. God's checks are but symptoms of his mercy, but his silence is the harbinger of judgment. Be circumspect and provident. Hast thou a fair summer? Provide for a hard winter. The world's river ebbs alone; it flows not. He that goes merrily with the stream must bale up. Flatter thyself no longer in thy prosperous sin, but be truly sensible of thy own presumption. Look seriously into thy approaching danger, and humble thyself with contrition. If thou procure sour herbs, God will provide his passover

Quarles.

11,249. PROSPERITY, Danger of. "There are seeds," says Saurin, "of some passions, which remain, as it were, buried during the first years of life, and which vegetate only in mature age." Valerian, the emperor, was at first distinguished for his temperance, moderation, and many virtues, which fixed the uninfluenced choice of all Rome upon him; but when he was invested with the purple, he displayed inability, meanness, cowardice, and seldom acted with any prudence. So dangerous is prosperity!
Buck.

11,250. PROSPERITY, Discomfort in. I have seen a young and healthful person warm and ruddy under a poor and thin garment, when at the same time an old rich person hath been cold and paralytic under a load of sables and the skins of foxes. It is the body that makes the clothes warm, and not the clothes the body; and the spirit of a man makes felicity and content, not any spoils of a rich fortune wrapped about a sickly and uneasy soul. Apollodorus was a traitor and a tyrant, and the world wondered to see a bad man have so good a fortune, but knew not that he nourished scorpions in his breast, and that his liver and his heart were eaten up with spectres and images of death. Does not he drink more sweetly that takes his beverage in an earthen vessel than he that looks and searches into his golden chalices for fear of poison, and looks pale at every sudden noise, and sleeps in armor, and trusts nobody, and does not trust God for his safety, but does greater wickedness only to escape awhile unpunished for his former crimes?
Jeremy Taylor.

11,251. PROSPERITY, Exposure of. I once received in the pulpit the following note: "The prayers of this congregation are earnestly desired for a man who is prospering in his worldly concerns."
Wm. Jay.

11,252. PROSPERITY, Insecurity of. Prosperity is not to be deemed the greatest security. The lofty unbending cedar is more exposed to the injurious blast than the lowly shrub. The little pinnacle rides safely along the shore, while the gallant ship advancing is wrecked. Those sheep which have the most wool, are generally the soonest fleeced. Poverty is its own defence against robbery. A fawning world is worse than a frowning world. Who would shake those trees upon which there is no fruit?
Secker.

11,253. PROSPERITY, Misery with. It was a good speech of an emperor, "You," said he, "gaze upon my purple robe and golden crown; but did you know what cares are under it, you would not take it up from the ground to have it." It was a true saying of Augustine on the twenty-sixth Psalm, "Many are miserable by loving hurtful things, but they are more miserable by having them."
Brooks.

11,254. PROSPERITY, Trial of. When fire is put to green wood, there comes out abundance of watery stuff that before appeared not; when the pond is empty, the mud, filth and toads come to light. The snow covers many a dunghill, so doth prosperity many a rotten heart. It is easy to wade in a warm bath, and every bird can sing in a sunshiny day, etc. Hard weather tries what health we have, afflictions try what sap we have, what grace we have. Withered leaves soon fall off in windy weather, rotten boughs quickly break with heavy weights.

Brooks.

11,255. PROSPERITY, Wicked. There are some people that differ little or nothing from children who, many times beholding malefactors upon the stage in their gilded vestments and short purple cloaks, dancing with crowns upon their heads, admire and look upon them as the most happy persons in the world, till they see them gored, and lashed, and flames of fire curling from underneath their sumptuous and gaudy garments. Thus, there are many wicked men, surrounded with numerous families, splendid in the pomp of magistracy, and illustrious for the greatness of their power, whose punishments never display themselves till those glorious persons come to be the public spectacles of the people, either slain and lying weltering in their blood, or else standing on the top of a rock, ready to be tumbled headlong down the precipice.
Plutarch.

11,256. PROTECTION, Divine. Three hundred Christian converts, in the army of the King of Madagascar, refused to bow down before the national idol. Their service against the enemy was required, so the commander resolved not to kill them, but to place them where they would be sure to be slain in battle. They met the enemy in a deep ravine, and led the attack. At the close of a hard battle, in which many pagans were slain or wounded, it was found that not a Christian soldier was missing. Because of this signal deliverance, many pagans renounced idolatry from that day.

11,257. PROTECTION, Legend of. St. Comgall, the monk, was forced to bear arms, much against his will. It was winter, and the soldiers were encamped upon a bleak moor. Many sheltered themselves from the drifting snow and biting cold by erecting temporary huts. Comgall made no such provision, and it was noticed that no snow fell upon him, and in the morning a wall of snow was found encompassing him, which protected him from the northern blast. The Lord can be a wall of fire or of snow round about his people as they need.

11,258. PROTESTANT, Origin of the Word. The name of Protestant took its rise 1529. At this time a few of the electors and princes of Germany, joined by the inhabitants of Strasburg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Constance, Hailbron, and several other cities, published a protestation against a decree of the Diet (the assembly of the States of the German Empire), and petitioned the emperor to have it revoked. Hence the name of Protestants was at that period given to the reformers of religion in Germany: and it has since become the general denomination of sects of every description, who, continuing to profess Christianity, abjure the errors of popery, whose adherents are called Romanists, Catholics, Roman Catholics, or more properly Papists, because of their subjection to the pope, whom the greater part of them receive and honor as Christ's vicar and universal bishop.

Buck.

11,259. PROTESTANT, Responsibilities of a. As a Protestant, every mature man, the humblest and poorest, has the same dignified right over his own opinions and profession of faith that he has over his own hearth. But his hearth can rarely be abused; whereas his religious system, being a vast kingdom, opening by immeasurable gates upon worlds of light and worlds of darkness, now brings him within a new amenability—called upon to answer new impeachments, and to seek for new assistances. Formerly another was answerable for his belief. Now he has new rights; but these have burdened him with new obligations; he is crowned with the glory and the palms of an intellectual creature; but he is alarmed by the certainty of corresponding struggles. Protestantism it is that has created him into this child and heir of liberty; Protestantism it is that has invested him with these unbounded privileges of private judgment, giving him in one moment the sublime powers of an autocrat within one solitary conscience; but Protestantism it is that has introduced him to the most dreadful of responsibilities.

T. de Quincey.

11,260. PROVERBS, Wisdom of. Like those concentrated essences of food which are so much used by travelers in our day, the proverb may not present to the eye the appearance of the wisdom that it was originally made of; but a great quantity of the raw material has been used up in making one, and that one, when skillfully dissolved, will spread out to its original dimensions. Much matter is pressed into little room, that it may keep and carry. Wisdom in this portable form, acts an important part in human life. The character of a people gives shape to their proverbs; and again, the proverbs go to mould the character of the people who use them. These well-worn words are precious, as being real gold, and convenient as being a portable, stamped and recognized currency. As a general rule, proverbs spring from the people at large, as herbage springs spontaneously from the soil, and the parentage of the individual remains forever unknown. Very few proverbs are attached, even traditionally, to the name of any man as their author. From time to time collections of these products are made, and catalogued by the curious; and the stock is continually increasing as the active life of a nation gives them off.

11,261. PROVIDENCE, Adaptations of. Suppose the mole should cry, "How I could have honored the Creator had I been allowed to fly!" it would be very foolish, for a mole flying would be a most ridiculous object; while a mole fashioning its tunnels and casting up its rastles is viewed with admiring wonder by the naturalist, who perceives its remarkable suitability to its sphere. The fish of the sea might say, "How could I display the wisdom of God if I could sing, or mount a tree, like a bird!" but a dolphin in a tree would be a very grotesque affair, and there would be no wisdom of God to admire in trouts singing in the groves; but when the fish cuts the wave with agile fin, all who have observed it say how wonderfully it is adapted to its habitat, how exactly its every bone is fitted for its mode of life. Brother, it is just so with you. If you begin to say, "I cannot glorify God where I am, and as I am," I answer, neither could you anywhere if not where you are.

Spurgeon.

11,262. PROVIDENCE, Ahead of. Luther was very importunate at the throne of grace to know the mind of God in a certain matter; and it seemed to him as if he heard God speak to his heart thus: "I am not to be traced." One adds, "If he is not to be traced, he may be trusted; and that religion is of little value which will not enable a man to trust God where he can neither trace nor see him. But there is a time for everything beneath the sun; and the Almighty has his 'times and seasons.' It has been frequently with my hopes and desires, in regard to Providence, as with my watch and the sun. My watch has often been ahead of true time: I have gone faster than Providence, and have been forced to stand still and wait, or I have been set back painfully. Flavel says, 'Some providences, like Hebrew letters, must be read backwards.'"

J. G. Wilson.

11,263. PROVIDENCE, Balance of. Divine Providence tempers his blessings to secure their better effect. He keeps our joys and our fears on an even balance, that we may neither presume nor despair. By such compositions God is pleased to make our crosses more tolerable, and our enjoyments more wholesome and safe.

Wogan.

11,264. PROVIDENCE, Dependence on. We are too apt to forget our actual dependence on Providence for the circumstances of every instant. The most trivial events may determine our state in the world. Turning up one street instead of another may bring us in company with a person whom we should not otherwise have met; and this may lead to a train of other events which may determine the happiness or misery of our lives.

Cecil.

11,265. PROVIDENCE, Firm Trust in. When worthy Mr. Hern lay upon his death bed, his wife, with great concern, asked him what was to become of her and her very large family? He answered, "Peace, sweetheart! that God who feeds the ravens will not starve the Herns."

W. Secker.

11,266. PROVIDENCE, Harmonies of. In the baptistery of the cathedral at Pisa is a wonderful dome. Spacious, symmetrical; composed of the choicest marble, it is a delight to stand beneath, and gaze upon its beauties. Thus I stood, one sunny April day, when suddenly the air became instinct with melody. The great dome seemed full of harmony. The waves of music vibrated to and fro, loudly beating against the walls, swelling into full chords like the roll of a grand organ, and then dying away into soft, long-drawn, far-receding echoes, melting in the distance into silence. It was only my guide, who, lingering behind me a moment, had softly murmured a triple chord. But beneath that magic roof every sound resolved into a symphony. No discord can reach the summit of that dome and live. Every noise made in the building, the slamming of seats, the tramping of feet, all the murmur and bustle of the crowd, are caught up, softened, harmonized, blended and echoed back in music. So it seems to me that over our life hangs the great dome of God's providence. Standing, as we do, beneath it, no act in the divine administration toward us, no affliction, no grief, no loss which our heavenly Father sends, however hard to bear it may be, but will come back at last, softened and blended into harmony, within the over-arching dome of his wisdom, mercy and power, till to our corrected sense it shall be the sweetest music of heaven. J. Dorman Steele.

11,267. PROVIDENCE, Incidents of. St. Felix escaped arrest and martyrdom by crawling through a small hole in an old stone wall, which was instantly closed by spiders' webs. His pursuers saw the place, but the spiders' webs satisfied them that no one had recently passed through it.

11,268. PROVIDENCE, Links of. If I had not met a certain person, I should not have changed my profession; if I had not known a certain lady, I should not probably have met this person; if that lady had not had a delicate daughter who was disturbed by the barking of my dog, I should not have known her; if my dog had not barked that night, I should now have been in the Dragoons, or fertilizing the soil of India. Who can say that these things were not ordered, and that, apparently, the merest trifles do not produce failure and a marred existence? F. W. Robertson.

11,269. PROVIDENCE, Minister of. A missionary in Jamaica was benighted in a very dangerous part of his way, which lay along a steep precipice. A misstep in the dark would send him into eternity. A little insect called the candle-fly, came to his relief, hovering about the missionary, and lighting him over the rough places till the danger was past. Providence has innumerable unexpected agents to relieve or to overwhelm.

11,270. PROVIDENCE, Omnipresence of. I asked a hermit once, in Italy, how he could venture to live alone in a single cottage, on the top of a mountain, a mile from any habitation? He replied that Providence was his very next door neighbor. Sterne.

11,271. PROVIDENCE, Preparations of. An old Jewish legend assures us concerning the cloud that conducted Israel through the wilderness, that it did not only show them the way, but also prepared it; that it did not only lead them in the way which they must go, but also fitted the way for them to go upon it; that it cleared all the mountains and smoothed all the rocks; that it cleared all the bushes and removed all the trees. Whether fact or fancy with the Jews, it is true of God's providence toward his people.

11,272. PROVIDENCE, Preserved by. A godly man, as he was going to take ship for France, broke his leg; and the ship that he would have gone in was cast away, and not a man saved. Brooks says, "By breaking a bone his life was saved. So the Lord many times breaks our bones, but it is in order to the saving of our lives and our souls forever."

11,273. PROVIDENCE, Rescue of. The poet Cowper, in his insane melancholy, resolved to drown himself in the Thames. He ordered a coachman, who was well acquainted with London, to drive him to Blackfriars Bridge. Strangely enough, the man drove all over London, but could not find the bridge. At this Cowper's mood changed, and he directed the driver to take him home. When he reached his room, he composed that beautiful hymn,

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

11,274. PROVIDENCE, Restraints of. Julian had two great designs before him; one was to conquer the Persians, the other to root out the Galileans, as he, by way of contempt, called the Christians; but he would begin with the Persians, and then make a sacrifice of all the Christians to his idols. He did so, and perished in the first attempt. John Flavel.

11,275. PROVIDENCE, Revelations of. A boy was lost by his drunken father in this great city, and he could get no tidings from his mother. Many years had passed, and he became anxious to discover his parents. He went to the Fulton-street meeting, and asked for prayers that he might find his parents. His mother chanced to be present, and revealed herself to the great astonishment of all. In the same meeting, at another time, a young man rose up, and said, "I have been an infidel for fourteen years; I had the prayers of a pious mother, but I spurned them. I have not seen her for fifteen years; I suppose she has given me up as lost. I don't know where to find her; but I would like to tell her what the Lord has done for me in answer to her earnest prayers." Just then his mother, who was present, recognized him, and cried out, "O my son! my son!"

11,276. PROVIDENCE, Seasonable. Everything comes in its own season. The fruits for man are so ordered that every month shall yield its unfailing supply. The markets of the metropolis receive the products of every clime. Out of season many things are rare and dear, or not to be had at any price. It is no use to worry about them. The fruits of the earth will come to the farmer in their due season. The lesson is, the blessings of Providence have their season, as well as the fruits and the flowers.

11,277. PROVIDENCE, Seeing God in. A person in company with Mr. Newton of London, remarked, that the East India Company had overset the college at Calcutta. "What a pity!" said a gentleman present. "No," said

Mr. N., "no pity—it must do good. If you had a plan in view, and could hinder opposition, would you not prevent it?" "Yes, sir." "Well, God can hinder all opposition to his plans: he has permitted that to take place, but he will carry on his own plan. I am learning to see God in all things; I believe not a person knocks at my door but is sent by God."

11,278. PROVIDENCE, Special. During the gale of December 5th, 1871, the Rev. Samuel Harris, of New Haven, who delivered the course of lectures before the Boston Theological Seminary that week, was sitting in his own room, No. 99 Marlborough Hotel, Boston, writing. Being at a loss for a word, he clasped his hands over the top of his head, and tilted back his chair to meditate. Scarcely had he done so, when a chimney was thrown over, and a mass of brick and mortar came through the roof and the ceiling, crushing the table on which he had been writing. But for the position he was in he would have been instantly killed. The hole made in the roof was at least ten by fourteen feet. Zion's Herald.

11,279. PROVIDENCE, Upborne by. God is said to have brought the Israelites out of Egypt on eagles' wings. Now, eagles, when removing their young ones, have a different posture from other fowl, proper to themselves (fit it is that there should be a distinction betwixt sovereigns and subjects), carrying their prey in their talons, but young ones on their backs, so interposing their whole bodies betwixt them and harm. The old eagle's body is the young eagle's shield, and must be shot through before her young ones can be hurt. Thus God, in saving the Jews, put himself betwixt them and danger. Surely, God, so loving under the law, is no less gracious in the gospel: our souls are better secured, not only above his wings, but in his body: your life is hid with Christ in God. No fear then of harm: God first must be pierced before we can be prejudiced. T. Fuller.

11,280. PROVIDENCE, Warnings of. Pharaoh, Sennacherib, both the Julians, and innumerable more, are the lasting monuments of his righteous retribution. It is true, a sinner may do evil a hundred times, and his days be prolonged; but oftentimes God hangs up some eminent sinners in chains, as spectacles and warnings to others. Many a heavy blow hath Providence given to the enemies of God, from which they were never able to recover. Christ rules, and that with a rod of iron, in the midst of his enemies. Psalm 110: 2. John Flavel.

11,281. PROVOCATION, Aroid. Pythagoras's direction was, "Dig not up fire with a sword;" that is, "Provoke not a person already swollen with anger by petulant and evil speeches."

11,282. PROVOCATION, Enduring. A man saw a Christian bear ill manners and intentional insult with great equanimity. He said to himself, "There must be something more in this man's religion than I have suspected." This led to his conversion. The indulgence of resentment has had the opposite effect.

11,283. PRUDENCE, Christian. King Josiah,

one of the most lovely darlings of God's favor among all the kings in Judah, fell under the sword for pressing further against his enemies than the word of the Lord did permit him. The ancient Eliberitan Council enacted, that all those who plucked down the idols or temples of the heathen should not be accounted martyrs, though they died for the faith of Christ, because they plucked persecution upon themselves, and provoked their own martyrdom. Bp. Hacket.

11,284. PRUDENCE, Judgment and. A ship may be well equipped both as to sails and as to guns, but if she be destitute both of ballast and of rudder, she can neither fight with effect nor fly with adroitness, and she must strike to a vessel less strong, but more manageable; and so it is with men; they may have the gifts both of talent and of wit, but unless they have also prudence and judgment to dictate the when, the where, and the how those gifts are to be exerted, the possessors of them will be doomed to conquer only where nothing is to be gained, but to be defeated where everything is to be lost; they will be out-done by men of less brilliant, but more convertible qualifications, and whose strength, in one point, is not counterbalanced by any disproportion in another. Colton.

11,285. PRUDENCE, Rules of. The rules of prudence in general, like the laws of the stone tables, are, for the most part, prohibitive. Thou shalt not, is their characteristic formula; and it is an especial part of Christian prudence that it should be so. Coleridge.

11,286. PRUDENCE, Value of. Those who, in the confidence of superior capacities or attainments, neglect the common maxims of life, should be reminded that nothing will supply the want of prudence; but that negligence and irregularity, long continued, will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible. Johnson.

11,287. PUBLICITY, Newspaper. There is a report of a famous battle called Aliwal, which gained its fame not by anything remarkable in itself, but by the exaggeration of an enthusiastic reporter. Of it an officer wrote "Aliwal was the battle of the dispatch, for none of us knew that we had fought a battle until the particulars appeared in a document, which did more than justice to every one concerned." Revivalists, Evangelists, and even pastors have been gazetted in this foolish fashion of the day. It always reacts disastrously upon all concerned.

11,288. PUGNACITY, Resistless. A pertinent story says that an Irishman, entering the fair at Ballinagone, saw the well-defined form of a large round head bulging out the canvas of a tent. The temptation was irresistible; up went his shillelagh, down went the man. Forth rushed from the tent a host of angry fellows to avenge the onslaught. Judge of their astonishment when they found the assailant to be one of their own faction. "Och, Nicholas!" said they, "and did ye not know that it was Brady O'Brien ye hit?" "Truth, did I not," says he; "bad luck to me for that same; but shure, if my own father had been there, and his head looking so nice and convanient, I could not have helped myself!"

11,289. PULPIT, Deceit in the. Alas for that man who consents to think one thing in his closet, and preach another in his pulpit! God shall judge him in his mercy, not man in his wrath. But over his study, and over his pulpit might be writ, "EMPTINESS;" on his canonical robes, on his forehead and right hand, "DECEIT, Deceit." Theodore Parker.

11,290. PULPIT, Power of the. Clemens Brentano, a literary acquaintance of Dr. Krummacher, and a Catholic, once said to the doctor, "Till you Protestants pull down the chatter-box," ("Plapperkasten,") he meant the pulpit, "or, at least, throw it into the corner, where it ought to be, there is no hope of you." I could only reply to him, "It is true indeed, that our 'Plapperkasten' stands greatly in the way of you Catholics." The pulpit is the Thermopylae of Protestantism, the tower of the flock, the palladium of the Church of God. Well might Paul magnify his office, for not only Glasgow but the city of our God "flourishes by the preaching of the word."

Spurgeon.

11,291. PUNCTUALITY, Exact. John Quincy Adams, who filled a greater number of important offices, political and civil, than has any other American, was pre-eminently punctual. He was an economist of moments, and was never known to be behind time. His reputation in this respect was such that when in his old age he was a member of the House of Representatives at Washington, and a gentleman observed that it was time to call the House to order, another replied, "No, Mr. Adams is not in his seat." The clock, it was found, was actually three minutes too fast; and before three minutes had elapsed Mr. Adams was at his post.

Mathews.

11,292. PUNCTUALITY, Example of. Lord Nelson was about leaving London for his last successful expedition. It was necessary for some cabin furniture to be sent on board his ship, and the upholsterer called to say that everything would be in readiness, and would leave at six in the morning. Nelson said, "And you will go and see them off, Mr. A." "I shall my lord; I shall be there punctually at six." "A quarter before six," said Mr. Nelson; "be there a quarter before six. To that quarter of an hour I owe everything in life."

11,293. PUNCTUALITY, Importance of. Punctuality is important, because it subverses the peace and good temper of a family; the want of it not only infringes on necessary duty, but sometimes excludes this duty. Punctuality is important, as it gains time; it is like packing things in a box; a good packer will get in half as much more as a bad one. The calmness of mind which it produces is another advantage of punctuality; a disorderly man is always in a hurry, he has no time to speak with you, because he is going elsewhere; and when he gets there, he is too late for his business, or he must hurry away to another before he can finish it. It was a wise maxim of the Duke of Newcastle—"I do one thing at a time." Punctuality gives weight to character. "Such a man has made an appointment; then I know he will keep it." And this generates punctuality in you; for, like other virtues, it propagates itself. Cecil.

11,294. PUNISHMENT, Awaiting. It was the custom in Persia to have an iron seat placed in front of the king's palace. This was the only sanctuary great criminals had, and here at the Tripod of the king they would sit for days, awaiting with fearful expectation, their sentence, and it was only ended by the taking of life. Such is the perilous condition of every guilty sinner before God.

11,295. PUNISHMENT, Delayed. Bias said once to a notorious reprobate: "It is not that I doubt thou wilt suffer the just reward of thy wickedness, but I fear that I myself shall not live to see it. For what did the punishment of Aristocrates avail the Messenians who were killed before it came to pass? He, having betrayed them at the battle of Taphrus, yet remained undetected for above twenty years together, and all that while reigned king of the Arcadians, till at length, discovered and apprehended, he received the merited recompense of his treachery. But alas! they whom he betrayed were all dead at the same time."

11,296. PUNISHMENT, Exemplary. Plutarch tells of his preceptor, Ammonius, who corrected his pupils by punishing his own son. The pupils had over-indulged their appetites at dinner. At his after dinner lecture, the philosopher ordered his freedman to whip the lecturer's son in presence of all, because he required sauce with his food, indicating that it was an example of punishment from which all were to take warning. This was the nearest to corporeal punishment he could inflict, as the Greek law allowed only the parent to whip a pupil.

11,297. PUNISHMENT, Future. There is no pain like that of burning. Put your finger in the candle for a moment if you doubt this, and try. Fire is the most destructive and devouring of all elements. Look in the mouth of a blast furnace, and think what it would be to be there. Fire is of all elements most opposed to life. Creatures can live in air, and earth, and water; but nothing can live in fire. Yet fire is the portion to which the Christless and unbelieving will come. Christ will "burn up the chaff with fire." Ryle.

11,298. PUNISHMENT, No Proxy. St. Bernard being consulted by one of his followers, whether he might accept of two benefices, replied, "And how will you be able to serve them both?" "I intend," answered the priest, "to officiate in one of them by a deputy." "Will your deputy suffer eternal punishment for you, too?" asked St. Bernard. "Believe me, you may serve your cure by proxy, but you must suffer the penalty in person."

11,299. PUNISHMENT, Release from. When Rev. H. M. Gallaher was a little school-boy in Ireland, playing with his companions on grounds belonging to an Earl, they were climbing a tree, and broke a limb. The Earl, hearing the crash, hurried to the spot to catch the offenders; but the boys all fled except himself, a little fellow in the top of the tree. "Come down," called the Earl's stern voice, and he came down trembling with fear. "Here," calling a man-servant, "take this boy to the guard-house," and the servant grabbed his coat collar, and was marching him off, when the Earl said, "What's your name?" "Henry M. Gallaher." "Are you a relative of James Gallaher?" Straightening up, the little fellow replied, "I am his eldest son." The Earl waved his hand to the servant, saying, "Let the lad go; I know his father." Henry went home, and told his mother what had happened, and how he was released. Taking him on her knee, she said, "Now, my son, I want you to remember that that is just what Jesus is to you. When you are called, at the last day, to answer for your sins and follies, God will say, 'Let Henry Gallaher go; I know his Redeemer.'"

11,300. PUNISEMENT, Substitute for. In Edinburgh, I saw a sight I never shall forget, a man hanged. For many sins? No, for one. He stole a parcel from a stage-coach, and he was led out to die before the crowd. Did any friend come and loose the rope, and say, "Put it round my neck, I will die instead?" No, none. At one point he broke the law, and died for it. I saw another sight; I saw myself undone, deserving hell, a lost sinner, for many, many sins, to suffer stripes forever. But I looked up and saw my Substitute, Jesus, hanging on the cross. I looked and was forgiven.

Sir James Simpson.

11,301. PURITANISM, Achievements of. Historians have loved to eulogize the manners and virtues, the glory and the benefits of chivalry. Puritanism accomplished far more. If it had the sectarian crime of intolerance, chivalry had the vices of dissoluteness. The knights were brave from gallantry of spirit; the puritans from the fear of God. The knights were proud of loyalty; the puritans of liberty. The knights did homage to monarchs, in whose smile they beheld honor, whose rebuke was the wound of disgrace; the puritans, disdainng ceremony, would not bow at the name of Jesus, nor bend the knee to the King of kings. Chivalry delighted in outward show, favored pleasure, multiplied amusements, and degraded the human race by an exclusive respect for the privileged classes; puritanism bridled the passions, commanded the virtues of self-denial, and rescued the name of man from dishonor. The former valued courtesy; the latter justice. The former adorned society by graceful refinements; the latter founded national grandeur on universal education. The institutions of chivalry were subverted by the gradually increasing weight, and knowledge, and opulence of the industrial classes; the puritans, relying upon those classes, planted in their hearts the undying principles of liberty.

Bancroft.

11,302. PURITANISM, Doings of. We may censure puritanism as we please; and no one of us, I suppose, but would find it a very rough, defective thing. But we, and all men, may understand that it was a genuine thing; for nature has adopted it, and it has grown and grows. I say sometimes, that all goes by wager of battle in this world; that strength, well understood, is the measure of all worth. Give a thing time; if it can succeed it is the right thing. Look now at American-Saxondom; and at that little fact of the sailing of the Mayflower, two hundred years ago, from Delft Haven, in Holland! Were we of large sense as the Greeks were, we had found a poem here,—one of nature's own poems, such as she writes in broad facts over great continents: for it was properly the beginning of America. There were straggling settlers in America before; some material as of a body was there; but the soul of it was first this.

Carlyle

11,303. PURITY, Emblem of. Dr. J. P. Newman held up two bottles of Jordan water, one of them pure and transparent, the other discolored and roily, especially when shaken up. Shake the first as much as you would, it was always clear. It was originally the same muddy water as the other, but had been purified by filtration through charcoal. To these Dr. Newman compared the pure and impure heart.

11,304. PURITY, Token of. The household of Jacob had strange gods among them; and he ordered them to put them away, and to make themselves clean, and to change their garments, in token of their purity. When people have been to an unholy place, on returning they always wash their persons and change their garments. No man can go to the temple wearing a dirty cloth; he must either put on a clean one, or go himself to a tank and wash it if it be soiled, or he must put on one which is quite new. Near the temples men may be often seen washing their clothes, in order to prepare themselves for some religious ceremony. See also Exod. 19: 10.

Biblical Treasury.

11,305. PURPOSE, Dominant. Peter the Hermit visited Palestine in the latter part of the eleventh century, and was so enraged at the Turks for their cruel treatment of Christians, that he resolved to rescue the holy soil. Returning he went through the towns of France and Italy, bareheaded and barefooted, bearing a heavy crucifix, and picturing with extreme eloquence and enthusiasm, the sufferings of the pilgrims to the holy places. He soon gathered an army of 60,000, which he led toward Jerusalem.

11,306. QUARRELS, Ancient. The Mohammedans keep a feast called Arafat, which is accounted for by the following legend: Eve was one day admiring a beautiful figure which was reflected from a looking-glass as she stood before it when Satan made his appearance, and assured her that Adam, her husband, loved the lady she saw in the glass more than he loved her. On hearing this, Eve was offended and ran away from Adam, and wandered about in the world for several years. At length she met Adam on the top of a mountain called Arafat, near Mecca, where they become reconciled. This is the first trace of a long succession of domestic discords not always so happily ended.

11,307. QUARRELS, Avoid. Francis I. of France, was in counsel with his Generals, as to the way they should take to lead the army to the invasion of Italy. Amaril, a fool, who unseen, had heard their propositions, sprang up and advised them rather "to consider which way they should bring the army back, out of Italy again; for it is easy to engage in quarrels, but hard to be disengaged from them."

11,308. QUARRELS, Fatal. The remark of one of two brothers, "Would that I had as many oxen as I see stars in the sky," grew into a quarrel, in which the brothers slew each other with the sword. The death of two brothers, one of them a cardinal, was the result of a dispute as to whose dog first laid hold of a hare. A quarrel between two sisters-in-law resulted in the death of the husband of each, and the loss of the crown of England to one of the families. The boxing of a boy on the ear in Italy originated the factions of the "Black and the White," and caused much bloodshed.

11,309. QUARRELS, How to Avoid. A young fox asked his father if he could not teach him some trick to defeat the dogs, if he should fall in with them. The father had grown gray in a long life of depredation and danger, and his scars bore witness to his narrow escapes in the chase, or his less honorable encounters with the faithful guardians of the hen-roost. He replied with a sigh, "After all my experience, I am forced to confess that the best trick is, to keep out of their way." Persian Fable.

11,310. QUARRELS, Parties to. In most quarrels there is a fault on both sides. A quarrel may be compared to a spark, which cannot be produced without a flint as well as a steel; either of them may hammer on wood forever, no fire will follow. South.

11,311. QUARRELS, Rejecting. I commend his discretion and valor who, walking in London streets, met a gallant, who cried to him a pretty distance beforehand, "I will have the wall!" "Yea," answered he, "and take the house too, if you can but agree with the landlord." Fuller.

11,312. QUARRELS, Seeking. Cælius, the orator, was a most passionate person. Asking a client one day many questions, and he agreeing with him in all things, in anger Cælius cried out in open court, "Say something contrary to me, that so we may quarrel."

11,313. QUARRELS, Subduing. Two boys having heard of Dr. Franklin's experiment of stilling the waves with oil, were impatient to repeat it. A brisk wind proving favorable to the trial, they hastened to a sheet of water and scattered the oil upon the pool. It spread itself instantly on all sides, calming the whole surface of the water. The youths inquired the cause of such a wonderful result. They were informed that the wind, blowing upon water which is covered with a coat of oil, slides over the surface of it, and produces no friction that can raise a wave. "This curious philosophical fact suggests a most important moral reflection. When you suffer yourselves to be ruffled by passion, your minds resemble the puddle in a storm. But reason, if you hearken to her voice, will then, like oil poured upon the water, calm the turbulence within you and restore you to serenity and peace."

11,314. QUARRELSOME, Banishment of the. Two quarrelsome persons brought their case before king Philip, of Macedon. He adjudicated in this summary manner. To the first, he said, "I command you immediately to run out of Macedon." To the other, he said, "See that you make all imaginable haste after him."

11,315. QUICKNESS, Fascination of. There is something extremely fascinating in quickness; and most men are desirous of appearing quick. The great rule for becoming so, is—by not attempting to appear quicker than you really are; by resolving to understand yourself and others, and to know what you mean, and what they mean, before you speak or answer.

S. Smith.

11,316. QUIETNESS, Advantage of. The dew which so bountifully baptizes the flowers and grass, on quiet summer evenings, does not distil in wind and storm. So the dews of grace come down on calm and trustful souls. If we would receive the Holy Spirit of which the dew is an emblem, we must abide in patience and prayer, down low, as the grass waits for the dew.

11,317. QUIETNESS, Christian. In the year 1666, an opinion ran through the nation that the end of the world would come that year. Sir Matthew Hale, going that year to the Western Circuit, as he was on the bench at the assizes, a most terrible storm fell out very unexpectedly, accompanied with such flashes of lightning and crashings of thunder, that the like will hardly fall out in an age; upon which a rumor ran through the crowd "that now was the end of the world, and the day of judgment was begun!" At this there followed a general consternation in the assembly, and all men forgot the business they were met about, and betook themselves to their prayers. This, added to the horror raised by the storm, looked very dismal; but the judge was not a bit affected, and was going on with the business of the court in his ordinary manner!

Bp. Burnet.

11,318. QUIETNESS, Example of. Dr. Sanderson has so conquered all repining and ambitious thoughts, and with them all other unruly passions, that if the accidents of the day proved to his danger or damage, yet he both began and ended it with an even and undisturbed quietness; always praising God that he had not withdrawn food and raiment from him and his poor family; nor suffered him to violate his conscience for his safety, or to support himself or them in a more splendid or plentiful condition; and that he therefore resolved with David, "that his praise should be always in his mouth."

Izaak Walton.

11,319. QUOTATION, Advantages of. A well-read writer, with good taste, is one who has the command of the wit of other men; he searches where knowledge is to be found; and though he may not himself excel in invention, his ingenuity may compose one of those agreeable books, the delicæ of literature, that will outlast the fading meteors of his day. Epicurus is said to have borrowed from no writer in his three hundred inspired volumes, while Plutarch, Seneca, and the elder Pliny made such free use of their libraries; and it has happened that Epicurus, with his unsubstantial nothingness, has "melted into thin air," while the solid treasures have buoyed themselves up amidst the wrecks of nations.

Disraeli.

11,320. QUOTATIONS, How to Use. If we steal thoughts from the moderns, it will be cried down as plagiarism; if from the ancients, it will be cried up as erudition. But in this respect every author is a Spartan, being more ashamed of the discovery than of the depredation. I have somewhere seen it observed that we should make the same use of a book that the bee does of a flower; she steals sweets from it, but does not injure it; and those sweets she herself improves and concocts into honey.

Colton.

11,321. QUOTATIONS, Poetical. If the grain were separated from the chaff which fills the works of our national poets, what is truly valuable would be to what is useless in the proportion of a mole-hill to a mountain.

Burke.

11,322. QUOTATIONS, Reading for. Dr. Richard Bentley, finding his son reading a novel, said to him, "Why read a book which you cannot quote?"

11,323. QUOTATIONS, Use of. Whatever is felicitously expressed risks being worse expressed: it is a wretched taste to be gratified with mediocrity when the excellent lies before us. We quote, to save proving what has been demonstrated. We quote, to screen ourselves from the odium of doubtful opinions, which the world would not willingly accept from ourselves; and we may quote from the curiosity which only a quotation itself can give, when in our own words it would be divested of that tint of ancient phrase, that detail of narrative, and that naïveté, which we have forever lost, and which we like to recollect once had an existence. The ancients, who in these matters were not perhaps such blockheads as some may conceive, considered poetical quotation as one of the requisite ornaments of oratory. Cicero, even in his philosophical works, is as little sparing of quotations as Plutarch. Old Montaigne is so stuffed with them, that he owns, if they were taken out of him, little of himself would remain; and yet this never injured that original turn which the old Gascon has given to his thoughts. I suspect that Addison hardly ever composed a Spectator which was not founded on some quotation, noted in those three folio manuscript volumes which he previously collected; and Addison lasts, while Steele, who always wrote from first impressions and to the times, with perhaps no inferior genius, has passed away, inasmuch that Beattie once considered that he was obliging the world by collecting Addison's papers, and carefully omitting Steele's.

Disraeli.

11,324. RAINBOW, Worship of the. Homer, with remarkable conformity to Scripture, speaks of the rainbow which Jove hath set in the cloud a token to men. Iris, or the rainbow, was worshiped not only by the Greeks and Romans, but also by the Peruvians in South America.

L'Abbé Lambert.

11,325. RATIONALIST, Description of a. The rationalist is distinguished from the atheist by his theoretical belief of a Supreme Power, and he is distinguished from the pantheist by his denial of an ever-present and all-pervading divine energy. The pantheist says, "God is at hand;" the rationalist says, "God is afar off." Pantheism sees the Divine Being in all things, and confounds the Creator with his creation; whereas rationalism, though distinguishing him from his works, banishes him into a distant solitude. Its distinctive characteristic, as a form of infidelity, is, that while admitting the world to have been originally created by God, it as it were extrudes him from that world by reducing it to a self-sustained mechanism, and by resolving what are generally understood by the works of Providence into a regularly successive series of necessary developments. The seed, having the vegetative power in itself, is cast by the husbandman into the soil, and there, aided merely by natural agencies, is left to develop itself into the full-grown plant or tree. The watch, complete in its wheels and mainspring, is wound up, and continues to move, though ever so far distant from the maker. The ship-builder having finished and launched the ship, leaves it entirely to the care of the sailors. Such are specimens of some of the analogies by which men would exclude God from his own world, and make the universe, if not independent of his creative power, altogether independent of his presence and control.

T. Pearson.

11,326. READER, Great. William King, the poet, was, at eighteen years of age, elected to Christ Church, where he is said to have prosecuted his studies with so much intenseness and activity, that, before he was eight years standing, he had read over and made remarks upon considerably more than twenty thousand books and manuscripts!

Buck.

11,327. READING, Directions for. If the books which you read are your own, mark with a pen or pencil the most considerable things in them which you desire to remember. Thus you may read that book the second time over with half the trouble, by your eye running over the paragraphs which your pencil has noted. It is but a very weak objection against this practice to say, "I shall spoil my book;" for I persuade myself that you did not buy it as a book-seller, to sell it again for gain, but as a scholar to improve your mind by it; and if the mind be improved, your advantage is abundant, though your book yields less money to your executors.

Watts.

11,328. READING, Historic. All books are properly the record of the history of past men. What thoughts past men had in them; what actions past men did; the summary of all books whatsoever lies there. It is on this ground that the class of books specifically named history can be safely recommended as the basis of all study of books; the preliminary to all right and full understanding of anything we can expect to find in books. Past history, and especially the past history of one's own native country—everybody may be advised to begin with that. Let him study that faithfully, innumerable inquiries, with due indications, will branch out from it; he has a broad beaten highway from which all the country is more or less visible—there traveling, let him choose where he will dwell.

Carlyle.

11,329. READING, Instruction for. Whenever you read the writings or hear the orations of the philosophers, attend alway to things more than words, and be not taken with what is curious and of a delicate thread and contexture, more than that which is strong, nervous, and beneficial. So in perusing poems or histories, be sure that nothing escapes you that is appositely said, in relation to the cultivation of manners or the calming of turbulent, immoderate passions; but always give it a note, and make it surely your own. Simonides said that a student in philosophy should be like a bee. That laborious creature, when it is amongst flowers, makes it a business industriously to extract the yellow honey out of them all; whilst others care and seek for nothing else except smell and color.

Plutarch.

11,330. READING, Possibility of. There is hardly any man of business who could not find time for at least ten pages a day in some solid book of history, science, art or religion; and so read as to master it. Let him actually do this, and at the end of the year what has he accomplished? He has made himself the master of thirty-six hundred and fifty pages. Continuing to do this a few years, he has not only acquired a habit of method and of economy of time which is invaluable, but has qualified himself to stand alongside with intelligent men. He is prepared to make an honorable and useful mark in the world. President Porter tells us of a lady who spent fifteen months of leisure, snatched by fragments from onerous family cares and brilliant social engagements, in reading the history of Greece as written by a great variety of authors, and illustrated by many accessories of art. The hint is a good one to follow. One spot of knowledge thus securely gained, may prove at once a starting point from which to push out in whatever direction may be chosen.

H. M. Groul.

11,331. READING, St. Jerome's. St. Jerome was thoroughly versed in the polite literature of his day, and a master of rhetoric and oratory.

The eloquence of Cicero, the stateliness of Fronto, and the smoothness of Pliny were his delight. For his devotion to these he considered himself reproved by a dream which he had. He thought he was arraigned before the judgment seat of Christ, and was asked what his profession was. He answered, "I am a Christian." "Thou liest," said the judge, "Thou art a Ciceronian, for the works of that author possess thy heart." The judge ordered him to be severely scourged by angels. The memory of his chastisement and his fault, though only dream, never left him. "From that time," he says, "I gave myself to the reading of divine things with greater diligence and attention than I had ever read the other authors."

11,332. REASON, Influence of. "Child," said my father to me, when I was young, "you think to carry everything by dint of argument. But you will find, by and by, how very little is ever done in the world by clear reason." Very little, indeed! It is true of almost all men, except so far as we are taught of God, passion and prejudice govern the world; only under the name of reason. It is our part, by religion and reason joined, to counteract them all we can.

John Wesley.

11,333. REASON, Presumption of. What surprises me, what stumbles me, what frightens me, is to see a diminutive creature, a little ray of light glimmering through a few feeble organs, controvert a point with the Supreme Being; oppose the intelligence that sitteth at the helm of the world; question what he affirms, dispute what he determines, appeal from his decisions, and, even after God has given evidence, reject all doctrines that are beyond his capacity! Enter into thy nothingness, mortal creature! What madness animates thee? How darest thou pretend, thou who art but a point, thou whose essence is but an atom, to measure thyself with the Supreme Being—with him whom the heaven of heavens could not contain?

Saurin.

11,334. REBELLION, Human. A robin happened to fly into the room, and in its efforts to escape again, dashed itself madly against the walls and ceiling, until its poor little head and wings were sore and bleeding. On my attempting to catch and set it free it only redoubled its frantic efforts, and when in my hand struggled so violently as only to hurt its bruised sides more. Ah, I thought, thus it is with that poor widow, with us all, when the Lord straitens us with trouble. We dash and wound our poor hearts against the firm wall of his will; we think of nothing but escape, and struggle madly against the kind and most gentle Hand that only holds us with its "wholesome strength," whose "end" and aim are but to restore us to the bright open air of his mercies that we may sun our hearts with his presence, and wing our way more freely towards himself.

Anon.

11,335. REBUKE, Effectual. A preacher was much annoyed by persons talking and laughing during his sermon. He paused, looked at the disturbers, and said, "I am always afraid to reprove those who misbehave in church. In the early part of my ministry I made a great mistake. As I was preaching, a young man who sat just before me was laughing, talking, and making uncouth grimaces. I paused and administered a severe rebuke. After the close of the service, one of the official members came and said to me, 'Brother, you made a great mistake. That young man whom you reproved is an idiot.' Since then I have always been afraid to reprove those who misbehave in church, lest I should repeat that mistake and reprove another idiot." After that there was good order.

11,336. RECIPROCITY, Example of. Pior, a hermit, visited another hermit, named Pambo, and when meal-time arrived, took from his pilgrim's wallet a piece of bread. "Why have you brought your food with you?" asked Pambo. "I did not wish to be a charge to your hospitality," answered Pior. Soon after the case was reversed. Pambo visiting Pior drew forth at meal-time his bread and water. "Why have you brought water and bread, my brother?" asked Pior. "I did not wish to be a charge to your hospitality," he answered.

11,337. RECOGNITION, Basis of. That identity of persons, and recognition after death are indeed facts, may be clearly comprehended also from the definite and distinctive position of man in the sight of God. "Fear not, I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name" (Isa. 43: 1). "I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father and before his angels" (Rev. 3: 5). St. Paul speaks of those whose names are in the book of life; and St. James of those whose names are not in the book of life. And numerous other passages might be quoted to show that the Christian especially will stand before God in heaven as personally and as individually known and distinguishable from his fellow-beings as he now stands before God and man on earth. The deduction is obvious; where individuality exists, recognition is a necessary consequence. If, with our present limited faculties, men know each other after long absence, and change from youth to age, is it possible that redeemed men, with the enlarged perceptions of a higher existence, can fail to recognize the earthly friends who were the faithful solace of their life's pilgrimage?

W. Merry.

11,338. RECONCILIATION, Example of. An eldest son in England was ejected from his father's house with high words. The father hardened his heart against him, but the mother longed for her boy's return. The son in his pride refused to return till his father should send for him. The mother pined and sickened, and when on the verge of death made her last request to her husband to recall their son, which he granted. The first train brought him. The unreconciled father and son stood in the presence of the dying woman. She took the hand of each and strove to bring about a reconciliation. But neither would speak. With her last strength she placed the hand of the son in the hand of the father, and sank down into the arms of death. The father looked at the wife and then at the boy; he caught his eye; they fell upon each other's necks, and there stood weeping by the bed of the departed.

11,339. RECONCILIATION, Necessity for. A pastor was stationed where two leading officials were at variance, making everything unpleasant about them, and hindering the work. All efforts to adjust the matter had proved unavailing, and how to meet the case without doing more hurt than good, was still a question. At a church meeting one evening, the pastor, who was full of expedients for good, invited the whole church to gather around the altar for singing and prayer. They did so, the unfriendly officials occupying a prominent place as usual. "Now," said the pastor, "let us be united, and to test ourselves, we will rise and repeat the Lord's Prayer together." So they arose and commenced, "Our Father, which art in heaven," and proceeded as far as "forgive us our debts as we," when there was a manifest break, the contending parties dropping out. Noticing their embarrassment, the minister proposed that they should try it again. They did so, and reached the point requiring forgiveness, when they faltered as before. "What!" said the pastor, "can't we go through with this? let us try it once more, and put our whole hearts into it." So they began again, and as they neared the point of difficulty, the eyes of the two officials met, when they approached and embraced each other, and went through the whole prayer squarely, saying, "forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." This was an affecting scene, and, amid tears and rejoicings, the war of years was terminated forever. Dr. J. Porter.

11,340. RECORD, Life's. There is an invisible pen always writing over our heads, and making an exact register of all the transactions of our life. Not our public conduct only, and what we reckon the momentous parts of our life, but the indulgence of our private pleasures, the amusement of our secret thoughts and idle hours, shall be brought into account.

Blair.

11,341. RECREATION, Benefits of. Recreation is intended to the mind, as whetting is to the scythe, to sharpen the edge of it, which otherwise would grow dull and blunt. He, therefore, that spends his whole time in recreation, is ever whetting, never mowing; his grass may grow and his steed starve: as, contrarily, he that always toils and never recreates, is ever mowing, never whetting; laboring much to little purpose. As good no scythe as no edge. Then only doth the work go forward, when the scythe is so seasonably and moderately whetted, that it may cut, and so cut that it may have the help of sharpening. Bishop Hall.

11,342. RECREATION, Royal. Pope Leo the Tenth spent so much time at the chase, that his business was neglected, bulls and pardons were left unsigned, and serious losses were often incurred. Hartabus, king of Hircania spent his time in catching moles; Bias, king of Lydia, in stabbing frogs; Eropus, king of the Macedonians, in making little table lanterns, and the king of Parthia in sharpening the points of arrows and javelins. Mahomet, who subverted the empire of Greece, carved out wooden spoons, even when giving audience to ambassadors.

11,343. REDEMPTION, Experience of. A negro on the coast of Africa, became distressed about his soul. One day an English sailor heard his lamentations, and told him that he must go to England, and there he would hear of the Christian's God, who paid the debt. The negro resolved to follow this advice. After a long search to find a ship, he obtained leave to work his passage to England. On board the ship, and in the streets of London, he inquired in vain for the object of his search. The negro, asking "for the Christian's God dat pay de debt," was ridiculed as a fool, or pitied as a lunatic. One day a gentleman overheard him, and stopping to speak to him, told him if he would go to a certain place that evening, he would hear about the Christian's God. He went, and found that the gentleman who had spoken to him was himself the preacher. There he heard of the debt of sin; how Jesus had paid that debt, and, having paid it, invites poor, helpless sinners to come to him and find peace and rest. Before the sermon was finished, the poor negro started up in his seat, with clasped hands, and tears streaming down his sable cheeks, and those near him could hear him whisper, "Me have found him! Me have found him! the Christian's God dat pay de debt!"

11,344. REDEMPTION, Joy of. A minister, preaching from the text, "If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them, how should we then live?" said, "I knew a poor widow who had got into a little debt that was a burden upon her, which she could not remove, just as a sin is a debt or burden upon the conscience, which no man is able to cast off. Her language to herself was, 'How can I live with this burden? My little furniture, my all will be sold! I must go to the workhouse, where I must mix with bad people, who know not my Saviour, and who take his name in vain!' A benevolent individual, hearing of her distress, sent to the creditor, desiring him to bring a receipt in full, and he should have his money. He took the receipt and gave it to the widow. 'O,' said she, 'now I shall live! I shall live!'"

11,345. REDEMPTION, Light of. Suppose you are standing over against some palace, and it is near midnight. Forth from that palace gate there comes a procession: the prince has come forth, attended by many of his train. He has not gone far, however, before you hear that he has dropped a beautiful gem. He is anxious about that gem, not simply for its intrinsic value, but it was the gift of one he loved. He calls for lights. You never saw the prince in your life, and in that dim darkness you have not been able to see much, except a very imperfect outline of him. But now a lamp has come, and the prince, in his anxiety to find his gem, takes the lamp in his own hand, and there he is looking for the lost gem. Now the light which falls on the road where that gem is lying goes up into the face of the prince; and while he finds the gem, you see him as you never would have seen him but for that loss. Now it is like that with the revelation of God. When he came forth from the retirement of eternity for the salvation of souls, there was light which, while it was thrown on the poor lost sinner, that he might be found, was thrown upon the face of God, who came to seek him and to save him. Coley.

11,346. REDEMPTION, Prefigured. Nature is full of indications of divine attributes. Natural law, through all time, and round the world, conveys hints and germs of heaven, of hell, of vicarious suffering, and of remedial mercy. It teaches these four things. Disobey and suffer, obey and enjoy; these are its first and fundamental lessons, which are the rude seed-forms of those higher truths; purity and heaven, impurity and hell. Then throughout the world we see illustrations of the fact that one man can suffer for another. In the mother's suffering, and in the father's watch and care, the child grows out of impurity and rudeness into purity and gentleness. Vicarious suffering is a law of the household and of society. Remedial mercy is also a truth which nature hints. It is one of the eternal truths of God's nature. In the natural world, within certain bounds, a man's wrong-doing may be repaired, if he turn from his transgression and repent. There is provision for every bone to knit together again when fractured, for every muscle to heal when lacerated, and for every nerve when shattered and diseased to return again to health. Thus in nature we see prefigured the great scheme of redemption. Purity gives heaven; impurity eternal wail and woe. But there is vicarious suffering to bring men from the one to the other. If through Christ there be repentance and turning from evil, there is also health and restoration. And these things are indicated in nature—when we know how to see them there—but are authoritatively taught only in the New Testament. In nature they are as twilight, while in the gospel they glow with noonday brightness.

Beecher.

11,347. REDEMPTION, Ownership by. A benevolent gentleman went South some years ago and purchased a slave. When he returned to the North, he said to the man, "You are now free, you can go where you please." "But," said the slave, "I will stay with you." Supposing he was not understood, he again said, "You are free to go wherever you please." The man replied, "I will stay with you; you bought me, and paid the price with your money, and I shall stay and serve you: I do not wish to go anywhere else." So it is with me; I have been bought at a great price, and I do not wish to serve any one but Jesus. Wm. McAlister.

11,348. REDEMPTION, Wonder of. O my soul, a wonder above wonders—an incomprehensibility above all admiration—a depth past finding out! Under this shadow, O my soul, refresh thyself! If thy sins fear the hand of justice, behold thy Sanctuary; if thy offences tremble before the Judge, behold thy Advocate; if thy creditor threaten a prison, behold thy bail; behold the Lamb of God, that hath taken thy sins from thee; behold the Blessed of heaven and earth, that hath prepared a kingdom for thee. Be ravished, O my soul! O bless the name of Elohim! O bless the name of our Emmanuel with praises and eternal hallelujahs!

Quarles.

11,349. REFLECTION, Art of. Reader! you have been bred in a land abounding with men able in arts, learning, and knowledges manifold: this man in one, this in another; few in many, none in all. But there is one art of which every man should be a master—the art of reflection. If you are not a thinking man, to what purpose are you a man at all? In like manner, there is one knowledge which it is every man's duty and interest to acquire—namely, self-knowledge. Or to what end was man alone, of all animals, endued by the Creator with the faculty of self-consciousness?

Coleridge.

11,350. REFLECTION, Spiritual. When St. Athanasius sent for St. Pambo to leave the desert and come to Alexandria, the holy abbot saw a gaily-dressed actress in the streets; whereupon he began to weep. When he was asked why he did so, he answered, "Two things move me; one is the damnation of that woman; and another is, that I do not take as much pains to please God as she does to please wicked men." You see even sinful things were steps to God for him.

F. W. Faber.

11,351. REFORM, Abhorrence of. So it is and must be always, my dear boys. If the angel Gabriel were to come down from heaven and head a successful rise against the most abominable and unrighteous vested interest which this poor old world groans under, he would most certainly lose his character for many years, probably for centuries, not only with upholders of the said vested interest, but with the respectable mass of the people he had delivered. They wouldn't ask him to dinner, or let their names appear with his in the papers; they would be careful how they spoke of him in the palaver or at their clubs.

Hughes.

11,352. REFORM, Beginning of. Reform, like charity, must begin at home. Once well at home, how will it radiate outwards, irrepressible, into all that we touch and handle, speak and work; kindling ever new light by incalculable contagion, spreading, in geometric ratio, far and wide, doing good only wherever it spreads, and not evil.

Carlyle.

11,353. REFORM, Need of. Educate the people; enlighten, elevate the people; lift the people to the plane of your reform; prove to them that it is desirable and important, and it is secured. Reform! O, how much we need it! not on the banners of political parties, but in the hearts and consciences of the people; not on the lips, but in the lives, of politicians, not in promised legislation, but in present political action; not simply the management of government when obtained; but in the means and methods by which that management is sought.

Dr. J. A. M. Chapman.

11,354. REFORM, Religion and. A man of good parts and considerable culture fell under the influence of drink. A missionary found him friendless and desolate, rescued him from his degradation, and secured him a situation. After a little he fell into his former habits and lost his place. This experience was repeated many times during ten years, the missionary holding on to him, feeding and clothing him in need, and getting new places for him whenever he would reform for a short time. At length the inebriate began to feel deeply troubled about his sins. He had tried to reform, and failed so often and for such a long time, that he felt there was no hope for him. Then he turned to God for help, and was saved. From that hour his demon was cast out. He became a devoted and honored Christian man, prospered in business, and is a conspicuous example of the power of the religion of Christ to save the drunkard.

11,355. REFORMATION, Crisis of the. Luther's appearance at the Diet of Worms, on the 17th of April, 1521, may be considered as the greatest scene in modern European history; the point, indeed, from which the whole subsequent history of civilization takes its rise. The world's pomp and power sits there on this hand: on that stands up for God's truth one man, Hans Luther, the poor miner's son. It is, as we say, the greatest moment in the modern history of man. English Puritanism, England and its Parliaments, America's vast work these two centuries, French revolution, Europe and its work everywhere at present—the germ of it all lay there; had Luther in that moment done other, it had all been otherwise.

Carlyle.

11,356. REFORMATION, External. The custom prevails in Paris of giving old buildings a new appearance, by recutting the stones of the walls. By this means the church of St. Genevieve has recently been modernized and beautified. It is so identified with the bloody massacre of St. Bartholomew's, that no renovation can obliterate its foul blot; its stains will not out, nor its vile memories die. Old sinners seek to quiet their consciences in the same way. They recast and polish the outside with remarkable success, but the deep stains of guilt will not depart, except by the application of the blood of Christ. Beware of confounding reformation with conversion! Bloody memories cluster about the church of St. Genevieve, and bleaching bones fill its vaults, in spite of its external renovation.

11,357. REFUGE, Christ a. I remember a story in Alexander's wars, that when he came to besiege the Sogdians, a people who dwelt upon a rock, or had the literal munition of rocks for their defence, they jeered him and asked him whether his soldiers had wings or no. "Unless your soldiers can fly in the air, we fear you not." It is a most certain truth, when God exalts a people, he can set them upon a rock so high that, unless their adversaries have wings, and those more than eagles' wings, to soar higher than God himself, they are beyond annoyance. He carries his own upon eagles' wings; what wings, then, must they have who get above his people. Caryl.

11,358. REFUGE, Heathen. Among the first temples built after the founding of Rome was one to the God of Refuge, which they called the Temple of the Asylan God. This was always open to all who came. Here the slave was free from his master, the debtor from his creditor, and the murderer from the avenger of blood, or the magistrate. This asylum was preserved from all violation by direction of the oracle of Apollo.

11,359. REFUGE, Refusing. Often the trembling fugitive mistakes the fortress for a prison, and refuses to enter in. A single soldier in an enemy's country is crossing a plain in haste, and making towards a castle whose battlements appear in relief on the distant sky. A man, who appears a native of the place, joins him from a by-path, and asks with apparent kindness whither he is going. "To yonder fortress," says the soldier, "where my sovereign's army lies in strength." The stranger, under pretence of friendship, endeavors to persuade him that it is a prison. He is an emissary of the enemy, sent to detain the fugitive until it be too late, and then cut him off. In this way many are turned back from the place of refuge; the agents of the enemy under various disguises join themselves to them, and insinuate that to be seriously religious is to throw their liberty away. Wm. Arnot.

11,360. REFUGE, Where is? Many a criminal has fled over seas into inhospitable wilds or into other countries, to escape the just penalty for his crimes. The weakness of civil government has been his safety. But where shall he flee for refuge who has sinned against God, whose empire is the universe, and who, from his perfect nature, must recognize and punish the sin? Christ is the only appointed refuge.

11,361. REGENERATION, Effect of. Give me a man of passionate, abusive, headstrong temper, and with only a few of the words of God, I will make him as gentle as a lamb. Give me a greedy, covetous, selfish wretch, and I will teach him to distribute his riches with a liberal, unsparing hand. Give me a cruel blood-thirsty monster, and all his rage will be changed into love. Give me a man guilty of injustice, full of ignorance, and lost in wickedness, he shall soon become just, prudent and holy; in the single laver of regeneration he shall be cleansed from all his malignity. Lactantius.

11,362. REGENERATION, Feigned. A man's conversation may be civilized, when his heart is not evangelized. There is as much difference between nature restrained and nature renewed as between the glimmering of a glow-worm and the splendor of the noonday sun.

A bad man is certainly worse when he is seemingly best. We must not account every one a soldier who swaggers with the sword. A rusty scimitar may frequently be found in a highly-trimmed scabbard. What is it to have our hands as white as snow, if our hearts be as black as the bottomless pit? Such professors resemble curious bubbles, smooth and clear without, yet only filled with air. Secker.

11,363. REGENERATION, Need of. A countryman carried his gun to a gunsmith for repairs. The latter examined it, and, finding it too far gone for repairing, said, "Your gun is in a very worn-out, ruinous, good-for-nothing condition; what sort of repairing do you want for it?" "Well," said the countryman, "I don't see as I can do with anything short of a new stock, lock, and barrel; that ought to set it up again." "Why," said the smith, "you had better have a new gun altogether." "Ah!" was the reply, "I never thought of that; and it strikes me that is just what I do want. A new stock, lock, and barrel! Why, that's about equal to a new gun altogether, and that's what I'll have." Man finds himself in similar condition, and needs to be made new.

11,364. REGRETS, Fruitless. "I would give a thousand worlds, if I had them," said a reformed man at a temperance meeting; "if I could only blot out the consequences of my past conduct."

11,365. RELIGION, Argument for. My religion is very simple. I look at this universe, so vast, so complex, so magnificent, and I say to myself that it cannot be the result of chance, but the work, however intended, of an unknown omnipotent Being, as superior to man as the universe is superior to the finest machines of human invention. Search the philosophers, and you will not find a stronger or more decisive argument. Napoleon I.

11,366. RELIGION, Asylum of. It not unfrequently happens that men are found ready to reject religion in time of health and peace, who fly to it in times of sickness and peril. Eutropius, a high official in Constantinople, in the time of Chrysostom, caused a law to be passed denying the right of asylum to the altars of the churches, or those who fled to them for safety. By a revolution in the government he was soon after compelled to clasp the altar to save his life. Upon this Chrysostom said, "The altar is more powerful than ever, now that it holds the lion chained."

11,367. RELIGION, Bequeathing. The will of Patrick Henry closed with the following testimony to the value of the Christian religion: "I have now disposed of all my property to my family. There is one more thing I wish I could give them, and that is the Christian religion. If they had that, and I had not given them one shilling, they would be rich; and if they had not that, and I had given them all the world, they would be poor."

11,368. RELIGION, Business Advantage of. A young countryman, with strong marks of rusticity upon him, came to New York to engage in business. The first Sabbath he went down to the old Wall-street church, and was invited by Robert Lenox, afterwards president of the Bible Society, to a seat in his pew. The next morning he started with letters of introduction, which he brought with him to buy leather to start shoemaking. He asked for credit, and was in return asked for references. He thought he could furnish them, as his father had some acquaintances in the city. The merchant asked: "Did I not see you yesterday in Mr. Lenox's pew?" "I don't know, sir. I was at church, and a kind gentleman asked me to sit in his pew." "Yes, young man, that was Robert Lenox. I'll trust any one that Mr. Lenox invites into his pew. You need not trouble yourself about references; when the goods are gone come and get more." The young man became a prominent and successful merchant, and always attributed his success to his attending church on his first Sunday in New York.

11,369. RELIGION, Defaming. How common it is for men first to throw dirt in the face of religion, and then persuade themselves it is its natural complexion! They represent it to themselves in a shape least pleasing to them, and then bring that as a plea why they give it no better entertainment.

Stillington.

11,370. RELIGION, Devotees of. God does not look for the chief confession of his name from beneath the cathedral's fretted roof, but from the commonest paths and homes of life; not from surpliced ministers or chanting choirs, but from men in their coats, their hosen, and their hats. Sublimar deeds of heroism have been done in coat, and hosen, and hat, than in the warrior's mail; and the histories of heaven are fuller of what has been done in the common walks of life, than of what has been done in the battle-field.

Power.

11,371. RELIGION, Difficulties of. Difficulty is a relative thing. The subject that is difficult to one mind is mere rudiment to another. The A B C of Newton are inscrutable enigmas to the mass, and that which stretched beyond the grasp of the great astronomer, may be the simplest elements in the knowledge of an angel. What is mystery to an angel is alphabet to God. Yes, and even to the same mind, subjects once most difficult become most plain. That which overtaken our energies at school is too easy for effort now. Interminable ages of progression are before us. The present intellectual mountains will dwindle into particles as we advance—particles of light streaming a radiance on our future steps.

Dr. Thomas.

11,372. RELIGION, Effects of. Oh, the wonders it will accomplish! It wipes guilt from the conscience, rolls the world out of the heart, and darkness from the mind. It will brighten the most gloomy scene, smooth the most rugged path, and cheer the most despairing mind. It will put honey into the bitterest cup, and health into the most diseased soul. It will give hope to the heart, health to the face, oil to the head, light to the eye, strength to the hand, and swiftness to the foot. It will make life pleasant, labor sweet, and death triumphant. It gives faith to the fearful, courage to the timid, and strength to the weak. It robs the grave of its terrors, and death of its sting. It subdues sin, severs from self, makes faith strong, love active, hope lively, and zeal invincible. It gives sonship for slavery, robes for rags, makes the cross light, and reproach pleasant; it will transform a dungeon into a palace, and make the fires of martyrdom as refreshing as the cool breeze of summer. It snaps legal bonds, loosens the soul, clarifies the mind, purifies the affections, and often lifts the saint to the very gates of heaven. . . . No man can deserve it; money cannot buy it, or good deeds procure it; grace reigns here!

Balforn.

11,373. RELIGION, Espousing. Wolf relates that a knight was engaged in a game of ball, and desiring to relieve himself of his ring, he placed it upon the finger of a statue of the Virgin. On returning for it he found the hand of the image firmly clasped, and the ring immovable. He interpreted the marvel as a call to the religious life. He considered himself espoused to the Virgin, renounced the world and entered a monastery.

11,374. RELIGION, Force of. You have seen a noble vessel going forth from the docks. The tide was in her favor, and away she went, sailing gallantly along, the admiration of all. She was, however, dependent upon outward influences. But you have seen a steamer, starting perhaps from the same place; if the tide was in her favor, so much the better, but whether or not, on she went, for she had a moving power, a "kingdom within;" and religion is just such an influence.

Dr. Jenkyn.

11,375. RELIGION, Gifts for. The similitude of those who lay out their substance for advancing the religion of God, is as a grain of corn which produceth seven ears, and every ear a hundred grains.

Koran.

11,376. RELIGION, Half Way. It is this half way religion that undoes the professing world. The heart can never be at unity with itself till it is wholly centered in God.

Whitefield.

11,377. RELIGION, Honorary. Vespasian determined upon the restoration of the sacred buildings, and the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. He carried timber upon his own back, wrought in the foundations with his own hands, and thought it not dishonoring to work on anything that concerned the worship of the gods.

11,378. RELIGION, Importance of. Religion, the final centre of repose; the goal to which all things tend, which gives to time all its importance, to eternity all its glory; apart from which man is a shadow, his very existence a riddle, and the stupendous scenes which surround him as incoherent and unmeaning as the leaves which the sibyl scattered in the wind.

Robert Hall.

11,379. RELIGION, Man without. Man without religion is like a leaky vessel without hands on the tempestuous ocean. Sin has already made a destructive inroad in his nature, and the tide of corruption is daily flowing in, and filling his soul; he is tossed about without aid on the boisterous ocean of the world, till at last he breaks to pieces, and sinks to rise no more. He is a ship without a pilot—a vessel without a rudder. Salter.

11,380. RELIGION, Method in. There is a great difference betwixt the sight of the several parts of a clock or watch, as they are disjointed and scattered abroad, and the seeing of them conjoined, and in use and motion. To see here a pin and there a wheel, and not know how to set them altogether, nor even see them in their due places, will give but little satisfaction. It is the frame and design of holy doctrine that must be known, and every part should be discerned as it hath its particular use to that design, and as it is connected with the other parts. Flavel.

11,381. RELIGION, Mixture of. The use of silk is prohibited to Mohammedans by law, it being considered an excrement. They avoid the interdict by mixing the least possible quantity of cotton with it. Religion is fashionable in these times, but it is taken only in the smallest quantities. A very thin coating will satisfy the worldly and fashionable heart, and the thinner the more satisfaction. A little religion seems enough in many minds to sanctify falsehood, pride, dishonesty, and general unreliability, and a large profession of religion seems enough to cover every conceivable offence.

11,382. RELIGION, Price of. Whitefield, preaching in Philadelphia, cried out in the midst of the sermon, "I am going to turn merchant to-day. I have valuable commodities to offer for sale, but I say not, as your merchants do, If you will come up to my price, I'll sell to you; but, if you will come down to my price; for if you have a farthing to bring you cannot be a purchaser." They were urged to "buy the truth;" to "buy wine and milk without money and without price."

11,383. RELIGION, Rekindled. The sacred fire among the Greeks was kept constantly burning in the temples at Athens and in Delphi. Provision was made that if by any cause it should be extinguished, as when the temple was burned, or as when in Rome, the very altar was overturned in war, it should be rekindled only by the flame drawn from the pure rays of the sun. Religion in the soul must be kindled by rays from the sun of righteousness, and rekindled in the same way.

11,384. RELIGION, Riches and. Religion brings forth riches, but the daughter devours the mother. Anon.

11,385. RELIGION, Romish. During all the ages of papal domination in Europe a religious person "did not mean any one who felt and allowed the bonds that bound him to God and his fellow men, but one who had taken peculiar vows upon him, a member of one of the monkish orders; a 'religious house' did not mean, nor does it now mean in the Church of Rome, a Christian household, ordered in the fear of God, but a house in which those persons were gathered together according to the rule of some man, Benedict or Dominic, or some other. A

'religion' meant not a service of God, but an order of monkery; and taking the monastic vows was termed going into a 'religion.' Now what an awful light does this one word so used throw on the entire state of mind and habits of thought in those ages! That then was 'religion,' and nothing else was deserving of the name! And 'religious' was a title which might not be given to parents and children, husbands and wives, men and women fulfilling faithfully and holily in the world the several duties of their stations, but only to those who had devised self-chosen service for themselves." Trench.

11,386. RELIGION, Sunday. To many of us, alas! our religion is like a stop in an organ which we can pull out "and shut off" at our own will. On Sunday mornings we pull it out, "and for a time it discourses excellent music;" but we push it in on Sunday evenings, and use it no more till the week has run out. Religion is only the Sunday stop in the organ of our life. S. Cox.

11,387. RELIGION, Testing. In the ninth century an enthusiastic Scandinavian chief named Herringar was converted, and proposed to put the boasted power of the gods of his heathen neighbors to the proof. He said, "Lo, the rainy season is at hand; call ye upon your gods that the rain may be restrained from falling upon you, and I will call on my God, Jesus Christ, that no drop fall on me; and the god that answereth our prayers let him be god." They agreed to this. Herringar and a little child took one side of a field, and his heathen neighbors the other. In a few moments rain fell in torrents upon the heathen, while on Herringar not a drop fell. He then exhorted them to accept Christ thus shown to be the true God.

11,388. RELIGION, Transformation by. A degraded man, idle, ragged, and barefoot, who spent his Sabbaths in hunting and fishing, had a family of similar character, the disgrace of the neighborhood. A change came over all. The father became a Christian and a respectable man. His family could not be recognized, so great was the change. His house and home was entirely transformed. This miracle has religion wrought in thousands of instances.

11,389. RELIGION, True. Claude, the celebrated French minister, said on his death-bed, "I have carefully examined all religions. No one appears to me worthy of the wisdom of God, and capable of leading men to happiness, but the Christian religion. I have diligently studied Popery and Protestantism. The Protestant is, I think, the only good religion. It is all founded on the Holy Scriptures, the word of God. From this, as from a fountain, all religion must be drawn. Scripture is the root, the Protestant religion is the trunk and branches of the tree. It becomes you all to keep steady to it."

11,390. REMEMBRANCE, Proper Use of. What man should learn is, to reject all that is useless in remembrance, and to retain with cheerfulness all that can profit and amend. Forget not thy sins, that thou mayest sorrow and repent; remember death, that thou mayest sin no more; remember the judgment of God, that thou mayest justly fear; and never forget his mercy, that thou mayest never be led to despair.

Petrarch.

11,391. REMORSE, Beginning of. Sin and hedgehogs are born without spikes, but how they prick and wound after their birth we all know. The most unhappy being is he who feels remorse before the (sinful) deed, and brings forth a sin already furnished with teeth in its birth, the bite of which is soon prolonged into an incurable wound of the conscience.

Richter.

11,392. REMORSE in Death. Behold all the gloomy apartments opening, in which the wicked have died; contemplate first the triumphs of iniquity, and here behold their close; witness the terrific faith, the too late repentance, the prayers suffocated by despair, and the mortal agonies! These once they would not believe; they refused to consider them; they could not allow that the career of crime and pleasure was to end. But now truth, like a blazing star, darts over the mind, and but shows the way to that "darkness visible" which no light can cheer. "Dying wretch!" we say in imagination to each of these, "is religion true? Do you believe in a God, and another life, and a retribution?" "Oh, yes!" he answers, and expires.

John Foster.

11,393. REMORSE, Described. Conscience is God's officer and vicegerent in man; set by him to be, as it were, thy angel, keeper, monitor, remembrancer, king, prophet, examiner, judge—yea, thy lower heaven. If thou slightest it, it will be an adversary, informer, accuser, witness, judge, jailer, tormentor, a worm, rack, dungeon, unto thee—yea, thy upper hell!

Dr. Fuller.

11,394. REMORSE, Horror of. Tiberius felt the remorse of conscience so violent, that he protested to the senate that he suffered death daily. Richard III., after the murder of his two innocent nephews, had fearful dreams and visions; insomuch that he did often leap out of his bed in the dark, and catching his sword, which, always naked, stuck by his side, he would go distractedly about the chamber, everywhere seeking to find out the cause of his own occasioned disquiet. It is as proper for sin to raise fears in the soul, as for rotten flesh and wood to breed worms. That worm that never dies is bred here in the froth of filthy lusts and flagitious courses, and lies gnawing and grubbing upon men's inwards, many times in the ruff of all their jollity. This makes Saul call for a minstrel, Belshazzar for his carousing cups, Cain for his workmen to build him a city, others for other of the devil's anodynes, to put by the pangs of their wounded spirits and throbbing consciences. Charles IX., after the massacre of France, could never endure to be awakened in the night without music, or some like diversion; he became as terrible to himself as formerly he had been to others.

Trapp.

11,395. REMORSE, Occasions for. A man can not spend all his life in frolic: age, or disease, or solitude, will bring some hours of serious consideration, and it will then afford no comfort to think that he has extended the dominion of vice; that he has loaded himself with the crimes of others, and can never know the extent of his own wickedness, or make reparation for the mischief that he has caused. There is not perhaps in all the stores of ideal anguish a thought more painful than the consciousness of having propagated corruption by vitiating principles; of having not only drawn others from the path of virtue, but blocked up the way by which they should return; of having blinded them to every beauty but the paint of pleasure, and deafened them to every call but the alluring voice of the sirens of destruction.

Dr. S. Johnson.

11,396. REMORSE, Power of. Rev. Benjamin Abbott, a very searching preacher of New Jersey, in the midst of a scathing indictment of crime, cried out, "For aught I know, there may be a murderer in this congregation." A large man in the audience rose and ran for the door, exclaiming, "I am the murderer; I killed a man fifteen years ago." At the door he thought himself met by two men with drawn swords, who were trying to stab him. He turned back and threw himself upon the floor, crying out in great agony.

11,397. REMORSE, Stings of. There is no man that is knowingly wicked but is guilty to himself; and there is no man that carries guilt about him, but he receives a sting into his soul.

Tillotson.

11,398. REMORSE, Unendurable. A man and his wife were executed at Augsburg for a murder committed twenty-one years before. Wincke, a lawyer, removed to Augsburg, where he became intimate in the family of M. Glegg, to whose daughter he paid his addresses; but the old gentleman not sanctioning his visits, he met the daughter privately and persuaded her, in order to remove the only obstacle to their union, to administer poison to her father. The horrid plan succeeded; no suspicions were entertained, and their union put him in possession of the old man's wealth. During a period of twenty-one years they lived externally happy, but in secret a prey to the greatest remorse. At length, unable to endure any longer the weight of guilt, the wife made confession of the particulars of the crime, and both were punished.

11,399. REPENTANCE, Analogy of. Suppose I am to go down to Boston to-night, and I go down to the Union depot and say to a man I see there, "Can you tell me, is this train going to Boston?" and the man says, "Yes," and I go and get on board the train, and Mr. Dodge comes along and says, "Where are you going?" I say, "I am going to Boston," and Mr. Dodge says, "Well, you are on the wrong train, that train is going to Albany." "But, Mr. Dodge, I am quite sure I am right; I asked a railroad man here, and he told me this was the train." And Mr. Dodge says, "Moody, I know all about these trains; I have lived here 40 years, and go up and down on these trains every day," and at last Mr. Dodge convinces me I am on the wrong train. That is conviction, not conversion. But if I don't remain on that train, but just get into the other train, that is repentance. Just to change trains—that is repentance.

Moody.
11,400. REPENTANCE, Ceaseless. "Sir," said a young man to Philip Henry, "how long should a man go on repenting? How long, Mr. Henry, do you mean to go on repenting yourself?" He replied, "Sir, I hope to carry my repentance to the very gates of heaven. Every day I find I am a sinner, and every day I need to repent. I mean to carry my repentance, by God's help, up to the very gates of heaven." Reader, may this be our divinity, your divinity, my divinity; your theology, my theology! May repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ be Jachin and Boaz—the two great pillars before the temple of our religion, the corner-stones in our system of Christianity! (2 Chron. 3: 17.)

Ryle.
11,401. REPENTANCE at Death. There is one case of death-bed repentance recorded—the penitent thief—that no one should despair; and only one, that no one should presume.

St. Augustine.
11,402. REPENTANCE, Death-Bed. A minister of long experience and careful observation, visited more than two thousand persons apparently in a dying condition, who manifested such signs of penitence as to encourage hope of their salvation. These were restored to health, and nothing less than Christian lives could have been expected of them, but only two out of two thousand manifested a saving change. How unreliable are sick-bed manifestations!

11,403. REPENTANCE, Delaying. When men feel sickness arresting, then they fear death is approaching. But we begin to die as soon as ever we begin to live. Every man's passing-bell hangs in his own steeple. Take him in his four elements, of earth, air, fire, and water. In the earth, he is as fleeting dust; in the air, he is as disappearing vapor; in the water, he is as a breaking bubble; and in the fire, he is as consuming smoke. Many think not of living any holier, till they can live no longer; but one to-day is worth two to-morrows. Reader, you know not how soon the sails of your life may be rolled up, or how nigh you are to your eternal haven; and if you have not Jesus as your pilot within you, you will suffer an eternal shipwreck.

Secker.
11,404. REPENTANCE, Early. The more we number our days, the fewer sins we shall have to number. As a copy is then safest from blotting when dust is put upon it, so are we from sinning when, in the time of our youth, we remember that we are but dust. The tears of young penitents do more scorch the devils than all the flames of hell; for hereby all their hopes are blasted, and the great underminer countermined and blown up. Mane is the devil's verb; he bids tarry, time enough to repent; but mane is God's adverb; he bids repent early, in the morning of thy youth, for then thy sins will be fewer and lesser. Well young men, remember this: he that will not at first hand buy good counsel cheap, shall at the second-hand buy repentance over dear.

Brooks.
11,405. REPENTANCE, Exhortation to. Oh! that I did know what arguments would persuade you; and what words would work thy heart hereto. If I were sure it would prevail, I would come down from the pulpit, and go from man to man upon my knees, with the request and advice in the text: "Oh! kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and you perish."

Baxter.
11,406. REPENTANCE, Fable of. A kite, who had been long very ill, said to his mother, "Don't cry, mother, but go and pray to the gods that I may recover from this dreadful disease and pain." "Alas! child," said the mother, "which of the gods can I entreat for one who has robbed all their altars?" A death-bed repentance is poor amends for the errors of a life-time.

Æsop.
11,407. REPENTANCE, Faith and. Repentance is Faith's usher, and dews all her way with tears. Repentance reads the law and weeps; Faith reads the gospel and comforts. Repentance looks on the rigorous brow of Moses; Faith beholds the sweet countenance of Christ Jesus.

T. Adams.
11,408. REPENTANCE, Forced. It is said by some that so soon as the soul of the sinner is separated from sense, and experiences in the next world the evil consequences of sin, those evil consequences will lead to repentance. We answer that repentance, in view of the experience of evil or the fear of evil, is repentance toward self, not toward God. The more men repent from an experience of evil consequences, the more they are damned. The thief always repents when the sheriff arrests him. Death forces many men to submit, others to repent. Such repentance is by necessity; or in view of consequences, not in view of God's goodness and of the evil of sin. Some weak people talk of repentance on the gallows. Dying sinners and murderers often repent, but it is a repentance forced in view of the termination of their moral agency. In this world, "repentance toward God" works by reformation; and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ works by love. In the world of doom, when moral probation is ended, repentance, by the necessity of the case, works by remorse; and faith by trembling.

Walker.
11,409. REPENTANCE, Method of. You might pound a lump of ice with a pestle into a thousand fragments, but it would still cor tinue ice. But bring it in beside your own bright and blazing fire, and soon, in that genial glow, the living waters flow. A man may try to make himself contrite. He may search out his sins, and dwell on all their enormity, and still feel no true repentance. But come to Jesus with his words of grace and truth. Let that frozen spirit bask in the beams of the sun of righteousness—then will it melt.

Dr. J. Hamilton

11,410. REPENTANCE, Peter's. Peter falls dreadfully, but rises by repentance sweetly; a look of love from Christ melts him into tears. He knew that repentance was the key to the kingdom of grace. As once his faith was so great that he leapt, as it were, into a sea of waters, to come to Christ; so now his repentance was so great that he leapt, as it were, into a sea of tears, for that he had gone from Christ. Some say that, after his sad fall, he was ever and anon weeping, and that his face was even furrowed with continual tears. He had no sooner taken in poison, but he vomited it up again, ere it got to the vitals; he had no sooner handled this serpent, but he turned it into a rod to scourge his soul with remorse for sinning against such clear light, and strong love, and sweet discoveries of the heart of Christ to him. Clement notes that Peter so repented, that all his life after, every night when he heard the cock crow, he would fall upon his knees, and, weeping bitterly, would beg pardon for his sin. Ah, souls, you can easily sin as the saints, but can you repent with the saints?

11,411. REPENTANCE, Preaching. Rev. Philip Henry often preached on the doctrine of faith and repentance. He used to say that he had been told concerning the famous Mr. Dod, that some called him in scorn, faith and repentance; because he insisted so much in these two in all his preaching. "But," says he, "if this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile, for faith and repentance are all in all in Christianity. If I were to die in the pulpit, I would desire to die preaching repentance; or if I die out of the pulpit, I would desire to die practicing repentance."

11,412. REPENTANCE, Public. The Moham-medan account of the preaching of Jonah to the Ninevites says that he exhorted them to repentance, and threatened them with destruction in three days if they disregarded his call. They scorned him, and cast him out of the city. Near the end of the time, a great black cloud, charged with fire, which filled the air with smoke, hung over their city, and filled them with consternation. Then they went into the fields, put sackcloth upon themselves, their children and their cattle, and sincerely repenting, asked God to forgive them. God heard their prayer, and the storm passed over.

11,413. REPENTANCE, Self-Condernnation of. To repent is to accuse and condemn ourselves; to charge upon ourselves the desert of hell; to take part with God against ourselves, and to justify him in all that he does against us; to be ashamed and confounded for our sins; to have them ever in our eyes, and at all times upon our hearts, that we may be in daily sorrow for them; to part with our right hands and eyes, that is, with those pleasurable sins which have been as dear to us as our lives, so as never to have to do with them more, and to hate them, so as to destroy them as things which by nature we are wholly disinclined to. For we naturally love and think well of ourselves, hide our deformities, lessen and excuse our faults, indulge ourselves in the things that please us, are mad upon our lusts, and follow them, though to our own destruction.

Francis Fuller.

11,414. REPENTANCE, True. Like Janus Bifrons, the Roman god looking two ways, a true repentance not only bemoans the past but takes heed to the future. Repentance, like the lights of a ship at her bow and her stern, not only looks to the track she has made, but to the path before her. A godly sorrow moves the Christian to weep over the failure of the past, but his eyes are not so blurred with tears but that he can look watchfully into the future, and profiting by the experience of former failures make straight paths for his feet.

Pilkington.

11,415. REPENTANCE, Waiting for. He that waits for repentance waits for that which cannot be had as long as it is waited for. It is absurd for a man to wait for that which he himself has to do.

Nevins.

11,416. REPETITION, Advantage of. A garment that is double-dyed, dipped again and again, will retain the color a great while.

Philip Henry.

11,417. REPETITION, Use of. "He must be a poor creature," says Holmes, "that does not often repeat himself. Imagine the author of the excellent piece of advice, 'Know thyself,' never alluding to that sentiment again during the course of a protracted existence! Why, the truths a man carries about with him are his tools; and do you think a carpenter is bound to use the same plane but once to smooth a knotty board with, or to hang up his hammer after it has driven its first nail? I shall never repeat a conversation, but an idea often. I shall use the same types when I like, but not commonly the same stereotypes. A thought is often original, though you have uttered it a hundred times. It has come to you over a new route, and by a new and express train of associations."

11,418. REPRIEVE, Reception of a. Rev. J. Denham Smith, of England, obtained a reprieve from the Queen for a man who was sentenced to be hung. He was in the greatest haste to reach the man, and anxious as to how he should break the good news to him who was already dead in law, and who had, as he supposed, bidden his last farewell to his wife and children. Admitted to him he said, "My poor man, can you read?" "Yes," was the reply. Fearing to break the royal pardon to him too suddenly, he added, "Would you like your life?" "Sir," he responds, "do not trifle with me." "But life is sweet; is it not?" "Sir, I had rather you would not speak to me." "But would you not like me to procure your life?" "It is of no use, sir; I'm justly condemned. I'm a dead man." "But the Queen could give you your life." He looked inquiringly, but was silent. "Can you read this?" said Mr. Smith. When he learned of his reprieve he dropped down at the messenger's feet, and lay insensible. It was more than he could bear. Mr. Smith says: "What! when a man to whom a reprieve is announced, granting him a few more short years of natural life, falls down as dead, may not a sinner, who finds he is not to be lost, but that on believing he is saved; he has Christ, and heaven, and everlasting life; I say, may not he weep? Yea, cry? Cry for joy!"

11,419. REPROOF, Discretion in. Discretion in the choice of seasons for reproof, is no less necessary than zeal and faithfulness in reproof. Good mariners do not hoist up sail in every wind.

11,420. REPROOF, Misplaced. We ought not to discover the imperfections of an husband before his wife, nor of a father before his children, nor of a lover in company of his mistress, nor of masters in presence of their scholars, or the like; for it touches a man to the quick to be rebuked before those whom he would have think honorably of him. They who aim at the interest and reformation of their friends rather than ostentation and popularity, ought, among other things, to beware of exposing them too publicly.

11,421. REPROOF, Penalty for. Aratus, a Sycionian, by his valor freed and restored his country to liberty; but King Philip caused him to be put to death by poison, because he had with too great freedom reprehended the king for his faults.

11,422. REPROOF, Where to Begin. Fredericus, a newly-consecrated bishop of Utrecht, was at a feast given by the Emperor Ludovicus Pius. The emperor told the bishop "he must remember to deal justly as in the sight of God, in the way of his vocation, without respect of persons." "Your majesty gives me good advice," said he, "but will you please to tell me whether I had best to begin, with this fish upon my plate, at the head or the tail?" "At the head," said the emperor, "for that is the more noble part." "Then, sir," said the bishop, "I commence with you." He then administered a terrible rebuke, which was not only well received, but improved upon.

11,423. REPUBLIC, Elements of Permanence in a. The seven wise men of Greece being asked what are the elements of perpetuity in a republic, answered severally. Solon: "I hold that city or state happy, and most likely to remain democratic, in which those that are not personally injured are yet as forward to question and correct wrong-doers as is that person who is immediately wronged." Bias added: "Where all fear the law as they fear a tyrant." Thirdly, Thales said: "Where the citizens are neither too rich nor too poor." Fourthly, Anacharsis said: "Where, though in all other respects they are equals, yet virtuous men are advanced and vicious men degraded." Fifthly, Cleobulus said: "Where the rulers fear reproof, and shame more than the law." Sixthly, Pittacus said: "Where bad men are prohibited from ruling, and good men from not ruling." Chilo, pausing a little while, determined that the best and most durable state was where the subjects minded the law most and the orators least.

11,424. REPUBLICS, Advantage of. In republics the advantages are—liberty, or exemption from needless restrictions, equal laws, regulations adapted to the wants and circumstances of the people, public spirit, frugality, averseness to war, the opportunities which democratic assemblies afford to men of every description of producing their abilities and counsels to public observation, and the exciting thereby and calling forth to the service of the commonwealth, the faculties of its best citizens.

11,425. REPULSE, Bearing. Diogenes went to all the statues in the Ceramicus begging. When asked the import of his strange action, he said he was practising how to bear a repulse.

11,426. REPUTATION, Benefits of. Reputation is one of the prizes for which men contend; it is, as Mr. Burke calls it, "the cheap defence and ornament of nations, and the nurse of many exertions;" it produces more labor and more talent than twice the wealth of a country could ever rear up. It is the coin of genius; and it is the imperious duty of every man to bestow it with the most scrupulous justice and the wisest economy.

11,427. REPUTATION, Good. Your innocence, by God's grace, no one can take from you without your own consent; but the fruit of a fair reputation, so beautiful and fragrant, and in all respects so precious, this, alas! hangs exposed to the assault of every passenger; the lowest, as he goes along, can fling a stone upwards, and laugh to see the prize fall, though he cannot gather it. We have an account of a certain tribe of savages who are possessed of a persuasion, that whenever they have slain a man, they are immediately endowed with all his good qualities; which they think are transfused from the soul of the dead unto the person that has killed him. You will not wonder that murders are frequent in that country; and that it is very dangerous for a man of merit to be found unguarded among people of such principles.

11,428. REPUTATION, Symbol of. A Turk, it is said, took a piece of white cloth to a dyer to have it dyed black. He was so pleased with the result that after a time he went to him with a piece of black cloth, and asked to have it made white. But the dyer answered: "A piece of white cloth is like a man's reputation; it can be dyed black, but you cannot make it white again."

11,429. RESCUE, Remarkable. Rev. Richard Boardman, one of the first Wesleyan missionaries to America, before his coming here went to preach at Mould, in Flintshire, England. His way lay along the sands by the sea-shore, and was safe enough at low tide. The tide closed in upon him so that he could go neither forward nor backward, and high rocks cut off escape by land. He gave himself up for lost, and commended his soul to God. Two men came running down a hill across the water, and taking a boat rescued him, just as the water reached his knees as he sat in the sad dle. His horse swam to land by the side of the boat. While in the boat, one of the men said, "Surely, sir, God is with you." He answered, "I trust he is." The man replied, "I know he is;" and then related the following circumstance. "Last night I dreamed that I must go to the top of such a hill. When I awoke, the dream made such an impression on my mind that I could not rest. I therefore went and called upon this man to accompany me. When we came to the place, we saw nothing more than usual. However, I begged him to go to another hill at a small distance; and there we saw your distressed situation." God had other work for Boardman, and preserved him for it.

11,430. RESCUE, A Sinner's. A shoemaker dug a well about twelve feet deep, near his house, which caved in before its completion, leaving an irregular hole with sloping sides. One day his son fell into it, and with all his efforts could not climb out. Filled with alarm he cried loudly to his father for help. His father heard him, and climbing down the sloping sides of the pit, reached down a strap to his boy, saying, "Take hold." He did so and was quickly lifted out. The sinner is in a pit and cannot extricate himself. If he but cry to the heavenly Father, he will reach down his promises, upon which he may take hold and be lifted to a place of safety.

11,431. RESIGNATION, Christian. Fenelon, gazing upon the remains of his illustrious pupil, the Duke of Burgundy, as he lay dead in his coffin, said, "There lies my beloved prince, for whom my affection was equal to the tenderest parent. Nor was my affection lost; he loved me in return with the ardor of a son. There he lies, and all my worldly happiness lies dead with him. But if the turning of a straw would call him back to life, I would not, for ten thousand worlds, be the turner of that straw, in opposition to the will of God."

11,432. RESIGNATION, Example of. An Indian, descending the Niagara river, was thrown into the rapids above the sublime cataract. The nursing of the desert rowed with an incredible vigor at first, in an intense struggle for life. Seeing his efforts useless, he dropped his oars, sung his death-song and floated in calmness down the abyss! His example is worthy of the imitation of all. While there is hope; let us nerve all our force to avail ourselves of all the chances it suggests. When hope ceases, and peril must be braved, wisdom counsels calm resignation. Dion.

11,433. RESIGNATION, Light of. True resignation, which always brings with it the confidence that unchangeable goodness will make even the disappointment of our hopes and the contradictions of life conducive to some benefit, casts a grave but tranquil light over the prospect of even a toilsome and troubled life. Humboldt.

11,434. RESIGNATION, Prayer and. A boy lost a valuable and much-prized ring, at which he was very much grieved. He prayed about it. His sister said, "What is the use of praying about a ring? will praying bring it back?" He replied, "No, sister, perhaps not, but it has done this for me; it has made me quite willing to do without the ring if it is God's will; and is not that almost as good as having it?"

11,435. RESOLUTION, Example of. Fulgentius was reared amid the luxuries of a senatorial family at Carthage, and lived about the end of the fourth century. He had wealth and office, but renounced all for a monastic life. The abbot to whom he applied repulsed him, saying, "Go and first learn to live in the world, abstracted from its pleasures. Who can suppose that you, relinquishing a life of softness and ease, can take up with our coarse diet and clothing, and inure yourself to our watchings and fastings." The young nobleman replied, "He who hath inspired me with the will to serve him can also furnish me with courage and strength." His resolute reply gained him admission to the monastery. His mother was greatly grieved, and presenting herself before the gates, cried out, "Faustus, restore to me my son, to the people their governor. The church always protects widows; why, then, do you rob me of my son?" This she repeated for many days, till she saw that her son's resolution was unalterable. He lived a devout life, and is reputed to have wrought many miracles, and holds a place in the saint's calendar for Jan. 1st.

11,436. RESOLUTION, Successful. Sheridan, the orator, believed in himself, and this self-confidence doubtless contributed to the failure of his first effort in Parliament, which was utter and apparently irretrievable. His friends considered him a hopeless failure, and advised him to seek some new field. He replied, "It is in me, and it shall come out." In the dark hour of defeat he resolved upon success, and won it.

11,437. RESPECT, Personal. Whenever we can bring a man to have a proper respect for himself, that moment we have secured him against the commission of any heinous crime.

Halliday.
11,438. RESPECT, Preservation of. Not only study that those with whom you live should habitually respect you, but cultivate such manners as will secure the respect of persons with whom you occasionally converse. Keep up the habit of being respected, and do not attempt to be more amusing and agreeable than is consistent with the preservation of respect.

S. Smith.
11,439. RESPIRATION, Process of. It appears that when respiration is performed naturally, there are about 18 respirations in one minute, 1,080 in the hour, and 25,920 in the 24 hours. By each inspiration a pint of air is sent to the lungs—that is, 18 pints in a minute; in the hour more than two hogsheads, and in the 24 hours more than 57 hogsheads. When the body is in a state of health, there will be 72 pulsations of the heart in one minute. Every pulsation sends to the lungs two ounces of blood. Thus, 146 ounces, about an imperial gallon, are sent to the lungs, for the purpose of arterialization, or purification, every minute. In one hour there are sent 450 pints, in 24 hours nearly 11,000 pints. The blood performs a complete circuit in the system in 110 seconds, and 540 circuits in 24 hours. There are three complete circulations of the blood in every eight minutes of time. The object of this beautiful arrangement is to ventilate the blood. A constant supply of fresh air is an absolute necessity of our nature. If we are deprived of it, we die at once; if the air is vitiated, we suffer languor, which very often results in disease.

Dr. S. Smith.

11,440. RESPONSIBILITY, Individual. Princes and kings—poor men and peasants, all alike must attend to the wants of their own bodies, and their own minds. No man can eat, drink, or sleep, by proxy. No man can get the alphabet learned for him by another. All these are things which everybody must do for himself, or they will not be done at all. Just as it is with the mind and body, so it is with the soul. There are certain things absolutely needful to the soul's health and well being. Each must attend to these things for himself. Each must repent for himself. Each must apply to Christ for himself. And for himself each must speak to God, and pray. You must do it for yourself, for by nobody else can it be done.

Ryle.

11,441. RESPONSIBILITY, Moral. To be morally responsible, a man must be a free, rational, moral agent. First, he must be in present possession of his reason to distinguish truth from falsehood. Secondly, he must also have in exercise a moral sense to distinguish right from wrong. Thirdly, his will, in its volitions or executive acts, must be self-determined—that is, determined by its own spontaneous affections and desires. If any of these are wanting, the man is insane, and neither free nor responsible.

Prof. Hodge.

11,442. RESPONSIBILITY, Necessity of. If the master takes no account of his servants, they will make small account of him, and care not what they spend, who are never brought to an audit.

Fuller.

11,443. REST, Disturbance of. I know that even the big planet, while it sweeps on in its pathway of light, thrills with a disturbing tremor if any foreign object swims across its orbit; and similarly I know, place anything between the heart and Christ, there will be, not utter "falling" from "the way," but certain disturbance of the calm of the resting soul that hath found rest in him.

Grosart.

11,444. REST, Emblem of. A ship's compass adjusted as to keep its level amidst all the heavings of the sea. Though forming part of a structure that feels every motion of the restless waves, it has an arrangement of its own that keeps it always in place, and in working order. Look at it when you will, it is pointing, trembling perhaps, but truly, to the pole. So each soul in this life needs an adjustment of its own, that amid the fluctuations of the "earthen vessel," it may be kept ever in a position to feel the power of its great attraction in the skies.

11,445. REST, Happiness in. All things have a propensity towards that in which they place their felicity. If a stone were laid in the the concave of the moon, though air, and fire, and water were between, yet it would break through all, and be restless till it come to the earth, its centre. A suitable and unchangeable rest is the only satisfaction of the rational creature. All the tossings and agitations of the soul are but so many wings to carry him hither and thither, that he may find out a place where to rest. Let this eagle once find out and fasten on the true carcase, he is contented; as the needle pointing to the north, though before in motion, yet now he is quiet. Therefore, the philosopher, though in one place he tells us that delight consisteth in motion, yet in another place tells us that it consisteth rather in rest.

Swinnock.

11,446. REST, Industrious. The rest which a troubled soul finds in Christ is like the rest which the Pilgrim Fathers found on the American continent. When they stepped upon the shore free, feeling God's earth firm under their feet, and seeing God's sunlight bright above their heads, they said and sung, "This is our rest." But they meant not idleness. Each family reared a cabin in the bush, and forthwith waged war against the desert, until they had subdued it, and turned it into a fruitful field. Their resting-place was their working-place; and none the worse in their esteem was the rest because of the labor that accompanied it. Beyond the reach of the tyrant, and past the dangers of the sea, the rest they sought and found was a place to work in, and useful labor close at hand.

Arnol.

11,447. REST, Motto of. The motto of Philip de Marix, Lord Sainte-Aldegonde, one of the most efficient leaders in that great Netherlands revolt against despotism in the sixteenth century, was Repos Ailleurs, or "Rest elsewhere."

11,448. REST, Places of. In eastern countries, where the habit of hospitality is stronger than with us, the traveler is sometimes surprised and regaled by much-needed but unexpected wayside comforts. Yonder husbandman, who is now a-field at his work, was here in the early morning to leave by the wayside that pitcher of water that the passing traveler might drink. This clump of trees which makes a thick and welcome "shadow from the heat," was planted by one who expected neither fame nor money for his toil, and who now lies in a nameless grave. Hands now mouldering in dust scooped out this cool seat in the rock. Some "Father Jacob gave us this well after drinking thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle." Travelers from the west are much affected by such instances of pure humanity and unselfish kindness. And yet these are but feeble types, mere dim shadows of divine thoughtfulness and care.

Raleigh.

11,449. REST, Pursuit of. Rest unto our souls! 'tis all we want, the end of all our wishes and pursuits: give us a prospect of this, we take the wings of the morning, and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth to have it in possession: we seek for it in titles, in riches, and pleasures, climb up after it by ambition, come down again, and stoop for it by avarice, try all extremes: still we are gone out of the way; nor is it till after many miserable experiments that we are convinced at last, we have been seeking everywhere for it but where there is a prospect of finding it; and that is within ourselves, in a meek and lowly disposition of heart.

Sterne.

11,450. REST, Safe. Years ago one of our fleets was terribly shattered by a violent gale. It was found that some of the ships were unaffected by its violence. They were in, what mariners call "the eye of the storm." While all around was desolation, they were safe. So it is with him who has the peace of God in his heart.

Pilkington.

11,451. RESTITUTION, Exemplary. A gentleman who had been the agent in the sale of oil stock, by which the purchasers lost their money, felt that this stood in the way of his religious progress. He resolved to make restitution if it impoverished him. His way was made practicable, and his heart was filled with joy.

11,452. RESTORATION, Glory of. Dr. Holme gives us an illustration by which Dr. Burchard used to enforce the necessity of the new birth. A very wicked man died, and his spirit entered the fires of purgation in the eternal world. After a thorough cleansing he was admitted to heaven. A new robe was put on him, a crown set on his head, and a harp was given to him, and he was required to sing. "What shall I sing?" said he. The angel said, "There is only one song sung here. Blessing and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb forever and ever." But, said the man, "I can't sing that song." "Honor to whom honor is due, say I. If I sing, it will be glory and honor to the devil, who burnt me out like an old pipe and fitted me for heaven."

11,453. RESTRAINT, Type of. As the plough is the typical instrument of industry, so the fetter is the typical instrument of the restraint or subjection necessary in a nation—either literally for its evil-doers, or figuratively, in accepting laws, for its wise and good men. Wise laws and just restraints are to a noble nation not chains, but chain mail—strength and defence. Therefore the first power of a nation consists in knowing how to guide the plough, its second power consists in knowing how to wear the fetter.

Ruskin.

11,454. RESURRECTION, Biblical Figures of. A tree cut down revived and sprouting, through the scent of water, Job 14: 7-15. Herbs revived by the moisture of dew, after the parching heat of the burning day, Isa. 26: 29. Dry bones, of all things most unlikely to be restored to life, Ezek. 37: 1-14. Awaking out of sleep, Ps. 17: 15; Dan. 12: 2; John 11: 11. A corn of wheat, or seed sown, dying to live, John 12: 24; 1 Cor. 15: 36-38.

Bowes.

11,455. RESURRECTION, Certain. "All that are in their graves shall hear his voice;" no grave may refuse to give up its dead. There have been some singular graves made in the world, and extraordinary pains taken to conceal them; but they, as well as the most ordinary receptacles of the dead, must give up their dead. Alaric, king of the Goths, had a curious grave. He had besieged, and levied an enormous tribute upon Rome, and was proceeding to Sicily, when he died suddenly. It is related that his victorious army caused their captives to turn aside the course of the river Busentinus, to make his grave in the bed of the river; and then, when they had buried him in it, and restored the waters to their former channel, they slew upon the spot all who had been engaged in the work, that none might tell the secret to the Romans. Neither will Attila's numerous coffins confine him in the grave. History tells us that he was buried in a wide plain, in a coffin enclosed in one of gold, another of silver, and a third of iron; that with his body was interred an immense amount of treasure; and that the spot might forever remain unknown, those who buried him were killed. But at the judgment-day, he will come forth from his grave, and give an account of all his bloody victories.

F. F. Trench.

11,456. RESURRECTION, Emblem of the. An army chaplain tells of having bivouacked with his brigade upon an open field, each soldier wrapped in his blanket, but with nothing over him but the cold, cloudy sky. On arising next morning all over that field were little mounds like new-made graves, each covered with a drapery of snow, which had fallen two or three inches deep during the night, and covered every sleeping soldier, as if in the winding-sheet of death. While he was gazing upon the strange spectacle, here and there a man began to stir, rise, shake himself, and stand forth in momentary amazement at the sight. It was a symbol of the resurrection, and failed not to make its impression upon the beholder.

11,457. RESURRECTION, First Fruits of the. There is a story that once a party of sailors on shore on some island of the sea, ate freely of some plant that threw them into a deep sleep. As they returned not, others came in search of their companions, and found them lying apparently dead. Anxiously they set to work to rouse the drugged sleepers, and the recovery of the first was a glad omen that the rest ere long would revive, as in time they did. So was the resurrection of Christ the pledge and proof of a like immortality assured to his followers.

Bibl. Treasury.

11,458. RESURRECTION, Identity in the. The divinely-chosen analogy of the seed and the plant is to me of all the most suggestive regarding our spiritual body as it shall be hereafter. For, take the bulb of a hyacinth, or of any other flower, submit it to the naturalist, and he will tell you by aid of the microscope what the perfected flower will be; yet who that did not know the mysterier of vegetation could believe that from that unpromising bulb would spring the gorgeous flower enveloped in its sheltering leaves? Yet such shall be our body then compared with our body now.

E. H. Bickersteth.

11,459. RESURRECTION, Memento of the. That is a beautiful thought of the Israelites of our days; when they enter their cemetery to deposit one of their number, it is said, they bow together three times to the ground; then seizing the grass of the tomb which they are about to enter, and casting it behind them, they utter in chorus these words of the prophet: "Thy bones shall flourish like the grass: O my brother, thy bones shall flourish like the grass!" My brethren, I come here to do something of a similar kind to-day. I take, as it were, handfuls of the grass and flowers with which the spring has covered our fields, and amidst the concert of gratitude and joy heard everywhere around us at this season of miracles, I exclaim, "Resurrection! Resurrection!" I declare to you that your bones, though laid in the very dust, shall flourish like the grass, with the whole of nature, which lives again. I preach to you the resurrection of the just.

Gaussen.

11,460. RESURRECTION, Method of the. The Koran represents Abraham as saying, "O Lord, show me how thou wilt raise the dead?" God said, "Dost thou not yet believe?" The patriarch answered, "Yea; but I ask this that my heart may rest at ease." Then God said, "Take four birds, and divide them, and lay a part of them on every mountain; then call them, and they shall come to thee." The legend says that he took an eagle, a peacock, a raven, and a cock, cut them in pieces, and mingled them together, and then scattered the parts upon several mountains, but retained the heads of the birds in his hands. He called each bird by name, and immediately the parts flew together from all quarters, and were joined to their several heads. This satisfied Abraham, who, seeing a dead body upon the sea-shore partly devoured by wild beasts, and birds, and fish, was troubled in spirit as to its resurrection.

11,461. RESURRECTION, No Deformities in the. There are no defects or deformities in the children of the resurrection. What members are now defective or deformed will then be restored to their perfect being and beauty; "for," as Tertullian says, "if the universal death of all parts be rescinded by the resurrection, how much more the partial death of any single member!"

John Flavel.

11,462. RESURRECTION, None Forgotten in the. Lady Maxwell was at one time much troubled by the curious temptation that she was so insignificant, she would be liable to be passed over hereafter. But we may meet all such temptations as Monica, the mother of Augustine, met the surprise of her friends at Ostia, when they expressed their wonder that she did not fear to leave her body so far from her own country. "Nothing," said she, "is far from God, and I do not fear that he should not know where to find me at the resurrection."

The small, as well as the great, are remembered in the grand distribution of rewards. The four-and-twenty elders give thanks in Rev. 11, that the time of the dead has come that they should be judged; and that God should give reward unto his servants, the prophets, and to the saints, and to them that fear his name, both small and great. Whenever we are oppressed with a sense of our own insignificance we must fall back upon the comprehensiveness of God's thought; the wideness of its range, the minuteness of its detail.

Power.

11,463. RESURRECTION, Obstructing the. In Queen Mary's days, the body of Peter Martyr's wife was, by the charity of that time, taken out of the grave and buried in a jungle, in detestation of that great scholar, her husband, sometime professor of divinity in the University of Oxford; but when the tide was once turned, and that Queen Elizabeth, of happy memory, swayed the scepter of this State, her bones were reduced to their place, and there mingled with the bones of St. Frideswide, to this intent, that if ever there should come an alteration of religion in England again, then they should not be able to discern the ashes of the one from the other. Thus death hath mixed and blended the bodies of men, women and children with the flesh of beasts, birds, and serpents; hath tossed, typed, and turned ashes both into air and water, to puzzle the God of heaven and earth to find them, but all in vain.

Anon.

11,464. RESURRECTION, Possibility of. An apocryphal legend, referred to in the Koran, represents Ezra as riding by the ruins of Jerusalem, after its demolition by the Chaldeans, and doubting the ability of God to restore the city and its inhabitants. Then God slew Ezra. He lay where he fell for one hundred years, when God restored him to life. The bones of the ass, upon which he had ridden, lay scattered about. While the prophet looked on these came together, were clothed with flesh, the animal was reanimated, and began to bray. But during the whole hundred years the basket of figs and cruse of wine he had with him at the time of his death were perfectly preserved. Then Ezra said, "I know that God is able to do all these things."

11,465. RESURRECTION, Preventing the. A glorious company of martyrs, suffered death after enduring the most fearful tortures at Lyons, in A. D. 177, in the reign of Marcus Aurelius. Among them Pothinus, bishop of Lyons; Sanctus, a deacon; Maturus, a young convert; Blandina, a slave; Alexander, a physician, and Ponticus, a lad of fifteen. These all bore their sufferings cheerfully and heroically, and their very chains appeared more like the ornaments of a bride than the masks of malefactors. Their bodies were burned to ashes and the ashes were thrown into the Rhone. Their persecutors intended thereby to prevent their resurrection, hope of which they saw had animated the martyrs. "Let us see now," they said, "if they will return again to life, and whether their God can save them and deliver them out of our hands."

11,466. RESURRECTION, Promise of. One may occasionally see a plant which, through being under more favorable circumstances than its companions, appears with an early blade or leaves, while around it all others are torpid in the cold of winter. Such a plant is, as it were, the "first fruits of those that slept,"—the promise that the verdure of spring and the ripeness of summer will again cover the face of the earth. Bib. Treas.

11,467. RESURRECTION, Suggestions of the. Beside the principles of which we consist, and the actions which flow from us, the consideration of the things without us, and the natural course of variations in the creature, will render the resurrection yet more highly probable. Every space of twenty-four hours teacheth thus much, in which there is always a revolution amounting to a resurrection. The day dies into a night, and is buried in silence and in darkness; in the next morning it appeareth again and reviveth, opening the grave of darkness, rising from the dead of night; this is a diurnal resurrection. As the day dies into night, so doth the summer into winter: the sap is said to descend into the root, and there it lies buried in the ground; the earth is covered with snow, or crusted with frost, and becomes a general sepulchre; when the spring appeareth, all begin to rise; the plants and flowers peep out of their graves, revive, and grow, and flourish; this is the annual resurrection. Dr. J. Pearson.

11,468. RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, Emblem of the. We have contemplated Christ's humiliation: the Sun of Righteousness appeared as a setting sun gone out of sight. But as the sun, when to us it is set, begins a new day in another part of the world, so Christ, having finished his course in this world, rises again, and that to perform another glorious part of his work in the world above. John Flavel.

11,469. RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, Legend of the. After the resurrection of Christ, "he was seen of James." Jerome gives the following account of this appearance on the authority of the Hebrew Gospel of the Nazarenes. St. James had solemnly sworn, at the time he ate the last supper, that he would eat bread no more till he saw the Lord risen from the dead. After his resurrection our Lord went to James and ordered bread to be set before him, which he took, blessed, and brake, and gave to him, saying, "Eat thy bread, my brother, for the Son of man is truly risen from among them that sleep."

11,470. RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, Type of the. Christ is the "first-fruits of them that sleep." According to the Levitical law, before the harvest could be gathered, the sickle was to be put into the corn and the "sheaf of the first-fruits" was to be brought unto the priest who was to "wave the sheaf before the Lord." This sheaf was to be offered on the morrow after the Sabbath, that is, on the Lord's day—the day on which we celebrate the resurrection of Christ from the dead. What a wonderful figure of the resurrection of Christ! The waving is a sign of life, and he had life from the dead on the day after the Jewish Sabbath. The wave-sheaf too was an earnest that the whole field should be reaped, as well as a sample of the harvest. Christ therefore being raised, we shall all rise; and as Christ after his resurrection had the same moral character that he possessed before his death—loving his apostles spite of their forsaking him—so shall we be in the resurrection. Pilkington.

11,471. RETALIATION, Legal. MacDonald, a noted thief of Scotland, had committed many murders, and was unmercifully cruel. Once he nailed horseshoes to the feet of a poor widow, because, in her grief, she swore she would report him to the king. He was taken prisoner with twelve of his associates; and King James I. of Scotland caused them all in like manner to be shod and for three days they were driven about the city of Edinburgh a spectacle to the people, after which they were put to death.

11,472. RETALIATION, Synonym for. In one of the famous wars between Carthage and Rome, Hannibal, a Carthaginian leader, and one of the most wonderful men of antiquity, led his army into Italy, and for several years continued to threaten the city and lay waste the surrounding country. Scipio, a Roman general, saw the necessity of getting rid of Hannibal and his forces, and so determined to lead an army into Africa and threaten Carthage, and thus make it necessary for Hannibal to return home for its defence. This scheme had its intended effect; and in all after time this retaliating upon an enemy by adopting his own tactics, is called carrying the war into Africa. Anon.

11,473. RETREAT, Not Practiced in. A German story says that after the concert of the Prussian military in Paris, before the Emperor Napoleon III., he entered into conversation with Kapellmeister Parlow. In the course of the talk, the Emperor lifted one of the brass instruments, found it heavy, and asked: "Do your band-people wear their knapsacks in the field, as well as carry these things?" "Certainly, sire," answered Parlow. "But how," asked the emperor, "do they manage in retreat?" "Don't know, your Majesty; that's not practiced among our people." The subsequent German victories must have impressed the remark upon Napoleon.

11,474. RETRIBUTION, Call for. The Æqui made a league and swore fidelity to the Romans. They afterwards revolted, and began war. Ambassadors were sent to them demanding satisfaction, but they treated them with contempt, and bade them deliver their message to an oak that grew near by. Accordingly one of the ambassadors turned to the oak and said, "Thou hallowed oak, and whatever else belongs to the gods in this place, hear, and bear witness to this perfidiousness, and favor our just complaints, that by the assistance of the gods, we may be revenged of this perjury."

The Romans gave battle to the Æqui, and utterly destroyed the perjured nation.

11,475. RETRIBUTION, Emblem of. The war chariots of ancient times, armed with scythes and drawn by frantic steeds intended to mow down the ranks of the enemy, frequently returned upon their own friends and wrought the greatest havoc.

11,476. RETRIBUTION, Example of. Banishment was made a law by Celisthenes, an Athenian, and he was the first to suffer from it. Gryphus, king of Egypt, on coming in from the hunt, was offered by his mother a cup of poison. He had been forewarned, and insisted that she should drink of it first. He plainly told that he had heard of her intention, and in order to clear herself of such an accusation, there was no way for her but to drink it. The son stood by and saw the miserable queen take the poison, from the effects of which she soon after died.

11,477. RETRIBUTION, Fable of. A viper entering a smith's shop began looking about for something to eat. At length, seeing a file, he went up to it and commenced biting at it; but the file bade him to leave him alone, saying, "You are likely to get little from me, whose business it is to bite others." Æsop.

11,478. RETRIBUTION, Instrument of. Marius was a cutler by trade, and one of the Thirty Tyrants during the reign of Gallienus. He was chosen emperor one day, and reigned the next, and the third was slain by one of his soldiers, who, striking him, said, "This is with a sword which was made by thyself."

11,479. RETRIBUTION, Law of. An African slave trader received a pistol in exchange for a slave, whom he had stolen from his native freedom. He wore the pistol proudly in his belt. One day it was accidentally discharged, and the man-stealer was slain by the reward of his crime.

11,480. RETRIBUTION, Speedy. In the reign of Henry VII., Dr. Whittington, a bishop's chancellor, having condemned a pious woman to the flames at Chipping, Sodbury, went to that town to witness the courageous manner in which she set her seal to the truth of the gospel. On his return from that affecting scene, a furious bull passed through the crowd, none of whom suffered from him, gored the chancellor, and suddenly inflicted death in a most awful manner. Whitecross.

11,481. RETRIBUTION, Swift. A man in Germany sent a young girl with 200 florins, to a town among the mountains. She was overtaken by a person who offered to accompany her, and pretended to know a short cut to the town. He led her to the shaft of an unworked mine, intending to throw her into it and obtain her money. She gave him the money, and he ordered her to prepare for death. Just then his foot stumbled, and he fell to the bottom of the shaft, where he had expected to throw the poor girl. He was found there dead, with the money in his possession.

11,482. RETROSPECTION, Effect of. When I look upon the tombe of the great, every motion of envy dies; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire forsakes me; when I meet with the grief of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tombs of the parents themselves, I reflect how vain it is to grieve for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying beside those who deposed them, when I behold rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men who divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the frivolous competitions, factions, and debates of mankind.

Addison.

11,483. REUNION, Providential. At the time of the wreck of the Rothsay Castle, a father and child sought safety by climbing the mast, but the boy was not able to hold on, and was soon lost from the father. Next morning the father was rescued, and went reluctantly ashore, thinking how he should meet his wife without the boy. The boy was picked up, taken ashore, and placed in the same bed with his father, unknown to each other or their rescuers, till they were clasped in each other's arms. It is easy for Omnipotence to reunite our scattered households in heaven.

11,484. REUNION, Unexpected. A commander of a British vessel of war, sailing from the Cape of Good Hope, was charged with the convoy of a little sloop to England, laden with an exceedingly valuable cargo. They were in mutual sight for many days, when a storm arose, and separated them so widely that, after the storm had passed, and the sea once more had become peaceful, they could not see each other. In vain the man-of-war searched the horizon to find her smaller and weaker consort. No trace of the sloop was to be found. With a heavy heart, the captain of the war ship pursued his course homeward, not expecting to see his little charge again. He entered the Channel, and anchored off Portsmouth, in a fog, saddened at the remembrance of the lost ship; but, when the thick fog lifted, what was his surprise at seeing the little lost craft anchored in peace directly by his side, having arrived at home before him! Each was ignorant of the course of the other, till they lay side by side at anchor in the harbor. So will it be with many who, by Providence, are separated from our families, our Sabbath-schools, our pastoral charges, to pursue the voyage of life without us, when we shall meet them at last in heaven, to go no more out forever. Ignorance of their safety may distress us now, but when the darkness is passed, and the true light shineth, we shall welcome with delight those who may have reached the shining shore before us, or that shall come after.

Dr. S. H. Tyng.

11,485. REVELATION, Need for. If Adam needed to hear his Father's voice, sounding amid the fair bowers and the unshaded glory of paradise, surely much more does this prodigal world, that has gone astray from him, need to hear a Father's voice asking after us, and the first intimations of a Father's desire that the lost may be found, and the dead at length become alive. Cumming.

11,486. REVENGE, Bloody. Cyrus, the elder, by strategy defeated Spargapises, and he was brought bound before him. Cyrus ordered his fetters unloosed; and, in desperation, he slew himself. After this Cyrus was defeated, and Tamyris, mother of Spargapises, finding the dead body of Cyrus, caused his head to be cut off and to be thrown into a vessel filled with human blood, saying, "Satisfy thyself with blood which thou hast so much thirsted after."

11,487. REVENGE, Characterized. Revenge is a cruel word; manhood, some call it; but it is rather doghood. The manlier any man is, the milder and more merciful. Trapp.

11,488. REVENGE, Dearly Bought. A horse had the whole range of a meadow to himself; but a stag coming and damaging the pasture, the horse, anxious to have his revenge, asked a man if he could not assist him in punishing the stag. "Yes," said the man, "only let me put a bit in your mouth, and get upon your back, and I will find the weapons." The horse agreed, and the man mounted accordingly; but instead of getting his revenge, the horse has been from that time forward the slave of man. Esop.

11,489. REVENGE, Heathen. At the formation of the second Triumvirate, the sacrifice of that master of eloquence, Cicero, was agreed upon, and a large reward was offered for his head. He fled and might have escaped but for his own indecision. His murderers found him at his country villa, and severed his head from his body with the sword. They cut off his hands and carried them with his head to Antony. Forsyth says, "He was seated on a tribunal administering justice in the forum, when they made their way through the crowd with the ghastly relics in their hands. His eyes sparkled with joy, and he not only paid the promised reward, but added to it an enormous sum. What more precious gift could he present to his wife Fulvia than the head of their deadliest enemy? She took it, and placing it upon her lap, addressed it as if it were alive, in words of bitter insult. She dragged out the tongue, whose sarcasms she had often felt, and with feminine rage pierced it with her bodkin. It was then taken and nailed to the Rostra, to moulder there in mockery of his eloquence, of which that spot had so often been the scene. A sadder sight was never gazed upon in Rome."

11,490. REVENGE, Prevented. A Christian told Sisoës, the Theban, of his intention to revenge a wrong done him. He advised him against such a course, but to leave vengeance to God. "I will not; I cannot," said the man. Then they knelt together in prayer, and Sisoës prayed, "O God, take, we pray thee, no more concern about our affairs; be no longer our protector; we are going henceforth to manage for ourselves, avenge ourselves, and do all the rest that thou hast hitherto done for us!" The man became ashamed of himself, and abandoned his intention.

11,491. REVENGE, True. Diogenes being asked by what means a man might revenge himself upon his enemies, replied, "By becoming himself a good and honest man."

11,492. REVIVALS, Aim for. A pastor entering upon a new charge said to his people that his object in coming to them was to save sinners—that all his services would be aimed at that—and he wished the church to co-operate with him. This announcement was carried out for two years, and many hearts seemed to be centered upon that grand point. The people understood that their salvation was the object of every service. Some surrendered the first month, others the next, and so on during the whole term, and as they did so they fell into a line, and did what they could to save others. The result was over three hundred were added to the church, in monthly installments of from five to thirty, by the ordinary means of grace. Dr. James Porter.

11,493. REVIVALS, Demand for. The churches need revivals. The constant tendency is to fall into routine and to run on in old ruts. The abiding need is of spontaneity. Solid forts are a necessity in war, so also are the light troops and the flying artillery. This need is most felt in old, well-established, and highly organized churches. When an iceberg breaks off in the far north, and floats southward in early summer, it cools the air and all water around. But when the Gulf Stream sends northward its southern waters, they carry to the shores of England and northern Europe something of a tropic summer. Those who come into a church in a revival come not as icebergs freighted with chills of death, but as the robins come, seemingly bringing the summer with them. New life is imparted to the church's activities, and the old members, like old trees in springtime, begin to bear fruit. Beecher.

11,494. REVIVALS, Necessity of. My brethren, we must have revivals! It must rain faster, or we perish with drought! There is no such thing as a growing, progressive church without them; no such thing as a prosperous country without them. God has never multiplied his people, never built up his kingdom rapidly without them, and never will. This is the thought I would impress upon those who hear me—the indispensable necessity of revivals of religion to perpetuate the church and to convert the world. Revivals are necessary as a kind of substitute for miracles. God is the author of conversion; but not in the way of miracles—not without reference to and conformity with the laws of mind. Miracles cannot convert the soul. How many of those who witnessed the miracles of Christ, do you suppose, were converted by the prodigies that attended them? Miracles had their use, but that use was not the conversion of the soul. But now their object is accomplished; the gospel is authenticated; the work is under motion. Hear the world roar as it rushes along; and see, as civilization advances, wealth accumulates, luxury abounds, and society rises higher and higher, how men dislike the humbling doctrines of the cross! Religion becomes offensive; the gospel is odious; and if they go on, they will scout it out of the world with their sneers and contempt. How are you to make head against all this accumulating hatred? By jogging along in the old orthodox way? No; men will go to hell by whole generations if something be not done. But go into a church filled with these gay, self-sufficient, contemptuous schemers, when the Spirit of God is abroad, and the atmosphere of revivals envelops the mass. Then see how they stir; what an arrest is put upon the current of their worldliness! The whole town is affected. Conviction spreads from heart to heart, like a fire in a dry forest. Everybody feels, and you cannot tell why. In Litchfield, during a great revival, I would hear of conversions taking place simultaneously ten miles apart, without any contact or intercommunion. The gospel then took hold. It was invested with a kind of almightiness. It is impossible for the truth to make such impression at any other time. We must have revivals, if the world is ever to be converted. To wait till the church is filled with the droppings of the sanctuary is to wait for ever.

Dr. Lyman Beecher.

11,495. REVIVALS, Renewal of. There was a heathen custom in Helvetia of celebrating the sun's return to heat and power, on what is now Easter eve. For some days previous all the fires were extinguished that they might be relighted from the sacred fires in the temple on Tara hill. The people waited for the appearance of this sacred flame, and hastened from it to rekindle the fires on their own cold hearths. On many a home altar the fire has gone out. These should all be rekindled from the sacred revival fires that blaze around us. If the sacred fire has gone out on the altar of our heart it is time to relight it.

11,496. REVIVALS, Secret of. A revival occurred in Orange county, New York, in the summer of 1828. The work began without any known cause. The inquiry was made, "Who is praying? This work must be in answer to somebody's prayers." If was afterwards learned that two old church members, who lived one mile apart, had made arrangements to meet half way between them in a piece of thick bushes every evening at sundown to pray God to revive his work. Their prayers were answered, and one hundred and fifty were added, during the months of July, August and September, to the church.

11,497. REVIVAL, Streams of. In the East the rivers in the dry seasons are little more than fleeting streams, and sometimes they are entirely evaporated by the powerful action of the sun's rays. The rainy season comes, and the beds of the ancient rivers begin to receive their annual tribute from the fruitful clouds; and the mountain torrent, rolling in its accustomed channel, causes the streams to return again, changing the sandy waste into a majestic river, raising the sower's hopes, replenish this parched land with the long-desired verdure, and man and beast again rejoice in the earth's abundance.

W. Brown.

11,498. REWARD, Expectation of. The Christian expects his reward, not as due to merit, but as connected, in a constitution of grace, with those acts which grace enables him to perform. The pilgrim who has been led to the gate of heaven will not knock there as worthy of being admitted; but the gate shall open to him, because he is brought thither. He who sows, even with tears, the precious seed of faith, hope, and love, shall "doubtless come again with joy and bring his sheaves with him," because it is in the very nature of that seed to yield, under the kindly influence secured to it, a joyful harvest.

Cecil.

11,499. REWARD, Greatness of God's. God's reward is exceeding great. He will also recompense our losses for his sake, as the king of Poland did his noble servant Zelilaus; having lost his hand in his wars, he sent him a golden hand for it; so Caius gave Agrippa, that had been imprisoned for his sake, a chain of gold as heavy as his chain of iron had been.

Trapp.

11,500. REWARD, Immediate. John Andrew Jones, a Baptist minister, whilst walking in Cheapside, London, was appealed to by some one he knew for help. He had but a shilling in the world, and questioned whether to give it or not. The distress of his friend prevailed, and the poor preacher gave away his last farthing. The promise came to his mind. "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth to the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again." He passed on a few yards only, before he met a gentleman who said, "Ah, Mr. Jones, I am glad to see you. I have had this sovereign in my pocket this week past, for some poor minister, and you may as well have it." In relating the story, Mr. Jones usually added, "If I had not stopped to give relief, I should have missed the gentleman and the sovereign too."

11,501. REWARD, Penalty and. Cato, the elder, said he would rather not be rewarded for his good deeds than not punished for his evil deeds; and that at any time he could pardon all other offenders besides himself.

11,502. REWARD, Unexpected. A Paduca woman had been taken captive by the Pawnees and was to be put to death. She was fastened to the stake, and the wood was about to be set on fire, when the young chieftain of his tribe came to her rescue. He was mounted on a horse, and led another. To the astonishment of all, he rode up to the pile, freed her from the stake, placed her upon the other horse and carried her off in triumph. It was so unexpected that it was thought to be nothing less than the Great Spirit's ordering. The young chieftain took his captive to her home and friends, and returned to his tribe without censure. His conduct, though extraordinary, passed unnoticed by them, but a silver medal was awarded him by the pupils of a ladies' seminary in Washington, for having rescued one of their sex from so unnatural a fate. On receiving the medal he said, "I am glad my brothers and sisters have heard of the good act that I have done. I did it in ignorance, and did not know I did good; but by your giving me this medal I know it."

11,503. RICH, Poverty of the. A Boston five-millionaire refused to give a donation on the ground that he had many hundreds of thousands lying in the banks without interest. A New York twenty-millionaire will plead equal poverty. And the richest family in Mexico had several millions left them by their founder, and three millions more to the poor of Mexico, and appropriated it all to themselves as being the poor of Mexico. The only way is for every body to reckon himself rich, and to be liberal accordingly. Bp. Haven.

11,504. RICHES, Biblical Figures of. Thorns, Matt. 13: 7; our Lord's figure of the two extremes which choke the word, "the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches." Treasures got with toil, kept with care, and always liable to be lost, Prov. 15: 16; 10: 2; Matt. 6: 19; Jer. 49: 4; James 5: 1, 2. A strong city and high wall, which the rich man in his "conceit" thinks to be "impregnable," Prov. 18: 11. Thick clay, Hab. 2: 6, with which covetous men load themselves, to their own sorrow and destruction. A snare or pit, 1 Tim. 6: 9, concealed in the ground, and covered over. Deep and dangerous waters, 1 Tim. 6: 9, where sailors are driven upon the rocks and shipwrecked. The sweet morsel quickly swallowed down, and as quickly cast up again, Job 20: 15. Vanity (Heb. a vapor), "tossed to and fro of them that seek death," Prov. 21: 6. The partridge sitting on eggs, and hatching them not, Jer. 17: 11. One of the large speculators in the railway mania many years ago becoming deeply involved, committed suicide, and left on his desk a paper, with written on it, Jer. 17: 11. Bowes.

11,505. RICHES, Contented without. Upon the best observation I could ever make, I am induced to believe that it is much easier to be contented without riches than with them. It is so natural for a rich man to make his gold his god; for whatever a person loves most, that thing, be it what it will, he will certainly make his god. It is so difficult not to trust in it, not to depend upon it for support and happiness, that I do not know one rich man in the world with whom I would exchange conditions. Mrs. Wesley.

11,506. RICHES, Despising. In St. Mark's church, Venice, will be found the tomb of Duke Sebastian Foscarius. Upon it are inscribed these words, "Hear, O ye Venetians! and I will tell you which is the best thing in the world; it is to condemn and despise riches."

11,507. RICHES, Dissatisfied with. A gentleman of vast fortune sent for a friend to settle some affairs; and while they were together, he walked to the window, and observed a chimney-sweeper's boy with his sack passing by. His friend was surprised to see the tears burst from his eyes; and, clasping his hands, he exclaimed—"Now would I give every shilling I am worth in the world to change beings with that little sweep!" Buck.

11,508. RICHES, Fleeting Nature of. Solomon compares wealth to a wild fowl. Riches make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle towards heaven; (Prov. 23: 5;) not some tame house-bird, or a hawk that may be fetched down with a lure, or found again by her bells; but an eagle, that violently cuts the air, and is gone past recalling. Wealth is like a bird; it hops all day from man to man, as that doth from tree to tree; and none can say where it will roost or rest at night. It is like a vagrant fellow, which because he is big-boned, and able to work, a man takes in a-doors, and cherisheth; and perhaps for a while he takes pains; but when he spies opportunity the fugitive servant is gone, and takes away more with him than all his service came to. The world may seem to stand thee in some stead for a reason, but at last irrevocably runs away, and carries with it thy joys; thy goods, as Rachel stole Laban's idols; thy peace and content of heart goes with it, and thou art left desperate.

Adams.

11,509. RICHES, Gathering and Scattering. An old woman, who showed the house and pictures at Towchester, England, said, "That is Sir Robert Farmer; he lived in the country, took care of his estate, built this house and paid for it; managed well, saved money and died rich:—This is his son. He was made a lord, took a place at court, spent his estate, and died a beggar!"

11,510. RICHES, Haste for. I see put up over business men's desks sometimes, "A penny saved is a penny earned," "Time is money," and a great many other whetstone maxims to make men sharp for this world. I have thought it might be well to put up some other things in business establishments for the benefit of the young men connected with them; and it would not hurt the principals to look at them. I would put up the picture of a gallows, of a poor-house, of a penitentiary, of the yard with its striped inmates, and of reeling drunkards; and above these I would have this motto: "The paradise of smart young men!" For cause produces effect; and they are constantly doing the things which lead to such a paradise. And when they have come to it they are in dismay, and they say, "How did this befall me?" It is as if a man should fall into the water, and then say, "Astonishing that I am wet!" Would it not be astonishing if he were not? It is as if a man should put his hand in the fire, and say, "Why, it burns!" Did fire ever do anything else? Young men set out to achieve success in forbidden ways, and they have only succeeded in cheating themselves; and they are amazed. They meant to have riches without earning them, and the result is that they are poverty-stricken through and through. They meant to take advantage of everybody's trust for their own benefit. By and by everybody loses confidence in them and when they are mildewed and blasted, and nobody will trust them, they think the world is hard and inhospitable. Beecher.

11,511. RICHES, Heavenly. O blinder than beetles! The merchant refuseth no adventure for hope of gain; the hunter shrinketh at no weather for love of game; the soldier declineth no danger for desire either of glory or spoil: and shall we frame to ourselves either an ease in not understanding, or an idleness in not using those things which will be a means to us not only to avoid intolerable and endless pains, but to attain both immeasurable and immortal glory, pleasure and gain? Hayward.

11,512. RICHES, Inconstancy of. A few years since those giants of the Stock Exchange, Drew and Vanderbilt, were contending for the control of the Erie Railroad. The wealth of either was counted by millions. The eyes of the nation and the world were upon them. Mr. Beecher looking on said, "Oh God, who are these men? With phosphoric light I see standing over their portals the Divine handwriting, 'Fool! fool!' And God says to them, 'In a year or two whose shall these things be?'" The first of these men lost his wealth; the second left his.

11,513. RICHES, Marrying for. It is better for a man to be chained with fetters of gold, as they bind their prisoners in Ethiopia, than to be tied to the riches of a wife.

Pisias in Plutarch.

11,514. RICHES, Passion for. The taste for real glory and real greatness declines more and more amongst us every day. New-raised families, intoxicated with their sudden increase of fortune, and whose extravagant expenses are insufficient to exhaust the immense treasures they have heaped up, lead us to look upon nothing as truly great and valuable but wealth, and that in abundance; so that not only poverty, but a moderate income, is considered as an insupportable shame; and all merit and honor are made to consist in the magnificence of our buildings, furniture, equipage, and tables. Rollin.

11,515. RICHES, Safe Growth of. If men were content to grow rich somewhat more slowly, they would grow rich much more surely. If they would use their capital within reasonable limits, and transact with it only so much business as it could fairly control, they would be far less liable to lose it. Excessive profits always involve the liability of great risks—as in a lottery, in which there are high prizes, there must be a great proportion of blanks.

Wayland.

11,516. RICHES, Snares of. Riches is compared to sharp stakes, or other piercing things, 1 Tim. 6: 10. The word περιεπεσαν signifies to be transfixed in every part, and probably refers to one of the snares or pits spoken of, ver. 9, where a hole is dug in the earth, and filled with sharp stakes, then slightly covered over, so that whatever steps on it, falls in, and is "pierced through" with much pain and suffering. Dr. A. Clarke.

11,517. RICHES, Unhappy with. Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, the infidel founder of Girard College, into which all clergymen are forbidden to enter, when surrounded by immense wealth, and supposed to be taking supreme delight in its accumulation, wrote thus to a friend: "As to myself, I live like a galley slave, constantly occupied, and often passing the night without sleeping. I am wrapped in a labyrinth of affairs, and worn out with care. I do not value fortune. The love of labor is my highest emotion. When I rise in the morning, my only effort is to labor so hard during the day that when night comes I may be enabled to sleep soundly."

11,518. RICHES, Use of. Let rich men therefore take heed how they handle their thorns; let them gird up the loins of their minds, lest their long garments hinder them in the way to heaven; let them see to it, that they be not tied to their abundance, as little Lentulus was said to have been to his long sword; that they be not held prisoners in those golden fetters, as the king of Armenia was by Antony, and so sent by him as a present to Cleopatra; lest at length they send their mammon of unrighteousness, as Croesus did his fetters, for a present to the devil, who had deluded him with false hopes of victory. Trapp.

11,519. RICHES, Worshiping. There were those among the heathen that worshiped the emerald as the true deity. The sick made pilgrimages to worship it, and there offered their gifts. The descendants of the treasure-worshippers have spread over the whole earth.

11,520. RIGHT, Departure from. Men begin and say, "The right." It seems hard to forget themselves: so they say, "The right and I." That serves their turn, so they take another step, and say, "I and the right." That does a good deal better; and they end by saying, "I without the right or against it." Thus they go to the devil and nobody cares how soon. God honors him who says "The right."

Theodore Parker.

11,521. RIGHT is Might. A man is right and invincible, virtuous, and on the road towards sure conquest, precisely while he joins himself to the great deep law of the world, in spite of all superficial laws, temporary appearances, profit-and-loss calculation;—he is victorious while he co-operates with that great central law—not victorious otherwise; and surely his first chance of co-operating with it, or getting into the course of it, is to know with his own soul that it is—that it is good, and alone good. This is the soul of Islam; it is properly the soul of Christianity; for Islam is definable as a confused form of Christianity; had Christianity not been, neither had it been. Christianity also commands us, before all, to be resigned to God. We are to take no counsel with flesh and blood; give ear to no vain cavils, vain sorrows and wishes; to know that we know nothing; that the worst and cruellest to our eyes is not what it seems; that we have to receive whatsoever befalls us as sent from God above, and say, "It is good and wise—God is great! Though he slay me, yet will I rust in him." Islam means in its way denial of self—annihilation of self. This is yet the highest wisdom that heaven has revealed to our earth.

Carlyle.

11,522. RIGHT, Universality of. In the army drinking and treating customs were general. One noble captain had the heroism to decline the often proffered treat. An observer asked him, "Do you always reject intoxicating liquor?" "Yes." "Do you not take it to correct this Yazoo water?" "Never." "You must have belonged to the cold water army in your boyhood." "Yes; but I learned something better than that; my mother taught me what is right is right, and coming to Mississippi don't make any difference. It would not be right for me to accept an invitation to drink at home; it is no more right here; therefore, I don't drink." This rule should be reduced to universal practice. The narrator of the above afterward met a mother who wanted to see some one who had met her boy, naming his office and regiment. He told her of the noble examples of piety which were found in the army, and related the case of the captain. She exclaimed, "That's beautiful! that's beautiful! his mother must be proud of him." "Yes," said he, "she is, and you are the proud mother." Amid grateful tears, she exclaimed, "Is that my boy?—is that my Will? It's just like him; I knew he would do so. He always was a good boy; he told me he always would be, and I knew he would." The mother and son were worthy of each other. We want a world full of such mothers and sons.

11,523. RIGHT, Death of the. In the article of death, the righteous have glorious prerogatives. The truth of this principle is generally admitted. We do not hear men exclaiming, "Let me die the death of the philosopher!" in whatever terms they express their admiration of his talents, his experiments and his discoveries; or, "Let me die the death of the warrior!" with whatever ardor they celebrate his martial virtues and his military achievements; or, "Let me die the death of the statesman!" whatever encomiums they may be disposed to pass on his political abilities. No, their language is, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

James Dore.

11,524. RIGHT, Garment of. In feudal times, when bishops held their strong castles and had numerous fighting men, one of them fought at the head of his retainers against King Richard, and being taken prisoner, was confined in one of the king's castles. The pope hearing this, sent an ambassador to the king, saying, "Set my son free." One of the courtiers at the king's order brought forward the prelate's helmet and coat of mail, and the king, turning to the ambassador, said, "Go ask thy master is this thy son's coat or no?" The world requires that the servants of Christ should wear the garment of righteousness.

11,525. RIGHT, Human. God pronounces our righteousness—observe, not our wickednesses, but our devotions, our charities, our costliest sacrifices, our most applauded services—to be filthy rags. Trust not, therefore, to them. What man in his senses would think of going to court in rags, in rags to wait upon a king? Nor think that the righteousness of the cross was wrought to patch up these, to supplement, as some say, what is either defective or altogether a-wanting in our personal merits; nor fancy, like some who would embrace a Saviour, and yet keep their sins, that you may wear these rags beneath his righteousness. Away with them; not as a dress, which one may lay aside, to be afterwards resumed; but cast them away, as the beggar who, having got better clothing, throws his rags into the nearest ditch, and leaves them there to rotteness and decay. You cannot otherwise be saved.

Dr. Guthrie.

11,526. RIGHT, Robe of. When our war was going on, men used to come to enlist, and the man who came with a fine suit of clothes on, and the hod-carrier in his dirty garments, would both have to take off their clothes and put on the uniform of the Government. And so, when men go into the kingdom of God, they have to put on the livery of heaven. You need not dress up for Christ, because he will strip you when you come, and put on you the robes of his righteousness.

Moody.

11,527. RIGHT, Sun of. Anaxagoras, the philosopher, being asked what he was born for, answered, "To see the heavens, the sun and the moon." Eudoxus, another philosopher, said, "He could be content to perish could he get so near the sun as to learn the nature of it." How much greater delight can the Christian enjoy in the beams of the Sun of Righteousness!—in the Creator of the world's luminary?

11,528. RITUALISM Unchristian. Some brethren cannot preach without the gown and the cassock, and some without the altar, and some without five thousand pieces of frippery. Any one who chooses to reason will say, "This cannot be the religion of Christ's open-air sermons on the mountain top; this cannot be the religion of the dozen poor fishermen who 'turned the world upside down;' this cannot be the religion of Paul, who preached the gospel of Christ, dressed in common garb, with no altar or tools to use, only his simple tongue, and won souls for his Master."

Spurgeon.

11,529. ROCK, Founded on. A young minister in Wales, going to a very exposed locality, slept at a farm house on the highest point of land in the country. He retired to rest, when the wind blew a tempest, the rain beat upon the house heavily, and he feared it must fall. He could not rest; he rose, sat by the fire and prepared for the worst. But it stood firm and unshaken. The morning came; the minister expressed his fears, and felt very timid, and wondered how the farmer could sleep so securely, exposed to such a storm. "Oh," said the farmer, "I had no fear of the house falling, and you need not to have feared either for it is founded upon a rock."

11,530. ROCK, Our. There was a certain nobleman who kept a deistical chaplain and his lady a Christian one. When he was dying he said to his chaplain, "I liked you very well when I was in health, but it is my lady's chaplain I must have when I am sick." How true "their rock is not as our rock, our enemies themselves being judges!" Whitefield.

11,531. ROCK OF AGES, Building on the. A soldier asked a delegate of the Christian Commission, "Won't you please tell me how I may build on the 'Rock'?" I was thinking of it while on guard, the other day." He told his story in brief: He was from New York City, had received his mother's dying blessing. Before she breathed her last, she sang this hymn and said, "George, my son, I would not feel so badly about your enlisting, if you were only built upon that 'Rock.'" These sacred memories were revived by the singing of the hymn, Rock of Ages; and as the delegate and soldier knelt on the dusty road-side, beneath the stars, the wanderer lost his weariness and thirst for sin, in the shadow of the "Rock of Ages." G. Brinckhurst.

11,532. ROD, Kissing the. Tiribazus, a Persian nobleman, was approached by officers for the purpose of arresting him. He drew his sword to defend himself, but when he learned it was only desired to bring him into the presence of the king, he yielded with joy. Afflictions are God's messengers to bring us into his presence.

11,533. ROGUES, City of. King Philip built a city which he named Poneropolis or Rogue-town, and in it he placed a colony of rogues and vagabonds. It is a symbol of the minds of the vicious full of wickedness of every kind and age.

11,534. ROMANISM, Conversion from. A Romanist, in California, was called upon to pray with a dying neighbor. He said he was a Catholic and could read a prayer if he had a book. This was not desired, a praying Methodist was sent for, who came, read the Scriptures, and prayed most fervently, to the great comfort of the dying man. The Romanist went home in thoughtful mood, and related the matter to his family. "This Methodist religion," said he, "is new. I would like to know more about it. This kind of praying has a wonderful effect." In a short time a Bible agent called, and the Romanist purchased a Bible and commenced "searching the Scriptures" with great earnestness. The Spirit wrought conviction in his heart, and his wife and grown-up daughter were equally earnest inquirers after the truth as it is taught in the Gospel. In a few weeks they were all happy in the love of the Saviour.

11,535. ROMANISM, Unscriptural. Papist missionaries went among the New Zealand converts and tried to lead them to worship the Virgin Mary, pray to the saints, and use images. They urged the authority of the Church of Rome, of the supremacy of the pope, of the antiquity of the Romish communion. The New Zealanders knew the Bible, and they heard all this calmly, and gave this memorable answer: "It cannot be true, because it is not in the Book." Ryle says, "All the learning in the world could never have supplied a better answer than that. Latimer, or Knox, or Owen, could never have made a more crushing reply."

11,536. RUBICON, Passing the. When Cæsar undertook the conquest of Italy, the act of crossing the river Rubicon was the first and significant step of the enterprise. Hence the phrase—"to pass the Rubicon"—signifies to take the decisive step by which one is committed to a hazardous or difficult enterprise.

Dr. Webster.

11,537. RUDENESS, Folly of. Nothing is more silly than the pleasure some people take in "speaking their minds." A man of this make will say a rude thing for the mere pleasure of saying it, when an opposite behavior, full as innocent, might have preserved his friend, or made his fortune. Steele.

11,538. RUDENESS Prohibited. A man has no more right to say an uncivil thing than to act one; no more right to say a rude thing to another, than to knock him down. Johnson.

11,539. RUMORS, Spreading. The art of spreading rumors may be compared to the art of pin-making. There is usually some truth, which I call the wire; as this passes from hand to hand, one gives it a polish, another a point, others make and put on the head, and at last the pin is completed. John Newton.

11,540. RUM, Attendant of. At a railroad station recently an anxious inquirer came up to the door of the baggage-car and said: "Is there anything for me?" After some search among boxes and trunks, the baggage-master rolled out a keg of whiskey. "Anything more?" asked the grocer. "Yes," said the baggage-man, "there's a gravestone that goes with that liquor."

11,541. RUMSELLER, Criminality of the. Any young man found drunk should be imprisoned and his term increased for each offence. The man who sells intoxicating beverages is a greater criminal and with less excuse. He goes into the business with a perfect knowledge of the fact that he is going to earn his living by the ruin of his fellow-men. He is morally responsible for the crimes that men commit who are made criminals by him, and he ought to be penally responsible. Every day that he carries on the business is fraught with great evil, since it has nothing in it but the essence of crime and devilry. His name should be written on the list of criminals high above that of murderers, robbers, ravishers, and thieves, as the greatest criminal of them all. Bp. Foster.

11,542. SABBATH, American. Agassiz was asked what impressed him most on his arrival in this country. He answered, "The quiet of an American Sabbath."

11,543. SABBATH, Conditions of Keeping the. Two ministers undertook to correct an indolent young man for Sabbath-breaking. The first spoke solemnly on the command, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." The other said, "You have forgotten one-half of the commandment; 'Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work,' for if a man does not labor six days of the week, he is not likely to rest properly on the seventh."

11,544. SABBATH, Desecration of the. The importance of the religious observance of the Sabbath is seldom sufficiently estimated. The violation of this duty by the young is one of the most decided marks of incipient moral degeneracy. Religious restraint is fast losing its hold upon that young man, who, having been educated in the fear of God, begins to spend the Sabbath in idleness, or in amusement. And so also of communities. The desecration of the Sabbath is one of those evident indications of that criminal recklessness, that insane love of pleasure, and that subjection to the government of appetite and passion, which forebodes that the "beginning of the end" of social happiness, and of true national prosperity, has arrived. Wayland.

11,545. SABBATH, Emblem of the. The green oasis, the little grassy meadow in the wilderness, where, after the week-days' journey, the pilgrim halts for refreshment and repose; where he rests beneath the shade of the lofty palm-trees, and dips his vessel in the waters of the calm, clear stream, and recovers his strength to go forth again upon his pilgrimage in the desert with renewed vigor and cheerfulness. Reade.

11,546. SABBATH, The Last. When that last Sabbath comes—the Sabbath of all creation—the heart, wearied with its tumultuous beatings, shall have rest; the soul, fevered with its anxieties, shall enjoy peace. The Sun of that Sabbath will never set, or hide his splendors in a cloud. The flowers that grow in its light will never fade. Our earthly Sabbaths are but dim reflections of the heavenly Sabbath, cast down upon the earth, dimmed by the transit of their rays from so great a height and so distant a world. The fairest landscapes, or combinations of scenery upon earth, are but the outskirts of the paradise of God, fore-earnests and intimations of that which lies beyond them; and the happiest Sabbath-heart, whose every pulse is a Sabbath-bell, hears but a very inadequate echo of the chimes and harmonies of that Sabbath, that rest, where we "rest not day and night," in which the song is ever new, and yet ever sung.

Dr. Cumming.

11,547. SABBATH-BREAKER, Fate of the. A worldly man, living on the shores of a beautiful lake, built a yacht for pleasure excursions. The minister called upon him, and expressed his fears that it would demoralize the young people, and prove a Sabbath-breaker. The man said, defiantly, "That is just what I'll name my boat. She shall be called the Sabbath-breaker." She was launched upon a Sunday, and her trial trip was made also on a Sunday. Many were invited to the excursion. Her ill-omened name floated on the flag, and caused many to refuse to go on board. A large company went, and mirth and music made them forget their fears. Suddenly, a flaw of wind struck the boat. She capsized, and fifty of her passengers were drowned. Just above the water floated her name, "The Sabbath-breaker."

11,548. SABBATH-BREAKER, Heaven of the. There is a place in Paris, called the Champs-Élysées, or the plain of heaven, a beautiful public walk, with trees and gardens. It is the chief scene of their Sabbath desecration, and an awful scene it is! Oh, thought I, if this be the heaven the Parisian loves, he will never enjoy the pure heaven that is above. M'Cheyne.

11,549. SABBATH BREAKING, Effects of. In New Hampshire there were two neighborhoods—the one of six families, the other of five families. The six families disregarded the Sabbath. In time, five of these families were broken up by the separation of husbands and wives; the other by the father becoming a thief. Eight or nine of the parents became drunkards, one committed suicide, and all came to penury. Of some forty or fifty descendants, about twenty are known to be drunkards and gamblers and dissolute. Four or five have been in State prison. One fell in a duel. Some are in the almshouse. Only one became a Christian, and he after first having been outrageously dissipated. The other five families that regarded the Sabbath were all prospered. Eight or ten of the children are consistent members of the Church. Some of them became officers in the Church; one is a minister of the gospel; one is a missionary to China. No poverty among any of them. The homestead is now in the hands of the third generation. Those who have died, have died in the peace of the gospel. Oh! is there nothing in remembering God's holy day? Talmage.

11,550. SABBATH BREAKING, Excuse for. A Syrian convert to Christianity was ordered by his employer to work on Sunday, but he declined. "But," said the master, "does not the Master say that if a man has an ox or an ass that falls into a pit on the Sabbath day, he may pull him out?" "Yes," answered Hayop, "but if the ass has a habit of falling into the same pit every Sabbath day, then the man should either fill up the pit or sell that ass."

11,551. SABBATH-BREAKING, Legend of. A German legend says that ages ago an old man went into the forest one Sunday morning to cut wood. Having gathered a bundle of sticks he threw it over his shoulder and took his way homeward. He met a man in Sunday clothes, going towards the Church, who asked him, "Do you know that this is Sunday on earth, when all must rest from their labors?" "Sunday on earth or Monday in heaven, it is all the same to me," laughed the Sabbath-breaker. "Then bear your bundle for ever," answered the stranger; "and as you value not Sunday on earth, yours shall be a perpetual Monday in heaven; and you shall stand for eternity in the moon, a warning to all Sabbath-breakers." Thereupon the man was caught up into the moon, where he has stood with the bundle on his back ever since.

11,552. SACRAMENT, Reconciliation before the. George IV. desired the sacrament and sent for the Bishop of Winchester to administer it. He became angry with the messenger he sent, because of what he considered unnecessary delay. He reprimanded the servant, discharged him, and immediately requested the bishop to proceed. This the bishop refused while any anger remained in the king's mind toward any fellow-creature. The king, recollecting himself, said, "My lord, you are right." He then sent for the offending servant, became reconciled to him and restored him to his place, after which the sacrament was duly administered.

11,553. SACRIFICE, Beneficial. If thy foot or thy hand happen to be mortified, thou wilt give money to the surgeon to cut them off. Calypso presented Ulysses with a robe breathing forth the sweet-scented odor of an immortal body, which she put on him as a token of the love she had borne him. But when his ship was cast away and himself ready to sink to the bottom, not being able to keep above the water by reason of his wet robe which weighed him down, he put it off and threw it away. Afterwards he was safely landed, and wanted neither food nor raiment. Plutarch.

11,554. SACRIFICE, Loyal. Xerxes, in fleeing from Greece, took refuge in a boat. So many crowded upon its decks, there was danger of its sinking. Xerxes, seeing the danger, exclaimed, "Since upon you, O Persians, depends the safety of your king, let me know how far you take yourselves to be concerned therein." He had no sooner spoken, before most of them had jumped into the sea, and so insured the life of their king.

11,555. SACRIFICE, A Mother's. An Italian mother felt herself stricken with the plague, and, anxious lest her two boys should be infected, she locked the children into a room, and left the house. She denied herself the pleasure of a last embrace. Her eldest child saw her from the window. "Good-bye, mother," said he, wondering why his mother left him so strangely. "Good-bye, mother," repeated the youngest child, stretching his little hand out of the window. The mother paused; her heart was drawn toward her children, and she was on the point of returning; she struggled hard, while the tears rolled down her cheeks at the sight of her helpless babes. At length she turned from them. The children continued to cry, "Good-bye, mother." The sounds sent a thrill of anguish to her heart; but she pressed on to the pest house, where she died in two days.

11,556. SACRIFICE, Necessity for. Arnot represents Christ as a King's son, who offered himself as a hostage for certain rebellious subjects. He took their place and they were set free. Because they were freed he must bear the punishment due them.

11,557. SACRIFICE, Patriotic. It was told Codrus, the seventeenth king of Athens, that the oracle had promised his enemies, the Dorians and Heraclids, that they should gain a victory over him if his life should be spared. Thereupon, in the year 1068 B. C., he devoted himself to death to save his country.

11,558. SACRIFICE, Prevalence of. Its universal prevalence is an irrefragable evidence of one out of two facts. It is either a proof that the doctrine was taught by the common progenitor of mankind, to whom it was in some way supernaturally communicated; or that it was an instinct implanted by the Author of our being, which, like all other instincts, must meet with its appropriate answer. T. Ragg.

11,559. SACRIFICE, Work not. Dr. Livingstone, in writing of the dangers he had to undergo in his missionary travels in South Africa, said, "I do not mention these privations as if I consider them to be 'sacrifices,' for I think that the word ought never to be applied to anything we can do for him who came down from heaven and died for us."

11,560. SACRILEGE, Punishment of. The spirit of God will not endure to have holy things profaned as if they were common or unclean. Belshazzar converted the consecrated vessels of the temple into instruments of luxury and intemperance; but the Lord tempered his wine with dregs, and made them prove unto him as cups of trembling and astonishment. Herod polluted the sepulchres of the saints with a sacrilegious search for treasures, presumed to have been there hidden, and God made fire rise out of the earth, to devour the over-busy searchers. Antiochus ransacked the temple of the Lord; Heliodorus emptied the treasures of their consecrated money; Pompey defiled the Sabbath and the sanctuary; Crassus robbed the house of God of ten thousand talents. But enquire into the event of these insolences; and we shall find that true then, of which later ages have given many examples and are still likely to give more, that stolen bread hath gravel in it to choke those that devour it—that ruin is ever the child of sacrilege—that mischief setteth a period to the lives and designs of profane men.

Bp. Reynolds.

11,561. SAFETY, A Christian's. A British subject may be safe, although surrounded by enemies in a distant land—not that he hath strength to contend alone against armed thousands, but because he is a subject of our queen. A despot on his throne, a horde of savages in their desert, have permitted a helpless traveler to pass unharmed, like a lamb among lions—although like lions looking on a lamb, they thirsted for his blood—because they knew his sovereign's watchfulness, and feared his sovereign's power. The feeble stranger has a charmed life in the midst of his enemies, because a royal arm unseen encompasses him as with a shield. The power thus wielded by an earthly throne may suggest and symbolize the perfect protection of Omnipotence. A British subject's confidence in his queen may rebuke the feeble faith of a Christian. Arnot.

11,562. SAINTS, Company of the. These glorious citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, he has chosen out of all the tribes of the children of Israel, and out of all nations, without any distinction of Greek or barbarian; persons of all ages, shewing there is no age which is not ripe or fit for heaven; and out of all states and conditions; in the throne, amidst the pomp of worldly grandeur; in the cottage, in the army, in trade, in the magistracy; clergymen, monks, virgins, married persons, widows, slaves, and freemen. In a word, what state is there that has not been honored with its saints? And they were all made saints by the very occupations of their states, and by the ordinary occurrences of life, prosperity and adversity; health and sickness, honor and contempt, riches and poverty—all which they made the means of their sanctification by the constant exercise of patience, humility, meekness, charity, resignation, and devotion. This is the manifold grace of God. He has employed all means; he has set all things at work to shew in ages to come the abundant riches of his grace. How do these happy souls, eternal monuments of God's infinite power and clemency, praise his goodness without ceasing! I will sing to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously, etc. And casting their crowns before his throne, they give to him all the glory of their triumphs. Alban Butler.

11,563. SAINTS, Imitation of the. To animate and encourage ourselves in the vigorous pursuit of Christian perfection, and in advancing towards the glory of the saints, we ought often to lift up our eyes to heaven, and contemplate these glorious conquerors of the world, clothed with robes of immortality, and say to ourselves: "These were once mortal, weak men, subject to passions and miseries as we are now: and if we are faithful to our sacred engagements to God, we shall very shortly be made companions of their glory, and attain to the same bliss." But for this we must walk in their steps; that is to say, we must with them take up our cross, renounce the world and ourselves, and make our lives a course of labor, prayer, and penitence. We are lost if we seek any other path. We must either renounce the world and the flesh with the saints, or we renounce heaven with the wicked. Alban Butler.

11,564. SAINTS, Worship of the. Soon after the coronation of Henry II. of France, a tailor was apprehended for working on a saint's day; and, being asked why he gave such offence to religion, his reply was, "I am a poor man, and have nothing but my labor to depend upon; necessity requires that I should be industrious, and my conscience tells me there is no day but the Sabbath which I ought to keep sacred from labor." He was committed to prison, and being brought to trial, was condemned to be burnt.

11,565. SALVATION, Anxiety for. A vessel struck on the rocks. She had only one life-boat. In that the passengers and the crew were going ashore. The vessel was sinking deeper and deeper. A little girl stood on the deck, waiting for her turn to get into the boat. The boat came and went repeatedly, but her turn did not seem to come. She could wait no longer, and leaped on the taffrail, and then sprang into the sea, crying, "Save me next! Save me next!"

11,566. SALVATION, Condition of. A young lady, while crossing the ice, fell through. A gentleman, hearing her cry for help, hastened to the spot. He put out both hands, saying, "Clasp my hands tightly, and I will save you." She replied, "O, I cannot lift up both hands, one rests upon the ice; were I to raise it I should surely sink." He answered, "Let go your hold upon the ice; trust me, and I will save you; were I to take but one I could not draw you out." She obeyed and he drew her out rejoicing. So Christ waits to save imperiled sinners, but they must give him both hands, and trust him fully.

11,567. SALVATION, Co-operation in. A little girl fell into a cistern, and called loudly for help, when her mother hastened to her rescue. Telling how she was saved, she said, "I reached up as far as I could and mother did the rest." So Christ saves the sinner.

11,568. SALVATION, Earnestness for. A number of years ago a vessel was wrecked. The life-boats were not enough to take all the passengers. A man who was swimming in the water swam up to one of the life-boats that were full and seized it with his hand. They tried to prevent him, but the man was terribly in earnest about saving his life, and one of the men in the boat just drew a sword and cut off his hand. But the man didn't give up; he reached out the other hand. He was terribly in earnest. He wanted to save his life. But the man in the boat took the sword and cut off his other hand. But the man did not give up. He swam up to the boat and he seized it with his teeth. Some of them said, "Let us not cut his head off," and they drew him in. That man was terribly in earnest. His earnestness saved him. Moody.

11,569. SALVATION, False Ways of. They are climbing up a steep precipice of ice, toiling hard and yet slipping backwards as fast they climb. They are pouring water into a cask full of holes, laboring busily, and yet no nearer the end of their work than when they began. They are rowing a boat against a rapid stream, plying the oar diligently, and yet in reality losing ground every minute. They are trying to build up a wall of loose sand, wearing themselves out with fatigue, and yet seeing their work roll down on them as fast as they throw it up. They are trying to pump dry a sinking ship. The water gains on them and they will soon be drowned. Such is the experience, in every part of the world, of all who think to cleanse themselves from their sins. Ryle.

11,570. SALVATION First. A boy was bathing in a river, and, getting out of his depth, was on the point of sinking, when he saw a wayfarer coming by, to whom he called out for help with all his might and main. The man began to read the boy a lecture for his fool-hardiness; but the urchin cried out, "O, save me now, sir! and read me the lecture afterwards." Asop

11,571. SALVATION, Interest in. As we prize any good, so we labor more or less to assure ourselves of it. If a prince should lose a pin from his sleeve or a penny out of his purse, and one should bring him news it is found, the things are so inconsiderable that he would not care whether it were true or not. But if his kingdom lay at stake in the field, and intelligence comes that his army hath got the day, and beaten the enemy, O how he would long to have his hope, that is now raised a little, confirmed more strongly by another post! Is heaven worth so little that you can be satisfied with a few probabilities and uncertainties? Thou basely despisest that blessed place, if thou be no more solicitous to know the truth of thy title to it. At the cost of all else secure that.

Gurnall.

11,572. SALVATION, Life-boat of. A man strolled out to a rock in the sea at ebb-tide, amused himself upon it till he was weary, and lying down to rest, fell asleep. When he awoke the tide returning had cut off his retreat to the shore, and the sea would soon cover the place on which he stood. He could not swim, and had no boat by which to escape. Death confronted him; he raised a signal of distress. It was seen from the shore, and a life-boat hastened to his rescue. He sprang into it, exclaiming, "Thank God, I am saved." This imperiled man represents the sinner; the life-boat is Christ. To yield all to him is to be saved.

11,573. SALVATION, Method of. A poor man, in crossing a heath in the dark, missed his way, and fell into a pit; but, although considerably injured, he was not killed. After being in the pit for some hours, his cries for help brought several persons to his assistance, who threw him the end of a rope, and promised to draw him from his wretched situation, if he would lay hold of it. He did so, and was saved. Now, that poor man, as soon as he saw the rope, believed there was deliverance for him: that was the faith of credence. But when he took hold of the rope, and was delivered, that was the faith of trust or appropriation. Your circumstances, in a spiritual sense, are very similar to those of that man; for you are said to be in "an horrible pit;" but, blessed be God, your Saviour appears at the mouth of the pit; and, calling to you, says, "Whoever believeth in me shall not perish, but have everlasting life." This is the rope he throws down for your rescue; and there is no way of your escaping, but by taking hold of it. You are not merely to credit the promise of salvation thus given, but you must take hold of it; and instantly will your feet be placed upon a rock, and a new song be put into your mouth, even of thanksgiving to your great Deliverer. It is possible that when the unfortunate man saw the rope, he might feel some degree of timidity in trusting himself to it; but when he considered that it was the only way of escape, he would seize it at once, with eagerness of mind and effort becoming his situation. You must do likewise. Venture upon the rope your Saviour offers you; grasp the promise of salvation through the Redeemer's blood; or you will die in the pit, and be eternally lost, there being no other escape.

Dr. Robert Young.

11,574. SALVATION, Neglect of. The saddest road to hell is that which runs under the pulpit, past the Bible, and through the midst of warnings and invitations.

Ryle.

11,575. SALVATION, Only Way of. A traveler relates that among the Alps there is a narrow path along the precipitous slope of a summit, which is crossed by a deep and dark defile. When the guides, one before and another behind the traveler, reach this fearful seam, they pause upon the dizzy edge to reassure his mind; then the leader makes a swing from a projecting rock, and lands upon the opposite side. Immediately turning towards the man he has left, urged forward by his rear-guard, he kneels upon the margin of the abyss, extends his hand over it, and says, "Place your foot there, and trust my arm to bring you over safely." It is done, and in a moment the traveler stands on the solid path, leading into a sweet and smiling landscape among the mountains—"peace reposing in the bosom of strength." This is called "the terrible pass." How forcibly it represents the convicted sinner's transition from disloyalty to reconciliation! He reaches the limit of his own wisdom and strength in seeking peace. Then Jesus bridges the gulf of alienation and death with his scarred hand, and invites the sinner to step by faith thereon, trust his Saviour and be saved. How simple the act! How glorious the result! He is brought over the terrible, dreaded pass, into "a large place," and one full of fragrance and song. Refusing to advance, escape is cut off, and he falls into "the blackness of darkness forever."

Herald of Mercy.

11,576. SALVATION, Quest of. Two brothers visited Pambo, and one said, "Father, I fast twice a week and eat only two loaves; shall I save my soul?" The other said, "I pick two pods of beans and give them in alms daily; shall I save my soul?" He did not answer at once, but at the end of four days, as they were about to depart, he said, "Pambo fasts two days a week and eats only two loaves, and does this make a monk of him? Pambo picks two bean-pods and gives them in alms every day; does that make a monk of him? By no means." After a pause he added, "Keep your conscience void of offence toward God and your neighbor, and so shall ye be saved."

11,577. SALVATION, Tidings of. It is said that after the first announcement of the loss of the steamer Central America, with her hundreds of passengers, a pilot-boat was seen coming up the bay with all sails set and colors flying, and on her deck was unusual excitement. Her captain ran out to the end of the bowsprit, and as the boat neared the dock cried, "Three more saved! Three more saved!" The crowd caught it up and passed it along till every street and avenue of New York echoed with the cry, "Three more saved!"

Who wonders at the joy in heaven over one repenting sinner? The surprise is that all men do not have as great an interest in the salvation of the souls as the bodies of men.

11,578. SALVATION, Unlimited. How rich are the terms Scripture applies to salvation through Jesus. He is able to save them to the uttermost that come to God by him. What can go further than uttermost? Dr. Clarke says, "He is able to save from the power, guilt, nature, and punishment of sin—to the uttermost—to all intents, degrees, and purposes; and always, and in and through all times, places and circumstances; for all this is implied in the original word." The Dutch Bible translates this word "perfectly," the German has it "forever," Dr. L. Van Ess translates it "complete," the Berleburg Bible gives it "most perfectly," the Catholic Bible (German) "eternally," Dr. Stier renders it "most complete." The original word seems to combine the two ideas of continuity and utmost completeness. Hence Jesus saves forever, to the uttermost.

Bp. Yeakel.

11,579. SALVATION, Uttermost. A city missionary was called from his bed at midnight, to meet a half-clothed little girl, who said as she saw him, "Be you the man that preached last night, and said, that Christ could save to the uttermost?" "Yes." "Well, I was there, and I want you to come right down to my house and try to save my poor father?" "What's the matter with your father?" "He's a good father when he don't drink, but he's out of work now, and he drinks awfully. He's almost killed my poor mother; but if Jesus can save to the uttermost, he can save him." Her house, a miserable underground room, without fire, light or furniture of any kind, was soon reached. On a little filthy straw in a corner, lay the bleeding and moaning mother. Her story was the too common one of drink, poverty and hunger. When the drunken father come home and found no supper, he stabbed his wife, and she expected him to return and finish his bloody work. Just then he came in, brandishing his still bloody knife. The missionary began to talk kindly to him and he became subdued. The little girl went up to the missionary, "Don't talk to father; it won't do any good. If talking would have saved him, he would have been saved long ago. You must ask Jesus, who saves to the uttermost, to save my poor father." At this challenge to faith he knelt down and prayed with unwonted power. The murderous father was melted into consciousness and repentance. Mercy was revealed and grace triumphed. That night the demon was cast out; one of the vilest sinners was saved to the uttermost. A new era dawned on that family. The reformed father found work, the mother was made comfortable and recovered, and the little girl was happy in leading her father to the Sunday-school, where he could learn more about him who "saves to the uttermost."

11,580. SANCTIFICATION, Influence of. The strong castle of the soul being taken and sanctified, the tower of the body commanded by it presently yieldeth. When Satan sat on the throne of the soul as king, the members of the body (which the Holy Ghost termed in unregenerate persons "weapons of unrighteousness," Rom. 6: 13), were his militia, and employed to defend his unjust title, to execute his ungodly designs, to perform his hellish pleasure—the head to plot, the hand to act, the feet to run, the eyes to see, the ears to hear, the tongue to speak for him. But, as when an enemy is conquered and a magazine in war is taken, the general maketh use of those arms and the ammunition for his service, which before employed against him: so the strong man Satan, being beaten out of his strongholds by Christ, the stronger than he, the members of the body which before were "instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, are now 'instruments of righteousness unto God' (Rom. 6: 13).

Swinmock.

11,581. SANCTIFICATION, Instantaneous. We are to come to God for an instantaneous and complete purification from all sins, as for instantaneous pardon. In no part of the scriptures are we directed to seek remission of sins seriatim—one now, and another then, and so on. Neither, in any part, are we directed to seek holiness by gradation. Neither a gradation-pardon, nor a gradation-purification, exists in the Bible.

Dr. A. Clark.

11,582. SARDIS, Fate of. Sardis, the capital of Lydia, identified with the names of Croesus, and Cyrus, and Alexander, and covering the plain with her thousands of inhabitants and tens of thousands of men of war—great even in the days of Augustus—ruined by earthquakes, and restored to its importance by the munificence of Tiberius—Christian Sardis, offering her hymns of thanksgiving for deliverance from Pagan persecution in the magnificent temple of the virgin and apostle; Sardis again fallen under the yoke of a false religion, but still retaining her numerous population and powerful defence only five hundred years ago; what is Sardis now? "How doth the city sit solitary that was full of people?" Lam. 1: 1. A few mud huts, inhabited by Turkish herdsmen, and a mill or two, contain all the present population of Sardis.

Arundell.

11,583. SATAN, Arts of. "Satan knows," says an old writer, "what orders thou keepest in thy house and closet; and, though he hath not a key to thy heart, yet he can stand in the next room to it and lightly hear what is whispered there. He hunts the Christian by the scent of his own feet, and, if once he doth smell which way thy heart inclines, he knows how to take the hint."

11,584. SATAN, Enmity of. I was once sailing on the broad Pacific. One day, when the sea was very calm, in looking out upon the water on the Mexican coast, I saw what seemed to be a long, sharp, pointed knife rising above the surface and cutting the water, while it kept along with the ship for an hour or more. On looking narrowly, I saw it was the fin of a shark rising from his back. This creature was following us, ready to catch any one who might fall overboard. It was very large, and had cold, murderous eyes. Thus it was gliding noiselessly along, watching for a chance to do some awful work of blood. So I thought that great enemy of souls, Satan, follows men, hoping to seize them in some unguarded moment, and drag them down to destruction.

Anon.

11,585. SATAN, Give no Advantage to. Alexander of Macedon, having observed that in close fighting the beards of his soldiers gave an advantage to his enemies, ordered them to be cut off, that no handle might be given to the foe. So should Christians renounce even their delights and pleasures, much more their lusts and sins, lest Satan should get advantage of them.

Anon.

11,586. SATAN, Statue of. The statue of the tempter at the side of one of the great doors of Strasburg Cathedral is in my opinion one of the most wonderful products of genius. Those thin, worn, wasted, sharpened features, the so palpable contractions of a once noble face, the compressed ascetic lips, the strange checked smile, the clutching hand seemingly going through the mantle, whose quivering folds thrill in their revelation of the dumb misery within, the twining snake's semi-show, the uneasy resting feet, no one who has looked at earnestly will soon forget. Copies are found elsewhere, e. g. in Basle, and indeed all over the museums of the continent, but they do not approach the profoundly conceived original. The tempter holds the plucked "apple," surely in itself a stroke of intellect.

Grosart.

11,587. SATAN, Subtlety of. The tempter always flings over, at least on the ugliest side, some shred of an angel's garment. An enemy who desired to destroy you by your own deed, would not lead you straight to a yawning precipice, and bid you cast yourself down. He would rather lead you along a flowery path, until you should insensibly be drawn into a spot which would give way beneath you.

Teachers' Treasury.

11,588. SATAN, Ubiquity of. Satan goeth to and fro through the earth; he is an ubiquitary, he stays nowhere. It is the folly of popish votaries, that think to shut themselves up in walls from the temptations of Satan: cloisters are as open to Satan as the open field. Satan walketh to and fro through the earth. Caryl.

11,589. SATAN, Wiles of. There were some young cavaliers in Pompey's army who were exceedingly proud of the beauty of their appearance. Caesar's generals, perceiving this, gave orders that, instead of aiming at their legs and thighs, the javelins should be directed at their faces, that so they might be deprived of sight. This was the very thing they wished to avoid. They could not bear the thought of returning to their homes with deformed features, and, when they saw the gleaming steel dazzling before their eyes, they covered their faces with their hands, turned away their heads, and fled in confusion and infamy from the field. Just that point where we least expect and can least afford to be attacked, and about which we manifest the most pride, Satan will try to reach, that he may not only wound us, but, if possible, also disfigure our character.

Anon.

11,590. SATIETY, Confession of. A French gentleman of wealth and culture who had nothing to do but enjoy himself, sought pleasure in travel. He visited different countries, observing scenes, manners, and men till he became wearied of it. He read much. There was no hindrance to his tasting every source of pleasure, which he did with even better than usual results. After this he says, "I am at a loss what to do. I know not where to go or what to see that I am not already acquainted with. There is nothing new to sharpen my curiosity or stimulate me to exertion. I am sated. Life to me has exhausted its charms. The world has no new face for me, nor can it open any new prospect to my view."

11,591. SATIETY, Examples of. Who aspires to a loftier elevation of honor than that attained by Burke? And yet he says, he would not give one peck of refuse wheat for all that is called fame in this world. What is the declaration of Byron, after having drained the cup of earthly pleasure to its dregs? It is, that his life has been passed in wretchedness, and that he longs to rush into the thickest of the battle, that he may terminate his miserable existence by a sudden death.

H. Southgate.

11,592. SAVED First. "Sir," said an ungodly man to Rev. T. Collins, "I hope to be saved at last." "It would be better, friend," was the reply, "to be saved at first. Let us go down on our knees and seek the blessing now."

11,593. SAVIOUR, A Mother. A child was bitten by a poisonous serpent. Its mother, moved by her own deep love, placed her lips over the wound to suck out the poison. She succeeded, and saved the child's life, but, in so doing, received the poison into her own system through an abrasion of the skin of her lip, and lost her own life.

11,594. SAVIOUR, Omnipresence of the. The city of Ulm, with a garrison of forty thousand, opened its gates and surrendered to Napoleon without firing a gun. Such was the terror inspired by his name and presence. On the same day the naval battle of Trafalgar was fought, and his own navy was ground to pieces. When Napoleon heard of this disaster, he said petulantly, "I cannot be present everywhere at once." In this our leader is superior to all chieftains, for he is with his people in every place.

11,595. SAVIOUR, Praising the. Titus Flaminus freed the Grecians from the bondage with which they had long been oppressed. When the herald proclaimed the articles of peace, the Greeks so pressed upon him he was in danger of losing his life. Reading the agreement the second time to them, and they fully understanding its import, they shouted for joy crying, Σωτηρ, Σωτηρ, "A Saviour, a Saviour," till the heavens rung with their acclamations. All night the Grecians surrounded Titus' tent, and, with songs of praise and instruments of music, extolled him as a god that had delivered them. Flavel says, in applying this, "Ye that have escaped the wrath of God, by the humiliation of his Son, extol your great Redeemer, and forever celebrate his praises."

11,596. SAVIOUR, Remembering the. When the memory of Rev. John Newton was nearly gone, he used to say, that whatever else he might forget, he still remembered two things: 1st. That he was a great sinner; 2d. That Jesus Christ was a great Saviour.

11,597. SCANDAL, Influence of. He that speaks ill of another, commonly before he is aware, makes himself such a one as he speaks against; for if he had civility or breeding, he would forbear such kind of language. John Selden.

11,598. SCANDAL, No Recalling. A woman who freely used her tongue to the scandal of others, made a confession to the priest of what she had done. He gave her a ripe thistle top, and told her to go out and scatter the seeds one by one. She obeyed, and then returned and told her confessor. To her amazement, he bade her go back and gather the scattered seeds; and when she objected that it would be impossible, he replied that it would be still more difficult to gather up and destroy all the evil reports which she had circulated about others.

11,599. SCANDAL, Thoroughfare of. That proverbial saying, "Ill news goes quick and far," was occasioned chiefly by busy, ill-natured men, who very unwillingly hear or talk of anything else. For their ears, like cupping-glasses that attract the most noxious humors in the body, are ever sucking in the most spiteful and malicious reports; and, as in some cities, there are certain ominous gates through which nothing passes but scavengers' carts or the sledges of malefactors, so nothing goes in at their ears or out of their mouths but obscene, tragical, and horrid relations. Plutarch.

11,600. SCAPE-GOAT, Custom of the. Moravian missionaries in Thibet mention this singular custom at Shassa: "Every year the Lama community provide a man of the lowest class, dress him up in goat skin, with the hair outside, and a singular head-dress, and then drive him out of the town to the river, where they lay on him the sins of the whole people. The man has then to cross the river, and live in a wilderness in solitude for some weeks, being abundantly supplied with food during this season. On his return he receives many presents from the people. The disgrace is so great, however, that no one is found voluntarily to go through the ceremony, except in very rare instances. It is a singular analogy to the scape-goat of the Old Testament."

11,601. SCARS, Honorable. I wish to have the honor to die fighting. I would have all my scars in my breast. Methinks I would not be wounded running away, or skulking into a hiding-place. Though I long to go to heaven to see my glorious Master, what a poor figure shall I make among the saints, confessors and martyrs that surround his throne, without some deeper signature of his divine impress, without more scars of Christian honor. I do not envy those who choose to sleep in a whole skin. Whitefield.

11,602. SCEPTICS, Controversies with. The old fable tells us of a boy who mounted a scavenger's cart with base intent to throw dirt at the moon; whereat another boy, with better intentions, but scarcely less folly, came running with a basin of water to wash the moon, and make its face clean again. Certain sceptics are forever inventing new infidelities with which they endeavor to defile the fair face of the gospel, and many ministers forsake the preaching of Christ crucified, to answer their endless quibbles: to both of these the ancient fable may be instructive. Spurgeon.

11,603. SCEPTICS, Reasons of. "It often happens that men who arraign religion have been arraigned by it;" and their defence of scepticism is to justify their own conduct.

11,604. SCHEMES, Advice Regarding. Some are prolific in schemes of usefulness, but are miserably poor in execution. Like some trees, they spend themselves in blossoms, and never yield fruit. A gentleman, last summer, showed me a fine tree in his grounds, which he said he had resolved to cut down; for although for years it had produced finer blossoms than any other tree in his orchard or garden, yet it never bore fruit. He mentioned this to a friend, who said, "The fact is, the tree spends itself in blossoms. I advise you to cut the rind off it, nearly half way round, and it will probably have less blossoms, but it will bear fruit." He did so, and the result was that it afterwards produced more and better fruit than any other tree in the garden. Let me, therefore, advise you to cut some of the rind from your schemes, that they may not spend themselves in blossoms, but may work out the fruits of usefulness. J. Griffin.

11,605. SCIENCE, Joy of. On the 3d of June, 1797, long before the first glimmering of day, there might have been seen in a little Pennsylvania village a young man at his telescope, in pensive silence and trembling anxiety, awaiting the breaking of dawn. The sunlight shoots up over the far, blue hills, clear and golden. The young man intently watches the brightening of day, his telescope poised, and his heart throbbing with emotion. He sees a celestial messenger approaching the sun; he sees a shadow creep slowly, faintly upon the edge of the flaming circle; he sees a dark spot on the limb of the great luminary, creeping slowly, slowly toward the centre. The form of the young man sways to and fro with exhilaration and delight; the deductions of astronomical science are proving true; the prophecies of Kepler are fulfilling. His face becomes as rigid as marble; his eyes grow dim; a sudden darkness sweeps across his brain; Rittenhouse sees Venus crowning the disk of the sun; he sinks back unconscious. Morning Star 11,606. SCOFFER, Judgment on a. The Rev. John Henley, when attempting to preach out of doors, was so persistently disturbed by a rude blasphemer, that he thought it wise to dismiss the congregation with a blessing, subsequently announcing the date upon which he would again be there. "Ay," cried the sot, "and I'll be here with you and put you down again." "God will not let you." "I'll try him," said the ribald. "God will not let you," was firmly repeated. The day came. Henley preached, and the congregation shuddered as ere the service was halfway through, they saw the coffin'd corpse of that shameless man borne past them to its unhonored grave.

T. Collins.

11,607. SCOFFER Rebuked. A lady once completely shut up a pretended freethinker, who had been repeating a number of absurdities to prove that men had no souls. The company seemed contented with staring at him, instead of replying. He addressed this lady, and asked her with an air of triumph, what she thought of his philosophy. "It appears to me, sir," she replied, "that you have been employing a good deal of talent to prove yourself a beast."

Power.

11,608. SCOFFERS, Prophecy of. A little girl engaged in reading her Bible, was accosted by a sceptic with, "Child, you can't understand that book, and it is not true!" Looking at him, she said, "There is one thing in the Bible certainly true." "Pray, what is that?" "The Bible says, 'In the last days shall come scoffers,' and are you one of them?"

11,609. SCOLDING, Perpetuation of. Passionate chiding carries rough language with it, and the names that parents and preceptors give children, they will not be ashamed to bestow on others.

Locke.

11,610. SCORPION, Poison of the. A scorpion was caught by some men in California, who tormented it until, in its rage, it struck itself on its back with its poisonous dart. It immediately grew quiet, and in less than ten minutes died from its own sting.

11,611. SCRIPTURE, Anachronisms in. In one of his finest poems, "Gertrude of Wyoming," Campbell commits a strange anachronism in respect of climate. Forgetting that the valley in which occurred the dark tragedy he celebrates is in the bleak and shaggy uplands of Pennsylvania, he introduces, if I err not, the condor wheeling over its blood-reddened cliff—the flamingo flaming with purple wings through the reeds—the crocodile laving its mailed length in the river—the palm tossing its plume in the glades; none of which by any possibility could be found beneath such an iron sky. Curiously enough, exactly similar slips occur in the writings of the world's greatest minds, as Shakespeare, Milton, Bacon, Sir Thomas Browne. There are no such slips, even the slightest, from beginning to end of the Word of God.

Grosart.

11,612. SCRIPTURE, Comments on. It is something like good Mr. Mason's notes in Bunyan's "Pilgrim." He asked one of his parishioners once, "Have you ever read Bunyan's 'Pilgrim'?"—and do you understand the volume?" "Oh yes!" was the reply, "I understand the book well enough; and I hope by the grace of God, one of these days, I shall be able to understand your explanations of it!" So I doubt not many of our hearers will say, "I understand the text, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved,' and do not doubt one day I shall understand your explanation of it."

Spurgeon.

11,613. SCRIPTURE, Frame Work of. The historical matters of Scripture, both narrative and prophecy, constitute the bones of its system; whereas the spiritual matters are its muscles, blood-vessels and nerves. As the bones are necessary to the human system, so Scripture must have its historical matters. The expositor who nullifies the historical ground-work of Scripture for the sake of finding only spiritual truths everywhere, brings death on all correct interpretation.

J. A. Bengel.

11,614. SCRIPTURE, Freshness of the. Mr. Geo. Müller, founder of the Orphan Home, England, says, "In forty-six years I have read my Bible through a hundred times; yet it is always fresh and new when I begin it again."

11,615. SCRIPTURE, Misuse of. Ireneus likens the Gnostics' dealing with Scripture, their violent transpositions of it—till it became altogether a different thing in their hands—to their fraud, who should break up some work of exquisite mosaic, wrought by a skillful artificer to present the effigy of a king, and should then recompose the pieces upon some wholly different plan, and make them to express some vile image of a fox or dog, hoping that, since they could point to the stones as being the same, they should be able to persuade the simple that this was the king's image still.

Trench.

11,616. SCRIPTURE, Treasures of. Place yourself in imagination by the side of an Australian gold-digging, and observe the earth that is drawn up from its bottom. It is likely that your unpractised eye will see nothing in that heap but rubbish, and dirt and stones. And yet that very heap of earth may prove, on washing, to be full of particles of the purest gold. It is just the same with the Bible. We shall find hereafter that every verse of it contained gold.

Ryle.

11,617. SCRIPTURES, Power of the. A native African preacher said, "We know that rocks are very hard. Our cutlasses and hoes can do nothing against them, so we leave them alone. But white people have something that can break up and scatter any rock in Uwet or Umon. You will admit that something must be more powerful than rocks. So we all know what country, laws and customs are; we cannot change them, so we leave them alone. But a thing has come to Calabar, even God's word, and it has broken up and scattered customs that our fathers thought would remain forever! What must you say concerning that word but that it is more powerful than the customs of our country? You know how strong your hearts are. Hearts as strong as yours have been changed in our town, have been changed by this word; and what must you, therefore, say but that this word is more powerful than a Calabar heart? Bend your heads, then, before this word."

11,618. SEA, Authority over the. Thomas Mann, a waterman on the Thames, being once employed to row a party, one of the number proposed singing, "Rule Britannia." Mann remarked, that he had heard Mr. Newton say, "God rules the waves, not Britannia."

11,619. SEA-VOYAGE, Lesson from a. Save only that we were mercifully preserved from peril, we had in our eleven days' voyage a compression of the experience of all possible voyages. I could not help thinking that it set forth in similitude the history of many a Christian life. Calm at the start; broken and troubled water when the Atlantic surges met us; heavy gales, blowing furiously against our progress; a sea majestic in its wrath, now making the ship to shake with trembling, now drenching it with showers of spray; the presence of three large icebergs, beautiful, but dangerous neighbors; a shroud of fog, which wrapped the heavens from our sight for a day and a half, during which the dreary fog-horn groaned out its dirge-like sound; calmer water as we approached the land, and then a brilliant sun, and a sea of exquisite beauty, as we sailed through the Narrows, and anchored in the fair haven. Do you not think that there are in our voyage the elements of a perpetual sermon? What heart, which has any experience of the things of God, does not understand this vicissitude within itself? How often is the fair start for heaven clouded soon by opposition and difficulty; then the blasts of persecution are fierce, and the billows of passion are angry. Then the heart is frosted by the world's chill neighborhood, or darkened by the gathering doubts which heap their shadows round it. Oh, that the similitude may be carried on to the end! calm water coming with the latest sunrise, and an "abundant entrance" and a joyous welcome at last! Punshon.

11,620. SEAL, Use of the. The 3d chapter of John and the 33d verse: "He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true." "He that hath received his testimony—his," that is, God's testimony—hath set to his seal that God is true." In the old days men used to wear a ring, a signet ring, and instead of signing their names to a document, they used to take that ring and sign that document, and so Christ uses that as an illustration. Now, Christ says if you will set to your seal that God is true, he will believe it. You then set to your seal that God is true. Moody.

11,621. SEASON, Word in. A traveler came suddenly upon a minister, who sat upon a seat on an eminence from which a beautiful landscape was to be seen. He expressed his surprise and admiration of the view, and branched off to speak of scenes in Switzerland, interlard-

ing his descriptions, with frequent oaths "That," said he, "is the place to make a man happy! It would make you happy, indeed, to be there." The minister answered, seriously, "I perceive, sir, it has not made you happy." The traveler wondered how this stranger should know anything about him, and asked to know the reason of his remark. The minister answered, "It is evident from the manner in which you alluded to God. How a human being, estranged from him, the only source of real happiness, can be happy, is a problem yet to be solved. Solve it if you can." It was an opportune word uttered by the ready Dr. J. Leifchild.

11,622. SECRETS, Undesirable. Philippides, the comedian, being asked by King Lysimach us, what he desired should be given to him, answered, "Anything but a secret."

11,623. SECTS: None in Heaven. Mr. Whitefield, on one occasion, was preaching earnestly in Philadelphia, from the balcony of the court-house, when suddenly he cried out, "Father Abraham, whom have you in heaven? Any Episcopalians?" "No." "Any Presbyterians?" "No." "Have you any Independents or Seceders?" "No." "Have you any Methodists there?" "No, no, no." "Whom have you there?" "We don't know those names here. All who are here are Christians—believers in Christ—men who have overcome by the blood of the Lamb and the word of his testimony." "O, is this the case?" said Whitefield; "then God help me, God help us all, to forget party names, and to become Christians in deed and in truth!"

11,624. SECURITY, False. Security has been the ruin of multitudes, both in temporal and spiritual things. Commerce, warfare, the lives of families and of nations are full of stories of the wreck and ruin which false security has caused. In the spiritual life, some of the greatest falls have come by it; some of the greatest successes have been missed by it; it is one of the most powerful weapons in Satan's hands when used at the proper time; and that time he accurately knows. Power.

11,625. SECURITY, Vain. Why will God's children build Babels? Why will they flatter themselves that God owns and approves of them because he suffers them to build high? In mercy to them, such building must come down. Lay your foundation deep in the knowledge of yourself, and you cannot build too high. Whitefield.

11,626. SEED, Fruitful. The botanist Ray tells us that he counted 2,000 grains of maize on a single plant of maize sprung from one seed, 4,000 seeds on one plant of sun-flower, 32,000 seeds on a single poppy plant, and 36,000 seeds on one plant of tobacco. Pliny tells us that a Roman governor in Africa sent to the Emperor Augustus a single plant of corn with 340 stems, bearing 340 ears; that is to say, at least 60,000 grains of corn, had been produced from a single seed. In modern times 12,780 grains have been produced by a single grain of the famous corn of Smyrna. In eight years as much corn might spring from one seed as to supply all mankind with bread for a year and a half.

Gaussen.

11,627. SEED, A Random. Rev. Mr. Grinnell, a missionary among the early settlers of the state of New York, gave a boy, whose religious education had been neglected, a sixpence to read the third chapter and third verse of John over three times. Twenty years later, passing through a poor section of the same State, he met a man who told him his experience including the gift of the sixpence as above. The verse "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God," followed him for many years, and finally led him to Christ.

11,628. SEED, Scattering. Philip Henry said to the minister of Broad Oaks, on meeting him, "I have been making bold to throw a handful of seed into your ground." "Thank you, sir," said he; "God bless it, and may it make work enough for us both!"

11,629. SEED, Self-Sowing. The self-propagating power of herbs and plants, by means of their seeds, is an admirable provision of the Creator for the perpetuation of their species. If there were not a man upon the earth, they would still clothe it with verdure and adorn it with beauty. For not only is the seed produced in itself, but sown by itself, also. In countless ways, and in a diversity of operations, it is its own sower. Sometimes it is found on the summit of elastic spires, to be agitated by the winds, which, when it is fully prepared, carry it forth in currents of air even to other regions. Sometimes birds of the air and beasts of the field convey it in their systems to different places by a mysterious process, which prevents it, while administering to their nourishment, from being injured, and even helps to its being quickened in its vegetative powers. It even floats upon the water as well as upon the air, in which case it is provided with a covering which is insoluble, and operates not until it strikes against some hard substance and is broken, when it lets forth its contents, which adhere to the substance; and by this means the dry coral rocks are clothed with verdure, and the island raised above the surface of the ocean adorned with a living green.

Dr. Leifchild.

11,630. SEED, Treatment of the. There are two ways of treating the seed. The botanist splits it up, and discourses on its curious characteristics: the simple husbandman eats and sows; sows and eats. Similarly there are two ways of treating the gospel. A critic dissects it, raises a mountain of debate about the structure of the whole, and relation of its parts; and when he is done with his argument, he is done; to him the letter is dead; he neither lives on it himself, nor spreads it for the good of his neighbors; he neither eats nor sows. The disciple of Jesus, hungering for righteousness, takes the seed whole; it is bread for to-day's hunger, and seed for to-morrow's supply.

W. Arnot.

11,631. SEEKING THE LORD, Time for. A young man sentenced to death said, two days before his execution, "I am afraid that nothing but the fear of death and hell makes me seek the Saviour now, and that I cannot expect to find him. The words, 'Seek ye the Lord while he may be found,' trouble my mind very much, as they show me that there is a time when he may not be found."

11,632. SELF, Danger of. Do you want to know the man against whom you have most reason to guard yourself? Your looking-glass will give you a very fair likeness of his face.

Whately.

11,633. SELF, Idolatry of. Oh if I could be master of that house-idol, myself, mine own wit, will, credit, and ease, how blessed were I! We have need to be redeemed from ourselves, as much as from the devil and the world. Learn to put out yourselves, and put in Christ for yourselves. I should make a good bargain, and give old for new, if I could turn out self, and substitute Christ my Lord in place of myself; to say, "Not I, but Christ; not my will, but Christ's; not my lusts, not my credit, but Christ, Christ."

John Flavel.

11,634. SELF-CONCEIT, Example of. There is an account of one Chrysippus who was famous only for his conceit. A neighbor asked him to whom he should send his son for instruction, "To me," he said, "if I did but imagine that any person excelled myself, I would read philosophy under him."

11,635. SELF-CONTROL, Absence of. Peter the Great made a law that if any nobleman beat or ill-treated his slaves, he should be looked upon as insane, and a guardian appointed to take care of his person and of his estate. This great monarch once struck his gardener, who, being a man of keen sensibility, took to his bed, and died in a few days. Peter, hearing of this, exclaimed, with tears in his eyes, "Alas! I have civilized my own subjects, I have conquered other nations, yet I have not been able to conquer or civilize myself."

11,636. SELF-CONTROL, Philosophic. A young man desired to become the disciple of a philosopher and attend his lectures. "Go first," said he, "to the marble quarries and carry stones for three years, among the malefactors condemned to the mines." He did so and reported to the philosopher at the end of the time. He was sent back to repeat his experience, and to pay money to those who should most bitterly insult and revile him, but to make no answer. He obeyed, and after another three years reported to his tutor. He was told that he might now go to Athens and be initiated into the schools of the philosophers. At the city gate an old man sat, who made it his business to abuse all who passed. The young man said nothing, but laughed to hear himself so outrageously abused. The old man asked the reason for his conduct. He said, "I have given money these three years to all who have treated me as you do; and shall I not laugh now it costs me nothing to be reviled?" The old man answered, "Welcome to the schools of philosophy! You are worthy of a seat in them." He added, "Behold the gate of heaven. All the faithful servants of the Lord have entered into this joy by suffering injuries and humiliations with meekness and patience." It is related of many that they have so disciplined themselves as to be able to endure reviling opposition or slight without the least emotion of anger or resentment, by the power of philosophy alone.

11,637. SELF-ESTEEM, Rebuke to. The tombs about Alexandria contain the remains of once proud princes as well as the dust of plebeians. This has been taken out and sold as a fertilizer, and is known in the trade as "Egyptian guano." Four thousand years ago no pains or cost was spared to honor this dust now so dishonored.

11,638. SELF-EXAMINATION, Daily. Daily examination is an antidote against the temptations of the following day, and constant examination of ourselves after duty is a preservative against vain encroachments in following duties; and upon the finding them out, let us apply the blood of Christ by faith for our cure, and draw strength from the death of Christ for the conquest of them, and let us also be humbled. God lifts up the humble; when we are humbled for our carnal frames in one duty, we shall find ourselves by the grace of God more elevated in the next. Charnock.

11,639. SELF-EXAMINATION, Fearing. As it is an evidence that those tradesmen are embarrassed in their estates, who are afraid to look into their books; so it is plain that there is something wrong within, among all those who are afraid to look within. Secker.

11,640. SELF-EXAMINATION, Method of. To take a distinct and orderly survey of all duties, that of Xenophon will be good direction, who said that it was the manner of discreet housekeepers to place their weapons of war, utensils for the kitchen, instruments of husbandry, and furniture for religious services, each in several and proper repositories. So every man that would make an exact inquiry into, and take a just account of himself, should first make a particular search into the several mischiefs that proceed from each passion within him, whether it be envy or jealousy, covetousness or cowardice, or any other vicious inclinations; and then distribute and range them all (as it were) into distinct apartments. This done, make thy reviews upon them with the most accurate inspection, so that nothing may divert thee from the severest scrutiny. Putarch.

11,641. SELF-EXAMINATION, Necessity of. The reason why there is so little self-condemnation, is because there is so little self-examination. For want of it many are like travelers skilled in other countries, but ignorant of their own.

11,642. SELF-EXAMINATION, Standard for. The conscience of the natural man is like a fraudulent man with false weights and measures, from whom we shall be sure to have no just weight. We must therefore take the golden balance of the sanctuary. Here, indeed, even our best services, when weighed with the law of God, will be found wanting; but the fullness of the redemption in the blood of Jesus—the freeness of his promises to every repenting sinner—the merit of his sinless obedience—these, on which the believer builds his hopes, however nicely weighed in the balance of truth, will want nothing of that true weight which the justice of God will demand at our hands.

Salter
11,643. SELF-EXAMINATION, Use of. A Highlander bought a barometer and afterwards complained that it made no improvement in the weather. Self-examination will be of no advantage unless it reveals our failures and deficiencies and incites us to improvement. The examination of symptoms without taking the doctor's remedy is useless.

11,644. SELF-IMPORTANCE, Rebuke of. William Penn and Thomas Story once took shelter beneath a house in Pennsylvania, from the rain. The owner came forth with great pomp of manner, and said, "How dare you take shelter here without my leave? Do you know who I am? I am the mayor of this place." "Pooh! pooh!" said Friend Story, "my friend here makes such things as thou art: he is the Governor of Pennsylvania."

11,645. SELFISHNESS, Common. How many are there who occupy public places with private spirits! While they pretended to under take everything for the good of others; it has appeared, that they undertook nothing but for the good of themselves. Such suckers at the roots have drawn away the sap and nourishment from the tree. They have set kingdoms on fire, that they might roast their own venison at the flames. These drones stealing into the hive have fed upon the honey; while the laboring bees have been famished. Too many resemble ravenous birds, which at first seem to bewail the dying sheep; but at last, are found picking out their eyes. These people never want fire, so long as any yard affords fuel. They enrich their own sideboards with other men's plate. There is a proverb, but none of Solomon's, "Every man for himself, and God for us all." But where every man is for himself, the devil will have all. Whosoever is a seeker of himself, is not found of God. Though he may find himself in this life, he will lose himself in death. Secker.

11,646. SELFISHNESS Punished. Old Churchill was riding on horseback, when he met an old woman who had not so many of this world's good things as he. He handed her a quarter of a dollar and rode on. He had ridden only a short distance, when he soliloquized thus: "Now, shouldn't I have done better if I had kept my money and bought myself something?" Wheeling his horse, he rode back to the old lady and said: "Give me that money!" She handed it to him. Placing it in his wallet, and at the same time handing her a five-dollar bill, he exclaimed: "There, self, now I guess you'll wish you had kept still."

11,647. SELFISHNESS, Unhappiness of. It is curious to observe how people who are always thinking of their own pleasure or interest will often, if possessing considerable ability, make after he had looked into the blank amazement of Sir Astley's face. "I," said the Englishman, "saved eleven out of the thirteen. How many did you save out of one hundred and sixty?" "Ah, monsieur, I lose dem all, but de operation was very brilliant." Such is the effect of many brilliant sermons.

11,657. SERMONS, Done. I remember our countryman, Bromeard, tells us of one who, meeting his neighbor coming out of the church, asked him, "What! is the sermon done?" "Done," said the other, "no: it is said, it is ended, but it is not so soon done." And surely so it is with us: we have good store of sermons said, but we have only a few that are done: and one sermon done is worth a thousand said and heard; for, "not the hearers of the law, but the doers of it are justified." And "if ye know these things, blessed are ye if ye do them." "Glory, honor, and peace to every man that worketh good!" Bp. Hall.

11,658. SERMONS, Effective. Joseph Benson preached a sermon in Cornwall, to a large congregation in the open air, through which five hundred people professed religion and joined the Wesleys. Seventy-six persons attributed their conversion to a single sermon by a Canadian minister. Thirty-six souls were reported saved by another sermon, and twenty-eight by another. Eighty-four by another.

11,659. SERMONS, Fine. Samuel Wesley wrote to his curate: "I sincerely hate what some people call a fine sermon, with just nothing in it. I cannot help thinking that it is very much like our fashionable poetry—polite nothing." John Wesley says: "I could write as floridly as the admired Dr. South, but I dare not. I would no more preach a fine sermon than wear a fine coat."

11,660. SERMONS, Helps to. I think it were well for their congregations if some of our Scotch ministers, who are not specially gifted as preachers, though very good pastors, would, without being slavish copyists, draw to a large extent on the rich stores of the old or foreign divines, or Puritan Fathers. Dr. Guthrie.

11,661. SERMONS, Length of. There is much ado being made just now about the proper length of sermons. The rule seems to be, as deduced from a vast number of particular facts and opinions, that the length of a sermon should be equal to its breadth and depth. It should be, in fact, the square thing. It ought not to be measured by the linear foot, as men measure tape and ribbons, but by the cubic foot, as men measure wheat and other grain. If it has no depth, it ought to have no length. Witness.

11,662. SERMONS, Making. A young clergyman once visited Dr. Bellamy, and inquired, "What shall I do to supply myself with matter for my sermons?" The doctor quaintly replied: "Fill up the cask, fill up the cask, fill up the cask; and then, if you tap it anywhere, you will get a good stream. But if you put in but little, it will dribble, dribble, dribble, and you must tip, tip, tip, and then you get but little after all."

11,663. SERMONS, Materials for. A young man in one of our seminaries came to me and said, "I have been trying very hard to write a sermon, and I find it the most difficult thing in the world to do." I said to him, "My dear young friend, were you ever at a mill? Do you know what the hopper and bin are? Suppose the miller should rouse his hands, set the stones going, hang the bags on the hooks at the bin, and then stand wondering why he does not get any meal." Some one says to him, "Why, you have forgotten to put corn in the hopper!" My dear young man, you cannot get meal at the bin till you put corn in the hopper. Dr. S. H. Tyng.

11,664. SERMONS, Preparation of. I used the simplest, plainest terms, avoiding anything vulgar, but always, where possible, employing the Saxon tongue—the mother tongue of my hearers. I studied the style of the addresses which the ancient and inspired prophets delivered to the people of Israel, and saw how, differing from dry disquisition or a naked statement of truths, they abounded in metaphors, figures, and illustrations. I turned to the gospels, and found that he who knew what was in man, what could best illuminate a subject, win the attention, and move the heart, used parables or illustrations, stories, comparisons, drawn from the scene of nature and familiar life, to a large extent in his teachings in regard to which a woman—type of the masses—said, "The parts of the Bible I like best are the 'likes.'" Taught by such models, and encouraged in my resolution by such authorities, I resolved to follow, though it should be at a vast distance, these ancient masters of the art of preaching; being all the more ready to do so as it would be in harmony with the natural turn and bias of my own mind. I was careful to observe by the faces of my hearers, and also by the account the more intelligent of my Sunday class gave of my discourses, the style and character of those parts which had made the deepest impression, that I might cultivate it. After my discourse was written, I spent hours in correcting it; latterly always for that purpose keeping a blank page on my manuscript opposite a written one, cutting out dry bits, giving point to dull ones, making clear any obscurity, and narrative parts more graphic, throwing more pathos into appeals, and copying God in his works by adding the ornamental to the useful. The longer I have lived and composed, I have acted more and more according to the saying of Sir Joshua Reynolds in his lectures on "Paintings," that God does not give excellence to men but as the reward of labor. Dr. Guthrie.

11,665. SERMONS, Providential. Dr. Jamieson, of Edinburgh, sought for two days for a text, but failed to select one up to the time of opening his Bible to preach. As he did this his eyes rested on Ps. 32: 1, "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." He spoke extemporaneously with great enlargement. Next morning a woman called on him, who said that she had doubted

God and the Bible, and that during the previous week she resolved to discard religion and burn her Bible unless the preacher preached from the before-mentioned text.

11,666. SERMONS, Reading. Norman McLeod was once preaching in a district where the reading of a sermon is regarded as the greatest fault of which the minister can be guilty. When the congregation dispersed, an old woman, overflowing with enthusiasm, addressed her neighbor: "Did ye ever hear any thing sae gran? Wasna that a sermon?" But all her expressions of admiration being met by a stolid glance, she shouted, "Speak, woman! wasna that a sermon?" "Oh, ay," replied her friend, sulkily, "but he read it." "Read it!" said the other, with indignant emphasis; "I wadna hae cared if he had whustled it."

11,667. SERMONS, Repeating. An old divine says, "The minister cannot be always preaching: two or three hours maybe in a week he spends among his people in the pulpit, holding the glass of the gospel before their faces; but the lives of professors, these preach all the week long; if they were but holy and exemplary, they would be as a repetition of the preacher's sermon to their families and neighbors among whom they converse, and keep the sound of his doctrine continually ringing in their ears. This would give Christians an amiable advantage in doing good to their carnal neighbors by counsel and reproof, which now is seldom done, and when done it proves to little purpose, because not backed with their own exemplary walking."

11,668. SERMONS, Successful. I once said to myself in the foolishness of my heart, "What sort of sermon must that have been which was preached by St. Peter, when three thousand souls were converted at once?" What sort of sermon?—such as other sermons: there is nothing to be found in it extraordinary. The effect was not produced by St. Peter's eloquence, but by the mighty power of God, present with his Word. Cecil.

11,669. SERVANT, A Devout. Isidore, the patron saint of Madrid, whose festival is held there on the 10th of May, attended by the ringing of bells, processions and joyous festivities, was only a common farm servant who did not forget the heavenly Master while serving the earthly. His fellow servants accused him to their master of being late at his work. When charged with this, he replied, "It may be true that I am later at my work than some of the other laborers, but I do my utmost to make up for the few minutes snatched for prayer. I pray you, compare my work with theirs, and if I have defrauded you in the least gladly will I make amends by paying you out of my private store." The master was silent, but not satisfied, and resolved to see for himself. Next morning he hid himself in the field to which the servant was assigned. He was later than the others in starting his plough, and the indignant master resolved to rate him soundly. He started to do this, but was rested by a strange vision. In the clear sunlight he saw a pair of white oxen drawing a plough, held by an angel. Up the field and down the field quickly passed the strange team, turning a clean furrow. The master started to go to Isidore, whom he saw bowing over his plough, while his boy drove the oxen, when the vision vanished. The master asked him who his assistants were. The surprised ploughman answered, "Sir, I work alone, and know of none save God, to whom I look." This legend enshrines a grand truth—God helps those who honor him.

11,670. SERVICE, Ceaseless. The stream has been turning yonder mill-wheel for years without wearying or complaint. The brook has been going on for ages, spreading fertility and beauty over all its borders, and will "go on forever." So let thy Christian service be uncomplaining, beneficent, ceaseless.

11,671. SERVICE, Honor of. A victor at the Olympic games was asked, "Spartan, what will you get by this victory?" He answered, "I shall have the honor to fight foremost in the ranks of my prince." Hard service brings promotion, danger, responsibility, and requires increased effort.

11,672. SHADOW, Measuring Time by the. "The people of the East measure time by the length of their shadow. Hence if you ask a man what o'clock it is, he immediately goes in the sun, stands erect, then looks where his shadow terminates; he measures the length with his feet, and tells you nearly the time. Thus they earnestly desire the shadow, which indicates the time for leaving their work. A person wishing to leave his toil often cries out, 'How long my shadow is in coming!' When asked, 'Why did you not come sooner?' his answer is, 'Because I waited for my shadow.'" Roberts.

11,673. SHAME, Allegory of. Guilt and Shame (says the allegory) were at first companions, and in the beginning of their journey inseparably kept together. But their union was soon found to be disagreeable and inconvenient to both: Guilt gave Shame frequent uneasiness, and Shame often betrayed the secret conspiracies of Guilt. After a long disagreement, therefore, they at length consented to part forever. Guilt boldly walked forward alone, to overtake Fate, that went before in the shape of an executioner; but Shame, being naturally timorous, returned back to keep company with Virtue, which in the beginning of their journey they had left behind. Thus, after men have traveled through a few stages in vice, Shame forsakes them, and returns back to wait upon the few virtues they have still remaining.

Goldsmith.

11,674. SHAMS, Popular. Empty chests, boxes and drawers painted brilliantly and lettered in gold, make a fine display on the shelves of the apothecary and the merchant. The bottles being transparent, can be easily filled with a little tinted water. Fruits, vegetables, and meats are so perfectly imitated that the sham does not appear to the casual observer. Sham are everywhere. There are business shams, political shams, society shams, literary shams and religious shams, worthless trash put up for exhibition. It is a losing business. The deception will soon be detected, and he who practices it be dishonored beyond retrieve.

11,675. SHEEP, The Lost. "As I came over, the heath, I noticed a solitary sheep, which had evidently wandered from its fold. It bleated piteously, and was scared at every sound, and every shadow. It seemed to be calling for its companions, and vainly trying to recover and retrace the path, by which it had so rashly strayed from its home. I went towards the poor wanderer; but it fled from a stranger; and would probably have perished in that solitude, had not the shepherd missed it from the fold, and come in time to seek it. As soon as he espied it from a distance, he hastened towards it; and the sheep, aware of his kindly purpose, suffered him to come near, and take it in his arms. He raised it on his shoulders, and bore it away rejoicing." It is a true emblem of the lost sinner.

11,676. SHEPHERD, Faithfulness of the. Many adventures with wild beasts still occur. There are wolves in abundance, and leopards and panthers exceeding fierce, prowl about those wild wadies in the region of Tyre. They not unfrequently attack the flock in the very presence of the shepherd, and he must be ready to do battle at a moment's warning. And when the thief and robber come (and come they do), the faithful shepherd has often to put his life in his hand to defend his flock. A poor, faithful fellow between Tiberius and Tabor, instead of fleeing, actually fought three Bedouin robbers, until he was hacked to pieces with their khanjars, and died among the sheep he was defending. Thomson.

11,677. SHEPHERD, Voice of the. A traveler asserted to an eastern shepherd, that the sheep knew the dress of their master, not his voice. The shepherd to refute the point changed dresses with the traveler. He went among the sheep with the shepherd's dress, called the sheep, and tried to lead them, but they knew not his voice, and never moved. But when the shepherd called, though in a strange dress, they ran at once to him. "A stranger will they not follow."

11,678. SHOES: Oriental Custom. "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Exod. 3: 5. This putting off the shoes is an invariable custom in the East as an act of courtesy or reverence. The Mussulman on entering his mosque, the Oapt in passing into his church, leaves his shoes at the door; it is, indeed, common to all Orientals in the act of worship; nor that alone, for it is done as a mark of respect on appearing before a superior.

Sunday at Home.

11,679. SICK, Exposure of the. In the most ancient times the custom was to exhibit the sick in public places that benevolent persons or others who had suffered from the same disease, or had labored for such, might communicate a remedy. In this way the science of medicine began. If people with moral infirmities would do the same, many a sick soul would be cured.

11,680. SICK, Healing the. When Myconius was very ill, apparently sick unto death, he wrote to Luther. On reception of the letter, Luther fell on his knees, and prayed, "O Lord, my God! no, thou must not take yet our brother Myconius to thyself; thy cause will not prosper without him. Amen." He then wrote to his sick friend, "There is no cause for fear, dear Myconius; the Lord will not let me hear that thou art dead. You shall not, and must not die. Amen." This letter aroused Myconius so that an ulcer upon his lungs discharged, and he was healed.

11,681. SICKNESS, Admonition of. Antigonus, successor to Alexander, after recovering from a severe illness, said, "It has done me no harm, for it has taught me not to be so proud by putting me in mind that I am but a mortal man."

11,682. SICKNESS, Chamber of. It may be said, that disease generally brings that equality which death completes. The distinctions which set one man so far above another, are very little preserved in the gloom of a sick-chamber, where it will be in vain to expect entertainment from the gay, or instruction from the wise; where all human glory is obliterated, the wit clouded, the reason perverted, and the hero subdued; where the highest and brightest of mortals find nothing left but consciousness and innocence. Addison.

11,683. SICKNESS, Joy in. A sick man said, "Days, weeks, and months have rolled round during my affliction, and I have scarcely known the night from the day, nor the day from the night, so rapidly and joyfully have the hours escaped me; I have felt nothing but joy and love; not for a moment have I been impatient or weary, or wished it otherwise with me, so marvelously has God wrought in me. This is the hand of God. This never grew in nature's soil."

11,684. SICKNESS, Recovery from. I was near port, but have put out to sea again. O, that it may be to pilot in some more dear souls! May we at last enter port with a full gale! We are sure of getting safe at last into the harbor, for Jesus is our pilot. Whitefield.

11,685. SIGHT, Danger of. There is a legend which represents St. Bridget as engaged in holy conversation as the sun went down with a devout, but blind nun called Dara. They talked of the love of Jesus and the joys of paradise, unconscious of the passing hours till the sun rose next morn and spread its golden light over a beautiful landscape. Then Bridget wished that Dara might see all this beauty. She prayed and touched Dara's eyes and they were healed. Dara looked up at the golden sun, at the trees and flowers adorned with dew drops that flashed like jewels, and out upon the joyous world. After a little while she said, "Close my eyes again, for when the world is so visible to the eyes, God appears less clearly to the soul." Then Bridget prayed again and Dara's blindness returned, A. D. 525.

11,686. SIGHT, Recovery of. A poor blind man, who had a wife and children whom he had never seen, sought a cure quite late in life, from a skillful physician. His opinion was that his sight might be restored, but with considerable suffering and risk. "I will submit to anything; I will endure anything, if I can only see," said the man. The operation was successfully performed. Gradually the light was admitted till his eyes were strong enough to look upon his wife and children. He called them to him, and required them to speak, that he might be assured of the reality of his newly-found faculty. He looked out upon the earth and up to the heavens, and his heart was filled with amazement and gladness. Then he said, "Bring me the doctor who has opened this glorious world to me; I love him better than all else." We are all blind. Christ can open our eyes and enable us to say, "Whereas I was blind, now I see."

11,687. SIGHT, Superiority of. Sight is the short road to knowledge, it is also the direct path to love; the eye is the first, the readiest, the surest of instructors. Why do we say "Example is better than precept?" The one appeals to the eye, the other to the ear, and the eye is quicker than the ear. A. B. Evans.

11,688. SILENCE, Bad. Silence is an excellent thing, but people who hold their tongues should not always account themselves silent. If their minds are occupied with their neighbor's short-comings, their silence is as bad as sensible chattering. Poemen.

11,689. SILENCE, Compulsory. Zeno, that he might not be compelled by the tortures of his body to betray, against his will, the secrets entrusted in his breast, bit off his tongue, and spit it in the tyrant's face. Plutarch.

11,690. SILENCE, Wisdom of. The lion called the sheep to ask her if his breath smelt; she said, "Ay;" he bit off her head for a fool. He called the wolf and asked him. He said "No;" he tore him in pieces for a flatterer. At last he called the fox, and asked him. Truly he had got a cold, and could not smell. Æsop.

11,691. SILENCE, Wise. In a certain assembly, when Demaratus was asked whether he held his tongue because he was a fool, or for want of words, replied, "A fool cannot hold his tongue." Plutarch.

11,692. SIN, Ashamed of. Mr. Perkins, afterwards a very excellent and useful minister, when a student at Cambridge, was much given to the indulgence of sin, from which he was reclaimed in a very remarkable manner. Passing along one of the streets of that town, he overheard a woman say to her peevish child, "Hold your tongue, or I will give you to drunken Perkins yonder." This led him to resolve on reformation, and was the occasion of his conversion.

11,693. SIN, Beginnings of. Thieves, when they go to rob a house, if they cannot force the doors, or the wall is so strong that they cannot break through, then they bring little boys along with them, and these they put in at the windows; who are no sooner in but they unbolt the doors, and let in the whole company of thieves. And thus Satan, when by greater sins he cannot tell how to enter the soul, then he puts on and makes way by lesser, which insensibly having got entrance, set open the doors of the eyes and the doors of the ears; then comes in the whole rabble. There they take up their quarters; there, like unruly soldiers, they rule, domineer, and do what they list, to the ruin of the soul so possessed. Alsop.

11,694. SIN, Burden of. As when a current of electricity is passed through filings of silver, the tiny pieces of metal are melted into one mass, so, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, do all our sins seem welded together into one fearful burden which weighs us down to perdition. Pilkington.

11,695. SIN, Contagion of. Men carefully avoid those who have any infectious disease. The sign of small-pox on a house is a greater protection than lock and key. The danger is only physical. But when sin is uncovered men gaze upon it with morbid curiosity. It is spread from mouth to mouth, and published in the Gazette. The first shock is overcome by familiarity. It communicates some of its virus to every one who sees, hears or tells of it. Sin and sinners are inseparable. They are not fit companions for yourself or children. Remember your liability to take this deadly infection, and avoid the locality as far as possible.

11,696. SIN, Cutting off the Hand of. The red hand of Ireland. This motto of the ancient line of O'Neil was obtained in a remarkable way. Some adventurers of the very olden time were bent upon an expedition from somewhere or other, perhaps Germany, Denmark, or Britain; and their leader, who was a daring captain of, it is to be feared, the "bold buccaneer" type, gave out that whoever first touched land should possess the territory they were making for. One of the band was named O'Neil, and he (from whom descended the princes of Ulster) determined to have the territory, rowed mightily towards the shore. But, lo! a rival boat pressed him hard, gained upon him, at last outstripped him. What was to be done? Have the land he would; that he had from the first settled with himself! But how? Why thus. With a grim look of mingled wrath and triumph at the rival boat, this strong-nerved, iron-minded O'Neil dropped the oars, seized a battle-axe, cut off one of the hands that had so lately plied them, and threw it upon the shore he determined to possess. And now "the bloody hand" is the badge of baronetcy in general, not the motto, but the badge; the motto is the O'Neil's, the badge signifies baronetcy. Now if this ready sacrifice and painful loss was endured in order to gain an earthly inheritance, what sacrifices and what losses can be counted too great for obtaining a heavenly inheritance? "If thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire."

Dr. Guthrie.

11,697. SIN, Danger of. Those who would not fall into the river, should beware how they approach too near to its banks. He that crushes the egg, need not fear the flight of the bird. He who would not drink of the wine of wrath, let him not touch the cup of pleasure. He who would not hear the passing-bell of eternal death, should not finger the rope of sin. A person who carries gun-powder about him, can never stand too far from the fire. If we accompany sin one mile, it will compel us to go twain. It swells like Elijah's cloud, from the size of a man's hand to such an expansion as to cover the whole sky.

Secker.

11,698. SIN, Defending. A lawyer undertook the defense of a robber on the promise of a thousand crowns reward. He won his case, and his client brought him the coveted money. The night being stormy, the lawyer invited him to lodge in his house. At midnight the robber arose, gagged his legal defender, retook the thousand crowns, and gathering all the treasure he could find, bade his helpless host good-bye. Such is the deceit of sin, and the reward of iniquity.

11,699. SIN, Description of. Look now at sin. Pluck off that painted mask, and turn upon her face the lamp of God's Word. We start—it reveals a death's head. I stay not to quote texts descriptive of sin. It is a debt, a burden, a thief, a sickness, a leprosy, a plague, a poison, a serpent, a sting: everything that man hates it is; a load of curses, and calamities beneath whose crushing, most intolerable pressure, the whole creation groaneth. Name me the evil that springs not from this root—the crime that I may not lay at its door. Who is the hoary sexton that digs man a grave? Who is the painted temptress that steals his virtue? Who is the murderess that destroys his life? Who is this sorceress that first deceives, and then damns his soul?—Sin. Who with icy breath, blights the fair blossoms of youth? Who breaks the hearts of parents? Who brings old men's gray hairs with sorrow to the grave?—Sin. Who, by a more hideous metamorphosis than Ovid even fancied, changes gentle children into vipers, tender mothers into monsters, and their fathers into worse than Herods, the murderers of their own innocents?—Sin. Who casts the apple of discord on household hearts? Who lights the torch of war, and bears it blazing over trembling lands? Who by divisions in the church, rends Christ's seamless robe?—Sin. Who is this Delilah that sings the Nazarite asleep, and delivers up the strength of God into the hands of the uncircumcised? Who, winning smiles on her face, honeyed flattery on her tongue, stands in the door to offer the sacred rites of hospitality, and when suspicion sleeps, treacherously pierces our temples with a nail? What fair Siren is this, who, seated on a rock by the deadly pool, smiles to deceive, sings to lure, kisses to betray, and flings her arm around our neck, to leap with us into perdition?—Sin. Who turns the soft and gentlest heart to stone? Who hurls reason from her lofty throne, and impels sinners, mad as Gadarene swine, down the precipice, into a lake of fire?—Sin. Dr. Guthrie.

11,700. SIN, Fear of. Eudocia angrily threatened St. Chrysostom with banishment. He calmly replied: "Go tell her, I fear nothing but sin."

11,701. SIN, Grooves of. The solid rock summits of our mountains are often found to be scarred and grooved, sometimes to the depth of several inches. A mighty force coming down from the northwest, when these tall hill-tops were just rising above the water, thrust its ploughshares into and left its ineffaceable furrows. Temptation and sin will sweep down with fearful force upon the human soul, and leave it scarred and furrowed. Some times one crime cuts a deep groove into the soul, which no good deeds can ever fill up. At other times it is accomplished by repeated sins which constitute a habit. In either case only divine power can restore the soul.

11,702. SIN, Growth of. Austin, writing upon John, tells a story of a certain man, that was of an opinion that the devil did make the fly and not God. Saith one to him, "If the devil made flies, then the devil made worms, and God did not make them, for they are living creatures as well as flies." "True," said he, "the devil did make worms." "But," said the other, "if the devil did make worms, then he made birds, beasts, and man." He granted all. "Thus," saith Austin, "by denying God in the fly he came to deny God in man, and to deny the whole creation."

Brooks.

11,703. SIN, Hardening Effects of. Dr. Preston tells us of a professor who on one occasion was found drunk, and when much depressed on account of his folly, the devil said to him, by way of temptation, "Do it again, do it again; for," said he, "the grief you feel about it now you will never feel any more if you commit the sin again." Dr. Preston says that the man yielded to the temptation, and from that time he never did feel the slightest regret at his drunkenness, and lived and died a confirmed sot, though formerly he had been a very high professor.

Spurgeon.

11,704. SIN, Hatred of. An Arminian controverting with a Calvinist, said, "If I believed your doctrine and was sure that I was a converted man, I would take my fill of sin." The Calvinist replied, "How much sin do you think it would take to fill a true Christian to his own satisfaction?" He hit a striking fact, though no answer. The Christian loathes sin, the sinner loves it.

11,705. SIN, Increase of. One danger of secret sin is that a man cannot commit it without being by-and-by betrayed into a public sin. If a man commit one sin, it is like the melting of the lower glacier upon the Alps, the others must follow in time. As certainly as you heap one stone upon the cairn to-day, the next day you will cast another, until the heap reared stone by stone shall become a very pyramid. See the coral insect at work: you cannot deree where it shall stay its pile. It will not build its rock as high as you please; it will not stay until an island shall be created. Sin cannot be held in with bit and bridle; it must be mortified. Spurgeon.

11,706. SIN, Insidiousness of. Sin is like the little serpent aspis, which stings men, whereby they fall into a pleasant sleep, and in that sleep die. Swinnock.

11,707. SIN, Origin of. Dr. Emmons, of Northampton, boldly taught that God was the author of sin. The discussion of this subject raged with great fury. One of his opponents retorted upon him with a vision. He said he was traveling in the west of England, when he saw a great black cloud, out of which gradually developed a figure, much like a man. He asked him who he was, and received answer that he was the devil. Again he was asked what he was doing, and where he was going. The devil flew into a great rage, and said that every mean crime, great or small, committed in that country was charged upon him; that he was about to take up his abode in Northampton, America, where such transactions were charged directly to the Almighty. Dr. Holme.

11,708. SIN, Overcoming. Sin is to be overcome, not so much by maintaining a direct opposition to it, as by cultivating opposite principles. Would you kill the weeds in your garden, plant it with good seed: if the ground be well occupied, there will be less need of the labor of the hoe. If a man wished to quench fire, he might fight it with his hands till he was burnt to death; the only way is to apply an opposite element. Andrew Fuller.

11,709. SIN, Poison of. A man who wished to buy a handsome ring, went into a jeweler's in Paris. The jeweler showed him a very ancient gold ring, remarkably fine, and curious on this account, that on the inside of it were two little lion's claws. The buyer, while looking at the others, was playing with this; at last he purchased another, and went away. But he had scarcely reached home, when first his hand, then his side, then his whole body became numb and without feeling, as if he had a stroke of palsy; and it grew worse and worse, till the physician, who came in haste, thought him dying. "You must somehow have taken poison," he said. The sick man protested that he had not. At length some one remembered this ring; and it was then discovered to be what used to be called a death-ring, and which was often employed in those wicked Italian states three or four hundred years ago. If a man hated another, and desired to murder him, he would present him with one of them. In the inside was a drop of deadly poison, and a very small hole, out of which it would not make its way except it was squeezed. When the poor man was wearing it, the murderer would come and shake his hand violently, the lion's claw would give his finger a little scratch, and in a few hours he was a dead man. Now, see why I told you this story. For four hundred years this ring had kept its poison, and at the end of that time it was strong enough almost to kill the man who had unintentionally scratched his finger with the claw; for he was only saved by great skill on the part of the physician, and by the strongest medicines. I thought, when I read that story, how like this poison was to sin. You may commit a sin now, and for the present forget it; and perhaps ten or twelve years hence the wound you then, so to speak, gave yourself, may break out again, and that more dangerously than ever. And the greatest danger of all is, lest the thoughts of sins we have committed, and the pleasure we had in committing them, should come back upon us in the hour of death. Dr. J. M. Neale.

11,710. SIN, Pollution of. How deep is the pollution of sin, that nothing but the blood of Christ can cleanse it! All the tears of a penitent sinner, should he shed as many as there have fallen drops of rain since the creation, cannot wash away one sin. The everlasting burnings in hell cannot purify the flaming conscience from the least sin. John Flavel.

11,711. SIN by Proxy. According to an old writer, no Capuchin among the papists may take or touch silver. This metal is as great an anathema to them as the wedge of gold to Achan, at the offer whereof they start back as Moses from the serpent; yet the monk has a boy behind him who will receive and carry home any quantity, and neither complain of metal or measure. Such are those who are great sticklers themselves for outward observance in religion, but at the same time compel their servants to sin on their account. They who sin by substitute shall be damned in person. Spurgeon.

11,712. SIN, Punishment of. What a diabolical invention was the "Virgin's kiss," once used by the fathers of the Inquisition! The victim was pushed forward to kiss the image, when, lo, its arms enfolded him in a deadly embrace, piercing his body with a hundred hidden knives. The tempting pleasures of sin offer to the unwary just such a virgin's kiss. The sinful joys of the flesh lead, even in this world, to results most terrible, while in the world to come the daggers of remorse and despair will cut and wound beyond all remedy. Spurgeon.

11,713. SIN, Rebuke of. An old English woman, hearing some gentlemen engaged in improper conversation, said, "Sirs, you are making work for repentance." It is an important thought that should check every sinful action.

11,714. SIN, Relief from. A converted Hindoo came to be baptized. He said he had been for years searching for a way of happiness in Poojahs (holy places in the river, etc.), but all in vain; but when he heard the word of Christ he could not rest. He sat up a whole night in distress of mind. He had great fears about his sins. When asked how he lost them, he said, "They went away in thinking of Christ." We shall never get rid of our fear in any other way.

11,715. SIN, Revelation of. Coals of fire cannot be concealed beneath the most sumptuous apparel, they will betray themselves with smoke and flame; nor can darling sins be long hidden beneath the most ostentatious profession, they will sooner or later discover themselves, and burn sad holes in a man's reputation. Sin needs quenching in the Saviour's blood, not concealing under the garb of religion.

Spurgeon.

11,716. SIN, Review of. A dying miner, lying on a bed of boughs, said to his comrades, "I have now reached a point at which the whole scene of my life seems to lie visibly before me. Every action that I have committed, every sin, every crime that I have perpetrated before God, seems to stare me right in the face. I can see my way clear back to my youth, and, as I look, the scenes of iniquity and guilt in which I have been engaged pass one another before me in terrible review." They sang with him, and prayed with him, and endeavored to console him and point him to Jesus; but, said he, "It's all over now; all over! I have rejected Christ, and there is no salvation for me." He died soon after.

11,717. SIN, Snares of. I read an account of a man who saw a very curious spectacle—that of a black snake more than a foot long suspended in the air in a perfect sack of spider's web. And the spider was not a large one. It was one of those small spiders. It bore no proportion to its victim, nor could he by any biting hurt him. But there he had him imprisoned. He had drawn him, little by little, into the air, and the snake could not help himself. Probably the serpent was torpid, or the enemy was so small that he did not know that he was upon him. And the spider spun out of his bowels a little film, not a third part as large as the smallest silk thread that a woman uses withal, and he dipped down and touched the snake with it, and it stuck. He took another little film and touched him with that, and it stuck. He went on industriously, and as the snake lay quiet, he put another and another film upon him; and as there was time enough, he added another and another, till there were a hundred, a thousand, ten thousand of them. And by-and-by these little weak strands, no one of which was strong enough to hold a gnat, when multiplied became strong enough to encase the victim. A million times stronger the snake was than that miserable little spider, and yet the spider caught him; he webbed him round and round, until when he tried to move he was held fast. The web had grown strong out of its weakness. By putting one strand here and another there, and drawing on this, that, and the other, the spider at last lifted the burden, and it hung suspended in the air. I have seen men webbed by offences in that same way, and no one of the offences was much larger than the film of a spider's web, and at last they were imprisoned and destroyed. Anon.

11,718. SIN, Stain of. Look, as one drop of ink colareth a whole glass of water, so one gross sin, one shameful action, one hour's compliance with anything of antichrist, will color and stain all the great things that ever you have suffered, and all the good things that ever you have performed; it will stain and color all the good prayers that ever you have made, and all the good sermons that ever you have heard, and all the good books that ever you have read, and all the good words that ever you have spoke, and all the good works that ever you have done, and therefore, whatever you do keep off from sin, and keep off from all sinful compliances, as you would keep off from hell itself.

Brooks.

11,719. SIN, Torture of. It is reported that the cantharis fly, by a certain kind of contrariety, carries within itself the cure of the wound which it inflicts. On the other side wickedness, at the same time it is committed, engendering its own vexation and torment not at last, but at the very instant of the injury offered, suffers the reward of the injustice it has done. And as every malefactor who suffers in his body bears his own cross to the place of execution, so are all the various torments of various wicked actions prepared by wickedness herself.

Plutarch.

11,720. SIN, Unpardonable. Aretius, a godly and eminent author, speaking of the sin against the Holy Ghost, said: "I saw and knew the man myself, and it is no feigned story. There was a merchant in Strasburg, whose whole life was abominable for whoredom, usury, drunkenness, contempt of God's word; he spent his life in gaming and whoring to his old age. At last he came to reflect on himself, and be sensible of the dreadful judgments of God hanging over his head. Then did his conscience so affright, and the devil accuse and terrify him, that he fell into open and downright desperation. He confessed and yielded himself to the devil as being his. He said, the mercy and grace of God could not be so great as to pardon sins so great as his. Then what horror was upon him, gnashing of teeth, weeping, wailing; yea, he would challenge Satan, and wish the devil would fetch him away to his destined torments. He threw himself all along upon the ground; refused both meat and drink. Had you seen him, you would never have forgot him while you had lived; you had seen the fullest pattern of a despairing person. Yet, after the many pains of godly and learned men who came to him, watched with him, reasoned with him, laid open the word and will of God, and after many prayers, public and private, put up for him, at length he recovered and became truly penitent; and having lived piously for certain years after, he died peaceably." He concluded, it is not an easy matter to determine of any man sinning against the Holy Ghost, and incapable of mercy, so long as he live.

Sheffield.

11,721. SIN, Vengeance upon. After Julius Cæsar was murdered, Antonius brought forth his coat, all bloody and cut, and laid it before the people, saying, "Look, here you have the Emperor's coat thus bloody and torn;" whereupon the people were presently in an uproar.

and cried out to slay those murderers; and they took their tables and stools that were in the place, and set them on fire, and ran to the houses of them that had slain Caesar, and burnt them. So that when we consider that sin hath slain our Lord Jesus, ah, how should it provoke our hearts to be revenged on sin, that hath murdered the Lord of glory, and hath done that mischief that all the devils in hell could never have done?

Brooks.

11,722. SIN, War upon. Men hunt the lion, tiger, wolf, or other beast of prey till they are exterminated. Bounties are offered by the government for the heads of such. If it is discovered that one has visited a certain place the alarm is given, and men turn out for miles around, and organize for a bear or wolf hunt. The beast may have taken a pig from the sty, or a sheep from the flock. There is a beast loose in the land which is a man destroyer. No cannibal was ever so voracious of human flesh. He is found destroying even in our cities and villages. Sound the alarm. Gather the people and hunt him from your midst. It is the raging wild beast rum.

11,723. SIN Washed Away. A woman went to a minister carrying a heavy bundle of wet sand. "Do you see what this is, sir?" said she. "Yes," was the reply, "it is wet sand." "But, do you know what it means?" "I do not know exactly what you mean by it; what is it?" "Ah, sir," she said, "that's me, and the number of my sins they cannot be counted." And then she exclaimed, "O wretched creature that I am! how can such a wretch as I ever be saved?" "Where did you get the sand?" asked the minister. "At the Beacon." "Go back then to the Beacon; take a spade with you; dig, dig, and raise a great mound; shovel it up as high as ever you can, then leave it there; take your stand by the sea-shore, and watch the effect of the waves upon the heap of sand." "Ah, sir," she exclaimed, "I see what you mean—the blood, the blood, the blood of Christ; it would wash it all away."

11,724. SIN, Whirlpool of. Mr. Ogden was descending the Columbia river in one of the boats of the United States Exploring Expedition, with ten Canadian voyagers, all well experienced in their duties. On arriving at the Dalles, they deemed it practicable to run them, in order to save the portage. Mr. Ogden determined, however, that he would pass the portage on foot, believing, nevertheless, the river was in such a state that it was quite safe for the boat to pass down. He was accordingly landed, ascended the rocks, from which he had a full view of the water beneath, and of the boat in its passage. At first she seemed to skim over the waters like the flight of a bird; but he soon perceived her stop, and the struggle of the oarsmen, together with the anxious shout of the bowman, soon told him that they had encountered the whirl. Strongly they plied their oars, and deep anxiety, if not fear, was expressed in their movements. They began to move, not forward, but onward with the whirl. Round they swept with increasing velocity, still struggling to avoid the now evident fate that awaited them. A few more turns, each more rapid than the last, until they reached the centre, when in an instant the boat, with all her crew, disappeared. So short had been the struggle, that it was with difficulty Mr. Ogden could realize that all had perished. Only one body out of the ter was afterward found at the bottom of the Dalles, torn and mangled by the strife it had gone through.

Anon.

11,725. SIN, Wounds of. In the heart of the old elm, which has been the pride and ornament of Boston Common for a century, but which like all earthly things came to its end, was found a flattened bullet which it had concealed for two hundred years, as was shown by the number of rings enclosing it. The wood had closed over it, but could not throw off the wound, or conceal it always. Men, have carried bullets in various members of their bodies, even in the brain, sometimes for years, unconsciously. So it is with the soul. A wound in youth may be carried till old age and death, almost forgotten, or it may be an open wound that will not heal. It will have its effect and be revealed at last. The wounds of sin can be cured only by the great physician.

11,726. SINCERITY Defined. Sincerity is to speak as we think, to do as we pretend and profess, to perform and make good what we promise, and really to be what we would seem and appear to be.

Tillotson.

11,727. SINCERITY, Importance of. True wisdom and greatness of mind raise a man above the need of using little tricks and devices. Sincerity and honesty carries one through many difficulties which all the arts he can invent would never help him through. For nothing doth a man more real mischief in the world than to be suspected of too much craft; because every one stands upon his guard against him, and suspects plots and designs where there are none intended: insomuch that though he speaks with all the sincerity that is possible, yet nothing he saith can be believed.

Stillington.

11,728. SINGING, Benefits of. There is nothing like singing to keep your spirits alive. When we have been in trouble, we have often thought ourselves to be well-nigh overwhelmed with difficulty; and we have said, "Let us have a song." We have begun to sing; and Martin Luther says, "The devil cannot bear singing." That is about the truth; he does not like music. It was so in Saul's days: an evil spirit rested on Saul, but when David played on his harp, the evil spirit went from him. This is usually the case; if we can begin to sing, we shall remove our fears.

Spurgeon.

11,729. SINNER, Address to the. O sinner, what a condition wilt thou fall into when thou departest this world, if thou depart unconverted! Thou hadst better have been smothered the first hour thou wast born; thou hadst better been plucked one limb from another, thou hadst better been made a dog, a toad, a serpent, than to die unconverted; and this thou wilt find true if thou repent not.

Bunyan.

11,730. SINNER, Contrast to the. The godless person is like the ferret, which hath its name in Hebrew from squeaking and crying, because he squeaketh sadly if taken from his prey. When the godly man (as Paulinus Molanus, when his city was plundered by the barbarians) though he be robbed of his earthly riches, hath a treasure in heaven, and may say, "Lord, why should I be disquieted for my silver and gold? for thou to me art all things." "Having nothing, yet he possesseth all things."

Swinmock.

11,731. SINNERS, Blindness of. A gentleman after attending church one day, said, "Here is gratitude for you; here I and my family have shown this man the greatest kindness, and the return he makes when he gets into the pulpit, is to tell us that we are great sinners unless we repent. He preaches that our good works go for nothing before God. This sermon will do very well for a penitentiary; but before a genteel and respectable audience, to tell them that they are sinners, is the most extraordinary conduct that I ever met with."

11,732. SINNERS, Exposure of. Last night, when I was thinking upon this subject, I had a half-waking dream, and I thought I stood out along the Hudson River Railroad track, and I saw a man sitting on that track. I went up to him and said, "My friend, don't you know you are in peril? The Chicago express will be along in a few moments." I found he was deaf and did not hear. I tried to pull him away from that peril, and he resisted me, and said, "What do you mean by bothering me? I am doing nothing. Am I disturbing you? I am doing nothing at all. I am just sitting here." At that moment I heard in the distance the thunder of the express train. A moment afterwards I saw the headlight of the locomotive flash around the corner. I held fast to the rocks that I might not be caught in the rush of the train. Like a horizontal thunderbolt it hurled past. When the flagman came, five minutes after, with his lantern, there was not so much as a vestige left to show that a man had perished there. What had the victim been doing there? Nothing at all. He was only sitting still—sitting still to die. So I find men in my audience to-night. I tell them the peril of living without God and without hope in the world. They say, "I am not doing anything. I don't lie. I don't swear. I don't steal. I don't break the Sabbath-day. I am sitting here to-night in my indifference, and what you say has no effect upon my soul at all. I am just sitting here." Meanwhile the long train of eternal disaster is nearing the crossing, and the bridges groan, and the cinders fly, and the brakes clank, and the driving wheel speeds on, and there is a blinding rush, and in the twinkling of an eye they "perish from the way when God's wrath is kindled but a little."

Talmage.

11,733. SINNERS, Following. A minister was awakened at midnight by a message from a sick young lady who wished to see him. As he entered the room, he noticed a younger sister of the dying girl, who was evidently fast following her into eternity. He asked the sick girl of her prospects, and as he did so, the younger sister arose and abruptly left the room. He was rejoiced to find that the dying girl was leaning on the strong arm of Christ. And so she died—in hope. Only a few weeks from her death, he was again sent for; this time to visit the younger sister, who was following the elder to the grave. As he went to her bedside, she looked up with great anxiety, and asked, "Mr. M——, do you remember, when you were here before, and began to talk to my sister about death, I left the room?" "Yes; why did you do so?" "Because I did not wish to hear what you would say; and now see where I am. Oh, Mr. M——, why did you not follow me, and make me hear?" There was agony, even despair in her tones, as she said it; and then she added, "Oh, it is a dreadful—dreadful thing to die." And before many hours she died—in despair.

11,734. SINNERS, Hope for. A woman who did not consider herself bad, was anxious about her soul. She went to a church where she heard the minister preach that the ungodly would be saved. That day she took a place with the ungodly and was saved. Christ came to save sinners, not the righteous.

11,735. SIN-OFFERING, Christ Our. The sin-offering was burnt without the camp. The other offerings were, without exception, burnt on the altar in the Tabernacle. Here "the skin of the bullock, and all his flesh, with his head, and with his legs, his inwards, etc., even the whole bullock shall he carry without the camp, and burn him on the wood with fire." It testified how completely the offering was identified with the sin it suffered for; so completely identified that it was itself looked at as sin, and as such cast out of the camp into the wilderness. A part indeed, "the fat," was burnt on the altar, to show that the offering though made a sin-bearer, was itself perfect. But the body of the victim, "even the whole bullock," was cast forth without the camp. "Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate." He was cast out as one who was unfit for Jerusalem, as unworthy a place in the city of God.

A. Jukes.

11,736. SINS, Danger of Small. Little sins arm God's terrible power and vengeance against you. As the page carries the sword of a great warrior after him, so your little sins bear the sword of God's justice, and put it into his hands against you.

Hopkins.

11,737. SINS, Forgotten. There is nothing that happens, you know, which must not inevitably, and which does not actually, photograph itself in every conceivable aspect and in all dimensions. The infinite galleries of the past await but one brief process, and all their pictures will be called out and fixed forever. We had a curious illustration of the great fact on a very humble scale. When a certain book-case, long standing in one place, for which it was built, was removed, there was the exact image on the wall of the whole, and of many of its portions. But in the midst of this picture was another—the precise outline of a map which had hung on the wall before the book-case was built. We had all forgotten everything about the map, until we saw its photograph on the wall. Then we remembered it, as some day or other we may remember a sin which has been built over and covered up, when this lower universe is pulled away from before the wall of infinity, where the wrongdoing stands self-recorded.

Holmes.

11,738. SINS, Magnitude of. No sin against God can be little; because it is against the great God of heaven and earth; but if the sinner can find out a little god, it may be easy to find out little sins.

Bunyan.

11,739. SINS, Progress of Little. The least sin is rather to be avoided and prevented than the greatest sufferings; if this cockatrice be not crushed in the egg, it will soon become a serpent; the very thought of sin, if but thought on, will break out into action, action into custom, custom into habit, and then both body and soul are lost irrecoverably to all eternity. The least sin is very dangerous. Cæsar was stabbed with bodkins; Herod was eaten up of lice; Pope Adrian was choked with a gnat; a mouse is but little, yet killeth an elephant if he gets up into his trunk; a scorpion is little, yet able to sting a lion to death; though the leopard be great, yet he is poisoned with a head of garlic; the least spark may consume the greatest house, and the least leak sink the greatest ship; a little postern opened may betray the greatest city; a dram of poison diffuseth itself to all parts, till it strangle the vital spirits, and turn out the soul from the body. If the serpent can but wriggle in his tail by an evil thought, he will soon make a surprisal of the soul, as you see in that great instance of Adam and Eve.

11,740. SINS, Secret. The ichneumon-fly lays its eggs in the body of the caterpillar. When the egg is hatched the larva begins to feed at once on the body of the poor worm. It avoids, by a remarkable instinct, the vital parts, and the caterpillar creeps on his way feeding as unconsciously as if he were in no danger. So many a soul is lost by some secret sin. The friends of a young man were shocked by finding him suddenly transformed into a drunkard. Before they suspected him he was lost to all shame or self-respect. He had been for years drinking in secret before this exposure, and the last stages were very rapid. There is a little weed which sometimes creeps into our canals and rivers, which seems very insignificant at first; but if left to itself it grows so fast, and its rope-like stems become so matted, that it seriously hinders navigation. Just such a multiplying evil is one little secret sin suffered to take root in the heart. Let us offer every day the prayer, "Cleanse thou me from secret faults."

11,741. SLANDER, How to End, re. It was reported to the poet Tasso that a malicious enemy spoke ill of him to all the world. "Let him persevere," said Tasso. "his rancor gives me no pain. How much better is it that he should speak ill of me to all the world, than that all the world should speak ill of me to him."

11,742. SLANDER, Punishment of. In early times, in the city of New York, slander was esteemed a rank offence. One Jan Adamzen, for slandering certain respectable persons, was condemned to be "stuck through the tongue with a red-hot iron, and banished from the province."

11,743. SLANDER, Sharpness of. Thearidas, the Spartan, was whetting his sword, when one asked him, "Is it sharp, Thearidas?" He replied, "Yes, sharper than slander."

11,744. SLANDER, Symbol of. There is in the museum at Venice, a machine by which some forgotten Italian tyrant used to shoot poisoned needles at the objects of his hatred. If merely used against our enemies, how much better than the tongues of back-biters and slanderers, who hurl poisoned words indiscriminately.

11,745. SLAVERY, Abolition of. In the Declaration of Independence the doors of the Temple of Liberty were thrown wide open; but the nation could not take slavery into it, and so they were closed, and it remained eighty-five years in the vestibule, cramped, embarrassed and agitated by a declaration of principles opposed by the constitutional law of the land, until Abraham Lincoln, our second Washington, issued his immortal Proclamation of General Emancipation; and then the doors of the Temple of Liberty swung once more upon their golden hinges, and the whole nation entered—the meanest slave beside the haughtiest aristocrat, endowed with the same inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Dr. J. A. M. Chapman.

11,746. SLEEP, Boon of. Sleep; what a rich boon it is to frail and weary men! It is one of God's purest acts of beneficence. He gives what he never needs, what he never takes. He sheds a sweet oblivion round and round the world, himself keeping watch, while man, and beast, and bird, and ever, in a measure, bud, and leaf, and blossom, take their rest. Sleep; it comes to the wet sea-boy in the rudest hour, to the poor slave in the intervals of his hopeless toil, to the traveler in the forest or on the mountains, and—marve! of mercy!—to the sinner under the heavy load of his sin!

Raleigh.

11,747. SLEEP, Characteristic. Even sleep is characteristic. How charming are children in their lovely innocence! how angel-like their blooming hue! How painful and anxious is the sleep and expression in the countenance of the guilty!

Humboldt.

11,748. SLEEP, Tradition of. A tradition, related by Rabbi Jachonnan in the Talmud, is that one Onias, who lived seventy years before Christ, was meditating on the text, "When the Lord turned the captivity of Zion, then vere we like unto them that dream." He thought "seventy years of captivity. How could that pass as a dream?" Then he saw a man planting a carob-tree, and he asked him, "How long before that tree will bear fruit?" "Seventy years." "Fool! think you that you will live to eat of the fruit of the tree you plant?" "Rabbi, my father planted a carob-tree, of which I eat now. I plant this that my son may eat thereof." The day being hot, Onias entered a cave, and fell asleep. When he awoke, he saw a man gathering the fruit of a carob-tree. "Did you plant the tree?" he asked. "No, Rabbi, my grandfather planted it seventy years ago." Then Onias returned to his house, and found it occupied by his grandson, and knew that he had slept seventy years.

11,749. SLOTH, Spiritual. A man who is under the dominion of spiritual sloth is like one who has a journey to take, but who has fetters on his legs; like a soldier who must stand up in a battle, but without armor or weapons of offence; or like a mariner who sits inactive in his boat, and leaves it to the mercy of the waves. Do you imagine that all that is necessary for you to do is to step into the boat, and lie down and sleep, and leave it to pursue its own course? This is enough if you are to sail with the stream, and only to be stopped when you reach the gulf of perdition below. But if you are to sail against the stream, and avoid having your bark dashed upon some neighboring rock, there must be watchfulness, and strength, and exertion, or you will never reach the fountain of life.

11,750. SMALL SINS, Effect of. In the fortification of a city or town all the ramparts are not castles and strongholds; but between fort and fort there is a line drawn that joins all together and makes the place impregnable. So it is in the fortification of the soul by sin. All sins are not strongholds of Satan: they are greater and grosser sins: but between these is drawn a line of smaller sins so close that you cannot find a breach in it, and by these the heart is fenced against God.

11,751. SMALL THINGS, Perfection by. How frequently are small things those which perfect anything! For instance: it is the bloom of the plum which perfects it, the scent in the flower, the cut of the nostril, or the dimples in a countenance, the short strings in a harp, the delicate finishing touches in a picture. What perfects a fireside but the children links? what perfects a cathedral choir but the children's notes? and what perfects God's praise but the "mouth of babes and sucklings?"

W. J. Bolton.

11,752. SMILE, Effect of a. A minister said to me, "I want you to notice that family in one of the front seats, and when we go home I want to tell you their story." When we got home I asked him for the story, and he said, "All that family were won by a smile." "Why," said I, "how's that?" "Well," said he, "as I was walking down a street one day I saw a child at a window; it smiled, and I smiled, and we bowed. So it was the second time; I bowed, she bowed. It was not long before there was another child, and I had got in a habit of looking and bowing, and pretty soon the group grew, and at last, as I went by, a lady was with them. I didn't know what to do. I didn't want to bow to her, but I knew the children expected it, and so I bowed to them all. And the mother saw I was a minister, because I carried a Bible every Sunday morning. So the children followed me the next Sunday and found I was a minister. And they thought I was the greatest preacher, and their parents must hear me. A minister who is kind to a child and gives him a pat on the head, why the children will think he is the greatest preacher in the world. Kindness goes a great way. And the father and mother and five children were converted, and have joined the church."

Moody.

11,753. SMOKING, Abandoning. When the use of tobacco was fashionable even among the genteel, in walking through a village, I passed a store where I knew there were some very fine cigars. I was immediately seized with the hankering so well known to habitual smokers. The determination arose to lay out a few shillings in purchasing some. As I had been endeavoring to accustom myself to regard my money as the Lord's and myself as the steward, I tried the rule in that case. I found myself unwilling to charge such an item on my account book. A faithful steward would make no such expenditure, thought I. The money which had been taken out was dropped again into my pocket, and I passed on. I have ever found it difficult to smoke cigars since that time. The cure which I propose is, to ask the blessing of God on all expenditures, and try to be faithful stewards of the Lord's money.

11,754. SNARES, Escaping from. St. Antony saw in a vision the earth covered so thickly with snares that it seemed impossible to put down a foot without being caught in them. Then he cried out, "Who, O Lord, shall escape them all?" A voice replied, "Humility, O, Antony!"

11,755. SNEERING, Import of. The most in significant people are the most apt to sneer at others. They are safe from reprisals, and have no hope of rising in their own esteem but by lowering their neighbors. The severest critics are always those who have either never attempted, or who have failed in original composition.

Hazlitt.

11,756. SNOW, Voice of the. The Rev. R. M. M'Cheyne was observed looking out of his window one clear frosty winter's day, during his sickness. The sun shone, and the snow glittered with whiteness. He looked upon it with glowing eyes and was heard to say to himself, "Whiter than snow! whiter than snow!" Evidently re-calling Isaiah's word from the Lord, "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow." Is. 1: 18.

11,757. SOCIETY, Changes of. Society undergoes continual changes: it is barbarous, it is civilized, it is Christianized, it is rich, it is scientific; but this change is not amelioration. For everything that is given, something is taken. Society acquires new arts, and loses old instincts. The civilized man has built a coach, but has lost the use of his feet: he has a fine Geneva watch, but cannot tell the hour by the sun.

Emerson.

11,758. SOCIETY, Restraints of. Anub and his six brothers were hermits, and lived together in a deserted pagan temple at Tere-nuth in the fifth century. At first Anub, the eldest of the brothers, every morning threw stones at the face of one of the idols, and at night he bowed before it, and apologized for the insult of the morning. He continued this strange conduct for seven days, when his brothers asked him what he meant. He answered, "I threw stones at the face of the image. Did it scowl, or look sulky, or utter words of anger?" "No." "And when I bowed the knee to it, and showed it profound respect, did it look pleased?" "No." Then said Anub, "Here are we seven brothers. If we purpose in our hearts to be like that image, unmoved by what we may say or do to one another, then, by all means, let us dwell here together. But if we are going to resent wrongs, or utter bitter speeches, or covet flattery, here are four doors, and let us separate." The lesson seems to have been effectual. They abode together in peace, till death separated them, under the rule of Anub—sitting at a common table, none of them saying, "Give me something else; I cannot eat this."

11,759. SOLDIER, Face of the. I well remember reading of a soldier tall and strong, who had a wordrons cuirass of gold, curiously-wrought; but it was buckled behind by straps that had seen much service. They were weather-stained and worn, and men said they were altogether unbecomingly so gorgeous a breast-plate. His comrades said, however, that it mattered not, that his enemies never saw anything unseemly, for he never turned his back to them. And we truly should ever stand, presenting a bold front to our spiritual enemies. Our safety is in fighting, not in flight.

Pilkington.

11,760. SOLDIERS, Christ's. The birthday of the Emperor Maximian was celebrated by the army with great pomp, and many sacrifices to the gods, in which all were requested to participate. Marcellus, a Christian, was a captain in the legion of Trajan. He refused to participate in the idolatrous ceremonies, cast off his military belt, threw down his arms, and the vine branch which he carried as insignia of office, and declared himself a soldier of Jesus Christ. For this he was taken before the prefect of the legion, and said in answer to the charge of desertion and impiety, "When you celebrated the emperor's festival, I said aloud that I was a Christian, and could serve no other than Jesus Christ, the Son of God." At a further hearing he maintained firmly his previous decision, and was led forthwith to execution. He laid down his life A. D. 298, at Tangiers, Africa, sooner than participate, even in a general way, in the pagan festivities.

11,761. SOLDIERS, Reliable. During the war in India, the British army were nearly surprised by the enemy. The commander-in-chief sent in great haste to order a particular corps to occupy at once a prescribed post. The order was to no purpose, for the men of that corps were so many of them intoxicated that they were unfit for duty. The danger would presently have become serious. The general knew this well, and he knew, too, how it could best be met. "Then," said he, when told that his former order was unavailing, "call out Havelock's saints; they are never drunk, and Havelock is always ready." They were immediately under arms, and the enemy were repulsed.

11,762. SOLDIERS, Religious. The strict temperance and religious devotion of Havelock's corps of the British army in India, secured for it the contemptuous epithet, "Havelock's Saints." It was reported in England that the general had turned preacher, and a committee of investigation was appointed. It was found that he had prayers with his troops both morning and evening; that on Sunday he formed them in a hollow square and preached to them. Their religion did not make them worse, but better soldiers. The report said: "No troops in India are as well drilled, as well equipped, as efficient. In time of trouble, the cry is, 'Bring out the saints.' They are never drunk. Havelock never blunders. Should trouble arise in India, Havelock's Corps will be the main reliance of the government." And so it proved on the outbreak of the Sepoy rebellion.

11,763. SOLITUDE, Disadvantages of. In complete solitude, the eye wants objects, the heart wants attachments, the understanding wants reciprocation. The character loses its tenderness when it has nothing to love, its firmness when it has none to strengthen it, its sweetness when it has nothing to soothe it, its patience when it meets no contradiction, its humility when it is surrounded by dependants, and its delicacy in the conversations of the uninformed.

Hannah More.

11,764. SOLITUDE, Happiness in. Solitude is not always desolation. How solitary, yet how glad is the mathematician, among his silent ratios and quiet trains of reasoning! How solitary, yet serene, the astronomer on his watch-tower, under the twinkling of the midnight stars! How solitary the student amongst his books, and yet who more blest than he? How solitary the poet, whilst his images are either slowly arising around or swiftly sweeping across his soul, and he is tempted to say, "This is the gate of heaven!" To make solitude happy, two elements are required: first, that the mind be at ease and satisfied with itself; and secondly, that it be employed also in some object out of itself. If a mind is not self-satisfied, solitude is solitude no more, "but peopled with the furies." If a mind be not occupied with some subject out of itself, its solitude may be luxurious, but is selfish, and will by-and-by become miserable.

G. Giffilan.

11,765. SOLITUDE, Sins of. More and greater sins are committed when men are alone than when they keep themselves in fellowship. When Eve in paradise walked alone, then came the evil one and deceived her. Whoever is amongst honest men and in honest company, is ashamed to sin; or, at least, he has no place or opportunity to do so. When King David was alone and idle, and went not out into the wars, he fell into adultery and murder; and I have myself found, that I have never fallen into more sin than when I was alone. Solitariness inviteth to melancholy; and a person alone hath often some heavy and evil thoughts; so hath he strange thoughts, and construeth everything in the worst sense. Melancholy is an instrument of the devil, by which he accomplishes his wicked purposes. The deeper a person is plunged into that state, the more power the devil hath over him. To live in an open, public state, is the safest. Openly, and amongst other persons, a man must live civilly and honestly—must appear to fear God, and do his duty towards men.

Luther.

11,766. SOLOMON, King. Full of sublime devotion, equally full of practical sagacity; the extemporizer of the loftiest litany in existence, withal the author of the pungent Proverbs; able to mount up on Rapture's ethereal pinion to the region of the seraphim, and keenly alive to all the details of business, and shrewd in his human intercourse; zealous in collecting gold, yet lavish in expending it; sumptuous in his tastes, and splendid in costume; and—except in so far as intellectual vastitude necessitated a certain catholicity—the patriot intense, the Israelite indeed: like a Colossus on a mountain-top, his sunward side was the glory toward which one millennium of his nation had all along been climbing—his darker side, with its overlapping beams, is still the mightiest object in that nation's memory.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

11,767. SORROW, Benefit of. God sees that they are very good for us; for, as seeds that are deepest covered with snow in winter flourish most in spring; or as the wind by beating down the flame raiseth it higher and hotter; and as when we would have fires flame the more, we sprinkle water upon them; even so, when the Lord would increase our joy and thankfulness, he allays it with tears of affliction.

Salter.

11,768. SORROW, Chariot of. There is no suffering, no sorrow, no human experience, that you have not the power to rise above, to subdue—nay, to harness to you, and make carry you. For sufferings, rightly understood, are, as it were, God's coursers harnessed to your chariot to bear you up. Horses and a chariot of fire did the prophet have to take him to heaven; but he is not the only one that went to heaven in a chariot of fire. Thousands are riding in chariots of fire. Sorrow is the fire, and troubles are those coursers by which myriads of men are being drawn, in that flaming chariot, heavenward.

Beecher.

11,769. SORROW, Flowers of. There is a tree near Bombay called "The Sorrowful Tree." It blooms only in the night. So soon as the sun declines the flowers burst out. We may, like that tree, bring forth flowers of grace in the night of sorrow.

11,770. SORROW for Sins of Others. St. Lawrence Justinian, the Patriarch of Venice, says, "He cannot help sorrowing for other people's sins, who sorrows truly for his own. A healthy limb on the body, that helps not the others when they are sick, occupies its place in vain. These members likewise of the church, who see their brethren's sin and do not weep over it, or compassionate the ruin of their souls, are useless members. When our Redeemer wept over the city that was to perish, he considered it the more to be deplored as it knew not itself its deplorable condition. As many, therefore, as are set on fire by the torch of love, weep over other men's sins as if they were their own. Yet no one worthily deplores the sins of others, who by voluntary falls neglects his own. We must at least cease to sin wilfully, if we desire to mourn over the falls of others." St. Augustine says, "We mourn over the sins of others, we suffer violence, we are tormented in our minds." St. Chrysostom says that Moses was raised above the people because he habitually deplored the sins of others. "He," says the same holy Doctor, "who sorrows for other men's sins, has the tenderness of an apostle, and is an imitator of that blessed One, who said, 'Who is weak and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not?'" F. W. Faber.

11,771. SORROWS, Entertainment of. That which the French proverb hath of sickness is true to all evils, that they come on horseback and go away on foot. We have often seen a sudden fall, or one meal's surfeit hath stuck by many to their graves; whereas pleasures come like oxen, slow and heavily, and go away like post-horses, upon the spur. Sorrows, because they are lingering guests, I will entertain but moderately, knowing that the more they are made of, the longer they will continue; and for pleasures, because they stay not, and do but call to drink at my door, I will use them as passengers, with slight respect. He is his own best friend that makes least of both of them.

Bishop Hall.

11,772. SOUL, Auction of a. Rev. Rowland Hill was preaching in the open air in the Moor-fields, London. His text was taken from the Song of Solomon 1: 5, "I am black, but comely." The text he regarded as having application to the Church, which, in the estimation of the world, was black—"black as the tents of Kedar"—but, in the estimation of her glorified Head, comely, comely, "as the curtains of Solomon." While discussing these themes, Lady Anne Erskine passed that way. Seeing the immense multitude, she asked one of her attendants the cause of this assemblage, and learned that Rowland Hill was preaching to the people. She had often wished to hear

11,787. SOUL, Responsibility for. Restore to the Lord the spirit entire, as thou hast received it; for if thou gavest to a fuller a garment which was entire, and desirest so to receive it again; but the fuller restored it to thee rent, wouldst thou receive it? Wouldst thou not say in anger, "I delivered to thee my garment entire, wherefore hast thou torn it, and made it useless? It is now, on account of the rent which thou hast made in it, of no more service to me." If thou then grieveest for thy garment, and complainest because thou receivest it not entire again, how, thinkest thou, will the Lord deal with thee, who gave thee a perfect spirit; but which spirit thou hast marred, so that it can be of no more service to the Lord? for it became useless when corrupted by thee. Anon.

11,788. SOUL, Return of the. A legend says that the body of Melonius, a holy man, bishop of Rennes in Brittany, who died while on a journey through his diocese, was placed in a boat and returned to Rennes without oars or sails, against the current of the stream. However it may be with the body, there is no doubt that the soul finds its way at death to its home, either the ready mansions of the saints or the dark abodes of the lost.

11,789. SOUL, Sadness of. Cardinal Richelieu, who had given law to Europe for many years, acknowledged the unhappy state of his mind to P. du Moulin. Being asked why he was so sad, the Cardinal replied, "The soul is a serious thing; it must either be sad here or be sad forever."

11,790. SOUL, Sin in the. Many people can mourn over a body from which a soul is departed, but they cannot mourn over a soul whom God has deserted; alas! what is the bite of a fly, to the stinging of a scorpion; or a spot in the face to a stab in the heart? Inward diseases are least visible, and yet most fatal. A man may die of the plague, although his spots never appear. Sin in the soul is like Jonah in the ship; it turns the smoothest water into a troubled ocean. We must mourn for sin on earth, or burn for sin in hell. It is the coldness of our hearts which kindles the fire of God's anger. Secker.

11,791. SOUL, Spoliation of the. When the impious king Antiochus entered the temple of Jerusalem to lay it waste, his first act was to remove the golden altar, and the candlestick, which was also of gold. The devil acts in the same manner when he intends to deprive of spiritual good that soul which is the temple of the living God: he takes from it the altar—that is, fervor of mind; he removes from it the candlestick—that is, the light which makes known the eternal maxims. The devil cannot take from the soul the light of faith: he, however, removes the light of consideration; so that the soul may not reflect on what it believes. And as it is of no avail to open the eyes in the dark, so, says St. Augustine, "it is of no advantage to be near the light if the eyes are closed." The eternal maxims, considered in the light of faith, are most clear; yet, if we do not open the eyes of the mind by meditating on them, we live as if we were perfectly blind: and so precipitate ourselves into every vice. Ignatius.

11,792. SOUL, Voice of the. After all, let a man take what pains he may to hush it down, a human soul is an awful, ghostly, unquiet possession for a bad man to have. Who knows the metes and bounds of it? Who knows all its awful perhappes—those shudderings and tremblings, which it can no more live down than it can outlive its own eternity! What a fool is he who locks his door to keep out spirits, who has in his own bosom a spirit he dares not meet alone; whose voice, smothered far down, and piled over with mountains of earthliness, is yet like the forewarning trumpet of doom! Mrs. Stowe.

11,793. SOUL, Voyage of the. Baring-Gould gives, on the authority of Macpherson, the following legend: One day a famous Druid of Skerr sat upon the rocks by the sea shore musing. A storm arose, the waves dashed high and the winds howled. Out of it a boat, with white sails and gleaming oars, emerged. In it were no sailors; the boat seemed to live and move of itself. A voice called to the Druid, "Arise, and see the Green Isle of those who have passed away!" He entered the boat; the wind shifted at once, and amid clouds and spray he sailed forth. Seven days gleamed on him through the mist; on the eighth the waves rolled violently, the vessel pitched and darkness thickened around him, when suddenly he heard a cry, "The Isle! the Isle!" The clouds parted before him, the wave abated, the wind died away, and the vessel rushed into dazzling light. Before his eyes lay the isle of the departed, basking in golden light. Its hills sloped green and tufted with beauteous trees to the shore; the mountain tops were enveloped in bright and transparent clouds, from which gushed limpid streams, which, wandering down the steep hill-sides with pleasant harp-like murmur, emptied themselves into the twinkling blue bays; the valleys were open and free to the ocean; trees loaded with leaves, which scarcely waved to the light breeze, were scattered on the green declivities and rising ground; all was calm and bright, the pure sun of autumn shone from his blue sky on the fields; he hastened not to the west for repose, nor was he seen to rise in the east, but hung as a golden lamp, ever illuminating the Fortunate. There in radiant halls, dwelt the spirits of the departed, ever blooming and beautiful, ever laughing and gay.

11,794. SOUL, Weeding the. King Charles the Fat sent a messenger to Notker, the monk, to ask what he should do for his soul, who found him in his garden weeding it and watering the plants. "Tell the king to do what I am doing now," was all the answer he made. When this was reported to the king, he said, "Yes, that is the sum of all. Away with the weeds of vice, and water the plants of grace."

11,795. SOUL AND BODY, Reunion of the. Even the glorified soul in heaven has a natural desire of union with its own body. We are all sensible of the soul's affection to the body now, its sympathy with it, and unwillingness to be separated from it. It is said to be "at home in the body." 2 Cor. 5:6. This inclination remains in heaven; it reckons not itself completely happy till its older dear companion and partner be with it. Now, when this inclination to its own body, its longings after it, are gratified with the sight and enjoyment of it again, what a joyful meeting will this be! especially if we consider the excellent temper and state in which they shall meet each other. For as the body shall be raised with all the improvements and endowments imaginable which may render it every way desirable, so the soul comes down immediately from God out of heaven, shining in its holiness and glory. And thus it re-enters its body, and animates it again.

John Flavel.

11,796. SOULS, Converting. I have passed through many places of honor and trust, both in church and state, more than any of my order in England these seventy years back; yet were I but assured that by my preaching I had but converted one soul to God, I should take therein more spiritual joy and comfort, than in all the honors and offices which have been bestowed upon me.

Archbishop Williams.

11,797. SOULS, Earnestness for. A little while ago, a clergyman said to a young man who never thought of his soul, "My dear young friend, I think you are going to lose your soul! You are putting off the day of salvation—neglecting all these solemn matters; going on heedlessly, I fear, to the day of your death." The young man looked up with surprise, and said, "I don't think so! And you must really pardon me, but I have my doubts whether you really think so, or your church thinks so." The minister was astonished. He never suspected the young man of scepticism. "How so?" he asked. "Why, my mother belongs to your church. Don't they all think as you do." "Yes, they do." "Well, then, don't my mother love me? And do you think she would never have told me, if she thought I was going straight to perdition? And there's my sister; don't she believe as you do?" "Yes." "Now, then, I know my sister loves me. Don't, don't, don't you think she would warn me if she thought I was going to perdition?"

J. W. Smith.

11,798. SOULS, Labor for. A minister whose pastorate of twenty years had not been crowned with many souls, was waited upon by a committee of his congregation to request him to resign on account of his unfruitful ministry. Incidentally the committee stated that he had been the means of converting only one soul in twenty years. "Do you say that? Do you know that one soul has been converted? Then here goes for another twenty years' work for another soul." The serious question would be how many more might and would have been saved through a more efficient preacher? How many were lost in that time? Our ministry should save souls, or give place to one that will.

11,799. SOULS, Perseverance for. A missionary from India, addressing an assembly, said he had been obliged to wait twelve years before God had rescued by his instrumentality one soul from the darkness of heathenism. But if he were asked whether he would have gone to the heathen, if he had been told thirty years before how little fruit of his labors he would have seen, he now answered most cheerfully, "Yes, indeed, I would have gone!"

11,800. SOULS, Price of. All they who wrong others to enrich themselves; all that rob upon the highway, pick pockets, or break open houses; all that forge deeds, forswear themselves, or suborn others to do so in law-suits; all that willingly cheat, defraud or overreach their neighbors, in buying or selling their goods; all that pilfer and steal, or so much as withhold and conceal what they know belongs to another; all that are able, yet will not pay what they owe, but lie in prison, or hide themselves, or at least pretend they cannot do it; all that smuggle the king's customs, or corrupt his officers, and by that means keep to themselves what the law hath made due to him; all that refuse or neglect to relieve those of their relations or others, which are really in need, and so withhold from them the maintenance which God hath appointed for them; all that oppress and gripe poor workmen in their prices, or servants in the wages which are due to them; all that work upon people's necessities, and extort from them more than the laws of the land allow of; all that follow such unlawful trades as tend to the corrupting of youth, and to the nourishing of vice and wickedness in the world; all that by false weights or measures, by lying, over-reckoning, or by any trick, impose on those they deal with; and all that are conscious to themselves that, by these and such like unlawful ways, they have got other men's money, goods or estate in their hands, and yet will not restore them again to their right owners as far as they are able,—these all as plainly lose their souls for this world as if they should make a solemn contract or bargain with the devil that, upon condition, they may have such and such things at present, he shall have their souls forever; for so he will, and leave them in the lurch, too: he will serve them in their own kind; as they cheated others, he will cheat them, and put them off with nothing but dreams and fancies, instead of the great profit and advantage they expected.

Bishop Beveridge.

11,801. SOULS, Unwelcome Effort for. A man had been repeatedly urged to seek Christ, and did not fail to show his displeasure. His friends were in earnest, and would not let him alone. At last, yielding to their persistence, he went to the altar of prayer. He was converted, and said to those who had pressed him, "God bless you for persevering, for if you had not I might have been lost. I am so thankful that you did not let me alone."

11,802. SOULS, Watching for. I visit and examine every district of my large congregation every year. My father did so; and though the increasing population of the country has enlarged the congregation considerably, I follow his example. Though urged by my friends to lessen my labor, I still go on; and my vigorous health fits me for a toil that would be oppressive to others. Old Mr. Shirra, of Kirkaldy, said to his brethren, when urging them to hard service, "It will not look the worse at the day of judgment." Dr. H. Belfrage.

11,803. SOUL-SAVING, Co-operation in. I don't know of anything that would make a man get up quicker than to have four people combining to try to bring him to Christ. Suppose one man calls upon him after breakfast; he doesn't think much about it; he has had some one invite him to Christ before. Suppose before dinner the second man comes and says, "I want to lead you to Christ. I want to introduce you to the Son of God." The man is quite aroused now; perhaps he has never had the subject presented to him by two different men in one day. But the third man has come, and the man has become thoroughly aroused by this time, and he says to himself, "Why, I never thought so much about my soul as I have to-day." But before the man gets to bed at night the fourth man has come, and I will guarantee that he won't sleep much that night—four men trying to bring him to Christ. If we can't bring our friends to Christ, let us get others to help us. If four men won't do it, let us add the fifth, and the Lord will see our faith, and the Lord will honor our faith, and we shall see them saved. Moody.

11,804. SOUL-SAVING, Estimate of. A contemporary writer says, "If we were to suppose the present population of our globe to be sixteen hundred millions, which is probably an over-estimate, and that in all that vast number there was but one true Christian, and that he should be instrumental in the hands of the blessed Spirit, during the coming year, of the conversion of two others to Christ, and that each of these new converts should instrumentally lead two others to Christ during the first year of their spiritual life, and that the work should thus continue—each new convert leading two others to Christ within a year of his conversion, how long would it take at this rate for the whole sixteen hundred millions to be brought to Christ? The answer will doubtless startle many of our readers; but if we may rely upon figures, the whole world would be converted in a little less than thirty years and a half, or within less than a single generation! Is such a work too mighty for God's Spirit to accomplish, or for the church to strive to achieve? But let us vary somewhat the conditions. Instead of supposing, as above, that there was but one true Christian in all the world, let us, with a nearer approximation to the truth, suppose the number to be at least twenty millions. This is probably much below the truth. If each one of these should bring to Christ instrumentally a single soul within the coming year, the whole number would be doubled before the close of 1877. If similar blessed results should follow prayer and effort in 1878, and be continued year after year—each true Christian becoming instrumental by prayer and personal effort in the salvation of only one soul each year—long before the year 1883 would have come to a close, the grand chorus would be heard in heaven: 'The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.' By each true Christian bringing instrumentally one soul to Christ each year, in less than seven years the world would be regenerated!"

11,805. SOUL-SAVING, Reward of. A young minister lodging in Margate, England, was aroused from slumber by hearing the cry, "Ramsgate, Ramsgate." He endeavored to find its source, but could not. Again he slumbered and was aroused by the same cry, "Ramsgate, Ramsgate." He concluded that the voice called him thither, and in the morning, obedient to the impulse, he set forth. Arrived there, he met an old friend who invited him to dine at his house, which was situated on an eminence fronting the sea. After dinner he strolled along the beach, where several youths were bathing. To one venturesome swimmer his attention was particularly drawn. He saw him suddenly disappear, and watched in vain for his reappearance. He noted the spot, called for the most expert swimmer of the boys, and encouraged him to rescue his friend. The brave youth dived at the place indicated, found the body and brought it ashore apparently lifeless. The man at once set about using all the usual appliances for resorting suspended animation. Constant friction and artificial breathing were resorted to for a long time with no success. The bystanders said further efforts were useless, and refused to help longer. The minister felt that his work in Ramsgate was to save this youth, and he persevered in his efforts. At last slight signs of life were manifested. Slowly animation returned. The youth was placed in a warm bed in the house where the minister had dined, and fell into a quiet sleep, closely watched by his rescuer. After a time he awoke and inquired how he came there. He was told of his narrow escape, and filled with gratitude threw himself at the feet his rescuer, exclaiming, "My more than father!" He felt himself fully repaid for his labors. He was invited to be present at the meeting of the Royal Humane Society for that year. His philanthropic deed had become well known. At the meeting, side doors were thrown open suddenly, when a procession of rescued men filed slowly through the hall, every one of whom had been snatched from a watery grave by the efforts of some one. In the procession was the rescued youth, scanning every face as he passed till he recognized his deliverer. He broke from the lines, and ran to embrace him, and the whole assembly was moved by the spectacle. He was summoned to the chair, and received the honors, thanks and medal of the society. If such is the reward of saving a life, what shall be the honor bestowed upon him who rescues a soul from death in the presence of saints, angels and God?

11,806. SOUL-SAVING, Skill in. A little girl found a fragment of a paper, on which was a picture. She carried it to her father, a poor inebriate, and expressed her delight with the beautiful picture, but the father could see no beauty in it. "O, yes, papa," said she, "it is a beautiful picture." It represented a father, mother, and little girl at prayer. "Just think, papa, if this man praying was you, and this woman was mamma, and this little girl was me, what a happy home we should have!" She had her idea of a happy home from an uncle's where she had visited, and, in memory of it, she appealed to her father. The father's heart melted, the picture prophecy became reality, and all the characters in it are now members of the Free-Will Baptist Church in Candia, N. H.

11,807. SOUL-SAVING, Successful. The wife of a pastor requested twelve of the leading unconverted men of the parish to meet her at the parsonage on a specified evening. They all came and had a brief conversation on the subject of personal religion. While they were together the pastor was in another room praying for them. The lady wrestled all night in prayer for these men, and prevailed. Nine of the twelve men were converted within three weeks from that time.

11,808. SOWING, Daily. A gentleman visiting at the house of a farmer, saw him scattering grain broadcast upon his field and asked, "What are you sowing?" "Wheat," was the answer. "And what do you expect to reap from it?" "Why wheat, of course," said the farmer. The same day some little thing provoked the farmer, and he flew into a violent passion, and, forgetting, in his excitement, the presence of his guest, swore most profanely. The gentleman said, "And what are you sowing now?" A new light at once flashed upon the farmer from the question of the morning. "What!" he said, in a subdued and thoughtful tone, "do you take such serious views of life as that, such serious views of every mood, and word and action?" "Yes," was the reply; "for every mood helps to form the permanent temper; and for every word we must give account; and every act but aids to form a habit; and habits are to the soul what the veins and arteries are to the blood—the courses in which it moves, and will move for ever. By all these little things we are forming character, and that character will go with us to eternity, and according to it will be our destiny forever."

11,809. SOWING, Picture of. I was at the Paris Exhibition in 1867, and noticed there a little oil painting, only about a foot square, and the face was the most hideous I have ever seen. On the paper attached to the painting were the words "Sowing the tares," and the face looked more like a demon's than a man's. As he sowed these tares, up came serpents and reptiles, and they were crawling up on his body, and all around were woods with wolves and animals prowling in them. I have seen that picture many times since. Ah! the reaping time is coming. Moody.

11,810. SPARROWS, Lesson from the. The sparrows which flutter and twitter about dilapidated buildings at Jerusalem, and crevices of the city walls, are very numerous. In some of the more lonely streets they are so roisy as almost to overpower every other sound. A person who resided in the country told me that these birds are sometimes brought to market in order to be sold as food. Being so small and abundant, their value singly must, of course, be trifling; and hence, as the custom of selling them was an ancient one, we see how pertinent was the Saviour's illustration for showing how minutely God watches over all events, and how entirely his people may rely on his care and goodness. Biblical Treasury.

11,811. SPEAKING, Good. Archbishop Whately says, that, while the true object of oratory is to carry one's point, "many a wandering discourse one hears in which the preacher aims at nothing and hits it." As a contrast to this kind of oratory, we have the remark made as to the speeches of Bishop Blomfield, that they were "those of one who had something to say, not of one who had to say something."

11,812. SPEECH, Silence and. Plato says, that for a word, which is the lightest of all things, both gods and men inflict the heaviest penalties. But silence, which can never be called to an account, doth not only, as Hippocrates hath observed, extinguished thirst, but it bears up against all manner of slanders, with the constancy of Socrates and the courage of Hercules, who were no more concerned than a fly at what others said or did.

Plutarch.

11,813. SPENDTHRIFTS, Punishment of. It is said that in Padua there was a stone called the Stone of Turpitude. It was situated near the Senate-house, and to it all spendthrifts and debtors were brought and condemned to sit nude upon the stone. Thus publicly disgraced they were less likely to indulge in excessive prodigality in the future. Such a stone at the present time might find numerous occupants.

11,814. SPIRIT, Return of the. The Rabbis have delivered what follows, on Eccl. 12: 7, where it is written, "The spirit shall return unto God who gave it." He gave it to thee unspotted, see that thou restore it unspotted to him again. It is like a mortal king, who distributed royal vestments to his servants. Then those that were wise, folded them carefully up, and laid them by in the wardrobe; but those that were foolish went their way, and, clothed in these garments, engaged in their ordinary work. After awhile the king was well pleased with the wise, and said, "Let the vestments be laid up in the wardrobe, and let these depart in peace." But he was angry with the foolish servants, and said, "Let the vestments be given to be washed, and those servants be cast into prison." So will the Lord do with the bodies of the righteous, as it is written, Isaiah 57: 2; with their souls, 1 Sam. 35: 29;

but with the bodies of the wicked, Isaiah 48: 22; 57: 21; and with their souls, 1 Sam. 25: 29.

11,815. SPIRIT, Wounds of the. The strokes of the "Sword of the Spirit" alight only on the conscience, and its edge is anointed with a balm to heal every wound it may inflict.

Dr. J. Harris.

11,816. SPIRITUALITY, Promotion of. It is said of St. Francis of Assisi, whatever he did, or wherever he was, his soul was always raised to heaven, and he seemed continually to dwell with angels. He consulted God before everything he did, and he taught his brethren to set a high value upon, and by humility, self-denial, and assiduous recollection, to endeavor to obtain the most perfect spirit of prayer, which is the source of all spiritual blessings, and without which a soul can do very little good. The practice of mental prayer was the favorite exercise which he strongly recommended. Persons who labored under any interior weight of sadness, or spiritual dryness, he vehemently exhorted to have resort to fervent prayer, and to keep themselves as much as possible in the presence of their Heavenly Father, till he should restore to them the joy of salvation. Otherwise, said he, a disposition of sadness, which comes from Babylon, that is, from the world, will gain ground, and produce a great rust in the affections of the soul.

Alban Butler.

11,817. SPRING, Contemplation of. There is no way in which the young can better learn the sentiments of devotion, or the old preserve them, than by cultivating those habits of thought and observation which convert the scenes of nature into the temple of God; which make us see the Deity in every appearance we behold, and change the world, in which the ignorant and the thoughtless see only the reign of time and chance, into the kingdom of the living and ever-present God of the universe. Reflections of this kind arise very naturally amidst the scenes we at present behold. In the beautiful language of the wise man, "The winter is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, and the time of the singing of birds is come." In these moments we are witnessing the most beautiful and astonishing spectacle that nature ever presents to our view. The earth, as by an annual miracle, arises, as it were, from her grave into life and beauty. It is in a peculiar manner the season of happiness. The vegetable world is spreading beauty and fragrance amidst the dwellings of men. The animal creation is rising into life; millions of seen, and myriads of unseen beings are enjoying their new-born existence, and hailing with inarticulate voice the Power which gave them birth. Is there a time when we can better learn the goodness of the universal God? Is it not wise to go abroad into nature, and associate his name with everything which at this season delights the eye and gratifies the heart?

Alison.

11,818. SPRING, Resurrection of. Beautiful is the season of awakening nature and spring—beautiful is the dawning day of summer; there is new life in the garden, the forest, and the field—beautiful! the hard reign of the winter is over, the birds have come back to us, the flowers appear on the earth—nature is awake again, is alive again, after her long sleep; the morning and the evening twilights are sacred to all sacred thoughts—spring is here. In the May boughs, in the lengthening twilight, in the note of the bird, in the gentle dew, in the fragrance of the flowers, in the echoing woods and hills, choral with the ring of waterfalls and rivulets rushing on their way, there is the glad voice—spring is here. Nature has been in her coffin long enough; God has touched the bier, and said, "Damsel, I say unto thee, arise," and she that was dead has heard the voice, and has come forth. The heart acknowledges the sway of the new life; so ever life lies deeper than death; the grave of death is only the urn, the sacred depository of life.

Hood.

11,819. SPRING, Spiritual. When our Lord spoke those great words, "God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth," words so fatal to priestcraft and to mere sacerdotalism; it was the spring-time of the world none the less because the beams had not struck down into the whole darkness. Spring is none the less here because there are clefts of the mountains where the snows as yet is unmelted, and rivers where the ice is yet unlocked. I step from the coffin of nature to the coffin of a dispensation. In the day of our Lord it was all-expiring; it was the advent of the spiritual—"That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual." The empire of the world's winter-day was dying, nor was there a word spoken by our Lord which was not seed for a new vernal empire of perpetual beauty. Judaism lay a dead root in a dry ground in the world's history, in a few years to be consigned to the lumber-room of the world's antiquities; but there was a seed in it; God, whose fingers touch the roots of trees and flowers, was at its heart in the germinating principle of life, grafting a new spirituality into it.

Hood.

11,820. SPRING, Symbology of. There is another symbol of spring; I refer to the singular preservation of the numberless germs which come to light, at this glad season, in all parts of the earth, the air, and the waters. The seed is to the plant what the egg is to the insect, or the bud to that which proceeds from it. In each egg there is a germ, containing the lineaments of a little animal, which needs only heat to develop it. In each seed also is a germ from which the plant issues. And as no vegetable is produced without a seed, to which it owes its first existence, no animal can come to the light which has not been prepared in an egg. But science has already numbered upon the globe ten thousand different species of plants, each of which proceeds from a germ peculiar to itself. And yet, my brethren, it is surprising that all these seeds of plants and eggs of insects, scattered everywhere, by millions upon millions, are never mistaken for the spring in its innumerable resurrections; the cochineal never arising where we expected the ant, or the tamarind in the place of the sycamore, or the mint and the cummin in the place of the hyssop or the mustard. But it is especially surprising how all these germs can, previous to their renewal, brave the power of the elements, the moisture of the night, the rigor of the winter, frequently long years, and sometimes also ages, without losing anything of their germinating virtue, or of that mysterious life which lies concealed in their interior. You have doubtless heard the tradition that the Greek missionaries, thirteen hundred years ago, secretly conveyed from China to Europe in the hollow of a pilgrim's staff, the first eggs of those marvelous worms which at this day supply us with silk, and which by their labors year after year enrich so many countries. You know also how in European markets people trade in these germs under the name of seed, as you would do with the seed of poppies or wheat. Our countryman, the illustrious Bonnet, mentions some little animals whose germs sustain, without perishing, the heat of boiling water; while others, still more remarkable, those for example, of the eels in rickety corn, or of polypi in rain-water, are preserved dry, and in a state of apparent death for many years, the one in the corn and the other in the dust. Corn has been discovered both in Europe and in Africa, which had been buried for several ages in cavities, or subterranean hollows, whose germs came to light as soon as one of our springs shed upon them its quickening breath. And to mention still one thing more, have you not heard of those Celtic tombs, and of the skeletons and seeds, lately discovered near Bergerac, in France? Under the head of each of these skeletons, buried, it is said, two thousand years ago, the superstition of the Druid priests had placed a block, and under each of these blocks in a little circular cavity covered with cement, a small quantity of seeds. Well, these seeds of two thousands years' duration, being collected and sown with particular care, have rapidly germinated; and the heliotrope, the trefoil, and the blue-bell have been seen springing in resurrection of life, after twenty centuries of a burial; so that last year you might have beheld, with your own eyes, those marvelous plants blossoming in beauty, under the light of our own spring, after their germs had slept two thousand years under the heads of the dead and in the dust of the tombs. O, my beloved brethren, my companions in the journey to the tomb, what may we not anticipate? Are not these sublime and imposing symbols; and am I not right in saying that they are rich in instruction and consolation? Do they not justify us in affirming that those very dead, whose dried skulls preserved the germs of the sunflower, the blue-bell, and the clover, shall also rise from their own dust in the last great day; that their germs shall be preserved, in spite of all the powers of the elements and the duration of ages; that then Jesus will come in the clouds of heaven; that there will be a resurrection of the just and of the unjust; that all the dead that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and that he will quicken their bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in them? Gaussen.

11,821. SPRINKLING, Custom of. In the East, when a prince or a great man gives a grand entertainment, there are servants who sprinkle with perfumed liquids (as rose water, etc.) the several guests as they enter. This sprinkling is understood to fit them for the presence of the entertainer, to declare them his guests, and, as such, to place them under his favor and protection. Dr. Kitto.

11,822. STABILITY, Condition of. A bronze figure of Luther, with gown and bands and the Bible in his arms, stands upon a pedestal of polished granite under a Gothic canopy at Wittenberg. Upon the base of the monument is the inscription, "Ist's Gottes Werk, so wirds bestehen. Ist's Menchen Werk wirds untergehen." If it is God's work it will stand, but if it is man's work it will perish. The ever spreading religion called Protestantism is Luther's noblest monument.

11,823. STEALING Arrested. The Rev. J. Smith, of Bathurst, South Africa, reports the following case, showing the power of conscience: "A fine, tall, athletic young man, a Caffre, addicted to all the debasing and demoralizing customs of his nation, one night resolved to go into the colony for the purpose of stealing a horse, which is a common practice with them. He immediately left his home, came into the colony, and watched for an opportunity of accomplishing his purpose, which soon presented itself. He found two horses grazing in a sheltered situation near a bush, and he instantly seized one of them, and made off with it as fast as he could. Elated with his success, and rejoicing in the prospect of securing his prize without being detected, he proceeded homewards, when all at once, the thought struck him, 'Thou shalt not steal.' He could go no further; he immediately drew up the horse, and said to himself; 'What is this? I have frequently heard these words before in the church; but I never felt as I do now. This must be the word of God.' He dismounted, and held the bridle in his hand, hesitating whether to go forward with the horse, or to return back with it, and restore it to its owner. In this position he continued for upwards of an hour. At last he resolved to take the horse back again, which he accordingly did, and returned home a true penitent, determined to serve God. When he reached his dwelling, he could not rest; sleep had departed from him; the arrows of conviction stuck fast in his conscience, and he could not shake them off. The next day he took an ox out of his kraal (or cattle place), and went to the nearest village to sell it, in order that he might buy European clothing with the money, and attend the house of God like a Christian. When he returned with his clothes, he went to the minister's house, told him all that had taken place, and requested to be admitted on trial as a church member. The minister, cheered with his statement, gladly received him; and, after keeping him on trial the appointed time, and finding him consistent in his conduct, a short time ago baptized him; and he is now a full member of the Christian church, and adorning his Christian profession."

11,824. STEALING, Conversion from. A highway robber, who had taken a gentleman's watch, money, and what he supposed to be valuable papers, found among them a sermon on the text, "Thou shalt not steal." The coincidence struck his attention, and the sermon alarmed him as he read it. He restored the stolen valuables to the minister, and became a reformed man.

11,825. STEWARDS, Oriental. Nearly all respectable families in the East have a steward, whose name in Tamul is Kanikapulle. He is sometimes one who has been master himself, or he is a relation, or has been selected on account of former services. His pay is often a mere trifle, and sometimes he has not any stipulated salary, but derives perquisites according to the extent of his master's dealings. Should there be money to give out on loan, he always demands from the borrower a certain percentage, and the least demur will cause him to say, "You cannot have the money; I have many other applicants." Is the produce of the land to be disposed of, he again squeezes something out of the purchaser, and if possible out of his master into the bargain. Has he anything to buy for the house, he grinds the face of the dealer, and demands a handsome present for the custom. Does he pay the servants or laborers, they must each dole out a trifle for their monthly or daily stipend; he never gives out goods or money without taking a bond or a "bill," which is sometimes written by the debtor, and always has his signature. Sometimes he brings false bonds and counterfeit jewels, and gives out large sums of money: and when his accomplices have decamped, he pretends to be, of all men, the most astonished at their villainy! When detected, he has generally a good store of his own filthy lucre, but should he not have succeeded, he would sooner starve than work, for the latter would be a mortal disgrace to a man of his rank! Even common beggars sometimes remind us of the passage, "I cannot dig." Religious mendicants swarm in every part of the East, and when you advise them to work, they cast upon you a contemptuous scowl, and walk off in great dudgeon, exclaiming, "We work! We have never done such a thing; we are not able. You are joking, my lord!"

Roberts.

11,826. STONES, Sermons in. There are no natural objects out of which more can be learned than out of stones. They seem to have been created especially to reward a patient observer. Nearly all other objects in nature can be seen, to some extent, without patience, and are pleasant even in being half seen.

Trees, clouds and rivers are enjoyable, even by the careless; but the stone under his foot has for carelessness nothing in it but stumbling; no pleasure is languidly to be had out of it, nor food, nor good of any kind; nothing but symbolism of the hard heart and the unfatherly gift. And yet, do but give it some reverence and watchfulness, and there is bread of thought in it, more than in any other lowly feature of all the landscape; for a stone when it is examined will be found a mountain in miniature. The fineness of nature's work is so great, that, into a single block, a foot or two in diameter, she can compress as many changes of form and structure, on a small scale, as she needs for her mountains on a large one; and taking moss for forests, and grains of crystal for crags, the surface of a stone, in by far the plurality of instances, is more interesting than the surface of an ordinary hill; more fantastic in form, and incomparably richer in color.

Ruskin.

11,827. STONING, Death by. A crier marched before the man who was to die, proclaiming his offence and the names of the witnesses on whose testimony he had been convicted. This was for the humane purpose of enabling any one possessing knowledge of the parties and circumstances to come forward and arrest the execution, until his further evidence had been heard and considered. Hence, usually the tribunal which had sentenced the prisoner remained sitting to hear such evidence as might be thus produced, and did not rise until the execution had taken place. Arrived at the place, the convict was divested of his clothing, except a small covering about the loins; and, his hands being bound, he was taken to the top of some eminence not less than twice a man's height. When the top was reached, the witnesses laid their hands upon him, and then cast off their upper clothing that they might be the more ready for the active exertion their position imposed. To prevent their clothes from being lost, they were consigned to the care of some friend. All being ready, one of the witnesses cast the condemned down from that high place with great violence, endeavoring to do it so that he should fall upon a large stone which was designedly placed below. The fall usually rendered him insensible, if it did not kill him; but, if he was not dead, those below turned him upon his back, and then the other witnesses remaining above cast down a large stone aimed at his chest. This stroke was generally mortal; but, if not, the people below hastened to cast stones at him till no life remained. Thus the execution was quickly over, and was attended by fewer revolting circumstances than must have ensued from that indiscriminate pelting by the people which is commonly supposed to have constituted the stoning to death. It would seem that Stephen rose from his fall to his knees, and in that posture prayed for the forgiveness of his murderers—a circumstance which imparts an additional touching emphasis to his prayer.

11,828. STORMS, Facing. The ship that is anchored is sensitive to every change of wind or tide, and ever turns sharply around to meet and resist the stream, from what direction soever it may flow. A ship is safest with her head to the sea and the tempest. In great storms the safety of all often depends on the skill with which the sailors can keep her head to the rolling breakers. Life and death have sometimes hung for a day and a night in the balance, whether the weary steersman could keep her head to the storm until the storm should cease. Even a single wave allowed to strike her on the broadside might send all to the bottom. But to keep the ship in the attitude of safety, there is no effort and no art equal to the anchor. As soon as the anchor feels the ground, the vessel that had been drifting broadside, is brought up, and turns to the waves a sharp prow that cleaves them in two and sends them harmless along the sides. Watch from a height any group of ships that may be lying in an open roadstead. At night when you retire they all point westward; in the morning they are all looking to the east. Each ship has infallibly felt the first veering of the wind or water, and instantly veered in the requisite direction, so that neither wind nor wave has ever been able to strike her on the broadside. Thereby hangs the safety of the ship. Ships not at anchor do not turn and face the foe. The ship that is left loose will be caught by a gust on her side, and easily thrown over. As with ships, so with souls.

11,829. STRIFE, Agent of. A trumpeter being taken prisoner in a battle, begged hard for quarter. "Spare me, good sirs, I beseech you," said he, "and put me not to death without cause, for I have killed no one myself, nor have I any arms but this trumpet only." "For that very reason," said they who had seized him, "shall you sooner die, for without the spirit to fight, yourself, you stir up others to warfare and bloodshed."

Æsop.

11,830. STRIFE, Portents of. There is something irritating and belligerent in the sluggish atmosphere that precedes a storm. Even before the clouds gather along the horizon with portentous shade and mysterious muttering, the herds are in disorder, and some of the stoutest within the fold engaged in actual combat, trampling the pasture under foot in wanton strife. It is said of bees, that when they stir and strive among themselves, it is an indication that they are about to lose their queen. The commotion is a sign of trouble in the hive. The buzzing and darting of bees in every direction, all readier to sting than to work, is an outward manifestation of an internal disturbance.

Alexander Clark.

11,831. STUDY, Methods of. It would have been well if Bacon had added some hints as to the mode of study: how books are to be chewed, and swallowed, and digested. For, besides inattentive readers, who measure their proficiency by the pages they have gone over, it is quite possible, and not uncommon, to read most laboriously, even so as to get by heart the words of a book, without really studying it at all; that is, without employing the thoughts on the subject.

Whately.

11,832. STUDY, Subjects of. I received a most useful hint from Dr. Bacon, then father of the University, when I was at college. I used to frequently visit him at his living, near Oxford. He would frequently say to me, "What are you doing? What are your studies?" "I am reading so and so." "You are quite wrong. When I was young, I could turn any piece of Hebrew into Greek verse with ease. But when I came into this parish, and had to teach ignorant people, I was wholly at a loss. I had no furniture. They thought me a great man, but that was their ignorance; for I knew as little as they did of what it was most important for them to know. Study chiefly what you can turn to good account in your future life."

R. Cecil.

11,833. STUPIDITY, Cause for. A facetious Irish minister remarked upon one of his stupid brethren, "Head! he has no head; what you call a head is only a top-knot that his maker put there to keep him from raveling out."

11,834. STUPIDITY, Reason of. Gough tells of a man who in attending lectures always left at a certain time. He was not a doctor, nor a man who was seeking to make himself conspicuous, and this eccentricity occasioned considerable remark among his neighbors. The reason of his action was not understood until after death, when a post mortem examination was held, when it was found that his skull had thickened, and kept thickening until there was no space left for his brain, and so he got filled up early and left to avoid an explosion.

11,835. STUPIDITY, Unconquerable. For of a truth stupidity is strong—most strong, as the poet Schiller sings, "Against stupidity the very gods fight unvictorious." There is in it a placid inexhaustibility—a calm viscous infinitude—which will baffle even the gods—which will say calmly, "Try all your lightnings here: see whether I cannot quench them."

Carlyle.

11,836. STYLE, Attention to. Cicero was accustomed to construct his orations with the greatest care, and even to labor to bring his sentences to the highest polish. On one occasion he had not satisfied himself and the appointed time for his address was at hand. At this point one of his slaves brought him word that the assembly was postponed for a day. Cicero was so rejoiced at this announcement, because of the time it would give him for preparation, that he gave the slave his liberty.

11,837. STYLE, Power of. In nothing is the creative power of a gifted writer seen more than in his style; true, his words may be found in the dictionary, but there they lie disjointed and dead. What a wonderful life does he breathe into them, by compacting them into his sentences. Perhaps he uses no term which has not been hackneyed by ordinary writers; and yet with these vulgar materials what miracles does he achieve! What a world of thought does he condense into a phrase! By new combinations of common words, what delicate hues or what a blaze of light does he pour over his subject! Power of style depends very little on the structure or copiousness of the language which the writer of genius employs, but chiefly, if not wholly, on his own mind. The words arranged in his dictionary, are no more fitted to depict his thoughts, than the block of marble in the sculptor's shop to show forth the conceptions which are dawning in his mind. Both are inert materials. The power which pervades them comes from the soul; and the same creative energy is manifested in the production of a noble style, as in extracting beautiful forms from lifeless stone.

Dr. Channing.

11,838. STYLE, Verbos. Plutarch had rather we should applaud his judgment than commend his knowledge, and had rather leave us with an appetite to read more, than glutted with that we have already read. He knew very well that a man may say too much even upon the best subjects, and that Alexandrides did justly reproach him who made very eloquent, but too long, speeches to the Ephori, when he said, "O stranger! thou speakest the things thou oughtest to speak, but not after the manner that thou shouldst speak them." Such as have lean and spare bodies stuff themselves out with clothes; so they who are defective in matter endeavor to make amends with words.

Montaigne.

11,839. SUBMISSION, Acceptable. The inhabitants of a Carthaginian city rebelled against their king, and he sent out his proclamation of intention to destroy the city. For this purpose he marched his army toward the doomed place. At his approach the great men of the city went out to meet him barefooted, and with ropes on their necks in token of unconditional submission, and gave him the keys. Taking the keys, he said, "Live, O my children, for I love you still." The rebellious soul is safe when it throws itself thus upon the mercy of Christ.

11,840. SUBMISSION, Demand for. During the Revolutionary war, Dr. Franklin, then ambassador of the new republic to the court of France, applied to the ambassador of King George III., asking him to treat for an exchange of prisoners. He received the spirited reply, "The king's ambassador receives no application from rebels unless they come to implore his majesty's mercy." The like submission is necessary in appealing to the Supreme Ruler. There can be no compromise with him. To contend against the Almighty is the most glaring folly.

11,841. SUBMISSION, Necessity for. Three years ago two friends of mine, good swimmers, by the name of Wells and Baker, went out into the lake to swim. Wells was taken with cramps, and was drowning. Baker swam to him, when Wells seized hold of both of his arms, and they went down together. Baker succeeded in releasing himself, and when they came to the surface he called to Wells, "I can save you, Wells, but you must let me get hold of you by the hair, and not hold my hands." Wells promised to do so if he would only try it again. He went to him again, and the second time he seized him, and both went down under the water again. Under the water there was a terrible struggle, but at last Baker got away and swam out a few rods, and turned around and saw his friend drowning. He heard his piercing cry for help, but he could not save him. If he had only stopped trying! So the Lord will save every sinner who stops trying and only trusts him.

Moody.

11,842. SUBMISSION, Reason for. I have watched an insect making its way with some earnest purpose along the highway, so long that I have become much interested in the success of its errand. When a loaded cart was coming up, whose wheel would have crushed the creature in an instant, I have laid a twig across its path, and compelled it to turn aside. Oh, how it stormed and fretted against my interference: if it could communicate with its kind, it would have a tale of hardship to recount that night, of some unknown and adverse power that stopped its progress and overturned its plans. Conceive, now, that intelligence should be communicated to that tiny being, and it should discover that another being, immeasurably raised above its comprehension, had in compassion saved it from death! Such will be the discoveries made in the light of heaven of the deliverances God wrought for his people. Oh, that will be joyful, to find out more and more of that incomprehensible thing.

Arnott.

11,843. SUBMISSION, Wise. The Tusculani, a people of Italy, having offended the Romans, whose power was infinitely superior to theirs, Camillus, at the head of a considerable army, was on his march to subdue them. Conscious of their inability to cope with such an enemy, they took the following method to appease him: They declined all thoughts of resistance, set open their gates, and every man applied himself to his proper business, resolving to submit where they knew it was in vain to contend. Camillus entering their city, was struck with the wisdom and candor of their conduct, and addressed himself to them in these words: "You only, of all people, have found out the true method of abating the Roman fury, and your submission has proved your best defence. Upon these terms, we can no more find in our heart to injure you than upon other terms you could have found power to oppose us." The chief magistrate replied, "We have so sincerely repented of our former folly, that in confidence of that satisfaction to a generous enemy, we are not afraid to acknowledge our fault." Thus he who confesseth and forsaketh his sins, shall find mercy.

Buck.

11,844. SUBSTITUTE, Christ Our. A visitor said to a sick soldier, "You have a 'Substitute,' have you, brother? You see there is a last great 'Draft' coming, for which every man on earth is enrolled. I was in Ohio a few weeks ago, and some who didn't go to war tried very hard to get exempted, and if they could not, they took great trouble to find a substitute, paying large sums to get others to take their chance, as they call it, of death. Now against that last grand draft there is a substitute provided, who has already taken our place, even unto death, and he is offered 'without money and without price.'

11,845. SUCCESS, Ministerial. The greatest success of the period has doubtless been gained by Rev. Chas. H. Spurgeon, of London. His commencement was discouraging; his work has been essentially missionary. The masses, for whom he longed, neglected him. He resolved to be heard, and said, "You shall hear me! If you will not hear me in a black coat, I will make you hear me in a red one." He was jeered at by the mob, caricatured by Punch, and written down by the The Times. He has a fine voice, earnest piety, and genuine love for souls. His personal influence is very great; his good sense is apparent in all his work. His individuality and vitality are very great. He is supreme in his church, and is never trammelled by boards of deacons, elders, or trustees; his wish is law among them. He built his great Metropolitan Tabernacle, personally collecting the funds for it. The same is true of his college and orphanage. He has written many books, edits a magazine, besides publishing more sermons than any living preacher, which are scattered in palace and cottage. It may encourage some of us to hear this wonderful man say, "The bane of my life is to keep myself steady at work. I often get discouraged, and think I should have done better at something else."

11,846. SUCCESS, Secret of. The lives of public men in America are so often dramatic and full of sudden and great changes that they attract little notice, and few of us trouble ourselves to deduce any signification touching our own work or aims from them. A man dies who has reached the second highest rank in the Government, and we hear without surprise the story of the excessive poverty and hard straits of his childhood. From the day of his birth until he was twenty-one he tells us that he had not had in all one dollar to spend. After that he had worked at shoemaking, making $5 a week, of which $2 went for board. His family and himself were abjectly ignorant, as well as poor. Yet, when we hear that in this strait he "made up his mind to go to school" and to succeed, and that he did it, and died Vice-President of the United States, we take it quite as a matter of course, and expend no wonder on the case. So, too, with the history of the elder Astor, recalled by the death of his son. A butcher boy sets out with his bundle on his shoulder for America, having made up his mind to be honest, to work, and to make money. We are not startled at all to know that when he died he bequeathed to his son $20,000,000. Every one of us can reckon in our own experience instances of success, not as extreme, but quite as remarkable as these. Men start in the race of life handicapped with every weight of poverty, disease, and inability, but they "make up their minds" to reach this or that point, and they reach it. Nor is success so easy in this country that we should receive it without surprise. The road is not broad but narrow, and the multitude are all in it. Where one achieves the prize, thousands sink discouraged, and among the thousands there are men more brilliant, shrewder, more richly endowed with wit, culture, and even judgment, than the winners. Why were they winners, then? Their aims were not always the best, but they conquered them, and surely it is worth our while to know how they did it; what was the secret of their power over other men and circumstances. The secret we believe to lie in their thorough earnestness and sincerity. They "made up their minds" as to what they wanted. They never altered them. There was no sham or faltering about Henry Wilson, John Jacob Astor, Franklin, Girard. You may call them a bull-dog race of men; but it is the bull-dog, after all, that brings down the prey, not the graceful spaniel. "Here stand I," says Luther, "and if all the tiles in Worms were devils, I could do no otherwise."

N. Y. Tribune.

11,847. SUCCESS, True Basis of. Admiral Farragut gave the following account of his start in life: "My father was sent down to New Orleans, with the little navy we then had, to look after the treason of Burr. I accompanied him as cabin-boy, and was ten years of age. I had some qualities which I thought made a man of me. I could swear like an old salt; could drink a stiff glass of grog as if I had doubled Cape Horn, and could smoke like a locomotive. I was great at cards, and fond of gaming in every shape. At the close of the dinner, one day, my father turned every body out of the cabin, locked the door, and said to me, 'David, what do you mean to be?' 'I mean to follow the sea.' 'Follow the sea! Yes, be a poor, miserable, drunken sailor before the mast, kicked and cuffed about the world, and die in some fever hospital in a foreign clime.' 'No,' I said, 'I'll tread the quarter-deck and command, as you do.' 'No, David; no boy ever trod the quarter-deck with such principles as you have, and such habits as you exhibit. You'll have to change your whole course of life if you ever become a man.' My father left me and went on deck. I was stunned by the rebuke and overwhelmed with mortification. 'A poor, miserable, drunken sailor before the mast, kicked and cuffed about the world, and to die in some fever hospital! That's my fate, is it? I'll change my life, and change it at once. I will never utter another oath; I will never drink another drop of intoxicating liquor; I will never gamble.' And as God is my witness, I have kept those three vows to this hour. Shortly after, I became a Christian. That act settled my destiny for time and eternity."

11,848. SUFFERING, Avenues of. Suffering comes to us through and from our whole nature. It cannot be winked out of sight. It cannot be thrust into a subordinate place in the picture of human life. It is the chief burden of history. It is the solemn theme of one of the highest departments of literature—the tragic drama. It gives to fictions their deep interest: it waits through much of our poetry. A large part of human vocations are intended to shut up some of its avenues. It has left traces on every human countenance over which years have passed. It is to not a few the most vivid recollection of life.

Dr. Channing.

11,849. SUFFERING, Biblical. May we not safely say, there is no book of the Bible which has not some reference to trial, whilst many parts are full of reference to the subject. In the Book of Psalms, e. g., out of one hundred and fifty Psalms, it is reckoned that in ninety some allusion is made to suffering! There is no saint in the Bible, of whose history we have any lengthened record, who was not called to endure trouble in some form; and very frequently the most eminent saints were most tried. Those who were called to important services, were generally trained in the school of affliction.

Bowes.

11,850. SUFFERING, Satisfaction in. Payson, in the midst of great suffering, being asked if he saw any special reason for the visitation, replied, "No, but I am as well satisfied as if I should see ten thousand; God's will is the very perfection of all reasons."

11,851. SUFFERING, Shrinking from. It is a memorable tribute that is paid to the martyrs in the Epistle to the Hebrews (11: 35): "Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance." May we not accuse ourselves that we are too apt to accept deliverance, any kind of deliverance, and from any quarter, if only it be deliverance. Infinitely better, my brother, my sister, cry for grace to "endure unto the end."

Grosart.

11,852. SUICIDE, Argument from. Suicide itself, that fearful abuse of the dominion of the soul over the body, is a strong proof of the distinction of their destinies. Can the power that kills be the same that is killed? Must it not necessarily be something superior and surviving? The act of the soul, which in that fatal instant is in one sense so great an act of power, can it at the same time be the act of its own annihilation? The will kills the body; but who kills the will?

Nicolas.

11,853. SUICIDE, Temptation to. Have you ever had the awful spectre of suicide raised up before your mind? It is very dreadful. But says good Thomas White: "Thou mayest be a child of God for all this, for our Saviour was tempted to 'cast himself down.'" Grosart.

11,854. SUN, Lesson from the. More joyful eyes look at the setting than at the rising sun. Burdens are laid down by the poor, whom the sun consoles more than the rich. No star and no moon announce the rising sun; and does not the setting sun, like a lover, leave behind his image in the moon! I yearn towards him when he sets, not when he rises. He is more nearly of kin to us in his setting, and he is more gentle to the evening star, which, in rising, he, warrior-like, annihilates. The moon and star of love glimmer after he has gone. He dies and goes under the earth, in order to make us blessed, and when I die, may he set half an hour later than I. I should like to take my leave of earth with the sun; but he should stay and look upon it a little time longer than I.

Richter.

11,855. SUN, Symbology of the. The sun is the fountain of light to this lower world. Day by day it rises on us with its gladdening beams; and with the return of light is connected the sense of reviving power in ourselves; invigorated health and cheerfulness; renewed and willing application to appointed duties. God himself has made it the ruler over the day. All nature seems to own its influence. The flowers that drooped, or closed their leaves during the night, expand themselves again when the sun ariseth. The gorgeous colors with which the clouds that were lately dark are now illuminated, bespeak the return of the absent king; and the clouds themselves are scattered at his approach. The loathsome or savage creatures that love darkness, now "get them away together, and lay down in their dens. Man goeth forth to his work and to his labor until the evening." Christ is to the moral world what the sun is to the natural world; the Source of life, and health, and motion. He is the "Sun of righteousness;" because the robe of righteousness in which his people "shine" is the light from him which they reflect, and on this account his church is said to be "clothed with the sun." And the inward righteousness also, in which they are created anew after the image of God, is derived from his illuminating presence in their hearts. And he rises on us "with healing in his wings;" because he brings with him, day by day, spiritual health to those who are diseased in soul, comfort to those who mourn, rest to the weary and heavy laden. The world has long lain in darkness and the shadow of death, waiting with "earnest expectation" for the first tokens of the "day-spring from on high;" even as travelers in a starless night, or as they that watch in loneliness and weariness, wait with eager longing for the burst of morning. At length the Sun of righteousness arose: when he who was with the Father from all eternity was born at Bethlehem; and took our nature upon him. And as the light from the morning sun travels with inconceivable speed to the remotest corners of the earth, and penetrates into the darkest recesses, so did the light from the Sun of righteousness penetrate "the dark places of the earth." It scattered the mists of ignorance and sin, and called forth from the garden of God's church those fruits and flowers which it could never otherwise have borne. Nor is his power to heal and comfort diminished by the lapse of years.

Bp. Trower.

11,856. SUNBEAMS, Resurrection of. Nothing in this vast creation is ever lost. Individuals may be losers through carelessness; but to the world at large no created substance can be lost. One combination of things is often changed into another, but no ingredient is ever utterly destroyed; for at this moment the created universe does not contain one particle of matter more, nor one particle less, than belonged to it that day it came fresh from the creating hand of him who made all things very good. Never did a sunbeam shine in vain, and therefore no sunbeam that ever streaked this world with light could be finally lost. Yet the sunbeam, lovely as it is, has had its grave, and there sometimes for unnumbered ages it has slept in undisturbed repose. What is coal but latent sunbeams, which need only to be ignited to start again into active life? The sun, when many thousand years younger than he is now, cast forth his radiant beams on the surface of the world, and noble trees of ferns and other acrogens started at his bidding into vigorous life; they lived, died, and underwent changes which made them coal—yes, coal—and the old sun, he did it all. These sunbeams have long been burned in the form of coal; and though by ignition their resurrection-life is but a dim shadow of their early brightness, they are yet sunbeams. We have nothing but sunlight in summer or in winter, think or talk as we may. The fire on our hearths, the gas in our tubes, the oil in our lamps, and the candles on our tables, are all products of the sunbeam. We kindle them, and in the very act raise the sunbeam from its grave, and send it forth to run perchance a long cycle of changes ere again it rests in such a peace as that we have dragged it from.

Brooke.

11,857. SUNDAY, Carrying. I had a friend, in Syracuse, who lived to be one hundred years of age. He said to me, in his ninety-ninth year, "I went across the mountains in the early history of this country. Sabbath morning came. We were beyond the reach of civilization. My comrades were all going out for an excursion. I said, 'No, I won't go, it is Sunday.' Why, they laughed. They said, 'We haven't any Sunday here.' 'Oh! yes,' I said, 'you have. I brought it with me over the mountains.'"

Talmage.

11,858. SUNDAY, Typology of. The eighth day is always typical of resurrection. The eighth day, the day after the seventh or Sabbath, answers to the first day of the week on which Christ rose; it is, however, the first day in reference to seven having gone before. Seven days include the periods proper to the first creation. The eighth day, as it takes us beyond and out of these—that is, beyond the limits of the old creation—brings us in type into a new order of things and times—into the new creation or resurrection. A. Jukes.

11,859. SUNDAY, Using. Make the Lord's day the market for thy soul; let the whole day be spent in prayer, repetitions, or meditations. Lay aside the affairs of the other parts of the week; let the sermon thou hast heard be converted into prayer. Shall God allow thee six days, and wilt not thou afford him one?

Bunyan.

11,860. SUNDAY-SCHOOL, Faithful to the. James Kershaw, of England, once a poor boy, but afterward a member of Parliament, revisited the Sabbath-school of his early days, and looked over the old class-books. He was gratified to see that for seven years while a scholar, and fourteen years while a teacher, he had not been once absent. He then expressed his conviction that his attachment to the Sabbath-school and his deep regard for the Sabbath, were the foundation of all his blessings, temporal and spiritual.

11,861. SUNDAY-SCHOOL, Recommendation of the. A wholesale liquor dealer one day accosted Moses F. Odell, the well-known superintendent of Sand St. M. E. S. S., Brooklyn: "I want you to send me a first-rate clerk—one that you can recommend. He must be prompt, smart, and reliable. In short, he must be a first-class Sunday-school boy." "Why do you want a clerk out of my Sunday-school? You're not a Christian; you don't attend church; your children are not in the Sunday-school." "O, that's all very well," replied the German free-thinker, "I can take care of myself; but I won't have anybody in my store that I can't trust. I know these Sunday-school boys, and they'll do to tie to. They won't drink my liquor, nor rob my till." It must be said that Sunday-school boys do not do the foul work of liquor dealers, but the indorsement is good.

11,862. SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, Advantage of. A little boy said to his irreligious mother, as she smoothed his dying pillow, "Oh, mother, you have never taught me anything about Jesus; and had it not been for the Sabbath-school teachers, I should now be dying without a hope in him, and must have been lost forever."

11,863. SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, Mission of. A new and beautiful flower has recently been discovered in the State of Texas. It is called the compass flower, because all its petals point to the north. In sunshine and in storm, by day and by night, the little flower points northward, and though the traveler may perchance be lost in the Texan wilds, yet, if he can only find one of these little compass flowers, he may, by looking at it, find his bearings and ascertain the true, the right way. Now, the mission of the Sabbath-school is to sow the seeds of truth in the heart of the little ones; those seeds will spring up as the seeds of flowers, and the blossoms will appear, beautiful and lovely in the sight of heaven, and as this compass flower points toward the north, they will point toward Christ. And, gazing upon these compass flowers of truth, planted by the instrumentality of some humble Sunday-school teacher, many a poor wanderer may be brought back to the way of peace and righteousness.

Anon.

11,864. SUNSET, Beauties of. I see the sun standing amid roses in the western sky, into which he has thrown his ray-brush, wherewith he has to-day been painting the earth; and when I look round a little in our picture-exhibition, his enameling is still hot on the mountains, on the moist chalk of the moist earth, the flowers, full of sap-colors, are laid out to dry, and the forget-me-not with miniature colors; under the varnish of the streams the skyey painter has penciled his own eye; and the clouds, like a decoration painter, he has touched off with wild outlines and single tints; and so he stands at the border of the earth. Richter.

11,865. SUPERINTENDENCE, Importance of. Superintending is the most costly and the most valuable work done in the world. Every business pays for superintending. A major-general is allowed sixteen rations, and more than a hundred salaries of the common soldiers. Bank management, presidents or cashiers, whichever happens to do the thinking, are paid enormous salaries. Bank directors know too much to commit their money to cheap men. Railroad superintendents are paid for their nerve power. Secretaries of insurance companies receive from $8,000 to $40,000 per year. Great factories employ superintendents at advanced wages. Great mercantile houses employ a good force of walking men, to look after the clerks and the customers. One single government building in this country cost the government millions on account of poor superintending.

Dr. C. H. Fowler.

11,866. SUPERSTITION, African. In case of sickness or death in the family of a Kaffir, of South Africa, the witch has been at work they think, and they ask, "Who is the witch?" A witch doctor is sent for, and he accuses a person of wealth, as whatever he has is given up to confiscation. The chief commands the accused to appear, and the mob proceed to "smell out" the culprit. The trial is by ordeal, and sometimes by enforced confession. The accused may be bound tightly, smeared with grease, and seated upon an anthill to be stung by ants. Again hot stones are applied to the body, or death by strangulation, or burning at the stake, is the fate of the victim. A witch doctor is also a rain-maker, who by incantations, sacrifices of cattle, and various ceremonies, tries to prolong his rites till rain comes, when he claims success.

11,867. SUPERSTITION, Fatal. Nicias, an Athenian general, filled with fear at a lunar eclipse sat still and was made prisoner, and his entire army of forty thousand men were slain or captured.

11,868. SUPERSTITION, Victims of. The Jews once sat quietly, it being their Sabbath-day, and suffered their enemies to rear their scaling ladders, and make themselves masters of their walls, and so lay still until they were caught like so many trout in the drag-net of their own superstition.

Plutarch.

11,869. SUPERSTITIONS, Common. Why is it that sailors cling to port on a Friday, and loose their ships and weigh anchor on Sunday? Why did the ancients build a temple to Fortune, consult oracles, and venerate white stones rather than black stones? Why did our grandmothers dislike the assemblage of nine rooks, turn back when they met a dog crossing their path, and show an antipathy to black cats? Why does a Fijian, to propitiate his ugly wooden god, offer him a bakolo, the dead body of his brother? Why was it improper to eat beans and the seeds of the lupine? What magic makes the third time never like the rest? At the wicked little German towns where small grand-dukes improve their revenues licensing gaming tables, you will find old gamblers begging the youngest in the company, often an English boy who has come to look about him, to take for them the first throw of the dice. Why so? Why is a fresh hand more likely to throw the three sixes than an old one?

The Gentle Life.

11,870. SUPPORT, Divine. I have read of famous Mr. Dod, who is doubtless now high in heaven, who intended to marry, was much troubled with fears and cares how he should live in that condition, his incomes being so small that they would but maintain him in a single condition; and looking out at a window, and seeing a hen scraping for food for her numerous brood about her, thought thus with himself: This hen did but live before it had these chickens, and now she lives with all her little ones; upon which he added this thought also: I see the fowls of the air neither sow nor reap, nor gather into barns, but yet my heavenly Father feeds them, Matt. 6: 25; and thus he overcame his fears of wanting. O Christians! you have such a Father for your portion, as will as soon cease to be, as he will cease to supply you with all things necessary for your good.

Brooks.

11,871. SUPPORT, Miraculous. The legend of Nicholas von der Flue is that for twenty years he lived without partaking of food of any kind. He lived the life of a hermit, and spent his time in prayer and meditation, meditating much on the passion of Jesus Christ, and therein he said he found supernatural food and received miraculous strength. It is written "Man shall not live by bread alone."

11,872. SUPPORT, Prayer and Trust for. Still, a celebrated German writer, in early life was very poor. He wished to study medicine. He had a firm faith in God. He reasoned thus: "God begins nothing without terminating it gloriously. He alone has ordered my present circumstances, and everything regarding me he will bring about in his own way." His friends were as poor as himself, and they wondered where he would get the money he needed for his education. After raising all he could for his long journey to Strasburg, where he was to spend the winter, he started on his way, but when he reached Frankfort, which was three days' ride from Strasburg, he had only one dollar left. He said nothing, but he prayed much. While walking the streets he met a merchant belonging to his native place, who said: "Still, what brought you here?" "I am going to Strasburg to study medicine." "Where do you get your money to study with?" "I have a rich father in heaven." "How much money have you on hand?" "One dollar," said Stilling. "So!" said the merchant. "Well, I'm one of your father's stewards," and he handed him thirty-three dollars. His money was soon reduced to one dollar. One morning his room-mate said to him, "Stilling, I believe you did not bring much money with you," and gave him thirty dollars in gold. In a few months after this he had no money to pay his college dues. The lecturer's fee must be paid by six o'clock on Thursday evening, or he would be obliged to leave college. Five o'clock came, and still he had no money. Then, while he was in great grief, and praying to God for help, a gentleman came in and gave him forty dollars in gold.

11,873. SURETY, Christ our. Abu Kabus Al Nooman, King of Hira, had two days, one of which he called the fortunate and the other the unfortunate day. Whoever met him on the former day he sent away in safety, loaded with gifts; but whoever met him on the latter day he caused to be slain. On this day an Arab, who had befriended him, came before him. The king could not discharge him on account of his law, and to execute him would be to violate the law of hospitality. So he devised a respite for a year on condition that he should provide a surety that at the end of a year he would return and suffer death. A prince of the king's court pitied the man, and became his surety, and he was discharged. The last day of his respite having arrived, and the principal not having arrived, the king ordered the surety to prepare for death. Before the day had passed, the man himself appeared and relieved the surety. The king was surprised at the man's generosity and fidelity, and asked him why he did not let his surety suffer. He replied that he was a Christian, and only did what his religion taught. The king thereupon pardoned the man, and was himself baptized in the name of Christ. We are represented by the condemned man. Christ became our surety to God, and actually died for us; but he has risen. He has ascended to heaven, and is there our surety still.

11,874. SURETYSHIP, Oriental. The Hindoo proverb says, "He who stands before may have to pay." This is the idea of a surety. He stands before the debtor, and covenants with the creditor for the payment of the money; he who stands before, is literally betwixt the contending parties. In this respect "was Jesus made a surety" for us; he stood before and between, and thus became our Mesites, or "Mediator." This practice of suretyship, however, is also common in the most trifling affairs of life: Pare-ellutha-vonum, that is, "Sign your name," is a request preferred by every one who is desirous of obtaining additional security to a petty agreement. In every legal court or magistrate's office may be seen, now and then, a trio entering, thus to become responsible for the engagements of another. The cause of all this suretyship probably is the bad faith which so commonly prevails amongst the heathen.

Roberts.

11,875. SURPRISE, Provision against. Iphecrates once pitched his camp in the territory of his allies, yet he fortified it as carefully as if he had been in an enemy's country. He was asked, "What are you afraid of?" He answered, "Of all speeches for a general none is so dishonorable as 'I should not have thought it.'"

11,876. SURRENDER, Complete. When Henry VIII. had determined to make himself head of the English Church, he insisted that the convocation should accept his headship without limiting and modifying clauses. He refused to entertain any compromises, and vowed that "he would have no tantums," as he called them. Thus when a sinner parleys with his Saviour he would fain have a little of the honor of his salvation, he would save alive some favorite sin, he would fain amend the humbling terms of grace—but there is no help for it, Jesus will be all in all, and the sinner must be nothing at all. The surrender must be complete, there must be no tantums, but the heart must without reserve submit to the sovereignty of the Redeemer. Spurgeon.

11,877. SURRENDER, Full. When General Lee surrendered with his army, every other army of the Confederate States at once gave up; and there are certain pitched battles with Satan and with the flesh which we have to take part in, but when we conquer in them, a thousand other things which had been worrying us are gone too. R. P. Smith.

11,878. SURRENDER, No. Some are in the habit of shouting "No surrender," but I say we should all surrender; we should surrender our passions, and our prejudices, and our uncharitableness towards others. We should seek to win as much as we can from the common humanity of our adversaries. The good and the wise will pursue this course, and they will succeed; whilst the treacherous, the arrogant, and the intolerant, will dwindle far behind in the march, and will perish of self-contention, instead of coming up to win the laurels. Bamford.

11,879. SURRENDER, A Wise. A commander who held a rock fortress in India, which was thought to be impregnable, surrendered himself and his stronghold, to Alexander. He made him governor of it and the surrounding country, saying, "I take this for a wise man who chose rather to commit himself to a good man than to a strong place." The encomium is appropriate to every man who delivers up the stronghold of self to God's irresistible Son, Jesus Christ.

11,880. SUSPENSE, Anguish of. Of all the conditions to which the heart is subject, suspense is one that most gnaws and cankers into the frame. One little month of that suspense when it involves death, we are told by an eye witness, in "Wakefield on the punishment of death," is sufficient to plough fixed lines and furrows in a convict of five-and-twenty—sufficient to dash the brown hair with gray, and to bleach the gray to white. Bulwer-Lytton.

11,881. SUSPICION, Demoralization of. Suspicion is not less an enemy to virtue than to happiness; he that is already corrupt is naturally suspicious, and he that becomes suspicious will quickly be corrupt. It is too common for us to learn the frauds by which ourselves have suffered; men who are once persuaded that deceit will be employed against them, sometimes think the same arts justified by the necessity of defence. Even they whose virtue is too well established to give way to example, or be shaken by sophistry, must yet feel their love of mankind diminished with their esteem, and grow less zealous for the happiness of those by whom they imagine their own happiness endangered.

Johnson.

11,882. SWEARER Rebuked. Mr. Meikle, a surgeon at Carnwath, in Scotland, was once called to attend a gentleman who had been stung in the face by a wasp or bee, and found him very impatient, and swearing, on account of his pain, in great wrath. "O, doctor," said he, "I am in great torment; can you any way help?" "Do not fear," replied Mr. M., "all will be over in a little while." Still, however, the gentleman continued to swear, and at length his attendant determined to reprove him. "I see nothing the matter," said he, "only it might have been in a better place." "Where might it have been?" asked the sufferer. "Why, on the tip of your tongue."

11,883. SWEARING, Degradation of. It is no mark of a gentleman to swear. The most worthless and vile, the refuse of mankind, the drunkard and the prostitute, swear as well as the best dressed and educated gentleman. No particular endowments are requisite to give a finish to the art of cursing. The basest and meanest of mankind swear with as much tact and skill as the most refined; and he that wishes to degrade himself to the very lowest level of pollution and shame, should learn to be a common swearer. Any man has talents enough to learn to curse God, and imprecate perdition on himself and his fellow-men. Profane swearing never did any man any good. No man is the richer, or wiser, or happier for it. It helps no one's education or manners. It commends no one to any society. It is disgusting to the refined, abominable to the good; insulting to those with whom we associate; degrading to the mind; unprofitable, needless and injurious to society; and wantonly to profane his name, to call his vengeance down, to curse him, and to invoke his vengeance, is perhaps of all offences the most awful in the sight of God.

Louth.

11,884. SWORD, Pen and. Men in the olden time won glory by the steel that flashed in their hands amid the smoke and din of battle. Men in the present day control nations and win battles by the steel they handle in their libraries; the former was the sword of steel, the latter the steel pen.

Mrs. Balfour.

11,885. SYMPATHY, Condition of. A minister, noted for intellectual strength, was felt to be out of place in the house of affliction. Sickness and death had never touched him or his. A loathsome disease finally entered his family, rendered his wife helpless, and carried off his darling child, for whom he prayed, like David, that he might be spared. The pastor came forth from that furnace a changed man, as remarkable for his sympathy and consolation as he had previously been for his stoicism.

11,886. SYMPATHY, Duty of. Sympathy is a debt we owe to sufferers. For Christians to be rejoicing when their brethren are weeping, is like putting silver-lace upon a mourning-suit. Our own particular losses and distresses resemble the extinguishing of a candle, which only occasions darkness in one room; but the general distresses of the church are like the eclipsing of the sun, which overshadows the whole hemisphere. Sympathy renders a doleful state more joyful. Alexander refused water in a time of great scarcity, because there was not enough for his whole army! It should be among Christians, as among lute-strings, when one is touched the others tremble. Believers should be neither proud flesh, nor dead flesh. Jeremiah suffered not in his person, being under the protection of the Divine Being; but though he dwelt securely from the hand of mortality, yet he was filled with the bowels of sympathy. Though he wrote of the Jews' desolations, yet he named them Jeremiah's Lamentations.

Secker.

11,887. SYMPATHY, Effect of. Mr. Mingins, of New York, said a lady came into the office of the City Mission and wanted a few tracts. She didn't feel as if she could do very much of active work for the Lord, but felt like giving away a few tracts. One day she saw a policeman taking a poor drunken woman to jail, a miserable object, ragged, dirty, with hair disordered, but the lady's heart went out in sympathy toward her. She found the woman after she came out of jail, and just went and folded her arms around her, and kissed her. The woman exclaimed, "My God, what did you do that for?" and she replied, "I don't know, but I think Jesus sent me to do it." The woman said, "Oh, don't kiss me any more, you'll break my heart. Why, nobody hasn't kissed me since my mother died." But that kiss brought the woman to the feet of the Saviour, and for the last three years she has been living a godly Christian life, won to God by a kiss.

11,888. SYMPATHY, Experience and. An English Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, passing by the village stocks, desired to be shut in, that he might know what the punishment was, which was done. The friend passed on and forgot him till he became wearied. He called to a person passing to let him out, who replied, "No, no, old gentleman, you was not set there for nothing." He was compelled to wait till his friend sent a servant to release him. Sometime after a case came before him for false imprisonment and setting in the stocks. The attorney for the defense ridiculed the charge as no punishment. The Chief Justice whispered, "Brother, have you ever been in the stocks?" The attorney answered, "Really, my lord, never." The Judge replied, "Then I have, and I assure you it is no such trifle as you represent."

11,889. SYMPATHY, Law of. Human Nature is fallen, and I am not in the habit of unduly exalting it; yet regarded from this point of view, it presents some vestiges of a departed glory—the last lights of sunset. Let me illustrate this by an example, over which I can fancy the angels bending with admiration:—A boat of castaways lay on the lone sea, drifting on a shoreless ocean; bread they had none; water they had none; no ship, no sail hove in sight. Among the dead and dying, a boy lay clasped in his mother's arms; with looks—for his lips were black and speechless—that seemed to cry, "Mother, mother, give me bread!" A rough sailor, who had kept and concealed a shell-fish for his own last extremity, looked on the child and tears started to his eye; he raised his rough hand to wipe them from his cheek; and then drawing out his prized last morsel, put it to lips of the dying boy. I don't know where he sailed from; I know neither his name nor his creed; but I know this—that I would rather my soul were bound up in the same bundle with his, than with the souls of those who go to church, and, having no bowels of mercy, heap up money, while other men are dying of starvation. Till she has sunk into the lowest depth of selfishness and sin, Human Nature could not enjoy the banquet when hungry faces were staring in at the window, and not the music of the tabret and viol filled the air, but the low moanings of manly suffering and the weeping of mothers whose children cry for bread and they have none to give them. The gospel of Jesus Christ directs us to love even our enemies—if they hunger, to feed them; if they thirst, to give them drink; and though Human Nature may not be great enough to forgive an enemy, she is kind enough to pity a sufferer, and to sympathize with suffering. Give her way, then! Yield to her generous impulses! Dr. Guthrie.

11,890. SYMPATHY, Need of. A gentleman one day came to my office for the purpose of getting me interested in a young man who had just got out of the penitentiary. "He says," said the gentleman, "he don't want to go to the office, but I want your permission to bring him in and introduce him." I said, "Bring him in." The gentleman brought him in and introduced him, and I took him by the hand and told him I was glad to see him. I invited him to my house, and when I took him into my family I introduced him as my friend. When my little daughter came into the room, I said, "Emma, this is papa's friend." And she went up and kissed him, and the man sobbed aloud. After the child left the room, I said, "What is the matter?" "O, sir," he said, "I have not had a kiss for years. The last kiss I had was from my mother, and she was dying. I thought I would never have another one again." His heart was broken.

11,891. TABERNAACLE, Frailty of the. A tabernacle is a frail, temporary dwelling, generally of cloth, which men make for shelter by night, when they expect to be so short a time in the place that it is not worth while to erect a more substantial edifice. The Hebrews in the wilderness dwelt in tents, shifting their encampment from day to day. Travelers and soldiers use them still. A few posts, a few cords, and a few pieces of cloth constitute the dwelling. It is easily set up, and easily taken down again. The body is frequently compared to a tent. It is very beautiful but very frail. Here we come abreast of an unfathomable mystery. Seeing it is made so perfect, why is it made so feeble? All the skill of the world could not make even a tolerable imitation of its mechanism; and yet the prick of a pin will turn it into dust.

Arnot.

11,892. TACITURNITY, Military. Metellus, a Roman commander, was asked by a centurion, "What new design he had in hand?" He curtly replied, "If I thought my shirt was privy to any part of my counsel, I would immediately pluck it off and burn it."

11,893. TACITURNITY, Philosophic. The ambassadors of the king of Persia, when at Athens, were invited to a feast, at which many philosophers were present. All had offered some sentiment except Zeno; who unlike the others, continued silent throughout the entertainment. When asked what word they should take to the king, he remarked, "Nothing further than this, that you saw at Athens an old man, who knew how to hold his tongue."

11,894. TALENTS, Accounting for. Slaves in antiquity were often artisans, or men allowed otherwise to engage freely in business, paying, as it was frequently arranged, a fixed yearly sum to their master; or they had money committed to them wherewith to trade on his account, or with which to enlarge their business, and to bring in to him a share of their profits.

Trench.

11,895. TALENTS, Concentrated. The work of the Church, like the work of the world, is done by the average men. Five talents trained on a single point are far better than ten talents trained on ten points. Farragut won his great victory, and achieved unfading fame, by converting his fleet into a grindstone that rubbed on the opposing fort, and ground it out, with a loss so small as not to be perceived when distributed over the circle of his fleet. What the Church wants is average men, concentrated into greatness.

Dr. Fowler.

11,896. TALENTS, Parable of the. The Romans used to let a Jewish prince reign, with the title of king, and with some of the power of king. Archelaus, son of Herod, reigned in this way. He had gone to Rome to get his claim to king established by the Roman government. This was well known to the disciples, as happening in their own country but a few years before. Our Lord likened him self to this prince. He was going into a far country, to receive a kingdom, and to return. He was about to go to heaven; hence he would return, and then his kingdom would be fully set up upon earth, and he would reign as a king indeed. But this was not to be yet; he was not even then gone. Now he has been gone for above eighteen hundred years, but he has not yet returned. It seems likely that our Lord in the parable alludes to this. As the Jews had refused Archelaus as their temporal king, because he was cruel, so would they refuse Christ as their Spiritual King and Saviour, because of his goodness. Trench.

11,897. TALENTS, Two. "What talents have I?" asked a desponding lady. "Well, at all events, two; leisure and God's word—time and truth. Let them be well used, and your crown will be bright." T. Collins.

11,898. TALENTS, Unused. A penalty is affixed to the non-use of our faculties and abilities, both in nature and grace. The man who, like the Fakir in India, refuses to use his arm, will lose ability to use it. The man who refuses to use his moral faculties in the service of God, will lose moral strength in the faculty which is not exercised. All our faculties gain strength by exercise, and lose strength by non-use. Walker.

11,899. TALKER, A Habitual. His measure of talk is till his wind is spent, and then he is not silenced, but becalmed. His ears have caught the itch of his tongue; and though he scratch them, like a beast with his hoof, he finds a pleasure in it. He shakes a man by the ear as a dog does a pig, and never loosens his hold till he has tired himself as well as his patient. He is a walking pillory, and punishes more ears than a dozen standing ones. He will hold any argument rather than his tongue, and maintain both sides at his own charge; for he will tell you what you will say, though perhaps he does not intend to give you leave. His tongue is always in motion, though very seldom to the purpose: like a barber's scissors, which are kept snipping as well when they do not cut, as when they do. He is so full of words that they run over, and are thrown away to no purpose; and so empty of things, or sense, that his dryness has made his leaks so wide, whatsoever is put in him runs out immediately. He is so long delivering himself, that those that hear him desire to be delivered too, or despatched out of their pain. S. Butler.

11,900. TARES, Scattering. It is said that "The country of Ill Will" is the by-name of a district hard by St. Arnaud, in the north of France. There, tenants, when ejected by a landlord, or when they have ended their tenancy on uncomfortable terms, have been in the habit of spoiling the crop to come by vindictively sowing tares, and other coarse strangling weeds, among the wheat, whence has been derived the sinister name in question. The practice has been made penal; and any man proved to have tampered with another man's harvest will be dealt with as a criminal.

11,901. TARES, Sowing. Roberts says, "See that lurking villain watching for the time when his neighbor shall plow his field; he carefully marks the period when the work has been finished, and goes the night following and casts in what the natives call pandinella, i. e. pig-pandy; this being of rapid growth, springs up before the good seed, and scatters itself before the other can be reaped, so that the poor owner of the field will be years before he can get rid of the troublesome weed. But there is another noisome plant which these wretches cast into the ground of those they hate, called perum-pirandi, which is more destructive to vegetation than any other plant. Has a man purchased a field out of the hands of another, the offended person says, 'I will plant the perum-pirandi in his grounds.' Commenting on this note of Roberts', Archbishop Trench says, "A friend who has occupied a judicial station in India confirms this account," and he adds, "we are not now without this form of malice nearer home. Thus, in Ireland, I have known an out-going tenant, in spite of his ejection, to sow wild oats in the fields which he was leaving. These, like the plant mentioned above, ripening and seeding themselves before the crops in which they were mingled, it became next to impossible to get rid of them."

11,902. TASTE, Morality of. Taste is not only a part and an index of morality—it is the only morality. The first, and last, and closest trial question to any living creature is, "What do you like?" Tell me what you like, and I'll tell you what you are. Go out into the street, and ask the first man or woman you meet, what their "taste" is; and if they answer candidly, you know them, body and soul. "You, my friend in the rags, with the unsteady gait, what do you like?" "A pipe, and a quarten of gin." I know you. "You, good woman, with the quick step and tidy bonnet, what do you like?" "A swept hearth and a clean tea-table; and my husband opposite me, and a baby at my breast." Good, I know you also. "You, little girl, with the golden hair and the soft eyes, what do you like?" "My canary, and a run among the wood hyacinths." "You little boy, with the dirty hands and the low forehead, what do you like?" "A shy at the sparrows, and a game at pitch-farthing." Good; we know them all now. What more need we ask? "Nay," perhaps you answer, "We need rather to ask what these people and children do, than what they like. If they do right, it is no matter that they like what is wrong; and if they do wrong it is no matter that they like what is right. Doing is the great thing; and it does not matter that the man likes drinking, so that he does not drink; nor that the little girl likes to be kind to her canary, if she will not learn her lessons; nor that the little boy likes throwing stones at the sparrows, if he goes to the Sunday-school." Indeed, for a short time, and in a provisional sense, this is true. For if, resolutely, people do what is right, in time they come to like doing it. But they only are in a right moral state when they have come to like doing it; and as long as they don't like it they are still in a vicious state. The man is not in health of body who is always thirsting for the bottle in the cupboard, though he bravely bears his thirst; but the man who heartily enjoys water in the morn, and wine in the even; each in its proper quantity and time. And the entire object of true education is to make people not merely do the right things, but enjoy the right things—not merely industrious, but to love industry—not merely learned, but to love knowledge—not merely pure, but to love purity—not merely just, but to hunger and thirst after justice.

Ruskin.

11,903. TAXES, Self-Imposed. "Friends," says he, "the taxes are indeed very heavy; and, if those laid on by the government were the only ones we had to pay, we might more easily discharge them; but we have many others, and much more grievous to some of us. We are taxed twice as much by our idleness, three times as much by our pride, and four times as much by our folly; and from these taxes the commissioners cannot ease or deliver us by allowing an abatement."

Dr. Franklin.

11,904. TEACHER, Bible-Class. There is in Troy, N. Y., a teacher who has instructed a Bible-class for twenty-two years. The original class numbered sixteen. The sum of all her scholars is 500. Of these 300 became members of the church. They are mostly poor, yet her class supports a native missionary in Burmah, a theological student in the South, and aids a poor church in Iowa. The secret of her success is, 1. Piety. 2. Personal devotion to her scholars. 3. Social influence. Her scholars are her friends and associates, and she is their spiritual guide.

11,905. TEACHER, Blaming the. Diogenes saw a youth devouring his food very greedily. He gave the boy's tutor a box on the ear, holding him to be responsible for the boy's faults, and not the boy who had not learned better manners.

11,906. TEACHER, Interesting. A Lacedæmonian tutor, being asked what good he did to the children whom he had in charge, answered, "I make good and honest things pleasant to children."

11,907. TEACHER, Persevering. The salvation of the famous Dr. Morrison, the first Protestant missionary to China was the result of the persevering efforts of a timid Sunday-school teacher. A young lady in an English school undertook to gather a class from the ragged boys of the town. Morrison was one of them. He was given a suit of clothes by the superintendent. After this he absented himself from class till his clothes were worn out. The teacher sought him and promised him another suit if he would come to her class. The second trial resulted like the first. The third time she went for him and promised him a third suit of clothes. After this she went for him for three Sabbaths. The fourth and ever after he came of his own accord. He became pious and useful. His great work was the translation of the Bible into Chinese.

11,908. TEACHER, Preparation of. A. An old Waterloo guide spent eight months in studying the ground plans of battle, reports, despatches, histories, narratives and whatever he could get to throw light upon that renowned field of blood. Then he offered himself as guide to visitors. The work of the teacher of religious truth to the young is far more responsible, and demands more care, preparation and prayer.

11,909. TEACHING, Motto of. Tyndale, the translator of the English Bible, had for his motto. "Banish me to the poorest corner of the world if you please, but let me teach the little children and preach the gospel."

11,910. TEARS, Vale of. "Good men weep easily," says the Greek poet; and the better any are, the more inclined to weeping, especially under affliction. As you may see in David, whose tears, instead of gems, were the ornaments of his bed; in Jonathan, Job, Ezra, Daniel, etc. "How," says one, "shall God wipe away my tears in heaven if I shed none on earth? And how shall I reap in joy if I sow not in tears? I was born with tears, and I shall die with tears; and why then should I live without them in this valley of tears?"

Brooks.

11,911. TELEGRAPH, Conversion through the. A young telegraph operator in Ohio was told that a friend of his in another office had been converted. Doubting the statement, he sat down to the instrument, and inquired, "Was there a conversion in your office yesterday?" He received the reply, "Yes; it was me. Seek ye the Lord while he may be found." He asked again, "Will you pray for me that I may find the Saviour?" The reply came, "I will; pray for yourself." In a few days the young men were received into the Christian Church on the confession of their faith.

11,912. TELEGRAPH, Story of the. After making his wonderful discovery, Prof. Morse sought aid from Congress, to establish a line between Washington and Baltimore, at its session in 1843. A bill for this purpose passed the Senate, but in the House it had not been reached up to its last session, and the pressure of bills was so great that it seemed impossible that it should be acted upon. Prof. Morse went away disheartened. The next morning Miss Annie Ellsworth, daughter of the first commissioner of patents, called and congratulated him on the passage of his bill. He could hardly believe it. For this service he gave her the privilege of sending the first message. When the line was completed, Prof. Morse sent to her for it. She wrote, "What hath God wrought!" A despairing inventor received the news of his unexpected success from his friend's daughter, and made her a promise, which he kept, and thus linked her name with his own in one of the greatest of modern inventions.

11,913. TEMERITY, Foolish. Otho was advised by his friend, when pressed in battle by Vitellius, to protract the fight as long as possible, because the enemy was suffering for provisions. But heedless of advice, he threw his whole army into the conflict, and lost both his army and his empire. He killed himself, and was laid in an unhonored grave. Had he avoided an engagement, hunger would have routed his enemy.

11,914. TEMPER, Aggravation of. A man can scarcely keep in tune who unstrings his nerves by lying late in bed in the morning, or who indulges in absinthe, and other extremely cogent beverages, or who neglects healthy exercise; his tuning-up will not be the bracing of a wholesome system, but the straining of strings which will become attenuated, and at length give way. Only fancy a man taking a violin with worn strings to the maker, and saying, "Kindly tune up this instrument." The answer would be, "The strings are pretty well done for, sir." And yet that is exactly what some people expect their doctors to do, viz: to tune them up when their nerve-strings are pretty nearly done for.

Statham.

11,915. TEMPER, Christian. The right temper of a Christian is—to run always cross to the corrupt stream of the world and human iniquity; and to be willingly carried along with the stream of Divine Providence, and not at all to stir a hand, nor a thought to row against that mighty current; and not only is he carried with it upon necessity, because there is no steering against it, but cheerfully and voluntarily—not because he must, but because he would.

Leighton.

11,916. TEMPER, Conquest of. A lady of Boston, was of a peculiarly irritable temper, and it caused her, as a professed Christian, the deepest grief. She struggled, prayed and resolved against it in vain. Every purpose was swept away in the first excitement of even a slight temptation. She was urged at a meeting to confide, by simple faith, in the power of Christ to keep her, and to make a full-hearted surrender of her entire being to him for that purpose. There she consciously laid her soul in the hands of Jesus. Her peculiar trials and temptations were at home, and these she had always declared to be so many that it was impossible for her to rise above them. Opening the front door, she saw a domestic violating one of her most explicit rules by carrying a slop-pail down the front stairs; and, to make the matter worse, the domestic was so alarmed at the sight of her mistress that she dropped the pail, and the water flowed down the stairs and over the carpet into the hall! The lady uttered not a word, but whispered over and over, "Jesus, help me! Jesus, help me!" and gained the victory. With entire composure she went in, and from that moment, she says, she found no difficulty in controlling her before ungovernable temper.

11,917. TEMPERANCE, Rewards of. Temperance puts wood on the fire, meal in the barrel, flour in the tub, money in the purse, credit in the country, contentment in the house, clothes on the back, and vigor in the body.

Dr. Franklin.

11,918. TEMPERANCE, Want of. Rev. J. J. Talbott, who recently died drunk in Elkhart, Ind., said: "I had position high and holy. The demon tore from around me the robes of my sacred office, and sent me forth churchless and godless, a very hissing and by-word among men. Afterward my voice was heard in the courts. But the dust gathered on my open books, and no footfall crossed the threshold of the drunkard's office. I had money ample for all necessities, but it went to feed the coffers of the devils who possessed me. I had a home adorned with all that wealth and the most exquisite taste could suggest. The devil crossed its threshold, and the light faded from its chambers; and thus I stand, a clergyman without a church, a barrister without a brief, a man with scarcely a friend, and a soul without hope—all swallowed up in the maelstrom of drink."

11,919. TEMPLE, Desecration of the. The mosque at the time of our passing through it was full of people, though these were not worshippers, nor was it at either of the usual hours of public prayers. Some of the parties were assembled to smoke, others to play at chess, and some apparently to drive bargains of trade, but certainly none to pray. It was indeed a living picture of what we might believe the temple at Jerusalem to have been, when those who sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting there, were driven out by Jesus with a scourge of cords and their tables overturned. It was, in short, a place of public resort and thoroughfare, a house of merchandise, as the temple of the Jews had become in the days of the Messiah.

Buckingham.

11,920. TEMPLE, Living Pillars of the. The Samoans believed that their chiefs, in a future state would be sent to a place called Pulotu. There they would be the supporting pillars of the temple of the king of the place. Death brought promotion to a nobler service, as they immediately became columns of living men usefully adorning the mansion of the king of Pulotu. We are forcibly reminded of the words of the Revelator, "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God."

11,921. TEMPLE, Stones in Christ's. A man dreamed that he was trying to build for himself a temple to commemorate his name. He wanted a whole temple to himself, and an angel came to show him one that was a model of beauty. But there was one stone missing from its peak, and the man asked the angel where it was. "There has never been one there," replied the angel. "We intended to place you there, but you say that you want a whole temple to yourself, and so the place will be filled by some one else. But you will never have your special temple." Then the man, aroused by his fears, started up from his sleep, crying, "O, God, put me in your temple. Put me in, even though I can be but a chink stone. Put me in!"

11,922. TEMPTATION, Avoiding. It is an all too common sin to repeat the sin of the man in the iron cage in Bunyan's peerless allegory, who said, "I have tempted the devil, and he is come to me;" or as dear old Thomas Fuller puts it, "to holloa in the ear of a sleeping temptation." O, my brethren, beloved, may you and I be saved from that! May we be "led" ever by the Spirit.

Grosart.

11,923. TEMPTATION, Disguised. When I see the fisher bait his hook, I think on Satan's subtle malice, who sugars over his poisoned hooks with seeming pleasures. Thus Eve's apple was candied with divine knowledge, "Ye shall be as Gods, knowing good and evil." When I see the fish fast hanged, I think upon the covetous worldling, who leaps at the profit without considering the danger. Thus Achan takes the gold and the garment, and never considers that his life must answer it. If Satan be such a fisher of men, it is good to look before we leap. Honey may be eaten, so that we take heed of the sting: I will honestly enjoy my delights, but not buy them with danger.

Warwick.

11,924. TEMPTATION, Fleeing from. St. Martian, a monk of Cesarea, was greatly tempted to commit vile sin. When just at the point to yield he thrust his limbs into the fire, saying, "O, Martian, how feels this fire to thee now? Yet it is not comparable to that which will consume the sinner." Thus he conquered. Afterward he resolved to find a place where temptation could not so readily reach him. He found an island off the coast, on which was a cave. Here he lived with all the advantages of solitude, for six years. Then temptation came to him again, and he fled to escape it. Fruitless task. The only refuge from it is in the grave.

11,925. TEMPTATION, Liable to. Jovinian, the heretic, whom St. Jerome opposed, would needs think, or at least say, that after baptism no man was tempted of the devil; not only not overcome, but not tempted. But our baptism does not drown the devil. "Few wrestlers that never took fall; none that may not, since we are all at best but wrestlers." "Vita hominis piraterium," says St. Ambrose. Others read it, "Man's life is a warfare; and that is labor enough and danger enough. But to be still upon so inconstant an element as the water, and still pursued by pirates, or consorted with pirates, is more; and vita piraterium, says he, man's life, every man's life, is spent among pirates, pursued by them, or consorted with them. The devil hath not a more subtle temptation to ensnare me with than to bring me to think myself temptation proof, above temptation.

Dr. Donne.

11,926. TEMPTATION, Occasions of. No sooner was Christ out of the water of baptism than in the fire of temptation. So David, after his anointing, was hunted "as a partridge upon the mountains." Israel is no sooner out of Egypt than Pharaoh pursues them. Hezekiah no sooner had left that solemn passover than Sennacherib comes up against him. St. Paul is assaulted with vile temptations after the "abundance of his revelations;" and Christ teacheth us, after forgiveness of sins, to look for temptation, and to pray against them. While Jacob would be Laban's drudge and packhorse, all was well; but when once he began to flee, he makes after him with all his might. All was jolly quiet at Ephesus before St. Paul came thither; but then "there arose no small stir about that way." All the while our Saviour lay in his father's shop, and meddled only with carpenter's chips, the devil troubled him not; but now that he is to enter more publicly upon his office of mediatorship, the tempter pierceth his tender soul with many sorrows by solicitation to sin. And dealt he so with the green tree, what will he do with the dry?

Trapp.

11,927. TEMPTATION, Outward and Inward. Our temptations are chiefly inward, because they find good entertainment in us (our disposition being like a mutinous city that is not only besieged with strong enemies without, but with false traitors within, ready to betray it), contrarily Christ's temptations, if not only, yet chiefly are external, presented by outward voices and objects to his outward senses; but presently, by the perfect light of his mind and unchangeable holiness of his will, discerned and repelled, that they could not get within him, and much less to be moved and affected with them.

Taylor.

11,928. TEMPTATION, Providential. Nor could he here (Matt. 4: 1) attempt anything against Christ until the Spirit had "led" him "to be tempted" of him, and had, as it were, committed him to his hands. Neither over the body or goods of righteous Job, until the Lord had said to him, "Lo, he (Job 1: 12) and all that he hath is in thy hands, only save his life" (2: 6). Neither over the unclean swine of the faithless Gergesenes, until it was said unto him "go;" yea, and that albeit they were "a legion of devils" (Mark 5: 9, 13). That therefore we are tempted, it absolutely cometh not of the power of the devil, but from the providence of the Lord himself, who also hath "led" us by his Spirit "to be tempted." So saith Tertullian (Lib. de Persecutione): Persecutiones veniunt aliquando per diabolum non autem a diabolo—persecutions come sometimes by the devil, but not of the devil; that is by him as the instrument and not of him as the author. We are in the hands of God, not in the hands of the devil.

Colfe.

11,929. TEMPTATION, Reality of Christ's. We must approach the temptation not from the side of the Lord's supreme divinity, but from the side of the incarnation. I believe the incarnation constituted the Eternal Son of God as really a man as I myself am a man. I believe that being so constituted a man, he was in all respects "temptable," and that he was actually "tempted" according to the manner of human temptations. Those who wonder to very bewilderment over this fact forget that, in the fall of the angels who "kept not their estate," and in the fall of Adam and Eve, we have examples of sinless creatures being successfully tempted. There must, therefore, have been media whereby sin could and did penetrate those sinless spirits. And while, as matter of fact, the Lord Jesus stood, while, as matter of fact, the Lord Jesus gave no response to sin, while, as matter of fact, there was awful shadow, but no stain, yet equally, as matter of fact, is it told us that the temptation was no slight thing, no unreal or mask-conflict, but an awful reality; as real as Gethsemane and Calvary, and that emphatically "he suffered being tempted" (Heb. 2: 18), having overcome "without sin," but not without agonizing conflict with sin. Grosart.

11,930. TEMPTATION Resisted. The junior class of a Southern college had assembled in a student's room to spend the night in riot and debauch. Amid the crowd was one who had never recited a bad lesson since his matriculation. In his studies he was head and shoulders above the class. That day he had failed. A shade of the deepest gloom came over him and he was melancholy. But wine and jest passed round while he felt like Lucifer in Eden, where all was joy and gladness around him. Said a classmate: "Come, Bob, quaff this bumper, and it will make you feel bright as a hermit's lamp." The tempter whispered in his ear, "Drink once and forget the past." A powerful struggle seemed to be going on in his mind for a moment; but at last he silently shook his head, and retiring from the room, gave vent to a flood of tears. That boy never drank—not even once. He took the valedictory, and is now president of a college. Anon.

11,931. TEMPTATION, Rules for Escaping. Fly from all occasions of temptation. If still tempted, fly further still. If there is no escape possible, then have done with running away. Show a bold face, and take the two-edged sword of the Spirit. Some temptations must be taken by the throat, as David killed the lion. Others must be stifled, as David hugged the bear to death. Some you had better keep to yourselves, and don't give them air. Shut them up as scorpions in a bottle. Scorpions in such confinement soon die; but, if allowed out for a crawl, and then put back into the bottles and corked down, they will live a long while, and give trouble. Keep the cork down on some temptations, and they die of themselves. Poemen, A. D. 450.

11,932. TEMPTATION, Running from. Augustine, one of the Christian fathers, before his conversion, lived with an ill woman, and some time after she accosted him as usual. He ran away with all his might, and she ran after him, crying, "Wherefore runnest thou away? It is I." He answered, "I run away because I am not I. I am a new man."

11,933. TEMPTATION, Seeking. A drunken student, trying to excuse his intoxication, said, "I don't know how it is that I am here in this condition, but now that I am in for it, I mean to go the whole figure. One might as well be killed for a sheep as for a lamb. I had no idea of getting into such a spree. I cannot tell what brought it about. I suppose Satan tempted me." "Poh!" said another, "he didn't do any such thing. Do you want to know how it happened with me. I went up to my room and read awhile, I smoked a cigar and then grew restless, and wanted some exciting pleasures, and after waiting for Satan to come to me, I came out in search of him, and here I am. The devil is very easily found by those who seek him, and it is a mean, cowardly piece of business to lay the blame where it does not belong, and say that he tempts us, when we run to put ourselves in the way of temptation."

11,934. TEMPTATION, Similes of. Temptations resemble the rocks which rest their jagged sides above the waves when it is low water. No vessel dares come near them. But after a while the tide comes sweeping into the bay, and buries the rocks under a flood of water, so that the largest ships may ride in safety above their teeth of death together with the lightest skiff. In our unbelief we often ask, How can I hope to resist the many enemies who constantly seem to be seeking my destruction? But before long the influence of the Holy Spirit will come, bearing us in safety like a rising tide over the rocks of temptation.

Bower.

11,935. TEMPTATION, Subduing. St. Benedict sought an increase of grace and exemption from temptation by wearing a rough hair shirt, and living, as he did for three years, in a desolate cave, beyond the reach of man. His scanty food was let down to him at the end of a cord. Even there temptations beset him. The memory of a beautiful woman he had met haunted him continually, and so impressed him, that he was on the point of leaving his seclusion to follow her. Near his grotto was a clump of thorns and briars. Having undressed, he threw himself among them and rolled about till his nude body was covered with bleeding wounds. This he continued till the infernal fire was extinguished forever. Others have prostrated themselves before the thicket of thorns which was the bed of triumph to this spiritual hero.

11,936. TEMPTATION, Subtlety of. Satan will lie in wait for the Christian in his time of weakness, even as the wild beasts do at the water side for the cattle coming to drink. Nay, when having resisted manfully, the Christian has driven off the enemy, he should look well that he be not wounded by the vanquished foe, who often makes a Parthian retreat. Pilkington.

11,937. TEMPTATION, Sudden. Some, indeed, plead their natural proneness to sin, excusing themselves on that ground; or on this, that the temptation before which they fell, struck them with the suddenness and vehemence of a hurricane. The command, however, to watch and pray leaves you without excuse. You were fully warned. You should have been on the outlook for the white squall. The sentinel is righteously shot, who is caught asleep upon his post. Dr. Guthrie.

11,938. TEMPTATION, Uses of. Some errors and offences do rub salt upon a good man's integrity, that it may not putrefy with presumption. St. Ambrose.

11,939. TENDERNESS, Power of. God is not only energetic, but tender also in action; he is the God of the dewdrops, as well as the God of the thunder-showers; the God of the tender grass blade, as much as of the mountain oak. We read of great machines which are able to crush iron bars, and yet they can touch so gently as not to break the shell of the smallest egg; as it is with them, so is it with the hand of the Most High: he can crush a world, and yet bind up a wound. And great need have we of tenderness in our low estate; a little thing would crush us: we have such bruised and feeble souls, that unless we had One who would deal tenderly with us, we must soon be destroyed. There are many soul diseases, to which a tender hand alone can minister; just as there are many states of body which need tender and patient nursing, and which cannot otherwise be successfully dealt with, even by any amount of skill. This tenderness we see continually in action in woman's ministrations in ordinary life. Her voice has notes more sweet and soft than can be distilled from any instrument of music; her hand has a touch more delicate and fine than even the breath of any summer's breeze; it is to her man carries the stories of his sorrows; it is she that has to follow his aching, heavy head; well as he thinks he can do without her in the more exciting scenes of life, he finds that he is not independent when the time comes for suffering and grief. And what makes woman equal to sustaining the heavy burden thus cast upon her? How comes the ivy to be able to sustain the oak, around which it used to cling, ornamenting it, while it owned its lordship and strength! She does all in the power of the tenderness of her nature; rugged and uncouth would life indeed be if such tenderness were withdrawn. But pass away to divine things—from woman, to him that was born of woman—and what do we find, but tenderness of action in him? That tenderness, which in any of mankind is but as a spark from the fire, is perfect in his bosom; its fullness is there; and it is continually being shown to them.

Power.

11,940. TERROR, Cause of. In a sea-fight between Antiochus and the Romans, the former was made victorious by an adroit device of Hannibal. He caused a great number of serpents to be gathered and placed in earthen pots, and thrown into the Roman vessels during the thickest of the fight. These unlooked-for enemies gliding everywhere produced such dismay that the Romans soon betook themselves to flight.

11,941. TERROR, Use of. Terror is subservient to love. As a skillful painter fills the background of his picture with his darker colors, so God introduces the smoke of torment and the black thunder-clouds of Sinai to give brighter prominence to Jesus, the Cross of Calvary, and his love to the chief of sinners.

Dr. Guthrie.

11,942. TESTAMENT, The New. All the genius and learning of the heathen world, all the penetration of Pythagoras, Socrates and Aristotle, had never been able to produce such a system of moral duty, and so rational an account of Providence and of man, and is to be found in the New Testament.

Beattie.

11,943. TESTAMENT, The Old and New. Though the New Testament is not to be interpreted by the Old, but rather the Old Testament by the New, yet when the light of the latter dispensation is thrown upon the elder one, it is often reflected back as in a mirror, so as to cast additional lustre upon itself. Like that secret writing, which is invisible to the reader till, held before the flame, it gives forth the precious truth for which the soul was longing, so are there myriads of bright and holy thoughts within that volume, which conceal themselves from such as are cold in their affections towards its Author, but which are brought out by the warmth of heavenly desires, giving sweet assurances of mercy and rich promises of blessing, when held before a glowing and a grateful heart.

Stainforth.

11,944. TESTAMENTS, Character of the. The Old Testament is chiefly a law-book, teaching what we should do or not do, and showing examples and acts how such laws are observed and transgressed. But the New Testament is a book wherein is written the Gospel of God's promises, and the acts of those that believed, and those that believed not.

Luther.

11,945. THANKFULNESS, Biblical. Our English word thankful is allied, from its Anglo-Saxon derivation, to thinkful. To be thankful is to be thoughtful or mindful of a benefit received. The various feasts of the Jewish economy were designed to teach the spirit of thankfulness and praise, especially after harvest and vintage, and after special mercies. The Feast of Weeks—of Tabernacles—the Peace offering of thanksgiving, Lev. 7: 11–15—the Drink offering, and others—all had this meaning. It is to be observed that there was special provision made in Solomon's temple and in the second temple for the service of thanksgiving, see 1 Chron. 16: 4–6; 23: 30; 2 Chron. 5: 12, 13; and for the second temple, Neh. 11: 17; 12: 8, 27, 31. A transient thought is too mean for a standing mercy. How many beautiful examples have we of the memorials the saints of old preserved of God's goodness: like Jacob's pillar, Gen. 35: 14; Joshua's twelve stones at Gilgal, Joshua 4; the golden pot of manna and Aaron's rod laid up in the ark, Exod. 16: 33; Num. 17: 10; Heb. 9: 4; the stone Ebenezer, 1 Sam. 7: 12; David's sword, 1 Sam. 21: 6.

11,946. THANKFULNESS, Christian. Rev. T. Collins writes of an invalid thankful for intervals of ease, but doubtful of God's mighty mercy in Jesus. He said to him, "Thomas, suppose I plunged into the Severn to save you from drowning, got you out, led you home, and at parting on your door step gave you a lozenge. What would rise to your mind ever after when you thought of me? The lozenge? the lozenge?" "O no, sir! the rescue!" "Well, let it be so concerning Jesus. You tell me of just one of his little gifts. Speak as Paul did of his dying love. Say, 'He loved me, and gave himself for me.' Think of that till it sets your soul on fire; think of that till a passion for him swells within you."

11,947. THANKFULNESS, Effect of. St. Felix of Cantalice, cultivated the thankful spirit.

tion," and took the place of social relaxation, nothing satisfied him short of perfection. He liked to have the earliest and best fruits, flowers, or vegetables. When he assumed the presidential chair of Brown, so high was his ideal, that after the work in his owl department was done, if any deficiency occurred in the duties of others he would perform them rather than have the college fall below the standard to which he aspired to raise it.

Christian Weekly.

11,964. THOUGHT, Food for. He who has thought for himself, depends not exclusively on others; and yet neither will he depend exclusively upon himself. He deals with raw materials of thought, and knows processes of preparation; but he does not manufacture for all his needs. He buys at the market of wisdom; but when he buys, he judges well and carefully of worth, and can detect adulteration. He can look around the world, and discern uses in things that other men will despise. He can scheme, invent, and combine for himself. Having thoughts of his own, he will speak of truth and opinion generally, as one who has seen and examined, not merely has heard the report of other men. The reflective man will see in his very pathway illustrations, opportunities, and phenomena, for which it might once have seemed necessary to go far and to search widely. It is a fault in life as great as obvious that we see not, or heed not, how principles that we honor and profess to obey may be, and are, applied or violated in our common conduct. He who meditates will be able to see this, and to show it. Accustoming himself to think, he will soon find shining within him, as central suns, certain great fixed principles. In their light will he see the things of his life, and of the world; his whole being will almost unconsciously become orderly and vivified, changed and glorious, under the influence of these suns. Trinal.

11,965. THOUGHT, Fruitfulness of. Some may know the story of the first weeping willow, introduced into England by the poet Pope, who found one twig in a Turkish basket of figs that had been given him, putting out a bud. He planted it in his garden, and reared it to a tree, whence all those beautiful trees in this country have been propagated. The weeping willow of Twickenham is no more; but its graceful offspring, bending over many a stream, live far and wide. So many a thought, slight in the outset, conveyed or sprung up by seeming chance, has led to inventions the most important, endeavors the most valuable, or has had other influence most extensive. Sheppard.

11,966. THOUGHT, Immortality of a. Beautiful it is to understand and know that a thought did never yet die; that, as thou, the originator thereof, hast gathered it, and created it from the whole past, so thou wilt transmit it to the whole future. It is thus that the heroic heart, the seeing eye of the first times, still feels and sees in us of the latest, that the wise man stands ever encompassed and spiritually embraced by a cloud of witnesses and brothers; and there is a living literal communion of saints, wide as the world itself, and as the history of the world. Carlyle.

11,967. THOUGHT, Man Made for. Man is evidently made for thinking: this is the only excellence that he can boast. To think aright is the sum of human duty; and the true art of thinking is to begin with ourselves, our Author, and our end. And yet what is it that engrosses the thoughts of the world? Not any of these objects; but pleasure, wealth, honor, and esteem; in fine, the making ourselves kings without reflecting what it is to be a king, or to be a man. Pascal.

11,968. THOUGHT, Productiveness of. Thought engenders thought. Place one idea on paper, another will follow it, and still another, until you have written a page; you cannot fathom your mind. There is a well of thought there which has no bottom; the more you draw from it, the more clear and fruitful it will be. If you neglect to think for yourself, and use other people's thoughts, giving them utterance only you will never know what you are capable of. At first your ideas may come out in lumps homely and shapeless; but no matter, time and perseverance will arrange and refine them. Learn to think, and you will learn to write; the more you think, the better you express your ideas. Sala.

11,969. THOUGHT, Repetition of. It is good to repeat old thoughts in the newest books, because the old works in which they stand are not read. New translations of many truths, as of foreign standard works, must be given forth every half century. Richter.

11,970. THOUGHT, Value of a. I look upon every true thought as a valuable acquisition to society, which cannot possibly hurt or obstruct the good effect of any other truth whatsoever; for they all partake of one common essence, and necessarily coincide with each other; and, like the drops of rain which fall separately into the river, mix themselves at once with the stream, and strengthen the general current. Middleton.

11,971. THOUGHTS, Escape from Evil. John, the dwarf, used to say that as a man climbs a tree when he sees a wild beast or a serpent coming towards him, so a person who sees any evil thoughts coming upon him, must ascend up to God by earnest prayer. He was greatly charmed by heavenly contemplation and desired to enjoy it constantly. He said one day to his elder brother, "I wish to live without distraction or earthly concern like the angels, that, I may be able to serve and praise God without interruption." So saying, he left all, and went into the unfrequented wilderness. There a few days of solitude, silence and hunger, subdued him, and he returned, and knocked at the door of his brother's cell. His brother asked his name. He answered, "I am your brother John." "How can that be?" said he, "my brother John has become an angel, and lives no more among men." The youthful hermit was satisfied that angelic attainments were not for him, even in solitude.

11,972. THOUGHTS, First. In matters of expediency and prudence wait for the after-thoughts; but in matters of conscious and present duty, take the first thoughts that arise, for they are the divinest. Dr. Raleigh.

11,973. THOUGHTS, Good. Good thoughts are blessed guests, and should be heartily welcomed, well fed, and much sought after. Like rose leaves, they give out a sweet smell if laid up in the jar of memory. Spurgeon.

11,974. THOUGHTS, Power over. A certain wise man replied to one who said, "Such and such thoughts have come into my mind," by saying, "Let them go again." And another wise oracle said, "Thou canst not prevent the birds from flying above thy head, but thou canst prevent their building their nests in thy hair." Luther.

11,975. THOUGHTS, Sinful. A monk came to Poemen and asked, "Father what am I to do? I have impure thoughts arising in my mind." "Don't think of them," he answered. "And ill-natured thoughts of others rise up." "Don't think of them." "Temptations are like an axe," says Sisoës; "they cut down your hopes of salvation and lop off your virtues, but they can do nothing against you unless you take them up by an act of will, and give consent to them."

11,976. THOUGHTS, Temptation in. St. Catherine of Sienna, was horribly tempted with vile thoughts and impure images of the imagination. She suffered great agony in wrestling against them. After such a season she was conscious of the presence of the Lord Jesus, and cried, "O, my Saviour, my Lord, why didst thou forsake me?" "My child," he answered, "I have been with thee through all." "What, my Lord! in the midst of these vile thoughts and foul imaginations?" "My child yes, I was in thy heart all the while, for thy will did not consent to the thoughts and images presented to thee."

11,977. THREATS, Abstaining from. I consider it a mark of great prudence in a man to abstain from threats or any contemptuous expressions; for neither of these weaken the enemy, but threats make him more cautious, and the other excites his hatred and a desire to revenge himself. Machiavelli.

11,978. THRESHING, Oriental. The threshing-floors of Migdol were near our tents. We went over to them in the gray twilight. They are simply circles of smooth ground, fifteen or twenty yards in diameter. Each had on it a heap of newly reaped grain; and round the outer edges of the heaps were broad flattened belts, where the "instruments" had already been at work. Labor had ceased for the night, and the oxen were feeding freely on the half-trodden grain, as if their master was resolved to obey to the letter the Scripture command, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn" (Deut. 24: 4). The "threshing-instruments" are flat, heavy, wooden slabs, some five feet long by three wide, slightly turned up in front. The under surface is thickly studded with knobs of hard stone or iron. A massive prison door with its rows of projecting nail-heads will give the best idea of a mowrej, as the instrument is now called. Each is drawn by a yoke of oxen. The driver stands on the mowrej, and the goad with which he urges on and directs the movements of his team, is a formidable weapon. It is sometimes ten feet long, and has a sharp iron point. We could now see that the feat of Shamgar, who "slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox goad," was not so very wonderful as some have been accustomed to think (Jud 3: 31). The oxen advanced in front, "treading out" the grain, and the mowrej follows, crushing and cutting the straw with its "teeth," till it is reduced almost to dust. (2 Kings 13: 7.) Dr. Porter.

11,979. TIME, Accounting for. Cato and other heathens held that account must be given not only of our labor, but also of our leisure. At the great day it will appear that they that have spent their time in mourning have done better than they that have spent their time in dancing, and they that have spent many days in humiliation than they that have spent many days in idle recreations. I have read of a devout man who, when he heard a clock strike, would say, "Here is one hour past that I have to answer for." As time is very precious, so it is very short. Time is very swift; it is suddenly gone. Brooks.

11,980. TIME, Benediction of. Father Time is not always a hard parent, and, though he tarries for none of his children, often lays his hand lightly upon those who have used him well, making them old men and women inexorably enough, but leaving their hearts and spirits young and in full vigor. With such people the gray head is but the impression of the old fellow's hand in giving them his blessing, and every wrinkle but a notch in the quiet calendar of a well-spent life. Dickens.

11,981. TIME Cast Away. Coming hastily into a chamber, I had almost thrown down a crystal hour-glass: fear lest I had, made me grieve as if I had broken it. But, alas! how much more precious time have I cast away without any regret? The hour-glass was but crystal, each hour a pearl: that, but like to be broken—this, lost outright: that, but casually—this, done willfully. A better hour-glass might be bought; but time once lost is lost forever. Thus we grieve more for toys than for treasures. Lord, give me an hour-glass, not to be by me, but in me. Teach me the number of my days—an hour-glass to turn me—that I may apply my heart unto wisdom. Fuller.

11,982. TIME, Consecration of. David was hid in the cave of Adullam, when the Philistines were encamped at Rephaim, and at the end of the plain. David had nothing to drink for twenty-four hours, and as he lay panting in the cave, with his men of arms about him, he said, "O that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem that is at the gate!" It was an ejaculation which fierce thirst wrung from him. There were three brave men who at once determined to gratify his wish, and they went over the plain, where the arrows were raining down on them; but through the midst of these hurtling arrows and flying javelins they went to the well of Bethlehem, got the water, and brought a gourd full of it to the king to slake his thirst. I know nothing richer or grander in the Old Testament, nor in the history of man, than David's conduct then. He would not drink of it, but poured it out as a libation to the Lord; and why? "My God forbid it me, that I should do this thing: shall I drink the blood of these men that have put their lives in jeopardy? for with the jeopardy of their lives they brought it!" Do you see the application I would make of this? Every hour of your human life and mine; every drop of this precious time, which God gives us in drops, was purchased with a dearer blood and more fearful peril of sacrifice than this. It was not merely through the arrows hurled from the towers of Bethlehem; it was not merely breasting the javelins of the Philistines, that Christ our Saviour purchased for us the gift of this precious time allowed to us in this life. Oh, no! He received into his divine breast all the arrows of hell; he poured out his most precious blood in sorrow and agony, to buy this time for you and me. Shall we drink up these hours that Christ has purchased, and waste them as they come? Oh, no! Say rather, I will pour them out to the Lord; I will glorify him with this time that he has purchased for me. Dr. John McClintock.

11,983. TIME, Conviction from. A young man attended a ball and was highly delighted with the diversion. In the midst of their enjoyment the clock struck one. That striking passage of Dr. Young instantly rushed upon his mind:

"The bell strikes one—we take no note of time,
But from its loss:—to give it then a tongue
Is wise in man. As if an angel spoke,
I feel the solemn sound; if heard aright,
It is the knell of my departed hours."

Conviction seized the youth. He left the ball room, retired to his closet and gave himself to Christ.

11,984. TIME, Curative Influence of. Time cures every wound, and though the scar may remain and occasionally ache, yet the earliest agony of its recent infliction is felt no more. Scott.

11,985. TIME, Definition of. Plato says that time is a movable image of eternity, or the interval of the world's motion.

11,986. TIME, Economy with. Many people take no care of their money till they have come nearly to the end of it, and others do just the same with their time. Their best days they throw away, let them run like sand through their fingers, as long as they think they have an almost countless number of them to spend; but when they find their days flowing rapidly away, so that at last they have very few left, then they will at once make a very wise use of them; but unluckily, they have by that time no notion how to do it. Gothelf.

11,987. TIME, Flight of. Let good fellows sit in a tavern from sun to sun, and they think the day very short, confessing (though insensible of their loss) that time is a light-headed runner. Bind them to the church for two hours, and you put an ache into their bones—the seats be too hard. Now time is a creeper, and many a weary look is cast up to the glass. It is a man's mind that renders any work troublesome or pleasant. Adams.

11,988. TIME, Fragments of. Philip of Macedon was one day drinking deep with some of his courtiers, when he began to discourse about the odes and tragedies of Dionysius the elder, disputing the likelihood of his having found leisure to write them. The son of the deceased poet exclaimed, "They were written in the time which you and I and other happy fellows spent over the bowl." If we could trace the history of the productions of the greatest men, the number of whose achievements amaze and astonish us, we should find that the hours spent by their fellows in trifling and sin were the precious seasons which, husbanded by them with care, brought forth such grand results. Fragments of time should be gathered as carefully as fragments of gems from the lapidary's floor, or dust of gold from amid the shavings of the gold-beater's room. Anon.

11,989. TIME, Making up. Lord Wilmington observed of the Duke of Newcastle, the prime minister, "He loses half an hour every morning, and runs after it during all the day, without being able to overtake it." Selwyn.

11,990. TIME, Mystery of. That great mystery of Time, were there no other—the illimitable, silent, never-resting thing called Time, rolling, rushing on, swift, silent, like an all-embracing ocean-tide, on which we and all the universe swim like exhalations, like apparitions which are and then are not—this is forever very literally a miracle—a thing to strike us dumb; for we have no word to speak about it. Carlyle.

11,991. TIME, Opportunity and. Great is the worth and excellency of time, all the treasures of the world cannot protract, stop, or call back one minute of time. O what is man, that the heavenly bodies should be wheeled about by Almighty Power in constant revolutions, to beget time for him! (Psalm 8: 3.) More precious are the seasons and opportunities that are in time for our souls; those are the golden spots of time, like the pearl in the oyster-shell, of much more value than the shell that contains it. There is much time in a short opportunity. There is a day on which our eternal happiness depends (Luke 19: 41, 42; Heb. 4: 7). Lost opportunity is never to be recovered by the soul any more (Ezek. 24: 13; Rev. 22: 11). To come before the opportunity, is to come before the bird is hatched; and to come after it, is to come when the bird is flown. There is no calling back time, when it is once past. See this in the examples you find (Luke 13: 26; Eccles. 9: 10). It is wholly uncertain to every soul, whether the present day may not determine his leave in this tabernacle, and a writ of ejection be served by debts upon his soul to-morrow (James 4: 13; Luke 12: 20). As soon as ever time shall end, eternity takes place. The stream of time delivers souls daily into the boundless ocean of vast eternity. Ad hoc momento pendet eternitas. We are now measured by time, hereafter by eternity. Flavel.

11,992. TIME, Redeeming. That time ought to be redeemed, is a lesson that hath been taught by the very heathens themselves. It was the saying of Pittacus, one of the seven wise men, "Know time, lose not a minute." And so Seneca: "Time is the only thing," saith he, "that we can innocently be covetous of, and yet there is nothing of which we are more lavishly and profusely prodigal." And Chrestus, a sophister of Byzantium in the time of Hadrianus the emperor, was much given to wine; yet he always counted time so precious, that when he had misspent his time all the day, he would redeem it at night. Chilo, one of the seven sages, being asked what was the hardest thing in the world to be done, answered, "To use and employ a man's time well." Cato held, that an account must be given, not only of our labor, but also of our leisure. And Ælian gives this testimony of the Lacedæmonians, "They were hugely covetous of their time, spending it all about necessary things, and suffering no citizen either to be idle or play." "And," saith another, "we trifle with that which is most precious, and throw away that which is our greatest interest to redeem." Certainly, these heathens will rise in judgment, not only against Domitian, the Roman emperor, who spent much of his time in killing of flies; nor only against Archimedes, who spent his time in drawing lines on the ground when Syracuse was taken; nor only against Artaxerxes, who spent his time in making hafts for knives; nor only against Solymán the great Turk, who spent his time in making notches of horn for bows; nor only against Eropas, a Macedonian king, who spent his time in making of lanterns; nor only against Hyrcanus the king of Parthia, who spent his time in catching of moles; but also against many professors who, instead of redeeming of precious time, do trifle and fool away much of their precious time at the glass, the comb, the lute, the viol, the pipe, or at vain sports and foolish pastimes, or by idle jestings, immoderate sleeping, and superfluous feasting. Brooks.

11,993. TIME, Ripening Influence of. It is an old and trite saying, "How rapidly time urges his flight; sometimes as a relentless, unsparing destroyer; but oftener as a swift-winged, and beautiful angel; changing, yet not taking away this world's blessings: making our past sorrows look dim in the distance; opening many flowers of pleasure on our way, and gradually ripening our souls for the great and glorious harvest of eternity. William Chambers.

11,994. TIME, Stealing. Whether a man steals from me a dollar or the half hour in which I can earn that sum is to me a matter of indifference. The former crime may be the more demoralizing to the offender; but my loss is as great in one case as in the other. It has been justly said that there is as much injustice and cruelty in destroying a man's comfort during the five minutes you keep him waiting as in giving him an actual blow. But suppose ten or twenty men are kept waiting for one man. By an utterly inexcusable negligence he causes an utter perdition of capital and labor to that amount, more, perhaps, to say nothing of the vexation he has caused, unfitting twenty men for their duties for all the rest of the day. Mathews.

11,995. TIME, Uncertainty of. A minister requested a lady to engage in a charitable work to which he thought her adapted. She declined, saying, "My stay here will be probably too short to be of use. I do not know that I shall be here three months." He answered her, "I do not know that I shall be here one." She felt his reproof and accepted the proffered duty.

11,996. TIME, Wasting. If a person were so foolish as to throw away a valuable piece of money into a pit, or in the sea, he would not literally throw away anything but the metal; but virtually he would throw away whatever best thing it would have purchased, as bread, clothing, refreshments, medicine for the sick, instructive books, etc. Even so, a person wasting time throws away, not the time itself only, but the opportunities and the privileges which that time presents. John Foster.

11,997. TIME, Well Disposed. When Drexelius was asked by his friend Faustinus how he could do so much as he had done, he answered, "The year has three hundred and sixty-five days, or eight thousand four hundred and sixty hours: in so many hours great things may be done; the slow tortoise made a long journey by losing no time." Bp. Horne.

11,998. TITHES, Custom of. That tithes were not confined to the Jewish priesthood, we learn from the fact of their having been very generally copied from the patriarchs by Gentile nations. Among the Greeks and Romans tenths were frequently dedicated out of a man's substance to their gods, sometimes as a lasting obligation, sometimes only on particular occasions; but it was customary to dedicate the tenth of the spoils of war to Jupiter Prædator, to Mars, and to Hercules. A tenth part of private possessions was also in some places dedicated to Diana. The Carthaginians sent a tenth of their profits to the Hercules of Tyre, of which city they were a colony. The Persians gave to their gods the tenth of war spoils. The Pelasgians paid tithes to the oracle of Apollo at Delphi. Mrs. Mackesy.

11,999. TOBACCO, Cost of. Bishop Thompson stated in one of his addresses that the "church spends more money for tobacco than would support her ministry at home and her missions abroad."

12,000. TOBACCO, Saved from. A prominent member and official in a New York church had been addicted to the constant use of tobacco for forty years, until its daily use had become seemingly necessary to health, if not to life. He had made many efforts to rid himself of the doubtful practice, but always failed because of the inward gnawing which its long-continued use had created, and which forced him to begin the practice again. At last, on a certain occasion, in the presence of the writer, he said, "I have long been seeking a deeper work of grace; tobacco appears to hinder me; but I had not supposed it possible to be saved from the dreadful power of this habit until now. Never before have I trusted Jesus to save me from the appetite as well as the use of it, but now I do," and, suiting the action to the word, he threw far away from him the tobacco he held in his hand. He still lives, and for several years has reiterated this testimony: "From that hour all desire left me, and I have ever since hated what I once so fondly loved."

W. H. Boole.

12,001. TO-DAY, Battle of. You remember how Leonidas, the Spartan, kept back the Persian hosts. He stood in the narrow pass of Thermopylae, and as the foe came up, one by one, each man was able to push back his enemy, and they might have kept Greece thus for many a day. But suppose Leonidas and his handful of men had gone out into the wide open plain, and attacked the Persians—why, they must have died at once, though they should have fought like lions. Christian, stand you in the narrow pass of to-day, and as your troubles come, one by one, by faith you shall find out that your strength is sufficient for you; but if you go out into the vast plain of time, and think to meet all the troubles that shall ever come at once, it must be too much for you. Will you please not to borrow misery, for you will have enough of your own. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Spurgeon.

12,002. TO-DAY, Duties of. Enjoy the blessings of this day, if God sends them, and the evils of it bear patiently and sweetly; for this day only is ours; we are dead to yesterday, and we are not yet born to the morrow.

Bp. Taylor.

12,003. TO-DAY, Proper use of. Now, is it safe, think you, to pass this day? A hard heart is a provoking heart; and, as long as it continues hard, continues provoking God and despising the Holy Ghost. To-day, therefore, hear his voice; that is, this present day. But which is that day? It is this very time wherein you stand before God, and in which you hear me. If you embrace the opportunity, happy are you; if not, you shall give as dear an account as for anything you ever heard in your life. There is no dallying with God; take his proffer, take him at his word in a matter of salvation. He calls thee "to-day;" peradventure he will speak no more!

Archbishop Usher.

12,004. TOMBS, Human. How many are so entombed by the riches, the honors, the pleasures and the sins of the world, as only to be taken out of them to be buried in the earth.

Marsh.

12,005. TO-MORROW, A Delusion. Say not, "I will do it to-morrow! Some other time." To-morrow may not be yours. To-morrow is a delusive phantom, ever beckoning the traveler toward the brink of a precipice. To-morrow is a courteous traitor, a smiling assassin, "Satan's chief recruiting-sergeant, paving with good intentions the road to hell!"

Anon.

12,006. TONGUE, Admonition to the. Some are of opinion that nature hath shut up the tongue with a double portcullis of lips and teeth on purpose that man, by their manner of disposition, might have a constant and silent kind of admonition, that he should not be over-hasty to speak.

Wanley.

12,007. TONGUE: Brevities. "There are some persons so full of nothings, that, like the strait sea of Pontus, they perpetually empty themselves by their mouths, making every company or single person they fasten on to be their Propontis." "The talking man makes himself artificially deaf, being like a man in the steeple when the bells ring." "Great knowledge, if it be without vanity, is the most severe bridle of the tongue. For so have I heard that all the noises and pratings of the pool, the croaking of frogs and toads, is hushed and appeased upon the instant of bringing upon them the light of a candle or torch. Every beam of reason and ray of knowledge checks the dissoluteness of the tongue."

12,008. TONGUE, Good and Bad. A certain person sent Bias, one of the seven wise men of Greece, a beast for sacrifice, with the request that he should return to him the best and worst part of its flesh. Bias returned the tongue of the animal to the donor. This act did much to gain for him a recognition as one of the wise men.

12,009. TONGUE, Good or Evil. Than a good tongue, there is nothing better; than an evil, nothing worse. It hath no mean; it is either exceedingly good or excessively evil. It knows nothing but extremes; and is if good, best of all; if bad, worst of all. If it be good, it is a walking garden that scatters in every place a sweet flower, an herb of grace to the hearers. If it be evil, it is a wild bedlam full of goading and maddening mischiefs. So the tongue is every man's best or worst movable.

Adams.

12,010. TONGUE, Punishing the. St. Olara, of Rimini, practiced great austerities, sleeping on a hard board and wearing iron rings around her neck and wrists, to punish herself for extravagance in jewelry when young. She once spoke intemperately of some one who annoyed her, and afterwards punished herself by pinching her tongue with a pair of pincers, so that she could not speak for two or three days.

12,011. TONGUE, Servitude of the. The tongue is the slave of the body as well as of the soul. The heart says—"Make love for me," and the tongue makes love for the heart; the brain says—"Discourse for me," and the tongue discourses for the brain; the soul says—"Pray for me, sing for me, curse for me, tell lies for me," and the tongue prays, sings, curses, and tells lies for the soul.

Prof. G. Wilson.

12,012. TONGUE, Wounds by the. A wound from a tongue is worse than a wound from a sword; the latter affects only the body,—the former the soul, the spirit. Pythagoras.

12,013. TONGUES, Gift of. The apostles, speaking on the day of Pentecost to the people, in their respective languages, was to us a plain intimation of the mind and will of God, that the sacred records should be preserved by all nations in their own tongue; that the Scriptures should be read, and public worship performed in the vulgar languages of the nations.

M. Henry.

12,014. TONGUES, Unconverted. There are many persons who think they are Christians because they have had experience; but they do not feel it to be their Christian duty to use their tongues according to the laws of kindness. Nor do they think, in the confession of their sins, to confess that, day in and day out, they are making somebody unhappy by the manner in which they use that member.

Beecher.

12,015. TOO LATE, Almost. After Sir Colin Campbell's silent retreat from Lucknow, in the war in India, there was one man left behind. "Captain Waterman," says Mr. Rees, in his personal narrative of the siege, "having gone to his bed in a retired corner of the brigade mess-house, overslept himself. He had been forgotten. At two o'clock in the morning he got up, and found to his horror that we had already left. He hoped against hope, and visited every outpost. All was deserted and silent. To be the only man in an open intrenchment, and fifty thousand furious barbarians outside! It was horrible to contemplate. His situation frightened him. He took to his heels, and he ran till he could scarcely breathe. Still the same silence, the same stillness, interrupted only by the occasional report of the enemy's gun or musketry. At last he came up with the retiring rear-guard, mad with excitement and breathless with fatigue."

12,016. TOO LATE, Effects of Being. A railroad train was running along at unusually quick speed. A curve was just ahead, and the train was late, very late; still the conductor hoped to pass the curve safely. Suddenly a locomotive dashed into sight. In an instant there was a collision, a shriek, a shock, and fifty persons were killed, and all because an engineer had been behind time.

Anon.

12,017. TOO LATE: Examples. "Too late!" Oh! word of terror, which has often fallen like the thunder of God upon many a heart of man. See that father as he hastens from the burning house, and thinks that he has taken all the children with him! He counts; one dear head is missing; he hastens back. "Too late!" is the hollow sound that strikes his ear. The stone wall tumbles under the roaring torrent of flame. He swoons, and sinks to the ground. Who is that hastening through the darkness of the night on the winged courser? It is the son who has been wandering in the ways of sin, and now at last longs to hear from the lips of his dying father the words, "I have forgiven you!" Soon he is at his journey's end. In the twinkling of an eye he is at the door. "Too late!" shrieks forth the mother's voice; "that mouth is closed forever!" and he sinks, fainting, into her arms. See that victim for the scaffold, and the executioner whetting the steel of death! The multitude stand shivering and dumb. Who is that heaving in sight on yonder distant hill, beckoning with signs of joy? It is the king's express; he brings a pardon! Nearer and nearer come the steps. Pardon! resounds through the crowd; softly at first, and then louder, and yet louder. "Too late!" The guilty head has fallen! Yea, since the world began the heart of many a man has been fearfully pierced through with the cutting words, "Too late!" But, oh! who will describe to me the lamentation that will arise when, at the boundary line which parts time from eternity, the voice of the righteous Judge will say, "Too late!" Long have the wide gates of heaven and its messengers cried at one time and another, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice!" Man! man! how then will it be with you when once those gates, with appalling sound, shall be shut for eternity? Tholuck.

12,018. TOO LATE, Result of Being. At the wreck of the steamer London, in January, 1866, the announcement was made that there was no hope of saving the ship, by Rev. D. J. Draper, who said at the same time that there was hope for all who would flee to Christ. He had an attentive audience, who were more than willing to hear about salvation in Christ. The only remaining boat was launched, the second engineer taking command. The heroic captain said to him, "There is not much chance for the boat. There is none for the ship. Your duty is done; mine is to remain here. Get in and take charge of the few it will hold." As they dropped into the boat, the engineer urged the captain to join them. "No," said the brave Englishman, "I will go down with the passengers; but I wish you God-speed and safe to land!" He threw them a compass, and gave them their course, saying, "East-northeast to Brest, ninety miles." At that instant, a lady, bare-headed, with disheveled hair, and with "livid horror on her face," shrieked aloud amidst the wind, "A thousand guineas for a place in that boat!" The doctor's assistant offered five hundred pounds for a seat in it, and pleaded his official relation to the crew. It was too late. The small boat, with nineteen persons, was pulled away, and within five minutes afterwards the steamship, the London, with her living cargo of more than two hundred and twenty immortal men, women and children—was seen to settle stern foremost, throw up her bows in the air, and then plunge headlong down through the dark whelming waters into the deep grave of the ocean. The boat's company were rescued next day.

12,019. TORMENT, Smoke of. A coal pit took fire, a dense volume of smoke was rising from its mouth, while below were the poor miners being suffocated or consumed. The smoke of their torment did not ascend forever, for ere that had ceased, their sufferings had ended in death. But there is a torment that is enduring, a smoke "that ascendeth forever and ever."

12,020. TORTURE, Example of. King Sapor, of Persia, required the Christians in his realm to adore the sun and fire. Jonas and Barachisius refused to obey. The executioners poured melted lead into the nostrils of Jonas, placed red-hot iron plates under his arms, and hung him up by one foot, till he fainted. They then cut off his hands and feet, tore out his tongue, and afterward crushed him to death in a grape press. They thrust sharp splinters into the body of Barachisius till he resembled a porcupine, and then rolled him on the ground to drive them in.

12,021. TRACT, Influence of a. The mate of a vessel received Dr. Payson's tract "Address to Seamen." The question, "Whither are you bound?" arrested his attention, led him to reflection, fastened conviction upon him, and led him to resolve upon reform. He delayed the fulfillment of his promise till severely wounded and shipwrecked, and in utter helplessness he fell into the arms of Christ.

12,022. TRACT, Name of. A minister gave a negro in his congregation a tract, and some time afterwards asked what he thought of it. "Oh, massa," said he, "it do me soul good. I never knew before why dey call 'em tracks, but when I read dat little book it track me dis way, and it track me dat way; it track me all day, and it track me all night. When I go out in de barn, it track me dare; when I go out in de woods, it track me dare; when I came in de house, it track me dare; it track me eberywhere I go. Den I know why dey call 'em tracks." He became a sincere Christian.

12,023. TRADITION, Unreliable. Would persons as readily believe the correctness of a report transmitted by word of mouth in popular rumors from one end of the kingdom to another, as if it came in a letter passed from one person to another over the same space? Would they think that because they could trust most servants to deliver a letter however long or important, therefore they could trust the same man to deliver the contents of a long and important letter, in a message by word of mouth? Let us put a familiar case: a footman brings you a letter from a friend upon whose word you can perfectly rely, giving an account of something that has happened to himself, and the exact account of which it concerned you to know. While you are reading and answering the letter, the footman goes into the kitchen and there gives your cook an account of the same thing, which he says he overheard the upper servants at home talking over as related to them by the valet, who said he had it from your friend's son's own lips; the cook relates the story to your groom, and he in turn tells you. Would you judge of that story by the letter, or the letter by the story?

Illustrations of Truth.

12,024. TRAITOR Punished. When the Emperor Aurelian came to the city of Thyana, and found the gates of the city shut against him, he swore he would make such a slaughter that he would not leave a dog alive. Heracleon, fearing to perish in the city, betrayed it into Aurelian's hands. Aurelian caused all the dogs in the city to be slain; but gave all the citizens a free pardon, except Heracleon, whom he caused to be slain, saying, "He would never prove faithful to him who had been the betrayer of his own country."

12,025. TRANSFORMATION, Legend of. The North American Indians, giving the origin of their maize, say that a beautiful girl, pursued by a river god, took refuge among the reeds, twining them about her to hide herself, upon which her slender form was changed into a graceful stalk, her teeth into milk-white kernels, and her lovely floating hair into silk; and, in place of reeds and maiden, there stood only a tall, bending stalk of Indian corn; so that ever after, in the rustle of a waving corn-field, the red man could hear the stirring of a company of timid girls. Appleton's Journal.

12,026. TRANSFORMATION, Sudden. Euripides's Iolaus, a feeble, superannuated old man, by means of a certain prayer, became, on a sudden, youthful and strong for battle; but the Stoics' wise man was, yesterday, most detestable and the worst of villains; but to-day is changed on a sudden into a state of virtue.

Plutarch.

12,027. TRANSGRESSOR, Hard Way of the. Go down to the Tombs. I am told that that little bridge over the prison yard, over which the prisoners are led, has written on one side the words, "The way of the transgressor is hard." If that is not true, how do they dare put it on there? They ought to take it off. There is not a man in all New York but knows as he goes down deep in his heart that the way of the transgressor is hard. On the other side of that bridge it is written, "The Bridge of Sighs;" and over that the young men pass every day, and every one of them will testify that that portion of the Bible is true where it says the way of the transgressor is hard. So don't give that as an excuse. Moody.

12,028. TRANSMIGRATION, Pagan. Many of the heathen priests in India teach their followers that the soul, after it has worn out one body, passes into another. They say if a person has not attended to the worship of the gods, or neglected the priests, then the soul at death will go into a deformed and afflicted body; or, if he has given much money to the idol-temples, then he shall be again born into the world in a beautiful form, and shall be rich and happy. A soul, they say, may pass into the body of a bird, beast, or insect, and be punished in its new state for the sins of a previous one; so that it may dwell in a buffalo or a butterfly, a fierce tiger or a gentle dove, according to its character in this life. And after many millions of changes, the highest state of perfection will be when it passes into the body of a white elephant. A Hindoo was lying upon his bed, expecting soon to die. A priest came to see him, when the dying man ex claimed, "What will become of me?" "Oh," said the priest, "you will inhabit another body." "And where," said he, "shall I go then?" "Into another; and so on through thousands of millions." The mind of the poor sufferer darted across the whole period of changes as though it were only an instant, and cried, "Where shall I go then?" The priest could not reply, and the unhappy idolater died in the dark as to his final destiny. Moister.

12,029. TREASURE, Heavenly. The old Grecians that had fed altogether on acorns before, after that bread came in amongst them, made no reckoning of their mast any more, but kept it only for their swine. And leathern and iron money began to grow out of request amongst the Lacedemonians, after that gold and silver came in use. So when a man hath once found the favor of God in his heart, and the love of God in Christ hath once lighted on it, and got assurance of it, he ceaseth then to be greedy of this world's trash. Gataker.

12,030. TREASURE, Hidden. A writer on Oriental literature and customs mentions that in the East, on account of the frequent changes of dynasties, and the revolutions which accompany them, many rich men divide their goods into three parts: one they employ in commerce, or for their necessary support; one they turn into jewels, which should it prove needful to fly, could be easily carried with them; a third part they bury. But while they trust no one with the place where the treasure is buried, so is the same, should they not return to the spot before their death, as good as lost to the living (Jer. 41: 8), until by chance a lucky peasant, while he is digging his field, lights upon it. And thus, when we read in Eastern tales how a man has found a buried treasure, and in a moment risen from poverty to great riches, this is, in fact, an occurrence that not unfrequently happens, and is a natural consequence of the customs of these people. Modern books of travel continually bear witness to the universal belief in the existence of such hid treasures. Often, too, a man abandoning the regular pursuits of industry, will devote himself to treasure-seeking, in the hope of growing rich of a sudden. Trench.

12,031. TREASURE, Indestructible. Rev. John Newton one day called to visit a family that had suffered the loss of all they possessed by fire. He found the pious mistress, and saluted her with, "I give you joy, madam." Surprised, and ready to be offended, she exclaimed, "What! joy that all my property is consumed?" "Oh no," he answered, "but joy that you have so much property that fire cannot touch." This allusion to her real treasures checked her grief; and she wiped away her tears.

12,032. TREASURE, Search for. After Mardonius had been conquered at Plataea, a report existed that he had left great treasures buried within the circuit where his tent had stood; Polycrates, a Theban, buying the ground, sought long for the treasure, but not finding it, inquired at Delphi, and was told "to turn every stone," which doing he found it. Such the proverb collectors give as the origin of the proverb, πάντα λίσσοντες. Trench.

12,033. TREASURE, Testing. Praxitiles told Phryne, that she might choose from his studio any statue that she pleased. Not knowing which was the most valuable, she caused some one to come in as if in haste and tell the artist that his studio was on fire. He, startled at the news, cried out, "Are the Cupid and the Satyr safe?" By this stratagem she saw what he prized the most, and chose the Cupid.

12,034. TREASURES, Imperishable. Stilpon, the philosopher, when his city was burned, and his wife and children in it, and he alone escaped, was asked whether he had lost anything. He replied, "All my treasures are with me—justice, virtue, temperance, prudence, and this inviolable principle, not to esteem anything as my proper good that can be taken from me."

12,035. TREE, Lesson from a Fallen. The sound of the woodman's axe gives note that some giant of the forest is about to fall: and now the crashing boughs tell plainly that the work is done, and the pride of the summer foliage is brought down to the ground. See what a gap is made in the screen of wood, and how the eye can now wander over the soft meadows, and the distant village, that were hid before! Let us go towards the opening that is so apparent, and consider what solemn or useful reflections may be suggested by a sight of the fallen tree. It lies in the direction in which it fell. While it still flourished in its pride and glory, the direction as well as the period of its fall was uncertain. It was possible that it might fall towards the north or towards the south: nor was there any reason why it should not enjoy the sunshine, and the rain, through many a verdant summer. But the word was given that the axe should be laid into its root, and now the direction in which it should fall is no more a question. It is a fixed and unalterable fact. The period during which one or the other direction could have been given to its fall is past and gone forever. Surely a thought of unspeakable importance is thus suggested to us. The stroke of death fixes the direction and the character of our future and eternal state of being. Bp. Trower.

12,036. TREE, Quality of a. There is no ascertaining the quality of a tree, but by its fruits. When the wheels of a clock move within, the hands on the dial will move without. When the heart of a man is sound in conversion, then the life will be fair in profession. When the conduit is walled in, how shall we judge of the spring, but by the waters which run through the pipes? Secker.

12,037. TREE OF LIFE, Import of the. The Tree of Life was a token of the Creator's preserving care and a memento of the creature's dependence. What it was like we do not know, but it possessed a marvelous efficacy. As long as man ate of it he could not die: and it has been ingeniously suggested that the protracted lives of the antediluvians were owing to the power of this paradisaic antidote lingering for ages in the human constitution. But however this may be, the Tree was a type of the one great source of immortality. It taught the creature that he was not his own preserver. It reminded him that the "Fountain of Life" was external to himself, and that the only security for his own life's prolongation was the constant command of this soul-gladdening and life-confirming sustenance. And most likely every time that he partook of it, he was conscious of an intenser immortality. Possibly the consummation of each day's lightsome labor, and coincident with those visits of his heavenly Father, which made so welcome the cool of the day, we can imagine him resorting to the spot where stood the sacramental symbol—its very continuance a sign that on either side the covenant continued still inviolate—devoutly stretching forth his hand to the laden bough, and whilst he and his partner ate the mystic fruit, which filled all their being with celestial joy and raised them nearer to the angels, overhearing from above the voice of God, answering with their evening hymn, and then sinking into hallowed slumber beneath the sacred shadow. But there is still a Tree of Life. Instead of abandoning our guilty race to self-entailed destruction, in his unspeakable mercy, God has interposed, and in the mission and atonement of his own dear Son has provided a salvation for sinners of mankind. And throughout the inspired records, the Saviour and his work are repeatedly introduced under the veil of this most ancient emblem.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

12,038. TREE OF LIFE, Typology of the. A beautiful figure, found in several of the dispensations, originally in the sacramental tree in Eden, Gen. 2: 9, and 3: 22; ultimately in paradise restored, Rev. 22: 2; Ezekiel's (chap. 47: 12) are probably also symbolical, the fruit for meat, and the leaf for medicine, representing the full provision of God's love. Bowes.

12,039. TREES, Souls in. Plato and Empedocles believe that plants are animals, and are endowed with souls; of this there are clear arguments, for they have tossing and shaking, and their branches are extended; when the woodmen bend them they yield, but they return to their former straightness and strength again when they are let loose, and even draw up weights that are laid upon them. Plutarch.

12,040. TRESPASS Defined. If a man wronged God, that was trespass; if he wronged or robbed his neighbor, that was trespass. We read: "If a soul commit a trespass, and sin through ignorance in the holy things of the Lord, then he shall make amends for the harm that he hath done." Again, "If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the Lord, and lie unto his neighbor, in that which was delivered him to keep, or in fellowship, or in a thing taken away by violence, or hath deceived his neighbor; or have found that which was lost, and lieth concerning it, and sweareth falsely; in any of all these that a man doeth, sinning therein, then it shall be, because he hath sinned, and is guilty, that he shall restore that which he took violently away, or the thing which he hath deceitfully gotten, or that which was delivered to him to keep, or the lost thing which he found." Here trespass is a wrong done to God, or wrong done to a neighbor: we read of "violently taking," "deceitfully getting," and "swearing falsely about that which is found." In every case of trespass, wrong was done; there was an act of evil by which another was injured. And the offering for this act, the trespass-offering (in this a contrast to the sin-offering) was offered by the offerer, not because he was, but because he had done evil. A. Jukes.

12,041. TRIAL, Succor in. At the battle of Cressy, where Edward the Black Prince, then a youth of eighteen years of age, led the van, the king, his father, drew up a strong party on a rising ground, and there beheld the conflict in readiness to send relief where it should be wanted. The young prince being sharply charged, and in some danger, sent to his father for succor; and as the king delayed to send it, another messenger was sent to crave immediate assistance. To him the king replied, "Go, tell my son that I am not so inexperienced a commander as not to know when succor is wanted, nor so careless a father as not to send it." He intended the honor of the day should be his son's, and therefore let him with courage stand to it, assured that help should be had when it might conduce most to his renown. God draws forth his servants to fight in the pitched field against Satan and his wicked instruments. But they, poor hearts, when the charge is sharp, are ready to despond, and cry with Peter, "Save, Lord, we perish;" but God is too watchful to overlook their exigencies, and too much a father to neglect their succor. If help, however, be delayed, it is that the victory may be more glorious by the difficulty of overcoming. Spurgeon.

12,042. TRIAL, Test of. A virtuous and well disposed person is like good metal—the more he is fired the more he is refined; the more he is opposed the more he is approved. Wrongs may well try him, and touch him; but they cannot imprint on him any false stamp.

Richelieu.

12,043. TRIALS, Benefits of. Of a truth there is a paradise within this thorn-hedge. Many a time the people of God are in bonds which are never loosed till they be bound with cords of affliction. God takes them and throws them into a fiery furnace that burns off their bonds; and then, like the three children (Dan. 3: 25), they are loose, walking in the midst of the fire. God gives his children a portion, with one bitter ingredient; if that will not work upon them, he will put in a second, and so on, as there is need, that they may work together for their good. With cross winds he hastens them to their harbor. Worldly things are often such a load to the Christian that he moves but very slowly heavenward. God sends a wind of trouble that blows the burden off his back, and then he walks more speedily on his way, after God hath drawn some gilded earth from him that was drawing his heart away from God.

Boston.

12,044. TRIALS, Fiery. I have observed, that towns which have been casually burnt, have been built again more beautiful than before; mud walls afterwards made of stone; and roofs formerly but thatched, after advanced to be tiled. The apostle tells me that I must not think strange concerning the fiery trial which is to happen unto me. May I likewise prove improved by it. Let my renewed soul, which grows out of the ashes of the old man, be a more firm fabric, and a stronger structure: so shall affliction be my advantage.

Fuller.

12,045. TRIALS, Ordeal of. When a founder has cast his bell, he does not at once put it into the steeple, but tries it with the hammer, and beats it on every side, to see if there be a flaw. So when Christ converts a man he does not at once convey him to heaven, but suffers him first to be beaten upon by many temptations and afflictions, and then exalts him to his crown. As snow is of itself cold, yet warms and refreshes the earth, so afflictions, though in themselves grievous, keep the Christian's soul warm and make it fruitful. Mason.

12,046. TRIALS, Similitude of. In a foundry-yard great piles of iron, ready for melting, were gathered. I noticed one heap of columns, broken, bent, split, shattered. I went into the foundry. They were "tapping" the furnace, and the molten metal flowed out in one stream of fire, sending up a sputter of sparks whiter than the stars. A row of men, on whose swarthy faces fell the strange glare of the fire, stood a little way from the furnace to catch the iron in ladles and carry it off to be run in the moulds. I knew those broken columns would some day be cast into the furnace, softened, melted, to run out in a stream of fire, and be moulded again in tall, shapely pillars. In no other way could they be of use. They must be melted. That very afternoon I saw a mother all bent and broken by affliction. She had parted with an only child. Just the Sabbath before had the earth been broken for that child's grave. I pitied that mother. How keenly her Saviour felt for her! And yet, perhaps, the only way to reach some elements in that mother's character, and change them, was through affliction. The character was not worthless; far from it. It only needed melting. Oh, the pain of that furnace of suffering, its smart, its agony! But in just this way is character sometimes formed, its qualities shaped into the strong, stately pillars sustaining the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom. Anon.

11,047. TRIALS, Tests. The storm tries the buildings, and discovers which is built upon a rock, and which upon the sands. The storm tries the pilot. The touchstone tries the metal whether it be gold or copper. The furnace tries the gold whether it be pure or dross. So afflictions and persecutions try the Christian.

Paint will rub off with washing, but true beauty by washing will appear more beautiful.

Francis Roberts

12,048. TRIALS, Visitation of. All trials are sent for two ends, that we may be better acquainted with the Lord Jesus, and with our own wicked hearts. Luther said that he never undertook any fresh work, but he was visited either with a fit of sickness or some powerful temptation. Whitefield.

12,049. TRIBULATION, Benefits of. A consideration of the benefit of afflictions should teach us to bear them patiently when they fall to our lot, and to be thankful to heaven for having planted such barriers around us, to restrain the exuberance of our follies and our crimes. Let the sacred fences be removed; exempt the ambitious from disappointment and the guilty from remorse; let luxury go unattended with disease, and indiscretion lead into no embarrassments or distresses; our vices would range without control, and the impetuosity of our passions have no bounds; every family would be filled with strife, every nation with carnage, and a deluge of calamities would break in upon us which would produce more misery in a year than is inflicted by the hand of Providence in a lapse of ages. Robert Hall.

12,050. TRIFLES, Delaying for. Bede says that Theodore, being appointed a bishop, delayed four months for his hair to grow, that it might be cut in the shape of a crown, before departing for his bishopric in Britain.

12,051. TRIFLES, Importance of. If we had eyes adapted to the sight, we should see, on looking into the smallest seed, the future flower or tree enclosed in it. God will look into our feelings and motives as into seeds; by those embryos of action he will infallibly determine what we are, and will show what we should have been had there been scope and stage for their development and maturity. Nothing will be made light of. The very dust of the balances shall be taken into account. It is in the moral world as it is in the natural, where every substance weighs something; though we speak of imponderable bodies, yet nature knows nothing of positive levity: and were men possessed of the necessary scales, the requisite instrument, we should find the same holds true in the moral world. Nothing is insignificant on which sin has breathed the breath of hell: everything is important in which holiness has impressed itself in the painted characters. And accordingly "there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; and hid that shall not be known." However unimportant now in the estimation of men, yet, when placed in the light of the divine countenance, like the atom in the sun's rays, it shall be deserving attention; and as the minutest molecule of matter contains all the primordial elements of a world, so the least atom of that mind shall be found to include in it the essential elements of heaven. Harris.

12,052. TRINITY, Derivation of. The word "Trinity," in its Latin form Trinitas, is derived from the adjective trinus, "threefold."

or "three in one." It is nowhere employed in Holy Scripture, but was a term invented and used as early as the second century, to express the doctrine by a single word, for the sake of brevity and convenience.

Bp. Hall.

12,053. TRINITY, Glory to the. That holy man, St. Francis, of Assissi, found appropriate expression of the ardent devotions of his soul in the constant repetition of the doxology, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen." He recommended the same exercise to others, who found it very helpful to spirituality.

12,054. TRINITY, Incomprehensibility of the. An infidel was scoffing at the doctrine of the Trinity. He turned to a gentleman, and said, "Do you believe such nonsense?" "Tell me how that candle burns," said the other. "Why, the tallow, the cotton, and the atmospheric air produces light," said the infidel. "Then they make one light, do they not?" "Yes." "Will you tell me how they are three, and yet but one light?" "No, I cannot." "But you believe it?" The scoffer was put to shame.

12,055. TRINITY, Names of. The two principal names which are applied to deity in the Old Testament are Jehovah and God (in Hebrew, Elohim). The former is God's proper name, and clearly applies to the divine essence. This name is always singular, and may be rendered, "He who exists." The other name, Aleim or Elohim, is plural. And the question occurs, Why is the name Jehovah, which refers to his essence, always singular? Plainly, to express the unity of the divine essence. Why is the other, Elohim, plural? As clearly to denote a plurality of persons in the Godhead. Field.

12,056. TRINITY, Symbol of. This symbol, light, is composed of three parts, one visible and two invisible: first, illuminative rays, which affect our vision, and by their Fraunhofer lines bring to us a knowledge of the substance of the suns from which they spring; second, chemical rays, which cause growth, and give the results of photography; and, third, the principle called heat, separate from either. So is God revealed—three persons in one God. No man hath seen the Father, or the Holy Ghost: but the Son has been seen of men. Each of these component parts is capable of separate and independent action. Each can be sundered from the other, and still retain its full efficiency. The illuminative rays still stream with their incredible swiftness, still bloom with incomprehensible color, and still bear their records of other worlds, after the other two component parts have been turned to other work. There could be no other so happy illustration of the incomprehensible trine nature of God.

Dr. H. W. Warren.

12,057. TRINITY, Understanding the. He who goes about to speak of the mystery of the Trinity, and does it by words, and names of man's invention, talking of essence and existences, hypostases and personalities, priority in co-equality, and unity in pluralities, may amuse himself and build a tabernacle in his head, and talk something—he knows not what; but the renewed man, that feels the power of the Father, to whom the Son is become wisdom, sanctification and redemption, in whose heart the love of the Spirit of God is shed abroad—this man, though he understand nothing of what is unintelligible, yet he alone truly understands the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.

Jeremy Taylor.

12,058. TRINITY, Unity of the. A converted Indian gave the following reason for his belief in the Trinity: "We go down to the river in winter, and we see it covered with snow; we dig through the snow, and we come to the ice; we chop through the ice, and we come to the water; snow is water, ice is water, water is water; therefore the three are one."

12,059. TRIUMPH, Celebration of. In September, 61 B. C., the most magnificent triumph ever seen in Rome was given to Pompey. For two days the grand procession of trophies from every land moved along the Via Sacra, amid the applause of the admiring Romans. At the head of the procession were carried brazen tablets on which were engraven the names of the conquered nations, Pontus, Armenia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Media, Colchis, Iberia, Albania, Syria, Cilicia, Mesopotamia, Phœnicia, Palestine, Judea and Arabia, including a thousand castles and nine hundred cities. The tablets declared that he had increased the revenues of the empire by thirty-five million drachmas, beside gold and silver vessels which he placed in the treasury, valued at twenty thousand talents, having also divided great spoils among his soldiers, not less than fifteen hundred drachmas to any. A long retinue of captives followed his triumphal chariot, including the son of Tigranes, king of Armenia, with his wife and daughter, Zosima, the wife of Tigranes, Aristobulus, king of Judea, and hostages of various nations. As many trophies were carried in procession as Pompey had gained victories either by himself or his officers. The remarkable circumstance of this celebration was that it declared him conqueror of the whole world. He first conquered Africa and received a triumph for it; next he overran Europe, and was again honored with a triumph; lastly he subdued Asia, and brought its spoils to Rome. Another captain has girded on his sword and gone forth to conquer the world. He has already subdued many nations, made innumerable captives, and enriched his followers with great spoil. Not long hence his universal triumph will be celebrated. Pompey's honor can give but a dim hint of the glorious triumph which awaits the King of Zion when he shall enter the New Jerusalem attended by captives from every land and nation and tongue under heaven.

12,060. TRIUMPH, Christian. The highest honor which the Romans bestowed upon their greatest captains was to grant them a day of triumph, and, in that, permission to wear a crown of grass or leaves, which withered the day following; but the triumph of the just shall be eternal, and their never-fading crown is God himself. O, most happy diadem! O, most precious garland of the saints, which is of as great worth and value as is God himself! Saporess, King of the Persians, was most ambitious of honor, and would, therefore, be called "The Brother of the Sun and Moon, and Friend to the Planets." This vain prince erected a most glorious throne, which he placed on high, and thereon sat in great majesty, having under his feet a globe of glass, whereon were artificially represented the motions of the sun, the moon, and the stars; and to sit crowned above this fantastical heaven he esteemed as a great honor. What shall be, then, the honor of the just, who shall truly and really sit above the sun, the moon, and the firmament, crowned by the hand of God himself, and that with a crown of gold, graven with the seal of holiness and the glory of honor? And this honor arrives at that height that Christ himself tells us, "He who shall overcome, I will give him to sit with me in my throne; even as I have overcome, and have sat with the Father in his throne."

Jeremy Taylor.

12,061. TRIUMPH, Importance of. The one important thing about every good enterprise is that it should be successful. Every laborer is entitled to his reward, and triumph is the most satisfactory part of his recompense. Triumph crowns only completed endeavors. "Triumphant" should characterize our lives and deaths, and be an appropriate inscription on our tombstones. All the rhetoric of the historian cannot express so much honor as the simple record, "Triumphant through the blood of the Lamb!"

12,062. TROUBLE, Escape from. There are many coal-pits in Wales. There are men down there who hardly have a gleam of sunlight. How are they to get up? There is a string at the bottom, they pull it, a bell up at the top rings, a rope, worked by a steam engine, is let down, and in this way they ascend to the top. A man gets down into the pit of trouble; he cannot get up himself, he must ring the bell of prayer, and God will hear it, and send down the rope that is to lift him out of it.

Thomas Jones.

12,063. TROUBLE, No Preventing. In the palace of the Constantines was a luxurious chamber called the purple—where all the princes and princesses first saw the light—the emperor thinking by this means to abolish the acerbities attending their existence. The favored children, however, saluted life with tears and groans, as well as others; and many of them were so overwhelmed with disasters, both in their own persons and families, that he who was of the meanest birth in all their empire, would have been very loth to have exchanged conditions with them.

12,064. TROUBLE, Rise above. When birds are flying over, and the fowler lies in wait for them, if they fly low some are wounded, and some, swerving sideways, plunge into the thicket and hide themselves. But you will find that immediately after the first discharge of the gun the flock rise and fly higher. And at the next discharge they rise again, and fly still higher. And not many times has the plunging shot thinned their number before they take so high a level that it is vain that the fowler aims at them, because they are above the reach of his shot. When troubles come upon you, fly higher. And if they still strike you, fly still higher. And by and by you will rise so high in the spiritual life, that your affections will be set on things so entirely above that these troubles shall not be able to touch you.

Beecher.

12,065. TROUBLE, Support in. When I first amused myself with going out to sea, when the winds arose, and the waves become a little rough, I found a difficulty to keep my legs on the deck, but I tumbled and tossed about like a porpoise on the water. At last I caught hold of a rope that was floating about, and then I was enabled to stand upright. So when, in prayer, a multitude of troublous thoughts invade your peace, or when the winds and waves of temptation arise, look out for the rope, lay hold of it, and stay yourself on the faithfulness of God in his covenant with his people and in his promises. Hold fast by that rope, and you shall stand.

Salter.

12,066. TROUBLES, Beneficial. It is to a Christian consideration one of God's greatest mercies that this world is full of troubles; for if we so much court her now she is foul, what would we do if she were beautiful? if we take such pains to gather thorns and thistles, what would we do for figs and grapes?

Lord Capel.

12,067. TROUBLES, Little. Let us not try to manage our little troubles by ourselves, lest greater ones spring out of them. Little troubles are like little seeds, they are small enough in themselves, but they are capable of producing great and important results. The oak is the produce of the acorn, the tangled brier comes from a seed on which no thorn can be seen; the Christian who will manage his little troubles by himself, will soon find that he must manage much greater ones than he bargained for at first.

Power.

12,068. TRUMPET, Call of the. At a village of the Hartz Mountains, it is the custom to usher in the Sabbath by the blowing of trumpets. Their call awakes the people and invites them to the special duties and joys of a new Sabbath. So may the last trumpet's sound awaken us to the joys of God's eternal Sabbath day.

12,069. TRUST, False Objects of. King George III. was one day looking at the plate which had been brought from Hanover and observing one of the articles with the arms of the electorate engraved upon it, he said to the domestic who attended him, "This belonged to King George II.; I know it by the Latin inscription," which he read, adding, "In English it is, 'I trust in my sword.' This," said he, "I always disliked; for had I nothing to trust in but my sword, I well know what would be the result; therefore, when I came to the crown, I altered it. My motto is—"I trust in the truth of the Christian religion." He then said, "Which of the two inscriptions do you like best?" The attendant replied, "Your Majesty's is infinitely preferable to the other." He said, "I have ever thought so, and ever shall think so; for therein is my trust and confidence. Think you, is it possible for any one to be happy and comfortable within himself, who has not that trust and confidence? I know there are those who affect to be at ease while living in a state of infidelity; but it is all affectation; it is only the semblance of happiness—the thing itself is impossible."

12,070. TRUST not in Man. The bankrupt who asks a bankrupt to set him up in business again is only losing time. The pauper who travels off to a neighbor pauper, and begs him to help him out of difficulties, is only troubling himself in vain. The prisoner does not beg his fellow prisoner to set him free. The shipwrecked sailor does not call on his shipwrecked comrade to place him safe ashore. Help in all these cases must come from some other quarter. Relief in all these cases must be sought from some other hand. Reader, it is just the same in the matter of cleansing away your sins. So long as you seek it from man, whether man ordained or man not ordained, you seek it where it cannot be found. Ryle.

12,071. TRUST, Misplaced. It is like a spider's web, Job 8: 14. A broken tooth and foot out of joint, Prov. 25: 19. Parched heath in the desert, Jer. 17: 5, 6. A lie, Jer. 28: 15; 29: 31; Hosea 10: 13. Leaning upon the Lord, when living in sin, Micah 3: 11; Isa. 48: 2; Jer. 7: 4. Trusting in Egypt. Always the great snare of Israel from the first, though they were specially warned against it, Deut. 17: 16. It is compared to trusting in a shadow, Isa. 30: 2, 3; to leaning upon the staff of a bruised reed, 36: 6; Ezek. 29: 6, 7; see Isa. 50: 1-7; 31: 1. Bowes.

12,072. TRUST IN GOD, Figures of. To cling is the original meaning of one of the Hebrew words used for trust. It is the word used for a child clinging to its mother's breast. To run for shelter, the original meaning of another Hebrew word; see Ruth 2: 12. To lean upon, another Hebrew word, from which the word Amen is derived. Two FIGURES are given of holy trust. The stability of Mount Zion, Ps. 125: 1. The luxuriant growth of a tree by the waters, Jer. 17: 7, 8. Bowes.

12,073. TRUST IN GOD, Power of. What was the vain boast of philosophers—that by the power of reason they could make all accidents to contribute to their happiness—is the real privilege we obtain by a regular trust in God, who directs and orders all events that happen for the everlasting good of his servants. Bates.

12,074. TRUST IN GOD, Safety of. A traveler in the Alps had been climbing a precipice which gradually became more and more steep. But he was lured onward by the pleasure of the exercise and the purpose of reaching the top, till he found he could go no further.

Now, looking back he saw he could not return. To attempt to descend would be certain destruction. He was in great peril. He had but an inch or two of footing, which might at any moment give way, and his strength was beginning to fail. He had been watched by a friend, who saw his peril, and by another route reached the summit of the rock and lowered a rope. What must he do? Believe! He hesitated. The rope might break, his friend's arm might fail, but the path was crumbling, his own strength was going; so he believed: that is, he trusted his friend and obeyed his directrics, and so was drawn up to safety. So let us believe and be saved. Let us take Christ at his word. Let us accept his mercy and obey his commands. Then shall we be saved—saved from guilt and condemnation; saved from death and judgment; saved now from wretchedness and ruin. We shall be saved, and so able to fulfill our high vocation to live for God and serve him. Newman Hall.

12,075. TRUSTING, Trying Versus. "The eternal God is my Refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms." In preaching upon this subject on a certain occasion, the Rev. T. Collins said, "One Sabbath I entered the cottage of a good man, and said, 'Well, James, is your soul joying in God to-day?' 'Indeed,' said he, 'no. My mind is clouded, my prayer feeble, and my heart cold. I can, however, still conscientiously say that I hate sin, and, though with many fears that it will master me, strive against it.' I replied, 'You want perfect love, James.' 'I do, I feel I do,' he said. 'Have it then,' I answered. 'Is not that what I wish? Is not that what I am trying for?' 'Yes, James, you have tried too much, and trusted too little. Here, read this:

'Round thee, and beneath are spread
The everlasting arms.

Whose arms? 'God's.' 'Where spread?' 'Around my soul and underneath.' 'Why, man, say you so? Sink down upon them then, and rest.' 'I will try,' said the man. 'James! James! there you are again; trying instead of trusting. Suppose you placed your child in the cradle, and said, 'Now, dear one, rest,' would you expect the little creature to set itself shaking the cradle, and to say, 'I am trying?' would he rest so?' 'No, sir, he must be still to rest.' 'And so must you, James. Tell God, 'Thou art mine, and I am thine,' cast thyself on his fidelity; sink down upon him, and, on an arm firmer than rock, tenderer than a mother's, thou shalt rest.'"

S. Coley.

12,076. TRUTH, Advantages of. Truth has all the advantages of appearance, and many more; and, upon every account, sincerity is true wisdom. As to the affairs of this world, integrity hath many advantages over all the arts of dissimulation and deceit. It is much the plainer and easier, much the safer and more secure way; it hath less of trouble and difficulty, of entanglement and perplexity, of danger and hazard; it is the shortest and nearest way to our end, carrying us thither in a straight line, and will hold out and last, when deceit and cunning, which continually grow weaker and less effectual, will finally fail us. Tillotson.

12,077. TRUTH, Denying. When the majestic form of truth approaches, it is easier for a disingenuous mind to start aside into a thicket till she is past, and then reappearing say, "It was not Truth," than to meet her, and bow, and obey. John Foster.

12,078. TRUTH, Derivation of. Truth, in Hebrew, signifies firmness; in Greek, that which cannot be hid, or that which is unconcealed; open, in opposition to falsehood, which lurks in the darkness. Such an instance serves to remind us of our Lord's words, "He that doeth truth cometh to the light." "Truth," says the Greek derivation, "is that which cannot be hid; it may be suppressed for a time—it may seem to be buried forever—but its very nature secures its ultimate revival and resurrection." The Hebrew derivation again reminds us of its indestructible firmness. The everlasting hills may tremble, the solid rocks may be shattered to atoms, the "heaven and earth may pass (Matt. 5: 18), but truth remains immovable." Henry Craik.

12,079. TRUTH, Domain of. There can be no treaty dividing the domain of truth. Every one truth is connected with every other truth in this great universe of God. The connection may be one of infinite subtlety and apparent distance—running, as it were, under ground for a long way, but always asserting itself at last somewhere and at some time. No bargaining, no fencing off the ground, no form of process will avail to bar this right of way. Blessed right, enforced by blessed power! Argyll.

12,080. TRUTH, Enlivening the. All experience teaches that truth, separate from a sense of the authority of God, does not become life in man's moral nature. It has no efficacy to quicken the conscience or to purify the heart. There is no moral efficacy, even in inspired truth, unless the soul recognizes in it the will and heart of God in regard to man. The words of Jesus had not the same efficacy before the advent of the Spirit as afterwards. Jesus taught, as we have noticed, why this was so. The God-sense was not connected with them in the mind of others until after the resurrection of Christ, and the advent of the Spirit; but when the Holy Ghost came, "He convinced men of sin, righteousness, and judgment," because he attached the authority and will of God to the life and teaching of Jesus. While they viewed Christ as a man like themselves, they felt less sense of obligation. Walker.

12,081. TRUTH, Fidelity of. If I had promised you an acorn next first of October, and all the oaks in England had been blighted, it would become my duty to send to Spain for one, but not for the value of the acorn. Did you ever hear of Ruy Diaz el Campeador, who in order to arm his men for a campaign against the Moors, had borrowed money upon some chests of stones, which the Jews of Burgos who lent it, imagined to be plate? He redeemed the pledge, and when his generals, on seeing the chests opened, wondered at his doing so (honesty does not seem to have been the Spaniard's forte in those days), he said, "Do you not know that there were in those chests a treasure far more precious than anything you can see? they contained el oro de mi verdad—the gold of my truth." Far more than meets the eye is implied in the keeping or not keeping of a trifling rubric; it is not the thing itself, but it is the compromise of principle—it is the difference between truth and falsehood—between honesty and dishonesty. Newland.

12,082. TRUTH, Fragments of. Where are divers opinions, they may be all false; there can be but one true: and that one truth oftentimes must be fetched by piecemeal out of divers branches of contrary opinions. For, it falls out not seldom, that truth is through ignorance or rash vehemence scattered into sundry parts; and like to a little silver melted among ruins of a burnt house, must be tried out from heaps of much superfluous ashes. There is much pains in the search of it, much skill in finding it; the value of it once found, requites the cost of both. Bishop Hall.

12,083. TRUTH, God and. God and truth are always on the same side. Theodore Parker.

12,084. TRUTH, Martyrs for the. To die for the truth is not to die for one's country, but to die for the world. Truth, like the Venus de Medicis, will pass down in thirty fragments to posterity; but posterity will collect and recompose them into a goddess. Then also thy temple, O eternal truth, that now stands half below the earth, made hollow by the sepulchres of its witnesses, will raise itself in the total majesty of proportions, and will stand in monumental granite; and every pillar on which it rests will be fixed in the grave of a martyr. Richter.

12,085. TRUTH, Mistaking. The house of error stands close alongside the house of truth. The door of one is so like the door of the other that there is continual risk of mistakes. Ryle.

12,086. TRUTH, Path of. The path of truth is a plain and safe path; that of falsehood is a perplexing maze. After the first departure from sincerity, it is not in your power to stop. One artifice unavoidably leads on to another, till, as the intricacy of the labyrinth increases, you are left entangled in your own snare. Blair.

12,087. TRUTH, Penalty of Violating. There was a law among the Persians and Indians, that if any person was three times convicted of falsehood, they should, upon the pain of incurring the penalty of death, never speak a word again as long as they lived.

12,088. TRUTH, Rarity of. Augustus Caesar, after a long search through his realm, found but one man who was said never to have told a lie. He was considered worthy to be the chief sacrificer in the Temple of Truth.

12,089. TRUTH, Rejecters of. It is something notable how the errorists talk about truth. It is the prominent word on the lips of Theodore Parker. He considered himself the apostle of truth. When he deliberately took his position against the inspiration, facts and miracles of the Bible, he thought himself launching out into the open and broad sea of truth. On his visit to Europe, in 1840, he walked up and down in front of the church in Wittemberg, to which Luther nailed his theses of defiance to the pope, feeling himself called to a like important mission. He says, "I felt the spirit of the great reformer. Three centuries and a quarter and what a change! Three centuries and a quarter more and it will be said, 'The Protestant Reformation did little in comparison with what has since been done.' Well if this work be of God." Such was the vision of the Boston reformer. Alas! for the reality.

12,090. TRUTH, Self-manifesting Power of. As light opens the close-shut flower-bud to receive light, or as the sunbeam, playing on a sleeper's eyes, by its gentle irritation opens them to see its own brightness; so the truth of God, shining on the soul, quickens and stirs into activity the faculty by which that very truth is perceived. It matters little which of the two operations, in logical or in natural order, be first; practically they may be regarded as simultaneous. The perception rouses the faculty, and yet the faculty is implied in the perception. The truth awakens the mind, and yet the mind must be in activity ere the truth can reach it. And the same two-fold process is carried on in the whole subsequent progress of the soul. Light and the organ of vision, knowledge and the understanding, divine truth and the spiritual reason, grow and expand together. They act and react. They are reciprocally helpful. They are, each by turn, cause and effect.

Caird.

12,091. TRUTH, Stand for. The Guthrie family motto was "Sto pro veritate"—Stand for the truth.

12,092. TRUTH, Support of. It is not wrangling disputes, and syllogistical reasonings that are the mighty pillars which underprop truth in the world: if we would but underset it with the holiness of our hearts and lives, it should never fail. Truth is a prevailing and conquering thing, and would quickly overcome the world, did not the earthiness of our dispositions and the darkness of our false hearts hinder it.

Cudworth.

12,093. TRUTH, Throwing Away. We must never throw away a bushel of truth because it happens to contain a few grains of chaff; on the contrary, we may sometimes profitably receive a bushel of chaff for the few grains of truth it may contain.

Dean Stanley.

12,094. TRUTH, Virtue and. The study of truth is perpetually joined with the love of virtue; for there is no virtue which derives not its original from truth, as, on the contrary, there is no vice which has not its beginning in a lie. Truth is the foundation of all knowledge, and the cement of all societies.

Casuerba.

12,095. TRUTH, What is? Fulgentio was preaching on Pilate's question, and told his hearers that after long searching he had at last found it: "Here it is," said he, drawing a New Testament from his pocket.

12,096. TRUTH, Wisdom of. It will be found that all frauds, like the "wall daubed with untempered mortar," with which men think to buttress up an edifice, tend to the decay of that which they are devised to support. This truth, however, will never be steadily acted on by those who have no moral detestation of falsehood. It is not given to those who do not prize straightforwardness for its own sake to perceive that it is the wisest course.

Whately.

12,097. TRUTHFULNESS, Credit for. The philosopher Xenocrates, being summoned to give evidence in a civil case, and advancing to take the witness' stand, was informed that his word was sufficient. Petrarch, before an ecclesiastical tribunal, where an oath had been required of others, was told by the presiding cardinal, "As for you, Petrarch, your word is sufficient."

12,098. TRUTHFULNESS, Reputation for. A young volunteer was expecting daily to be ordered to the seat of war. One day his mother gave him an unpaid bill with money and asked him to pay it. When he returned home that night she said, "Did you pay the bill?" "Yes," he answered. In a few days the bill was sent in a second time. "I thought," said she to her son, "that you paid this." "I really don't remember, mother; you know I've had so very many things on my mind." "But you said you did." "Well," he answered, "if I said I did, I did." He went away, and the mother took the bill herself to the store. The young man had been known in town all his life, and what opinion was held of him this will show. "I am quite sure," she said, "that my son paid this some days ago; he has been very busy since, and has quite forgotten about it; but he told me that day he had, and says if he said then that he had, he is quite sure that he did." "Well," said the man, "I forgot about it; but if he ever said he did, he did."

12,099. TYPES, Christ in the. An old writer says, "God in the types of the last dispensation, was teaching his children their letters. In this dispensation he is teaching them to put these letters together, and they find that the letters, arrange them as we will, spell Christ, and nothing but Christ."

12,100. TYPES of the Pentateuch. The types of Genesis foreshadow God's great dispensational purposes respecting man's development, shewing in mystery his secret will and way, respecting the different successive dispensations. The types of Exodus—I speak, of course, generally—bring out, as their characteristic, redemption and its consequences; a chosen people are here redeemed out of bondage, and brought into a place of nearness to God. Leviticus again differs from each of these, dealing, I think I may say solely, in types connected with access to God. Numbers and Joshua are again perfectly different, the one giving us types connected with our pilgrimage as in the wilderness; the other, types of our place as over Jordan, that is, as dead and risen with Christ.

A. Jukes.

12,101. TYPES, Scripture. In the Old Testament there are typical persons, things, times, and actions arranged by God himself, under different classes, each one distinct from the other, and each having something characteristic. The books of the Old Testament are God's divisions; each of them may be called one of God's chapters; and in each of these books we find something different as respects the character of the types they contain. Christ is indeed the key to them all. He is the key of the types, and the key to the Bible. Of him God has given us more than sketches; the word from end to end is full of him. In the word we have a whole Christ presented to us: Christ in his offices, in his character; in his person; Christ in his relations to God and man; Christ in his body to the church; Christ as giving to God all that God required from man; Christ as bringing to man all that man required from God; Christ as seen in this dispensation in suffering; Christ as seen in the next dispensation in glory; Christ as the first and the last; as "all and in all" to his people.

A. Jukes.

12,102. UNBELIEF, Barrenness of. There is but one thing without honor; smitten with eteral barrenness, inability to do or to be: insincerity, unbelief. He who believes no thing, who believes only the shows of things, is not in relation with nature and fact at all. Carlyle.

12,103. UNBELIEF, God Dishonored by. A very tender parent had a son, who from his earliest years proved headstrong and dissolute. Conscious of the extent of his demerits, he dreaded and hated his parent. Meanwhile every means was used to disarm him of these suspicions, so unworthy of the tenderness and love which yearned in his father's bosom, and of all the kindness and forbearance which were lavished upon him. Eventually the means appeared to be successful, and confidence, in a great degree, took the place of his ungenerous suspicions. Entertained in the family as one who had never trespassed, he now left his home to embark in mercantile affairs, and was assured that if in any extremity he would apply to his parent, he should find his application kindly received. In the course of years it fell out that he was reduced to extremity; but instead of communicating his case to his parent, his base suspicion and disbelief of his tenderness and care again occupied him, and he neglected to apply to him. Who can tell how deeply that father's heart was rent at such depravity of feeling? Yet this is the case of the believer, who, pardoned and accepted, and made partaker of a Father's love and covenant promises, when under distress refuses to trust his heavenly and almighty Parent, throws away his filial confidence, and with his old suspicions stands aloof in sullen distrust.

Salter.

12,104. UNBELIEF, Obstinacy of. Galileo invented the telescope with which he observed the satellites of Jupiter, and invited a man who was opposed to him to look through it that he might observe Jupiter's moons. The man refused, saying, "If I should see them, how could I maintain my opinions, which I have advanced against your philosophy?"

12,105. UNBELIEF Refuted. It is said of the great Galileo—who had been accused of infidelity because he asserted that the earth went round the sun, in apparent contradiction to the language of Scripture—that, when questioned by the Roman Inquisition as to his belief in the Supreme Being, he pointed to a straw lying on the floor of his dungeon, saying to his accusers that, from the structure of that trifling object, he would infer with certainty the existence of an intelligent Creator. And this is the welcome conclusion to which an attentive examination of the grass of the field inevitably leads.

Macmillan.

12,106. UNBELIEF, Works of. Unbelief is the occasion of all sin, and the very bond of iniquity. It does nothing but darken and destroy. It makes the world a moral desert, where no divine footsteps are heard, where no angels ascend and descend, where no living hand adorns the fields, feeds the fowls of heaven or regulates events. Thus it makes nature, the garden of God, a mere automaton, and the history of Providence a fortuitous succession of events; a man, a creature of accidents, and prayer a useless ceremony. It annihilates even the vestiges of heaven that still remain upon the earth, and stops the way to every higher region.

Krummacher.

12,107. UNDERSTANDING, Exercise of the. Nobody knows what strength of parts he has till he has tried them. And of the understanding one may most truly say, that its force is greater generally than it thinks, till it is put to it. And, therefore, the proper remedy here is but to set the mind to work, and apply the thoughts vigorously to the business; for it holds in the struggles of the mind as in those of war, dum putant se vincere, vincere. A persuasion that we shall overcome any difficulties that we meet with in the sciences, seldom fails to carry us through them. Nobody knows the strength of his mind, and the force of steady and regular application, till he has tried. This is certain; he that sets out upon weak legs will not only go further, but grow stronger too, than one who, with a vigorous constitution and firm limbs, only sits still.

Locke.

12,108. UNDERSTANDING, Unreliable. A thing may be very useful, which we must not lean upon, lest it should break and let us fall; a reed from an osier bed is very useful to make baskets, but you would not lean upon it. So our understandings are very useful, but the best of them are not sufficiently strong to lean upon.

J. Curwen.

12,109. UNFAITHFULNESS, Curse upon. The least unfaithfulness may bring a curse upon us, as the foot of the chamois on the snowy mountains, or the breath of a traveler who sings or shouts on his snowy road, may cause an avalanche which shall entomb the village now full of life and gayety at the mountain's base.

S. Martin.

12,110. UNFAITHFULNESS, Inexcusable. An officer of Alexander's army was directed to lay in provisions for his master's coming, but instead of doing so, he collected three thousand talents in money but no food. Alexander pointed to his horses, and bade him offer the gold to them, but they refused it, and he ordered the lieutenant into custody for his folly in providing money rather than bread.

12,111. UNFAITHFULNESS, Penalty of. A great captain thought he gave that soldier but his due whom he ran through with his sword because he found him asleep when he should have stood sentinel, excusing his severity with this, that he left him as he found him—Mortuum inveni, et mortuum reliqui—"I found him dead in sleep, and left him but asleep in death." Gurnall.

12,112. UNHAPPINESS, Human. Herbert, the great thinker, philosophized about himself, philosophized about this world, philosophized about everything, then in his dying moment asked that only one word might be cut upon his tombstone, and that word "Infelicissimus,"—most unhappy—descriptive of the state of the lives and of the deaths of those who take their case out of the hand of God. The only appropriate inscription for their banqueting hall and their equipage and their grave, and the wall of their eternal prison-house—"Infelicissimus." In drooling, moral idiocy they are scrabbling at the door of their happiness, which never opens: miserably playing the fool. Talmage.

12,113. UNION, Basis of. A portly Quaker taking Mr. Whitefield by the hand, said: "Friend George, I am as thou art; I am for bringing all to the life and power of the ever-living God, and therefore if thou wilt not quarrel with me about my hat, I will not quarrel with thee about thy gown."

12,114. UNION, Biblical Figures of. The body, which having many members—feeble and strong—less and more honorable—is still "fitly framed" and "compacted together," Rom. 12: 4; 1 Cor. 12: 12-27; Eph. 4: 13-16. The family of the redeemed, militant and glorified, Eph. 3: 15. A loaf—the emblem alike of Christ's natural body, broken for us, and of the united members of Christ's mystical body—many, but united, 1 Cor. 10: 17. A temple formed of living stones, built up upon the "living stone," Eph. 2: 21; 1 Pet. 2: 4, 5. A flock, with many folds, under the great and good Shepherd's care, John 10: 16. The curtains of the tabernacle, linked together by golden taches, that it might be "one tabernacle," Exod. 26: 1-11; 36: 18. The annual feasts of Israel helped largely to foster the spirit of union. The camp of Israel, gathered round the central tabernacle, Num. 2. The one stick, which was the sign of the brotherhood of Ephraim and Judah, Ezek. 37: 19. Christ's coat, "without seam, woven from the top throughout," John 19: 23, 24. Bowes.

12,115. UNION, Christian. I do not want the walls of separation between different orders of Christians to be destroyed, but only lowered, that we may shake hands a little easier over them. Rowland Hill.

12,116. UNION, Importance of. Scilurus, on his death-bed, being about to leave four-score surviving children, offered a bundle of darts to each of them, and bade them break them. When all refused, drawing out one by one, he easily broke them; thus teaching them, that if they held together they would continue strong; but if they fell out, and were divided, they would become weak. Plutarch.

12,117. UNION, Military. The Macedonian phalanx is said to have been like a solid union of shields that were locked together, while each soldier kept his place in the moving mass. But, if one of them fell out of the ranks, the square being broken, an advantage was gained by the foe which not unfrequently terminated in a severe slaughter of the otherwise invincible army. The strength of each individual lay in the compactness of the body of which he formed but an inconsiderable but necessary part. Individual influence may be powerless when it stands alone, but Christians in union and under their great Captain have irresistible force to attack sin, whereby they can overcome it, and locked hearts are better than locked shields in the holy war. Anon.

12,118. UNION, Strength in. If you consider how it is that a hempen twine is made strong enough to draw a loaded wagon, or to bear the strain of a ship as she rides at anchor, you will see a significance that perhaps did not occur to you before, in the use which Holy Scripture make of this work of human art as an emblem. It is formed of many threads, twisted together into one cord, and these cords are again combined into one cable. Each thread in itself is so weak, that a child could break, or the slightest weight would burst it; but when the threads are twined into one rope, their united strength is such as would have seemed incredible. "A threefold cord is not quickly broken." The truth is just brought before us that union is strength. They who are weak and helpless singly, are able to produce a vast result when they combine their powers. It was in order to restrain his sinful creatures from doing what they had imagined to do, that God scattered them over the face of the earth; and he gathers together again his elect people in one body in Christ, that by uniting their various energies in one work, and for one end, they may strengthen each other's hands, and effectually "bruise under foot" the powers of darkness. Bp. Trower.

12,119. UNION, Strength of. In the Centennial Exhibition was a powerful magnet, that would lift a weight of eighteen hundred pounds. It was formed of a hundred thin plates, no one of them of much magnetic power, but together holding the weight, an illustration of the proverb, "Union is strength, dissension weakness."

12,120. UNION, Unnatural. I remember it is noted in our English history as a very remarkable thing, that when the Severn overflowed part of Somersetshire, it was observed that dogs and hares, cats and rats, to avoid the common destruction, would swim to the next rising ground, and abide quietly together in that common danger, without the least discovery of their natural antipathy. Flavel.

12,121. UNITY, Dream of. We thought we were at sea, saw a great commotion, and heard voices high and loud. It was a conference of the waves. Listening, we heard one wave say, "See that city yonder with her marble mansions and many spires, that is New York, the metropolis of the United States. Let us inundate that city, and we inundate the States; say, shall it be done?" and there followed a big swell which we interpreted as saying, "It shall be done!" But a lull succeeded, and in its quiet we heard a modest voice say, "Under present circumstances the thing is impracticable. Along the coast, at the base of that city, there are millions of little sands, tiny and weak apart, but massive and strong when united, as they now are, and while that remains, the thing is not only impracticable, but, let me add, impossible; divide them, and your work is done." Blue with anger, foaming in passion, the leader leaped on the back of the tide, while the winds gave martial music, and with a voice like that of thunder, cried, "We revenge the insult. On! and the thing is done! Talk no more of sands. We defy; we conquer! On! on!" And on they went, and as we saw it in our dream, the march was grand. Nothing daunted, the sands kept close, compact, united. The waves dashed on, and bore down in their fury, but only to dash themselves into fragments and spray—an ignominious defeat. In our delight we shouted, "A city saved! Victory! In union there is strength," and thus awoke ourselves, and our dream was over. J. Johns.

12,122. UNIVERSE, Extent of. According to a German poet God called man into the vestibule of heaven, saying, "Come up higher, and I will show thee the glory of my house." And to his angels, who stood about his throne, he said, "Take him, strip him of his robes of flesh; cleanse his affections; put a new breath into his nostrils; but touch not his human heart—the heart that fears and hopes and trembles." A moment, and it was done, and the man stood ready for his unknown voyage. Under the guidance of a mighty angel, with sound of flying pinions, they sped away from the battlements of heaven. Sometimes on the mighty angel's wings they fled through Saharas of darkness, wildernesses of death. At length, from a distance not counted, save in the arithmetic of heaven, light beamed upon them—a sleepy flame, as seen through a hazy cloud. They sped on in their terrible speed to meet the light; the light with lesser speed came to meet them. In a moment the wheeling of planets; then came long eternities of twilight; then again, on the right hand and on the left, appeared more constellations. At last the man sunk down, crying, "Angel, I can go no further; let me down into the grave and hide me from the infinitude of the universe, for end there is none." "End there is none?" demanded the angel. And from the glittering stars that shone around, there came a choral shout, "End there is none!" "End there is none?" demanded the angel again; "and is it this that awes thy soul? I answer, End there is none to the universe of God! Lo, also, of him who made it there is no beginning!" Prof. Mitchell.

12,123. UNIVERSE, Order in. If the atoms have by chance formed so many sorts of figures, why did it never fall out that they made a house or a shoe? Why at the same rate should we not believe that an infinite number of Greek letters strowed all over a certain place might possibly fall into the contexture of the Iliad? Montaigne.

12,124. UNKINDNESS, Effect of. More hearts pine away in secret anguish for unkindness from those who should be their comforters, than for any other calamity in life. Dr. E. Young.

12,125. UNSEEN, Care for. A pagan sculptor was engaged to erect a statue in one of the Grecian temples, which was to be set in the wall. He wrought the back of the statue, which would be concealed, with the same care as the front. He was asked why he did this, and answered, "The gods see everywhere."

12,126. UNSELFISHNESS, Maternal. It is reported of Agrippina, the mother of Nero, who being told, "That if ever her son came to be an emperor, he would be her murderer," she made this reply, "I am content to perish if he may be emperor." What she expressed vain-gloriously, that we should do religiously: "Let us perish, so our neighbors, our relations, and our country be bettered." Secker.

12,127. UNTHANKFULNESS, Crime of. If it be a fault to be matched even with murder not to requite man with thankfulness, what a crime is it to deal unthankfully with God! Ambrose.

12,128. UPRIGHTNESS, Emblem of. The pine, placed nearly always among scenes disordered and desolate, brings into them all possible elements of order and precision. Lowland trees may lean to this side and that, though it is but a meadow breeze that bends them, or a bank of crowslips from which their trunks lean aslope. But let storm and avalanche do their worst, and let the pine find only a ledge of vertical precipice to cling to, it will nevertheless grow straight. Thrust a rod from its last shoot down the stem, it shall point to the centre of the earth as long as the tree lives. Anon.

12,129. USEFULNESS, Absence of. In the school of Pythagoras it was a point of discipline, that if among the akoustikoi, or probationers, there were any who grew weary of studying to be useful, and returned to an idle life, they were to regard them as dead; and, upon their departing, to perform their obsequies, and raise them tombs with inscriptions, to warn others of the like mortality, and quicken them to refine their souls above that wretched state. Addison.

12,130. USEFULNESS, Advantages of. It is a great satisfaction, at the close of life, to be able to look back on the years that are past, and to feel that you have lived, not for yourself alone, but that you have been useful to others. You may be assured, also, that the same feeling is a source of comfort and happiness at any period of life. Nothing in this world is so good as usefulness. It binds your fellow-creatures to you, and you to them; it tends to the improvement of your own character; and it gives you a real importance in society, much beyond what any artificial station can bestow.

12,131. USEFULNESS, Inevitable. Knowest thou not that thou canst not move a step on this earth without finding some duty to be done, and that every man is useful to his kind, by the very fact of his existence? Carlyle.

12,132. USEFULNESS, Opportunities of. How often do we sigh for opportunities of doing good, whilst we neglect the openings of providence in little things, which would frequently lead to the accomplishment of most important usefulness! Dr. Johnson used to say, "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once will never do any." Good is done by degrees. However small in proportion the benefit which follows individual attempts to do good, a great deal may thus be accomplished by perseverance, even in the midst of discouragements and disappointments.

12,133. USEFULNESS, Posthumous. Bunyan is dead, but his bright spirit still walks the earth in his Pilgrim's Progress. Baxter is dead, but souls are still quickened by the Saints' Rest. Cowper is dead, but the "golden apples" are still as fresh as when newly gathered in the "silver basket" of the Olney Hymns. Eliot is dead, but the missionary enterprise is young. Henry Martyn is dead, but who can count the apostolic spirits who, phoenix-like, have started from his funeral pile? Howard is dead, but modern philanthropy is only commencing its career. Raikes is dead, but the Sabbath-schools go on. Wilberforce is dead, but the negro will find for ages a protector in his memory.

12,134. UTILITY before Ornament. A stag one summer's day came to a pool to quench his thirst, and as he stood drinking he saw his form reflected in the water. "What beauty and strength," said he, "are in these horns of mine; but how unseemly are these weak and slender feet!" While he was thus criticising, after his own fancies, the form which Nature had given him, the huntsmen and hounds drew that way. The feet, with which he had found so much fault, soon carried him out of the reach of his pursuers; but the horns, of which he was so vain, becoming entangled in a thicket, held him till the hunters again came up to him, and proved the cause of his death.

12,135. VALOR, Modern. General Fisk tells of a colored color-bearer, who, when the captain of his company gave the order for the men to fall back, thinking their exposure too serious, kept on alone in advance. He was personally ordered to fall back, lest the colors should be lost. He shouted to his captain, "Dese colors never fall back! You jess bring up de men to them, and dey won't be lost."

12,136. VALOR, Seat of. The estimate and valor of a man consists in the heart and in the will; there his true honor lies. Valor is stability, not of arms and of legs; but of courage and the soul: it does not lie in the valor of our horse, nor of our arms, but in ourselves. He that falls obstinately in his courage, if his legs fail him, fights upon his knees. Montaigne

12,137. VANITY, Biblical Figures of. Fading flowers, Isa. 28: 1. Hasty fruit of summer, Isa. 28: 1; no sooner discovered than gathered and eaten. Broken cisterns that can retain no water, Jer. 2: 23. Perishing gourds, like Jonah's, 4: 6-10. Reeds, easily bruised and broken, a vain support to lean upon, Isa. 36: 6. Brooks in summer vanishing in the heat, dried up when most needed, Job 6: 15-17. Cockatrice (marg., adders') eggs, Isa. 59: 5. Spiders' webs, Isa. 59: 5, 6. Vapor or breath, James 4: 14. The mirage of the desert, Isa. 35: 7; the waters that fail and cheat the traveler, Jer. 15: 18. Wind, Prov. 11: 29, inheriting; Eccles. 5: 16, laboring for; Hosea 8: 7, sowing. Feeding on ashes, Isa. 44: 20; on husks, Luke 15: 16; on wind, Hosea 12: 1. Putting wages into a bag with holes, Haggaï 1: 6. Laboring in the very fire, Hab. 2: 13. Rejoicing in a thing of naught, Amos 6: 13. Physicians of no value, Job 13: 4. Bowes.

12,138. VANITY, Check to. When you are disposed to be vain of your mental acquisitions, look up to those who are more accomplished than yourself, that you may be fired with emulation; but when you feel dissatisfied with your circumstances, look down on those beneath you, that you may learn contentment.

Dr. J. Moore.

12,139. VANITY, Emblems of. Honor must put off its robes when the play is done; make it never so glorious a show on this world's stage, it hath but a short part to act. A great name of worldly glory is but like a peal rung on the bells; the common people are the clappers; the rope that moves them is popularity; if you once let go your hold and leave pulling, the clapper lies still, and farewell honor. Strength, though like Jeroboam it put forth the arm of oppression, shall soon fall down withered. (1 Kings 13: 4.) Beauty is like an almanac: if it last a year it is well. Pleasure like lightning: oritur moritur; sweet, but short; a flash, and away. All vanities are but butterflies, which wanton children greedily catch for; and sometimes they fly beside them, sometimes before them, sometimes behind them, sometimes close by them; yea, through their fingers, and yet they miss them; and when they have them, they are but butterflies; they have painted wings, but are crude and squalid worms. Such are the things of this world, vanities, butterflies. Vel sequendo labimur, vel assequendo ledimur. The world itself is not unlike an artichoke; nine parts of it are unprofitable leaves, scarce the tithe is good: about it there is a little picking meat, nothing so wholesome as dainty: in the midst of it there is a core, which is enough to choke them that devour it. Adams.

12,140. VANITY, Force of. O, Vanity, how little is thy force acknowledged, or thy operations discerned! How wantonly dost thou deceive mankind, under different disguises! Sometimes thou dost wear the face of pity; sometimes of generosity; nay, thou hast the assurance to put on those glorious ornaments which belong only to heroic virtue. Fielding.

12,141. VANITY, Memento of. There once stood at one end of the Library in Dublin a globe of the world, and at the other a skeleton of a man. Suppose the skeleton to represent Alexander, and his conquests to have been universal, what does it profit him now? Suppose it is all that remains of the gold-clasping Rothschild; what will his millions profit him now? Skeletons hold no sceptres, wield no swords, drive no pens, grasp no gold, court no favor, hear no censure and regard no praise. They cannot be endured in the palaces where once they reigned. This is the end of all. The flesh to the worms, and the skeleton—a powerless thing—mocks our pride by only a little slower decay.

12,142. VANITY, Personal. Most persons are like Themistocles, who never found himself so much contented as when he found himself praised. I will not say a gracious heart never lifts up itself; but I will say, that grace in the heart never lifts it up. Seeker.

12,143. VANITY, Real. Philip the Good attended a royal wedding in Flanders. For days feasting and hilarity was kept up. Walking out one evening he saw a man dead drunk snoring by the road-side. He caused his followers to take him to the palace, where he was stripped of his old clothes and dressed in full court costume. When he awoke he found every one ready to wait upon him. The poor fellow wondered how he came there, surrounded by so much splendor. All day long they caused him to think himself some great duke, and when night came, he heard music and saw all the pleasures of a full court. But late at night, when well drunk, and fast asleep, the old clothes were put upon him, and he was taken back to his place in the street. The man ever after insisted that he had seen a vision.

12,144. VANITY, Universal. Hardly shall you meet with man or woman so aged or ill-favored but if you will commend them for comeliness, nay, and for youth too, shall take it well. South.

12,145. VANITY, Vices of. Vanity is the foundation of the most ridiculous and contemptible vices—the vices of affectation and common lying. Adam Smith.

12,146. VANITY, Weeds of. How much I regret to see so generally abandoned to the weeds of vanity that fertile and vigorous space of life in which might be planted the oaks and fruit-trees of enlightened principle and virtuous habit, which, growing up, would yield to old age an enjoyment, a glory, and a shade! John Foster.

12,147. VARIETY, Nature's. Ruskin says, "Break off an elm bough three feet long, in full leaf, and lay it on the table before you, and try to draw it, leaf for leaf. It is ten to one if on the whole bough (provided you do not twist it about as you work) you find one form of a leaf exactly like another; perhaps you will not even have one complete. Every leaf will be oblique, or foreshortened, or curled, or crossed by another, or shaded by another, or have something or other the matter with it; and though the whole bough will look graceful and symmetrical, you will scarcely be able to tell how or why it does so, since there is not one line of it like another." What variety then must we expect in life and experience!

12,148. VAUNTING, Folly of. A lion and an ass made an agreement to go out hunting together. By-and-by they came to a cave where many wild goats abode. The lion took up his station at the mouth of the cave, and the ass, going within, kicked and brayed and made a mighty fuss to frighten them out. When the lion had caught very many of them, the ass came out and asked him if he had not made a noble fight, and routed the goats properly. "Yes, indeed," said the lion; "and I assure you, you would have frightened me too, if I had not known you to be an ass." Æsop.

12,149. VENGEANCE, Expectation of. Joseph Upcheer, a colored Christian soldier, said, "Some say dar's no God is dis war. But I puts my trust in de Lord, an' balls don't scare me. De han' ob de Lord is in de war." One asked, "What do you think is the cause of it, Joseph?" He revolved the question a moment and then said earnestly, "So much unfair work am de cause of the war. My old uncle, who died twenty years ago, put his han' on my head once, and says he, 'Young dog, make haste and grow. Bimby you'll have a gun and fight.' Wese been 'pecting dis war, sah, dere's been so much unfair work." G. N. Marden.

12,150. VENGEANCE, Goddess of. The old Greeks personated conscience and called the goddess Nemesis. First she is the personification of moral reverence for law, and last she becomes the angel of vengeance, overtaking with fullest retribution the reckless transgressor. I shall never forget a picture seen in my boyhood. A prodigal fleeing for his life, a thousand sins stirring his soul like a tempest, his eyes starting from their sockets: behind him the swiftly-flying Nemesis with the flashing weapon uplifted, ready to strike him down. The poor wretch cannot escape the blow. Thus is every sinner relentlessly pursued by the avenging deity whose sword is sharp, and swift, and sure. Dr. Geo. H. Whitney.

12,151. VERACITY, Importance of. When the materials of a building are solid blocks of stone, very rude architecture will suffice; but a structure of rotten materials needs the most careful adjustment in order to make it stand. Whately.

12,152. VESSEL, Filing the. Methought I looked and saw the Master standing, and at his feet lay an earthen vessel. It was not broken, not unfitted for service, yet there it lay, powerless and useless, until he took it up. He held it awhile, and I saw that he was filling it, and anon, I beheld him walking in his garden, whither he had "gone down to gather lilies." The earthen vessel was yet again in his hand, and with it he watered his beauteous plants, and caused their odors to be shed forth yet more abundantly. Then I said to myself, "Sorrowing Christian, hush! hush! peace, be, still! thou art this earthen vessel; powerless, it is true, yet not broken, still fit for the Master's use. Sometimes thou mayst be laid aside altogether from active service, and the question may arise, what is the Master doing with me now? Then may a voice speak to thine inmost heart, 'he is filling the vessel, yes, only filling it ready for use.' Dost thou ask in what manner? Nay, be silent. Is it not all too great an honor for thee to be used by him at all? Be content, whether thou art employed in watering the lilies, or in washing the feet of the saints." Truly, it is a matter of small moment. Enough, surely enough, for an earthen vessel, to be in the Master's hands, and employed in the Master's service. Anon.

12,153. VICE, Allies of. I think you will find it true, that, before any vice can fasten on a man, body, mind, or moral nature must be debilitated. The mosses and fungi gather on sickly trees, not thriving ones; and the odious parasites which fasten on the human frame choose that which is already enfeebled. Mr. Walker, the hygeian humorist, declared that he had such a healthy skin it was impossible for any impurity to stick to it, and maintained that it was an absurdity to wash a face which was of necessity always clean. I don't know how much fancy there was in this; but there is no fancy in saying that the lassitude of tired-out operatives, and the languor of imaginative natures in their periods of collapse, and the vacuity of minds untrained to labor and discipline, fit the soul and body for the germination of the seeds of intemperance. Holmes.

12,154. VICE, Escape from. He that is deeply engaged in vice is like a man laid fast in a bog, who by a faint and lazy struggling to get out does but spend his strength to no purpose, and sinks the deeper into it: the only way is, by a resolute and vigorous effort to spring out, if possible, at once. When men are sorely urged and pressed, they find a power in themselves which they thought they had not. Tillotson.

12,155. VICE, Infelicity of. So absolutely does vice dispose of all men, being such a self-sufficient worker of infelicity, that it has no need either of instruments or servants. Other tyrants, endeavoring to render those men miserable whom they punish, maintain executioners and tormentors, devise searing-irons and racks to plague the reasonless soul. But vice, without any preparation of engines, as soon as it enters into the soul, torments and dejects it, filling a man with grief, lamentations, sorrow and repentance. Plutarch.

12,156. VICE, Unhappiness of. The greatest miracle that the Almighty could perform would be to make a bad man happy, even in heaven: he must unparadise that blessed place to accomplish it. In its primary signification all vice, that is, all excess, brings its own punishment even here. By certain fixed, settled and established laws of him who is the God of Nature, excess of every kind destroys that constitution that temperance would preserve. The debauchee, therefore, offers up his body a "living sacrifice" to sin. Colton.

12,157. VICISSITUDE, Design of. As pleasant and as much desired as fair weather is wont to be, and as much as we become discontented at a lowering and dropping sky, yet the one is no less necessary or useful in its season than the other. For too interrupted a course of heat and sunshine would make the season fruitful in nothing but in caterpillars, or such kind of vermin, and in diseases; and is far more proper to fill graves than barns. Whereas seasonable vicissitudes of clouds, and cloudy weather, make both the ground fruitful, and the season healthful. Thus in our outward condition, too long and constant a prosperity is wont to make the soul barren of all but such wantonness as 'tis ill to be fruitful of; and the interposition of seasonable afflictions is as necessary and advantageous, as it can be unwelcome. R. Boyle.

12,158. VICTORY, Biblical Emblems of. Palm branches, Rev. 7: 9. Crowns. Riding in triumph, as ancient victors were wont to do, leading their captives in chains, and scattering incense and precious gift in their triumphant progress, 2 Cor. 2: 14. Putting the feet upon the necks of vanquished foes, as Josh. 10: 24. Treading under foot, as ashes, Mal. 4: 3; as the mire of the streets, Micah 7: 10. Sitting on thrones, Matt. 19: 28; Rev. 20: 4. Bowes.

12,159. VICTORY, Cheap. Victories that are cheap, are cheap. Those only are worth having which come as the result of hard fighting. Beecher.

12,160. VICTORY, Faith in. Agesilaus, while in Egypt with a very few soldiers, had to encounter a host of two hundred thousand men. He wrote the word Victory in the palm of his left hand. When the priest cut up a bird for an augury Agesilaus took its liver and pressing it in his marked hand, printed upon it the word he had written there. He then showed the wonder to the soldiers, telling them that the gods had given them this certain omen of victory. Believing the victory certain they went bravely into battle, resolved upon victory, and won it. The church has for her confidence the more "sure word of prophecy." Resolutely let the battle be pushed till victory is universal.

12,161. VICTORY, God of. A large army of Suevi and Alemanni swept down upon Gaul for the purpose of plunder. Clovis, a pagan, gathered his force, and met them not far from Cologne. His Christian wife, Clotildis, said to him before his departure, "My lord, you are going to conquer; but, in order to be victorious, you must invoke the God of the Christians. He is the sole Lord of the universe, and is called the God of Armies. If you call upon him in faith, nothing can resist you. Though your enemies were a hundred against one, you would triumph over them." The shock of the enemy was terrible. Clovis's cavalry was routed, the battle was evidently going against him, and his best efforts failed to rally his troops. Then he thought of the words of his queen, and, in his great extremity, lifted his eyes to heaven, and prayed, "O, Christ, whom Clotildis invokes as the Son of the living God, I implore thy succor; I have called upon my gods, and find they have no power; I, therefore, invoke thee; I believe in thee; deliver me from mine enemies, and I will be baptized in thy name." The fortunes of the day began to change immediately. The enemies were routed and reduced to tributaries. This victory is set down as miraculous, and from it Clovis dates his conversion to Christianity, A. D. 496.

12,162. VICTORY, A Martyr's. James Renwick, who was martyred at the age of twenty-six, in Scotland, before his execution, exclaimed, "O Lord, thou hast brought me within two hours of eternity; and this is no matter of terror to me more than if I were to lie down on a bed of roses: nay, through grace, to thy praise I may say, I never had the fear of death since I came to this prison; but from the place whence I was taken I could have gone very composedly to the scaffold. O, how can I contain this, to be within two hours of the crown of glory?" On hearing the drums beat for the guards to turn out, he exclaimed, "Yonder is the welcome warning to my marriage: the bridegroom is coming: I am ready, I am ready!"

12,163. VICTORY Not to Numbers. Lucullus, with an army of ten thousand foot and one thousand horse, fought Tigranes in Armenia, who led an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men. The Roman general gained a remarkable victory, slaying more than one hundred thousand of the enemy, and losing but five of his own men.

12,164. VICTORY Proclamation of. After Commodore Perry's decisive victory in the war of 1812, on Lake Erie, he announced the result to the government thus: "We have met the enemy and they are ours." So it may be said of Christ and soon will be said by the church.

12,165. VIGILANCE, Duty of. Never in all the admonitions which fell from those holy lips did Christ impress upon the mind of man a more solemn duty than when he proclaimed, "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!" Not in the series of parables wherewith he engraved his thoughts by illustration and simile upon his hearers did he ever insist upon any duty which is more completely a guide to our path, a light upon our way, a warning against danger, and source of internal confidence in pursuit of the discovery of another and a better world, than is vigilance. Bellev.

12,166. VIRGINS, Parable of the. A sailor once listened to the reading of the parable of the ten virgins, at a cottage meeting. Sometime after he went again, and said, "I have not forgotten the parable of the ten virgins, and all that was then said. I was far away at sea when the words were brought home to me." It had been part of his employment to light the lamps at sea; and one evening he discovered that the supply of oil was getting low, and would scarcely last till they arrived in port "I knew," he said, "that the captain would be very angry, and that I should in all probability lose my situation. Then came to my mind the parable of the virgins, and I said to myself, I am in danger of offending an earthly master, and of being shut out from my employment on board his ship; but oh, what is that to not being ready when my heavenly Master calls me, and to being shut out of heaven?" The poor man with tears added, "I prayed then most earnestly that God would give me his grace, and save me in Jesus Christ." His lamp was filled with the oil of grace.

12,167. VIRTUE, Practicing. Eudaemonidas saw Xenocrates when he was very old, in the academy reading philosophy to his scholars. He was told that he was in quest of virtue. He inquired, "When does he intend to practice it?" The aged need to use great diligence as well as the young.

12,168. VIRTUE, Religion and. Religion or virtue, in a large sense, includes duty to God and our neighbor; but in a proper sense, virtue signifies duty towards men, and religion duty to God. Dr. I. Watts.

12,169. VIRTUE, Value of. Plato, who was a competent judge, was of opinion that virtue was a more valuable treasure than all the riches above the earth or all the mines beneath it. Plutarch.

12,170. VISITATION, Divine. Put your ear to the rail track and you can hear the train coming miles away: so I to-day put my ear to the ground, and I heard the thundering on of the lightning train of God's mercies and judgments. The mercy of God is first to be tried upon this nation. It will be preached in the pulpits, in theatres, on the streets, everywhere. People will be invited to accept the mercy of the gospel, and the story and the song and the prayer will be "mercy." But suppose they do not accept the offer of mercy—what then? Then God will come with his judgments, and the grasshoppers will eat the crops, and the freshets will devastate the valleys, and the defalcations will swallow the money markets, and the fires will burn cities into ashes, and the earth will quake from pole to pole. Year of mercies and of judgments. Year of invitation and of warning. Year of jubilee and of woe. Which side are you going to be on?

Talmage.
12,171. VISITATION, Tract. Harlan Page superintended thirty tract distributors in the city of New York, and he observed that in the course of three or four years, though the district had been regularly gone through by the visitors, yet only four conversions had occurred which could be traced to their agency. Aware of the cause of such limited success, he called his distributors together, and laid before them the return. He told them, "The fault lies with yourselves: you are not doing the work right. Have you not," he said, "one or more individuals in your district for the salvation of whose souls you can labor, either by prayer or by speaking to them?"

The result was, that the distributors singled out eighty-four cases for their special labor; and in the course of eight months, thirty-four hopeful conversions were reported; all but four of whom had been converted by direct conversation and prayer.

12,172. VISITING, Encouragement to. Do not be afraid of venturing a few visits for the Lord. There was in a certain minister's district a public house, in which neither the landlord nor his wife were professors of religion. It was quite a resort for the thoughtless and profane, and he dreaded visiting the place; but conceiving it to be his duty he nerved himself up to the task. He was respectfully received and invited into the sitting room, where he found the tavern keeper and his wife alone. He conversed with, or rather talked to them about the interests of their immortal souls; endeavoring to show them the responsibility of their station; and urged them to give immediate attention to the things which belonged to their peace; but could get no other answer than a promise from the landlord that he would think of it. He left the house with a heavy heart, feeling that he had done no good. They soon left the place, and the minister, ten years after, received a very kind note from the man, informing him that the conversation which seemed to be so little regarded, had resulted in the conversion of both himself and his wife. Power.

12,173. VOLITION, Influence of. A man with a half-volition goes backwards and forwards, and makes no way on the smoothest road; a man with a whole volition advances on the roughest, and will reach his purpose, if there be even a little wisdom in it. Carlyle.

12,174. VOW, Reminded of a. A sea-captain related his misfortunes: the wreck of his ship, and his own escape after floating several days on a plank. A gentleman who heard it asked him privately if he did not in that hour of peril vow to serve the Lord if he would deliver him. The captain became angry, and replied: "It is none of your business." His questioner treated him very kindly, while he was ill at ease. The next day the captain called on him and said: "Sir, I have not slept a wink since I saw you; I abused you yesterday; I am now come to ask your pardon. I did, while on that plank, vow to God, that I would live differently from what I ever had done; and, by God's help, from this time forward, I am determined to do so."

12,175. VOWS, Avaricious. A rich heathen, in a storm at sea, vowed to Jupiter if he would save him and his vessel, he would sacrifice a hundred oxen. When the storm abated, he thought an offering of seven oxen sufficient. And so after each storm his sacrifice decreased. From seven oxen to one, and then to a sheep; and when at last safe on shore, a few dates were regarded as enough. But these dates were eaten up while on his way to the altar, and the shells alone left for an offering to Jupiter. The human heart has been the same selfish thing in all ages.

12,176. WAITING, The Christian. Conceive the case of a man who, having been cast upon a dreary inhospitable island, awaits the time for a vessel to come and bear him away. He paces its barren and desert sands, and looks up at the overcast sky, anxiously waiting for the arrival of the vessel to carry him to a land of light and fertility. So the Christian, like the exile on a rock, feels that he is far from his natural home, and is looking for and hasting unto the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. He knows that the vessel is prepared, and the convoy ready, which are to bear him hence from a barren wilderness to a happy land flowing with milk and honey. Salter.

12,177. WAITING, Examples of. You remember that strange half-involuntary "forty years" of Moses in the "wilderness" of Midian, when he had fled from Egypt. You remember, too, the almost equally strange years of retirement in "Arabia," by Paul, when, if ever, humanly speaking, instant action was needed. And pre-eminently you remember the amazing charge of the ascending Lord to the disciples, "Tarry at Jerusalem." Speaking after the manner of men, one could not have wondered if out-spoken Peter, or fervid James, had said: "Tarry, Lord! How long?" "Tarry, Lord! Is there not a perishing world, groaning for the 'good news?'" "Tarry! did we hear thee aright, Lord? Was the word not haste?" Nay; "Being assembled together with them, He commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father." (Acts 1:4.) Grosart.

12,178. WANTS, Book of. On a tradesman's table I noticed a book labeled Want Book. What a practical suggestion for a man of prayer! He should put down all his needs on the tablets of his heart, and then present his want book to his God. If we knew all our need, what a large want book we should require! How comforting to know that Jesus has a supply book, which exactly meets our want book! Promises, providences, and divine visitations combine to meet the necessities of all the faithful. Spurgeon.

12,179. WANTS, Imaginary. A great number of our wants are simply special wants of the imagination; we want them because we think that we want them; they give us no enjoyment when we obtain them. Fichte.

12,180. WANTS, Ruinous. We are ruined, not by what we really want, but by what we think we do; therefore, never go abroad in search of your wants; if they be real wants, they will come home in search of you; for he that buys what he does not want, will soon want what he cannot buy. Colton.

12,181. WAR, Absurdity of. "What are you thinking, my man?" said Lord Hill, as he approached a soldier who was leaning in a gloomy mood upon his firelock, while around him lay mangled thousands of French and English a few hours after the battle of Salamanca had been won by the British. The soldier started, and, after saluting his general, answered, "I was thinking, my lord, how many widows and orphans I have this day made for one shilling."

12,182. WAR, Contrast of. It is not known where he that invented the plough was born, nor where he died; yet he has effected more for the happiness of the world than the whole race of heroes and of conquerors, who have drenched it with tears, and manured it with blood, and whose birth, parentage, and education have been handed down to us with a precision proportionate to the mischief they have done.

Colton.

12,183. WAR, Cost of. Give me the money that has been spent in war, and I will purchase every foot of land upon the globe. I will clothe every man, woman, and child in an attire of which kings and queens would be proud. I will build a school-house on every hill-side, and in every valley over the whole earth; I will build an academy in every town, and endow it; a college in every State, and fill it with able professors; I will crown every hill with a place of worship, consecrated to the promulgation of the gospel of peace; I will support in every pulpit an able teacher of righteousness, so that on every Sabbath morning the chime on one hill should answer to the chime on another round the earth's wide circumference; and the voice of prayer, and the song of praise, should ascend like a universal holocaust to heaven.

Stebbins.

12,184. WAR, Destruction by. In 1756, Edmund Burke estimated the loss of human life by war, both directly and indirectly, at 35,000,000,000, about twenty-three times the present population of the globe, now estimated to be 1,425,000,000.

12,185. WAR, God of. The Alani have no temples or shrines; but with barbarous ceremonies they fix a naked sword in the ground. This they religiously worship as the god of the region of their abode.

12,186. WAR, Horror of. Take my word for it, if you had seen but one day of war, you would pray to almighty God that you might never see such a thing again.

Wellington.

12,187. WAR, Preparation for. Suppose a gentleman, living in a suburban house, with his garden separated only by a fruit-wall from his next door neighbor's, and he had called me to consult with him on the furnishing of his drawing-room. I begin looking about me, I find the walls rather bare; I think such and such a paper might be desirable—perhaps a little fresco here and there on the ceiling—a damask curtain or so at the windows. "Ah," says my employer, "damask curtains, indeed! that's all very fine, but you know I can't afford that kind of thing just now!" "Yet the world credits you with a splendid income!" "Ah, yes," says my friend, "but do you know, at present I am obliged to spend it nearly all in steel-traps?" "Steel-traps! for whom?" "Why, for that fellow on the other side the wall, you know: we're very good friends, capital friends; but we are obliged to keep our traps set on both sides of the wall; we could not possibly keep on friendly terms without them and our spring guns. The worst of it is, we are both clever fellows enough; and there's never a day passes that we don't find out a new trap, or a new gun barrel, or something; we spend about fifteen millions a year each in our traps, take it all together; and I don't see how we're to do with less?" A highly comic state of life for two private gentlemen! but for two nations, it seems to me, not wholly comic. Bedlam would be comic, perhaps, if there were only one madman in it; and your Christmas pantomime is comic when there is only one clown in it; but when the whole world turns clowns, and paints itself red with its own heart's blood instead of vermilion, it is something else than comic, I think.

Ruskin.

12,188. WAR, Weapons of. Cannon and fire arms are cruel and damnable machines; I believe them to have been the direct suggestion of the devil. Against the flying ball no valor avails; the soldier is dead ere he sees the means of his destruction. If Adam had seen in a vision the horrible instruments his children were to invent, he would have died of grief.

Luther.

12,189. WARFARE, Christian. At one time a detachment of English soldiers under Sir Philip Sydney was called to meet a much more numerous force of the enemy. Their commander sent them word that if they would each fight an enemy he would take care of all the rest. Christ proposes to do better than this. He gives us strength to fight all our battles, retrieves our reverses, and gains the victory beyond a peradventure. (Matt. 28: 20.)

12,190. WARFARE, Constant. When the warriors in the old heroic days had no human enemies with whom to fight, they employed their time in fighting with wild beasts. Thus Theseus, desiring to keep himself in action, went forth against the Marathonian bull, which had wrought immense mischief to the inhabitants of Tetrapsus. We should keep our armor bright by constant fighting.

Anon.

12,191. WARFARE, Life's. Our life is a warfare: and we ought not, while passing through it, to sleep without a sentinel, or march without a scout. He who neglects either of these precautions exposes himself to surprise, and to become a prey to the diligence and perseverance of his adversary.

Feltham.

12,192. WARNING, Angry at a. A pilot guiding a steamer down the Cumberland saw a light, apparently from a small craft, in the middle of the narrow channel. His impulse was to disregard the signal and run down the boat. As he came near, a voice shouted: "Keep off, keep off." In great anger he cursed what he supposed to be a boatman in his way. On arriving at his next landing he learned that a huge rock had fallen from the mountain into the bed of the stream, and that a signal was placed there to warn the coming boats of the unknown danger. Alas! many regard God's warnings in the same way, and are angry with any who tell them of the rocks in their course. They will understand better at the end.

12,193. WARNING, Disregard of. The night before Cæsar's death his wife dreamed that their house had fallen and wounded her husband, and that he sought refuge in her arms. The armor of Mars, then Cæsar's by virtue of office, rattled upon the wall, and the door of his sleeping-room opened of itself. The omens from the feeding of poultry were unfavorable, and he resolved to stay in doors that day. The senate met, among them the conspirators, with concealed daggers, waiting for Cæsar. A messenger from them announced the readiness of the senate to receive him, but he still lingered. Decemus Brutus then went to Cæsar, and persuaded him to accompany him to the senate-house. On the way, a paper was put into his hands, which revealed the plot for his assassination, which he thrust into the folds of his robe unread. He passed a soothsayer, who had warned him to beware of the Ides of March, and said, "You see the day you feared has come, and I am still alive." He answered, "Yes, it has come, but it has not yet passed." As he passed his own statue, which stood at the entrance of the senate-house, it fell, and was broken into fragments. As he entered, the senators rose, received him with honor, and welcomed him; but it was to the banquet of death! At a signal, the conspirators gathered about him. Cæsar struck the first blow. Then dagger after dagger was plunged into Cæsar's body. Seeing Brutus, whom he much loved, ready to strike, he cried, "You, too, Brutus, my son?" and submitted to his fate. Had he kept his resolution, and stayed at home; had he read the paper, or regarded the warning of the soothsayer, he would have escaped. How many warnings the sinner disregards in rushing upon his doom!

12,194. WARNING, Kindness of. That father who sees his son tottering toward the brink of a precipice, and, as he sees him, cries out sharply, "Stop, stop!"—does not that father love his son? That tender mother who sees her infant on the point of eating some poisonous berry, and cries out sharply, "Stop, stop! put it down!"—does not that mother love that child? It is indifference that lets people alone, and allows them to go on every one in his own way. It is love, tender love, that warns and raises the cry of alarm. The cry of "Fire! fire!" at midnight may sometimes startle a man out of his sleep, rudely, harshly, unpleasantly. But who would complain if that cry was the means of saving his life? The words, "Except ye repent, ye shall perish," may seem at first sight stern and severe. But they are words of love, and may be the means of delivering precious souls from hell.

Ryle.

12,195. WARNING, Noah's. An Oriental legend says that God ordered Noah to make an instrument of wood, such as is used to this day in the East instead of bells, to call the people to church, and directed him to strike upon it three times every day to call the people together at the place where the ark was building, and to warn them of the impending deluge, from which they could escape only by repentance.

12,196. WARNING, Unheeded. A great fire was raging in one of our cities, in which Bishop Janes was passing the night. The continued alarms and lurid glare called him forth to the scene of the fire. On a housetop near the conflagration, were two men, extinguishing every spark that might alight. They had gained this by passing over other roofs, and there was no other means of escape but as they came. The flames made rapid progress. So busy were the two men as not to observe or think of their danger. The crowd below saw them and sent up a great cry of alarm. The imperiled men did not even now understand that they were being warned. A few minutes more and a roof fell, cutting off all retreat. The flames hastened in their destructive work, till the men bound in by fire sought in vain for escape. Oh, worldling! be warned in time, before you are encircled with inevitable doom.

12,197. WATCHFULNESS, Adaptation to. Man is a movable watch tower. His telescopes, placed upon the highest point, are easily made to sweep the whole horizon. Here man is given the strict order, "Watch." He cannot desert his post, but he may sleep in it. Foes may be expected from any quarter. Vigilance is his only safeguard.

12,198. WATCHFULNESS, Demand for. A friend was recently overtaken by night on a mountain ridge. The path behind was too perilous to be retraced in the darkness, and the way in front was stopped by a projecting rock, which in his exhausted state he could not scale. His only alternative was to wait for the morning. But his resting-place was a steep slope, ending in a sheer precipice. One careless movement might prove his destruction. As the darkness deepened, the danger was disguised. With a lessening sense of peril, there came on increasing drowsiness. What efforts were his during those long hours to drive off sleep! How he had to stir up his mind to a conviction of the necessity of unremitting vigilance! For, should he once be overpowered, he might unconsciously slide down his sloping couch, and be hurled into the valley below. Such is our position. If we would not fall down the precipice, let us watch lest during slumber we slip along the treacherous incline.

Newman Hall.

12,199. WATCHFULNESS, Examples of. When a flock of rooks light on a field, foraging, they often set one of their number on a tree or the fence, to watch when any one approaches, and call alarm. At sea a sailor is sent to the mast-head to look out, and tell when the sail of another ship appears in sight, or distant land comes in view; especially at night and in storm, lest the vessel suddenly strike some other bark, or on a floating iceberg, or rush among the breakers. In these cases there is watching against evil.

Edmond.

12,200. WATCHFULNESS, Fable of. A doe that had but one eye used to graze near the sea, and that she might be the more secure from attack, kept her eye towards the land against the approach of the hunters, and her blind side towards the sea, whence she feared no danger. But some sailors rowing by in a boat and seeing her, aimed at her from the water and shot her. When at her last gasp, she sighed to herself, "Ill-fated creature that I am! I was safe on the land side, whence I expected to be attacked, but find an enemy in the sea, to which I most looked for protection."

Æsop.

12,201. WATCHFULNESS, Need of Prayerful. Watch, for your passions are strong. Deal by yourselves as men deal by themselves who carry dynamite to and fro. A man who is laden with explosive materials does not go into foundries and blacksmith shops. He does not resort to places where sparks are flying abroad. He seeks safe ways. He avoids places of peril. He is conscious all the time that he is carrying death about himself if he exposes it to the touch of fire. When they were storing that great cavern of Hell Gate with explosive tubes there were to be three thousand handled by two hundred or a hundred and fifty men; and they all knew that if any man dropped one the whole would explode in a moment and they would perish; and with what care and circumspection did every man of them labor! If it did not turn the hair of the superintendent gray it ought to have done it, to watch the work! Now, if men felt that they were bearing explosive materials within them, if they had a sense of the training that is needed in certain parts of their nature, and if they joined training to prayer, then they might hope to have some answer to their petitions.

Beecher.

12,202. WATCHFULNESS, Security of. Souls, you are no longer safe and secure than when you are upon your watch. While Antipater kept the watch, Alexander was safe; and while we keep a strict watch, we are safe. A watchful soul is a soul upon the wing, a soul out of gun-shot, a soul upon a rock, a soul in a castle, a soul above the clouds, a soul held fast in everlasting arms.

Brooks.

12,203. WATCHING, Ceaseless. Alexander, founder of the Acœmeti, or Sleepless Ones, established his community of monks at Gomon on the Bosphorus, A. D. 430. They numbered three hundred, and were divided into six choirs, who sang alternately. Night and day ceaselessly their songs of praise ascended to Christ. They sang and watched continually for the coming of the Bridegroom. This ceaseless song and vigil was the characteristic of this order.

12,204. WATCHING, Neglect of. A ship was swept by a restless storm upon a rocky coast. A passenger asked if there was any hope of safety, and being told that there was none, threw himself into his berth in despair. Just before the ship struck, it was lifted over a reef of rocks by a huge wave and left upon a sandbar. On the instant the captain and crew escaped in safety to the shore. The passenger was lost because he did not watch.

12,205. WATER, Costly. It is related of Sons, an early Lacedæmonian king, that he and his army were cut off by his enemy from his water supply. He agreed to give up all his conquests, provided himself and all his army should drink of a certain spring. The conditions being accepted, he offered to give his kingdom to any one of his forces who would forbear drinking. Not one was willing to pay such a trifling price, even for a kingdom. The king himself went to the spring, sprinkled his face, but did not drink, and thus saved his kingdom.

12,206. WATER, Dying for. A party of men riding through a country where there was water for neither man nor beast, came suddenly into the neighborhood of a river. The jaded horses sprang forward with new life, and plunged into the stream. Not far away they found a woman and exhausted man overcome by thirst. When found, he could only whisper, "Water! water!" It was brought to him, and every care was taken to secure his recovery. All must have died but for the water. One was worse off than the others. This is a parable of the "living waters." All must have it; all may have it. Some must help others to get it.

12,207. WATER, Price of. Water in the Orient is scarce, and hard to be obtained. He who owns a fountain sells the water, and often asks an extortionous price. Quarrels arise, and wars have been waged for water. The poor might be unable to buy it, but Christ invites all to living water "without money and without price."

12,208. WEAK, Encouragement to the. The babes in a family are as much loved and thought of as the elder brothers and sisters. The tender seedlings in a garden are as diligently looked after as the old trees. The lambs in a flock are as carefully tended by the good shepherd as the old sheep. Oh! rest assured it is just the same in Christ's family, in Christ's garden, in Christ's flock. All are loved. All are tenderly thought of. All are cared for. And all shall be found in his garner at last.

Ryle.

12,209. WEAKNESS, Biblical Figures of. A bruised reed—a thing at the best pliable—weak—powerless to resist; much more a reed when bruised and drooping, Isa. 42: 3; Matt. 12: 20. Babes—little children, 1 Cor. 3: 1; 13: 11; Heb. 5: 13; 1 Pet. 2: 2; 1 John 2: 13. Lambs, Isa. 40: 11; John 21: 15 (the word here means little delicate lambs). Doves—turtle doves, timid and trembling, Ps. 74: 19. Worms, Isa. 41: 14. "Jacob" in his low estate—"thou worm Jacob," feeble and trampled upon, yet acknowledged by God—"worms" but not vipers. God's "little ones," so called twice in Zechariah and four times in St. Matthew.

Bowes.

12,210. WEAKNESS, Strength in. Some living creatures maintain their hold by foot or body on flat surfaces, by a method that seems like magic, and with a tenacity that amazes the observer. A fly marches at ease with feet uppermost on a plastered ceiling, and a mollusc sticking to the smooth, water-worn surface of a basaltic rock, while the long swell of the Atlantic at every pulse sends a huge white billow, roaring and hissing, and cracking and crunching over it, are objects of wonder to the on-looker. That apparently super-natural solidity is the most natural thing in the world. It is emptiness that imparts so much strength to these feeble creatures. A vacuum, on the one side within a web-foot, and on the other within the shell, is the secret of their power. By dint of that emptiness in itself, the creature quietly and easily clings to the wall or the rock, so making all the strength of the wall or rock its own. By its emptiness it is held fast; the moment it becomes full it drops off. Ah, it is the self-emptiness of a humble, trustful soul, that makes the Redeemer's strength his own, and so keeps him safe in an evil world.

Arnot.

12,211. WEAKNESS, Upheld by Grace. A noble vessel, in the year 1800, appeared off the Goodwin sands with signals of distress. She had been for some time making signals for a pilot, and having been observed on shore, a small skiff put off with an experienced one on board. But before it could reach her, she was driven on the sands, and became a wreck. The well-piloted little skiff escaped the dangers, and returned safely to port. So, weakness, upheld by almighty grace, is safe—while the strongest without it must fail.

Salter.

12,212. WEALTH, Acquisition of. Wealth is not acquired, as many persons suppose, by fortunate speculations and splendid enterprises, but by the daily practice of industry, frugality and economy. He who relies upon these means will rarely be found destitute, and he who relies upon any other will generally become bankrupt.

Wayland.

12,213. WEALTH, Covenant for. There are some who made a covenant with God, saying, "Verily, if he give us of his abundance we will give alms." It is said that Mohammed wrote this to cover the case of Thalaba Eben Hateb, who came to him desiring that he would pray God to bestow riches upon him. The people dissuaded him, telling him that wealth would only increase his temptations or induce covetousness. But Thalaba repeated his request, and made the most solemn promise that he would use his riches for charity and religion. His desire was granted, and in a short time Thalaba became very rich. Mohammed sent collectors to him to solicit his proportion of alms, but he found some excuse and sent them away empty. His greed led him to break his vow. It is the usual way. Mohammed says, "When he had given unto them of his abundance they became covetous thereof. They failed to perform unto God that which they had promised. God shall scoff at them, and they shall suffer a grievous punishment."

12,214. WEALTH without Heaven. A nobleman invited the neighboring minister one day to dine with him. Before dinner they walked into the garden, and after viewing the various productions and rarities with which it abounded, the host exclaimed, "Well, Mr. D—, you see I want for nothing; I have all that my heart can wish for." As the minister made no reply, but appeared thoughtful, his lordship asked him the reason. "Why, my lord," said the old man, "I have been thinking that a man may have all these things, and never see heaven after all." These words led to the conversion of the nobleman.

12,215. WEALTH, Imperishable. Aristippus having lost all his goods by shipwreck, found his knowledge adequate to supply his wants. He sent this counsel to his friends, "I advise you to procure such riches for your children as a tempest at sea has no power over."

12,216. WEALTH, Poverty of. Cornelius Vanderbilt, though not the rich possessor of a world, had acquired the largest fortune ever gained by an American: estimated at $100,000,000. Around his dying bed his friends sang at his request, "Come, ye sinners, poor and needy, weak and wounded, sick and sore." He often repeated, "I am poor and needy." Thus the hundred-millionaire seeks true riches in Christ.

12,217. WEALTH, Uncertainty of. A storm at sea, a spark of fire, an unfaithful servant, a false oath, or a treacherous friend, may quickly bring a man to sit with Job upon a dunghill. Look, as the bird flies from tree to tree, and as the beggar goes from door to door, and as the pilgrim travels from place to place, and as the physician walks from patient to patient; so all the riches, honors, and glory of this world do either fly from man to man, or else walk from man to man. Now one is exalted, and anon he is debased; now one is full, and anon he is hungry; now one is clothed gloriously, and anon he is clothed with rags; now one is at liberty, and anon he is under restraint; now a man hath many friends, and anon he hath never a friend. There is nothing but vanity and uncertainty in all earthly portions.

Brooks.

12,218. WEDDING, A Jewish Custom at a. The Jews had a custom at their wedding feasts for the married couple to drink out of the same glass together, and then to break it in pieces; teaching them, by that emblem, that whatever felicity they expected together, their lives, upon which it all depended, were frail and brittle as glass. No sooner joined, but they were warned to prepare for separation.

Buck.

12,219. WELCOME, Custom of. In Pompeii the custom was to place a caged magpie in the vestibule of the houses, who was taught to salute the visitors with the word "χαίρε," "Hail." The Romans used to have the word "Salve," Hail, inscribed upon the titles of their entrance halls.

12,220. WICKED, Brief Life of the. "The wicked shall not live out half their days." The case of murders is almost a literal proof of the text. It is very seldom that a convicted murderer has reached the age of thirty-five, and they are almost always men of great vitality. We have collected a list, taking them as they came, from the newspapers of recent months

We noted fifty cases (taking no pains to get all), and not one of the fifty was over thirty-five. D. H. Wheeler.

12,221. WICKED, Desires of the. They are mere flashes; as a sudden light, that rather blinds a man than shews him the way. So these enlightenings—they are not constant. Wicked men often have sudden motions and flashes and desires. "Oh, that I might die the death of the righteous." Oh, that I were in such a man's estate. But it is but a sudden flash and lightning. They are like a torrent, a strong sudden stream, that comes suddenly and makes a noise, but it hath no spring to feed it. The desires of God's children—they are fed with a spring, they are constant, they are streams, and not flashes. Sibbs.

12,222. WICKED, Destruction of the. If the wicked flourish, and thou suffer, be not discouraged; they are fatted for destruction, thou art dieted for health. Fuller.

12,223. WICKED, Envyng the. "Their end was bitter as the smoke," said an aged teacher. "What meanest thou, O, master?" asked his young disciple. "I was thinking of the unrighteous," replied the old man, "and of how too often I, like the Psalmist, have been envious when they were in prosperity. Their lives have seemed so bright and glowing that I have thought they resembled the blaze of a cheerful fire on a winter night. But as I have watched them, they have suddenly vanished, like the flame that fades into black and bitter smoke, and I have ceased to envy them. Trust not, O, my scholars, only to that which appears brilliant, but watch also for its ending, lest thou be deceived."

12,224. WICKED, Prosperity of the. Prescott says, "One of the most important festivals was that in honor of the god Tezcathepola, whose rank was inferior only to the Supreme Being. He was called 'the soul of the world,' and supposed to have been its creator. He was depicted as a handsome man, endowed with perpetual youth. A year before the intended sacrifice, a captive, distinguished for his personal beauty, and without a blemish on his body, was selected to represent this deity. Certain tutors took charge of him, and instructed him how to perform his new part with becoming grace and dignity. He was arrayed in a splendid dress, regaled with incense, and with a profusion of sweet-scented flowers, of which the Mexicans were as fond as their descendants of the present day. When he went abroad he was attended by a train of the royal pages, and as he halted in the street to play some favorite melody, the crowd prostrated themselves before him, and did him homage as the representative of their good deity. In this way he led an easy, luxurious life, till within a month of his sacrifice. Four beautiful girls, bearing the names of the principal goddesses, were then selected; with them he lived in idle dalliance, and feasted at the banquets of the principal nobles, who paid him all the honor of a divinity. At length the fatal day of sacrifice arrived—the term of his short-lived glories was at an end; he was stripped of his gaudy apparel, and bade adieu to the fair partners of his revelries. One of the royal barges transported him across the lake to a temple which rose on its margin: hither the inhabitants of the capital flocked to witness the consummation of the ceremony. As the sad procession wound up the sides of the pyramid, the unhappy victim threw away his gay chaplet of flowers, and broke in pieces the musical instruments with which he had solaced the hours of his captivity. On the summit he was received by six priests, whose long and matted locks flowed disorderly over their sable robes covered with hieroglyphic scrolls of mystic import. They led him to the sacrificial stone, a huge block of jasper, with its upper surface somewhat convex: on this the prisoner was stretched. Five priests secured his head and his limbs; while the sixth, clad in a scarlet mantle, emblematic of his bloody office, dexterously opened the breast of his wretched victim with a sharp razor, made of a volcanic substance, hard as flint—and inserting his hand in the wound, tore out the palpitating heart. The minister of death, first holding this up towards the sun, an object of worship through Anahuac, cast it at the feet of the deity to whom the temple was devoted, while the multitude below prostrated themselves in humble adoration. The tragic story of this prisoner was expounded by the priests as the type of human destiny, which, brilliant in its commencement, too often closes in sorrow and disaster." Thus far the historian—I rather view the tragedy as typical of the ungodly, who abounding in wealth, and, using it for the gratification of all their carnal appetites, are really only like oxen fattening for their slaughter. F. F. Trench.

12,225. WICKED, Punishment of the. A wicked Austrian nobleman lived to the advanced age of ninety-three, and had not in all that time been visited with either grief or affliction. Frederick the Third on hearing of his death said, "This is what divines teach, that after death there is some place where we receive reward or punishment, since we see often in this world neither the just rewarded, nor the wicked punished."

12,226. WICKED, Restraining the. "My hook in thy nose!" What an expressive phrase is this. A bull with a hook in its nose can be led even by a little child. The ferocity of the animal is untamed, his might and strength remain as they were before, but he is powerless; the least plunge or struggle is restrained by the pain of the hook or ring. Thus the Lord often controls wicked men; He leaves them their ferocity of nature, but so puts them under restraint, and that by apparently unimportant means, that they cannot hurt his people. We must not so much look for the changing of the bull's nature, as for the putting the hook in his nose. Power.

12,227. WICKED, Vain Expectations of the. Not many years ago a dissolute young man of large fortune made an attempt upon the life of ar actress, and immediately destroyed his own life. In a letter written by him before the perpetration of these foul deeds, he signified his deliberate intention of thus committing a double murder, and that he and his intended victim might go to heaven together, and remarks that he was in a state of ecstatic joy at the prospect! Here was a debauchee, a frequenter of theatres, a murderer, a suicide, and yet anticipating the rewards of heaven! Nor does this wretched man's case afford as exaggerated a view as might be supposed, of the delusive hopes of heaven which are entertained by multitudes. In my own ministerial experience, I have known a case almost as gross; and what are the generality of men doing in places where the gospel is faithfully preached, but living in known sin, and still expecting to go to heaven at last? F. F. Trench.

12,228. WIFE, Benefit of a Cross. Xanthippe, though she was a woman of a very troublesome spirit, could never move Socrates to a passion. Being accustomed to bear patiently this heavy burden at home, he was never in the least moved by the most scurrilous and abusive tongues he met with abroad. Plutarch.

12,229. WIFE, A Good. A good wife is heaven's last best gift to a man; his angel of mercy; minister of graces innumerable; his gem of many virtues; his casket of jewels; her voice, his sweetest music; her smiles, his brightest day; her kiss, the guardian of his innocence; her arms, the pale of his safety, the balm of his health, the balsam of his life; her industry, his surest wealth; her economy, his safest steward; her lips, his faithful counselors; her bosom, the softest pillow of his cares; and her prayers, the ablest advocates of heaven's blessing on his head.

Jeremy Taylor.

12,230. WIFE a Plague. Pittacus, celebrated for fortitude, wisdom, and justice, gave a banquet to several friends, when his wife entered in ill-humor and overturned the table. His guests were greatly surprised and annoyed; but he said, "Every one of you hath his particular plague, and my wife is mine, and he is very happy who hath this only."

12,231. WIFE, A Rich. As there is little or no use to be made of a mirror, though in a frame of gold, enchased with all the sparkling variety of the richest gems, unless it render back the true similitude of the image it receives; so is there nothing of profit in a wealthy dowry, unless the conditions, the temper, the humor of the wife be conformable to the natural dispositions and inclination of the husband, and he sees the virtues of his own mind exactly represented in hers. Plutarch.

12,232. WILLFULNESS, Fate of. An ass that was being driven along the road by his master, started on ahead, and leaving the beaten track, made as fast as he could for the edge of a precipice. When he was just on the point of falling over, his master ran up, and seizing him by the tail, endeavored to pull him back; but the ass resisting and pulling the contrary way, the man let go his hold, saying, "Well, Jack, if you will be master I cannot help it. A willful beast must go his own way." Æsop.

12,233. WILL, Need of. In the schools of the wrestling master, when a boy falls he is bidden to get up again, and go on wrestling day by day till he has acquired strength; and we must do the same, and not be like those poor wretches who, after one failure, suffer themselves to be swept along as by a torrent. You need but will, and it is done; but if you relax your efforts, you will be ruined; for ruin and recovery are both from within. Epictetus.

12,234. WILL, Responsibility of. The inward principle to the outward act is as the kernel to the shell; but yet, in the first place, the shell is necessary for the kernel, and that by which it is commonly known; and in the next place, as the shell comes first, and the kernel grows gradually, and hardens within it, so it is with the moral principle in man. Legality precedes morality in every individual, even as the Jewish dispensation preceded the Christian in the education of the world at large. When may the will be taken for the deed? When the will is the obedience of the whole man; when the will is, in fact, the deed, that is, all the deed in our power. In every other case, it is bending the bow without shooting the arrow. The bird of paradise gleams on the lofty branch, and the man takes aim and draws the tough yew into a crescent with might and main! and lo! there is never an arrow on the string! Coleridge.

12,235. WISDOM, Counsel of. Delay hath undone many for the other world. Haste hath undone more for this. Time, well managed, saves all in both. Anon.

12,236. WISDOM, Deliverance by. Anaximenes, met Alexander when he was marching to destroy Lampsacus. Alexander, suspecting that Anaximenes was coming to intercede for the safety of the city, immediately resolved to frustrate his purpose by taking an oath that he would not grant him anything that he should ask. "Then," said Anaximenes, "I request that you will destroy this city." Alexander was thus outwitted, but he respected his oath, and the city was spared. Thus it was the wisdom of one man which, by suddenly taking advantage of Alexander's oath, saved a noble city from destruction. Solomon could not, of course, have this instance in view, because he lived long before it occurred; but he might have others in view equally true. His design was to show that in this life virtue and wisdom may perform the most important services, and yet often be unrewarded; and hence the certainty of a future life, when God will render to every man according to his deeds. W. Cooke.

12,237. WISDOM, Essentials of. Living in an age of extraordinary events and revolutions, I have learned from thence this truth, which I desire might thus be communicated to posterity:—that all is vanity which is not honest, and that there is no solid wisdom but in real piety. Evelyn's Epitaph, by himself.

12,238. WISDOM, Particulars of. Perfect wisdom hath four parts, viz.: wisdom, the principle of doing things aright; justice, the principle of doing things equally in public and private; fortitude, the principle of not flying danger, but meeting it; and temperance, the principle of subduing desires, and living moderately.

Plato.

12,239. WISDOM, Seeking. A gentleman who was afterwards for many years a clergyman of distinguished acceptance in the church of England, one day called upon Dr. James Foster to converse with him upon the skepticism which then oppressed his own mind. After the necessary introduction, he began to state his objections, when the doctor, with the benevolent gravity for which he was so distinguished, stopped him with this question, "Have you asked a solution of your difficulties from God this morning? Have you prayed to the Fountain of all light for information?" Upon receiving an answer in the negative, he rejoined, "Sir, you will excuse my gratifying your curiosity on the subject of the revelation, while you are chargeable with the breach of the first duties of natural religion."

12,240. WISDOM, Spouse of. Laurence Justinian, bishop of Venice in the fifteenth century, was called in a special manner to consecrate himself to the service of God. In his nineteenth year he saw in a vision eternal wisdom in the dress of a damsel of charming countenance. She addressed him, saying, "Why seekest thou rest to thy mind, out of thyself sometimes in this object and sometimes in that? What thou desirest is to be found only with me; behold, it is in my hands. Seek it in me who am the wisdom of God. By taking me for thy spouse thou shalt be possessed of inestimable treasure." That instant he was overcome by her attractions and resolved to possess her. He was of the best family in Venice, and honor and preferment lay before him. He placed on one side honors, riches, worldly pleasures, on the other hardships, poverty and self-denial. Then he said to his soul, "Hast thou courage, my soul, to despise these delights, and devote thyself to a life of cross-bearing and mortifications?" Casting himself upon Christ for strength, he espoused wisdom. On his dying bed he said, "Behold the spouse; let us go forth and meet him," and added, "Good Jesus: behold I come."

12,241. WISHES, Ignorance of our Own. I respect the man who knows distinctly what he wishes. The greater part of all the mischief in the world arises from the fact that men do not sufficiently understand their own aims. They have undertaken to build a tower, and spend no more labor on the foundation than would be necessary to erect a hut.

Goethe.

12,242. WIT, Acquirement of. It is imagined that wit is a sort of inexplicable visitation, that it comes and goes with the rapidity of lightning, and that it is quite as unattainable as beauty or just proportion. I am so much of a contrary way of thinking, that I am convinced a man might sit down as systematically, and as successfully, to the study of wit, as he might to the study of mathematics: and I would answer for it, that by giving up only six hours a day to being witty, he should come on prodigiously before mid-summer, so that his friends should hardly know him again.

S. Smith.

12,243. WIT, Example of. Two cardinals up-braided Raphael Urbanus, for representing St. Peter and St. Paul with high color. He replied that he had not painted them in such a paleness and leanness in their faces as they had contracted while living, with their fastings and troubles; but that he had imitated that redness which came upon them now they were amongst the blessed, where they blushed at the manners and life of their successors."

12,244. WIT, Greek. "There, my lad," said an Athenian once to a little Hebrew boy, by the way of joke, "here is a pruta (a small coin, of less value than a farthing); bring me something for it, of which I may eat enough, leave some for my host, and carry some home to my family." The witty boy went and brought him salt. "Salt," exclaimed the Athenian; "I did not tell thee to bring salt!" "Nay," replied the boy, archly, "didst thou not say, 'Bring me of what I may eat, leave, and take some home?' Verily, of this thou mayest eat, leave some behind, and still have plenty to carry home."

Medrash Eloh.

12,245. WIT, Shallowness of. Wonder why authors and actors are ashamed of being funny? Why, there are obvious reasons, and deep philosophical ones. The clown knows very well that the women are not in love with him, but with Hamlet, the fellow in the black coat and plumed hat. Passion never laughs. The wit knows that his place is at the tail of the procession. If you want the deep, underlying reason, I must take more time to tell it. There is a perfect consciousness in every form of wit—using that term in its general sense—that its essence consists in a partial and incomplete view of whatever it touches. It throws a single ray, separated from the rest—red, yellow, blue, or any intermediate shade—upon an object; never white light; that is the province of wisdom. We get beautiful effects from wit—all the prismatic colors—but never the object, as it is in fair daylight. A pun, which is a kind of wit, is a different and much shallower trick in mental optics; throwing the shadows of two objects so that one overlies the other. Poetry uses the rainbow tints for special effects, but always keeps its essential object in the purest white light of truth.

12,246. WITNESS, A Royal. Herodotus says that at the battle of Salamis Xerxes took his position on Mount Ægaleas, overlooking the fight. Whenever he saw any of his own men performing deeds of valor, he inquired who they were, and caused his scribes to write down their names and residences. On this record the reward would be bestowed in due time. We are a spectacle to men, angels and to God, and the record of our lives is being made up.

12,247. WITNESS, An Unexpected. A legend of St. Severus of the fifth century states that a bath-house keeper brought suit against the widow of one of his deceased patrons for a large sum, which he affirmed her husband owed him at the time of his death. The judge approved the claim and ordered that the widow and her children should be sold to pay it. The widow fled to St. Severus and besought protection against this extortion. He asked her if the deceased owed the bath-keeper anything. She thought there might have been a trifling debt, but not so large a sum. The saint said, "The dead man himself shall give evidence."

He took his staff and went to the tomb of the dead man and called upon him to answer him truly how much he owed the bath keeper. Then the corpse opened its eyes, and rose and said, "I owe but one egg;" then fell back again as rigid as before. At the Almighty summons witnesses shall arise on the day of judgment against all sinners.

12,248. WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT, Doctrine of. Wilson condenses from Rev. C. Prest, some testimonies to this doctrine. Novatian, A. D. 250, in his work on the Trinity, speaks very distinctly of the Holy Ghost as the author of regeneration; the pledge of the promised inheritance, and, as it were, the handwriting of eternal salvation. Chrysostom, A. D. 398, teaches that the testimony declared Romans 8: 16, "is not the voice of the gift or grace which is conferred upon us, but of the comforting Spirit, inwardly assuring us that we are the sons of God." Bernard, A. D. 1115, in Sermon V., "That which lieth hid concerning us in the heart of the Father, may by his Spirit be revealed unto us; and the same Spirit, testifying unto us, may persuade our spirits that we are the sons of God." Calvin, A. D. 1539, on Romans 8: 16, says, "St. Paul means, that the Spirit of God gives such a testimony to us, that he being our guide and teacher, our spirit perceives our adoption of God to be certain. For our own mind, of itself, independent of the preceding testimony of the Spirit, could not produce this persuasion in us. For whilst the Spirit witnesses that we are the sons of God, he at the same time inspires this confidence in our minds."

12,249. WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT, Testimony to the. Owen, A. D. 1657, on communion with God; "The Spirit worketh joy in the hearts of believers immediately by himself, without the consideration of any other acts or works of his, or the interpositions of any reasonings, or deductions, or conclusions. This does not arise from our reflex consideration of the love of God, but rather gives occasion thereunto. He so sheds abroad the love of God in our hearts, and fills them with gladness by an immediate act and operation." And again: "The Comforter comes; and by a word of promise, or otherwise, overpowers the heart with a comfortable persuasion, (and bears down all objections,) that he is a child of God." Isaac Ambrose, A. D. 1652, in his "Middle Things:" "The Spirit gives a distinct witness of his own, which is his immediate work, and is in a way of peculiarity and transcendency called, 'the witness of the Spirit.' And this evidence is solitary, without reference to inherent graces; yet, however, it excludes them not." In the confession of faith issued by the assembly of divines, under the article Assurance, in the third edition, 1688, we read: "This certainly is not a bare conjectural and probable persuasion, but an infallible assurance of faith, founded upon the testimony of the spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirit that we are the children of God."

C. Prest.

12,250. WIVES, Disciplining. It is not surprising that in the establishment of an African with several wives, there should sometimes occur "family jars." When these are so serious as to defy the authority of the master of the house, which is not unfrequently the case, recourse is had to an institution called Mumbo Jumbo. This is a person unknown, with a mask on his face, a staff in his hand, and robed in a singular dress made of the bark of a tree. When he is seen entering a village in the dusk of the evening, and approaching the bentang, where the people are assembling for their usual amusements, great is the curiosity excited as to the parties who may have occasioned the visit of the mysterious personage. There are many palpitations and heart-searchings among the ladies whose consciences tell them that they have not been remarkably loving, mild and pacific in their respective families. At length Mumbo Jumbo, with unerring aim, seizes upon the unfortunate vixen to be punished for her misconduct. He strips her naked, ties her to a post, and severely beats her with his rod till she cries for mercy, and promises not to offend again, whilst the bystanders of both sexes look on with derisive bursts of laughter, and shouts of savage joy, forgetting that their turn to be punished may soon come. This Mumbo Jumbo may be the husband of the lady thus chastised, or it may be his friend whose services have been engaged for the occasion. Having executed his office in perfect disguise, he retires in the darkness of the night, takes of his dress, and hangs it up in a tree near the village, where it remains suspended, in terrorem, as a standing warning to unruly wives. Some of the African ladies think there ought to be instituted a Mumbo Jumbo for naughty husbands as well as disobedient wives.

12,251. WOMAN, Ornaments of. Crates said, "That is ornament which adorns; and that adorns a woman which renders her more comely and decent. This is an honor conferred upon her, not by the lustre of gold, the sparkling of emeralds and diamonds, nor splendor of the purple tincture, but by the real embellishments of gravity, discretion, humility and modesty."

12,252. WOMAN, Perfection of. A beautiful and chaste woman is the perfect workmanship of God, the true glory of angels, the rare miracle of earth, and the sole wonder of the world.

Hermes.

12,253. WOMAN, Right of. Kings say they reign by divine right, and impiously stamp Rex Dei gratia upon innocent copper; but woman is the only sovereign who can justly use these words, and she may, "I am a woman by the grace of God." She alone rules by divine right.

Theodore Parker.

12,254. WOMAN, Sympathy of. A recent traveler says, "I have always remarked that women in all countries are civil, obliging, tender and humane. To a woman, whether civilized or savage, I never addressed myself in the language of decency and friendship without receiving a decent and friendly answer. With man it has often been otherwise. In wandering over the barren plains of inhospitable Denmark, through honest Sweden and frozen Lapland, rude and churlish Finland, unprincipled Russia, and the widespread regions of the wandering Tartar, if hungry, dry, cold, wet or sick, the women have ever been friendly to me, and uniformly so: and to add to this virtue (so worthy the appellation of benevolence), these actions have been performed in so free and kind a manner, that if I was dry, I drank the sweetest draught, and if hungry, I ate the coarsest morsel with a double relish."

12,255. WOMAN, Temptation of. Woman is often abused because Mother Eve did not throw the apple in the serpent's face, instead of being wheedled into eating it. But, if it had been offered to her precious spouse, he would not have stood there, Shall—I—shall I—ing? but would merely have said, "Apples, indeed! so early! Thank ye, Mister Snake!" and would have eaten it without thinking of conscience. Now, the sons of this biped pique themselves upon being men, not women.

Theodore Parker.

12,256. WOMEN, Heathen Hatred of. Cato the Censor had such a hatred for women that it was his common saying, "That if the world was without women, the conversation of men would not be exempt from the company of the gods." Hyppolitus said in Seneca that he hated, cursed, and detested them all. That water would dwell kindly with fire, or the morning light should brighten from the west, or wolves would lie down calmly with lambs, ere he would give over his hatred of the female sex.

12,257. WOMEN, Power of. Whatever may be the customs and laws of a country, the women of it decide the morals. Free or subjugated, they reign, because they hold possession of our passions. But their influence is more or less salutary, according to the degree of esteem which is granted them. Whether they are our idols or companions, courtesans or beasts of burthen, the reaction is complete, and they make us such as they are themselves. It seems as if Nature connected our intelligence with their dignity, as we connect our morality with their virtue. This, therefore, is a law of eternal justice: man cannot degrade woman without himself falling into degradation; he cannot raise them without himself becoming better. Let us cast our eyes over the globe, and observe those two great divisions of the human race, the East and the West. One half of the ancient world remains without progress or thought, and under the load of a barbarous cultivation; women there are slaves. The other half advances toward freedom and light: the women are loved and honored.

Martin.

12,258. WOMEN, Resolute. The Thessalonians were marching upon the Phocians with the announced intention of slaying all the men, and selling all the women and children into slavery. Diaphantus proposed that the men should fight the Thessalonians, and the women and children be gathered in one place and surrounded with combustibles whereby they might be burned to ashes, sooner than fall into the enemy's hands. The vote was taken, and women and children agreed to sacrifice themselves. The Phocians, joining battle at Cleone, fought desperately, remembering their wives and children, and won the victory. This resolution of the Phocian women was honored with a festival for many years.

12,259. WOMEN, Strength of. 'Tis a powerful sex; they were too strong for the first, the strongest and the wisest man that was; they must needs be strong when one hair of a woman can draw more than a hundred pair of oxen!

Howell.

12,260. WOMEN, Unmarried. I speculate much on the existence of unmarried and never-to-be-married women nowadays; and I have already got to the point of considering that there is no more respectable character on this earth than an unmarried woman, who makes her own way through life quietly, perseveringly, without support of husband or brother; and who retains in her possession a well-regulated mind, a disposition to enjoy simple pleasures, and fortitude to support inevitable pains, sympathy with the sufferings of others, and willingness to relieve want as far as her means extend.

Charlotte Brontë.

12,261. WOMEN, Usefulness of. Women, so amiable in themselves, are never so amiable as when they are useful; and as for beauty, though men may fall in love with girls at play, there is nothing to make them stand to their love like seeing them at work.

Cobbett.

12,262. WORD, The Divine. The divine person who has accomplished the salvation of mankind is called the Word, and the Word of God, Rev. 19: 13; not only because God at first created, and still governs all things, by him, but because, as men discover their sentiments and designs to one another by the intervention of words, speech, or discourse, so God by his Son discovers his gracious designs in the fullest and clearest manner to men.

Igdalia.

12,263. WORD, Influence of the. A tree which is fastened unto a wall, in which the heat of the sun is more permanent and united, will bring forth ripe fruit before the ordinary season: so a people upon whom the light of the gospel hath constantly shined, and which doth often drink in the rain which falleth upon it, must needs bring forth summer-fruit, sin-speedily ripe, and, therefore, be so much nearer unto cursing. There is but a year between such a tree and the fire. Bp. Reynolds.

12,264. WORD, Power of the. Though men were as hard as rocks, the Word is a hammer which can break them; though as sharp as thorns and briars the Word is a fire which can devour and torment them; though as strong as kingdoms and nations, the Word is able to root them up, and to pull them down; though as fierce as dragons and lions, the Word is able to trample upon them and chain them up.

Bp. Reynolds.

12,265. WORD, Sharpness of God's. The Jewish priest required a strong and skillful hand to do the ordinary work of his holy calling. It needed both strength and skill to lay the victim on the altar, to guide the sharp two-edged sacrificial knife straight through the carcass, till the very back-bone was severed, the whole laid bare, and the very joints and marrow exposed and separated. For this reason (as well as because he was a type of him who is perfect), because such persons ordinarily are deficient in bodily strength, no deformed person could be high priest, he could not do the work required of him. There is a knife sharper than that two-edged sword, and a hand to guide its blade and apply its edges and point, stronger and surer than the Jewish priest's. That knife is the Word of God: it is a "living" word; it has a power to lay open hearts far greater than that sacrificial knife had to lay bare the bodies of the sacrifice; its edge is sharper than that of the two-edged sword; and, when driven home and directed by the hand of the almighty Spirit, "it pierces even to the dividing asunder of the joints and marrow, the soul and spirit," and lays bare "the thoughts and intents of the heart."

W. W. Champneys.

12,266. WORDS, Choice of. I have first considered whether it be worth while to say a thing at all, before I have taken any trouble to say it well; knowing that words are but air, and that both are capable of much condensation. Words indeed are but the signs and counters of knowledge, and their currency should be strictly regulated by the capital which they represent.

Colton.

12,267. WORDS, Good and Evil. Dost thou not see how God putteth forth a parable, representing a good word as a good tree, whose root is firmly fixed in the earth and whose branches reach unto heaven, which bringeth forth its fruit at all seasons by the will of its Lord? And the likeness of an evil word is an evil tree, which is torn up from the face of the earth, and hath no stability.

Koran.

12,268. WORDS, Power of. Words, when well chosen, have so great a force in them, that a description often gives us more lively ideas than the sight of things themselves. The reader finds a scene drawn in stronger colors, and painted more to the life in his imagination, by the help of words, than by an actual survey of the scene which they describe.

Addison.

12,269. WORDS, Seasonable. It is a special piece of wisdom to improve the season of sickness for the good of thy neighbor's soul. When the wax is softened, then we clap the seal upon it, lest it harden again, and be incapable of any impression. When the hand of God hath by sickness made the heart of thy wicked friend or brother soft and tender, then do thy utmost to stamp the image of God upon it. Paul would preach whilst a door was open, and there was likelihood of doing good. It is a great encouragement to work, when the subject upon which we bestow our pains seems capable of what we prosecute, and probable to answer our labor. We have some heart to strike a nail into a board, because there is hope it will enter; but no list to drive a nail into a flint, because we despair of effecting it. The smith strikes when the iron is hot; he knoweth, if he should stay till it is cold, his labor would be in vain.

Swinnoek.

12,270. WORDS Seeds. Cast forth thy act, thy word, into the ever-living, ever-working universe: it is a seed-grain that cannot die; unnoticed to-day, it will be found flourishing as a banyan grove, perhaps, also, as a hemlock forest, after a thousand years.

Carlyle.

12,271. WORK, Adaptation to. Work is the key that has unlocked all the treasures throughout the centuries. Nature is a workshop. She carries on an infinite variety of activities. She has all tools. She has a bench and kit for every mortal, where the tools and the hands match. The misplacing of workmen and the mixing of tools are not her fault. To bring each to his own stall is no small part of the work to be done. Nature simply makes this possible by furnishing both the stalls and men.

Dr. C. H. Fowler.

12,272. WORK, Enthusiastic. The bulbous-headed fellows that steam well when they are at work, are the men that draw big audiences, and give us marrowy books and pictures. It is a good sign to have one's feet grow cold when he is writing. A great writer and speaker once told me that he often wrote with his feet in hot water; but for this, all his blood would have run into his head, as the mercury sometimes withdraws into the ball of a thermometer.

Browne.

12,273. WORK, Gospel of. The latest gospel in this world is, know thy work and do it. "Know thyself," long enough has that poor "self" of thine tormented thee; thou wilt never get to "know" it, I believe! Think it not thy business, this of knowing thyself: thou art an unknowable individual: know what thou canst work at, and work at it like a Hercules! That will be thy better plan.

Carlyle.

12,274. WORK, Happiness of. The only happiness a brave man ever troubled himself with asking much about was happiness enough to get his work done. Not "I can't eat!" but, "I can't work!"—that was the burden of all wise complaining among men. It is, after all, the one unhappiness of a man—that he cannot work; that he cannot get his destiny as a man fulfilled. Behold, the day is passing swiftly over, our life is passing swiftly away, and the night cometh, wherein no man can work. The night once come, our happiness, our unhappiness,—it is all abolished, vanished, clean gone; a thing that has been: “not of the slightest consequence” whether we were happy as enepctic Curtis, as the fattest pig of Epicurus, or unhappy as Job with pot-sheerds, as musical Byron with Giaours and sensibilities of the heart; as the unmusical meat-jack with hard labor and rust! But our work!—behold, that is not abolished, that has not vanished; our work, behold, it remains, or the want of it remains—for endless times and eternities, remains; and that is now the sole question with us for evermore! Brief brawling day, with its noisy phantasms, its poor paper crowns tinsel-gilt, is gone, and divine everlasting night, with her star-diadems, with her silences and her veracities, is come!

Carlyle.

12,275. WORK, Honest. St. Tylo, of Collogue, was educated as a goldsmith, and was noted for his skill, honesty, and piety. He wrought curious vessels, and set rare gems for the king. His motto was, “Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.” As he wrought he studied the Bible, which he always kept open before him. From the shop he was called to the office of an abbot. We want more saints in the workshops.

12,276. WORK, Incentive in. An ordinary mechanic, for instance a maker of musical instruments, would be much more attentive and pleased at his work if he knew that his harp would be touched by the famous Amphion, and in his hand serve for the builder of Thebes, or if that Thales had bespoke it, who was so great a master that by the force of his music he pacified a popular tumult amongst the Lacedæmonians.

Plutarch.

12,277. WORK, Influence of. Sir S. Romilly refused to speak in popular assemblies, confining himself to the House of Commons, where a measure can be carried by a speech. The business of the House of Commons is conducted by a few persons, but these are hard-worked. Sir Robert Peel “knew the Blue Books by heart.” His colleagues and rivals carry Hansard in their heads. The high civil and legal offices are not beds of ease, but posts which exact frightful amounts of mental labor. Many of the great leaders, like Pitt, Canning, Castlereagh, Romilly, are soon worked to death. They are excellent judges in England of a good worker, and when they find one, like Clarendon, Sir Philip Warwick, Sir William Coventry, Ashley, Burke, Thurlow, Mansfield, Pitt, Eldon, Peel, or Russell, there is nothing too good or too high for him.

Emerson.

12,278. WORK, Library of. The vast sum of inventions is an immense library, whose every page is some crowded, agonizing life-record. Step by step, up from barbarism to beauty and power, is the toiling march. Every inch that has been gained and held has been secured by some unresting soul. The multiplicity of achievements, from reapers for our harvest to gas for our streets, from spindles for our factories to cables for our oceans, all have a history of toil. The cook, the dentist, the doctor, the shoemaker, the tailor, the engineer, prepare better nutriments, better securities, and more abundant vitality. Old veins are filled with new blood, and old nerves with new electricity; but all this represents fifty years of harvest and fifty centuries of seed-time, and both are work-days.

Dr. C. H. Fowler.

12,279. WORK, Out-door. Perhaps there are some of my readers who do no out-of-door work for Christ, who neither plough the ground for him, nor feed his sheep. Ploughing is hard, and to our dainty notions, soiling work; and so we will not plough for Christ. It is hard work to lift one's foot in the heavy clay—to set it down often only to lift it up with greater difficulty still; nothing springs up immediately from the ploughing, the prospect of harvest gain must be remote, and so you plough not—and what, if neither shall you reap? Oh, if there were a speedy return for their toil, perhaps some of the Lord's people who now do nothing would undertake labor on his behalf. If, in the fields around us, as men turned up the furrow, the reaper overtook the sower, and the seed threw up its sprouts, beneath the ploughman's very steps, carpeting his feet with green; if, as they sweated in ploughing, the sprouts became headed with grain, and cooled the laborer's fevered brows with the breezes which undulated the waving corn, murmuring like the melodies of another world, amid the bending stalks, as slowly, and solemnly, and keeping time to the beat of some unseen hand, they sway to and fro—if this were the ploughman's lot, and ere the earth was reddened with the steel—man's toil on earth, it became gilded with the harvest—God's gift from heaven; daintier hands than any which now guide the plough would be engaged in the almost poetic toil; but such is not earthly ploughing, and such is not heavenly ploughing either; and because it is present labor with only a future profit, and present toil, and present offence to our fastidious tastes, some of the Lord's people are leaving his out-of-door work undone.

Power.

12,280. WORK, Physical. Dr. H. W. Warren says that a man doing his best work, shoveling sand, or pumping water, could do no more in his whole life time than could be accomplished by three tons of coal. His moral is that man had better go to the Allegheny mountains, dig out three tons of coal, and take his exit, if his only purpose is manual labor.

12,281. WORK, Test of. Work is the divine test of greatness. It is a quaint old law, as it stands in the New Testament, that the chiefest must serve most; but so it also stands in the order of the universe. We honor the men who serve most. In times of great national peril some man steps to the front and does a hero's work, and, whether he will or no, he must thereafter bear a hero's honors. Some man hews his way through all the walls of past ignorance, and discovers a new world or lays an ocean cable, and for his great service he must be rewarded. Serving most he becomes chiefest. How simple this makes all the questions of ambition and fame! The one thing that is always sure to be appreciated is work. Every man can afford to work, and take the consequences in due time.

Dr. C. H. Fowler.

12,282. WORK, Whose? You cannot serve two masters—you must serve one or other. If your work is first with you, and your fee second, work is your master, and the Lord of work, who is God. But if your fee is first with you, and your work second, fee is your master, and the lord of fee, who is the devil; and not only the devil, but the lowest of devils—"the least erected fiend that fell." So there you have it in brief terms—work first, you are God's servants; fee first, you are the fiend's. And it makes a difference, now and ever, believe me, whether you serve him who has on his vesture and thigh written, "King of kings," and whose service is perfect freedom; or him on whose vesture and thigh the name is written, "Slave of slaves," and whose service is perfect slavery.

Ruskin.

12,283. WORKS, Immortality by. William of Wickham was appointed by King Edward III. to build a stately church. It was a great success, and won him much fame. The architect wrote on one of the windows, "This work made William Wickham." Afterward the king charged him with assuming the honor of the work. He explained that he had only affirmed that the work made him; as he was before poor, but now in good credit; before unknown but now famous. Works make men, and are the test of men.

12,284. WORLD, Burning the. Chemistry says water will burn. Your firemen will tell you the same thing. Geology says that we live upon a cooled crust, and that the central parts of the earth are liquid fire. Let now one of those forces of the upheaval of continents, which geologists have at their command when they need them, break up the bed of the Pacific ocean, and let down the ocean of water upon the ocean of fire, and how long will it be before the old chaos will be upon us? Or, if we take the dynamic theory of heat, Tyndall tells us, that simply to stop the earth in its orbit, would generate heat enough to dissipate the whole of it into vapor. I suppose that is science, as much so, certainly, as the speculations of geologists. Add to this what is now known of the decomposing and rending power of all-pervasive imponderable agents, of which we can have no conception. Faraday says, that in a single drop of water there is latent electricity enough for an ordinary flash of lightning. Add this, and we shall see that science joins with the Bible in labeling the earth, "reserved unto fire."

Hopkins.

12,285. WORLD, Christian and the. The bird of paradise, which has such a dower of exquisitely beautiful feathers, cannot fly with the wind; if it attempts to do so, the current, being much swifter than its flight, so ruffles its plumage as to impede its progress, and finally to terminate it; it is, therefore, compelled to fly against the wind, which keeps its feathers in their place, and thus it gains the place where it would be. So the Christian must not attempt to go with the current of a sinful world; if he does, it will not only hinder, but end his religious progress; but he must go against it, and then every effort of his soul will surely be upward, Godward.

Dr. Davies.

12,286. WORLD, Deception of the. A lady being once told that the world in all its glory was but vanity, returned for answer, "True, I have heard that Solomon said so; but he tried it before he said it, and so will I." He that knocks at the creature's door for supplies, will find an empty house kept there. "All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full." Though all the rising streams of worldly profits may run into the hearts of men, yet they cannot fill up the hearts of men.

Secker.

12,287. WORLD, Hero of the. The hero of the world is the man that makes a bustle—the man that makes the road smoke under his chaise-and-four—the man that raises a dust about him—the man that manages or devastates empires!

R. Cecil.

12,288. WORLD, Offers of the. When Darius, king of Persia, offered Alexander all the country which lies at the west of the Euphrates, with his daughter Statira in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occasion to observe, that he would without hesitation accept of these conditions, if he were Alexander. "So would I, were I Parmenio," replied the conqueror. Thus a Christian must not accept of any proposition made by the world beneath the dignity of his character, but must fight the good fight of faith.

Buck.

12,289. WORLD, Preferring this. It was the saying of a cardinal, "I prefer a part in the honors of Paris to a part in the happiness of paradise." What is the glimmering of a candle to the shining of the sun? or the value of brass compared with gold? Thoughtless children are taken up more with present counters than with future crowns. Thus, while the shadow is embraced, the substance is neglected; and short-sighted man courts the veil, when he should admire the face.

12,290. WORLD, Reflective Character of the. We may be pretty certain that persons whom all the world treat ill deserve entirely the treatment they get. The world is a looking-glass, and gives back to every man the reflection of his own face. Frown at it, and it will in turn look sourly upon you; laugh at it and with it, and it is a jolly, kind companion; and so let all young persons take their choice.

12,291. WORLD, This and the Next. They say the sinner drags the harrow in this world, and the wagon in the world to come.

12,293. WORLDLINESS, Absorption of. Mrs. H. More, says her biographer, "after pointing out to us some of the many beautiful objects to be seen from the room in which we were sitting, conducted us into an adjoining apartment, which was her sleeping room; and pointing to an arm chair, 'that chair,' said she, 'I call my home. Here,' looking out of a window, 'is what I call my moral prospect. You see yonder distant hill which limits the prospect in that direction. You see this tree before my window directly in range of the hill. The tree, you observe from being near, appears higher than the hill which is distant; though the hill actually is much higher than the tree. Now this tree represents to my mind the objects of time; that hill, the objects of eternity. The former, like the tree, from being reviewed near at hand, appears great. The latter, like the distant hill, appears small.'"

12,294. WORLDLINESS, Effects of. Mithridates was overcome in battle by Lucullus, and sought safety in flight. Seeing his pursuers were gaining upon him, he caused great quantities of gold to be scattered in the way. The Romans stopped to pick up the treasure, and Mithridates escaped. Their avarice deprived them of the fruits of their victory.

12,295. WORLDLINESS, Diversion of. Martin de Golin, master of the Teutonic order, was taken prisoner by the Prussians, and delivered bound to be beheaded. But he persuaded his executioner first to take off his costly clothes, which otherwise would be spoiled with the sprinkling of the blood. Now the prisoner, being partially unbound to be unclothed, and finding his arms somewhat loosened, struck the executioner to the ground, killed him afterwards with his own sword, and so regained both his life and liberty. We are all Achans by nature, and the Babylonish garment is a bait for our covetousness; whilst therefore we ask to take the plunder of this wardrobe, we let go the mastery we had formerly of it. T. Fuller.

12,296. WORLDLINESS, End of. If riches have been your idol hoarded up in your coffers, or lavished out upon yourselves, they will, when the day of reckoning comes, be like the garment of pitch and brimstone, which is put on the criminal condemned to the flames. Hervey.

12,297. WORLDLINESS, Fate of. Tamerlane had great success as a warrior, and desired to make further conquests, but was afraid that the terror of his arms would precede him, and cause the people to hide their treasures. So he sent soldiers dressed in the habit of merchantmen, with camels laden with rich booty, into the richest cities of Asia. He commanded that the articles should be sold at very low prices, that the people might be induced to bring out their gold and silver and buy. Then before they could hide their treasures again, Tamerlane would sweep down upon them unawares, and plunder them of all they had.

12,298. WORLDLINESS, Dying Cry of. The lamentable cry of poor Adrain, when he felt death approaching was, "Oh my poor wandering soul! alas! whither art thou going! where must thou lodge this night? Thou shalt never jest more, never be merry more!" Flavel.

12,299. WORLDLINESS, Symbol of the. I have seen a poor blind worm on the top of a slender pole, stretching every ring of its fragile form, and groping all round in vacant space—tingling with impatience to climb higher, but doomed to stop there. It was a caterpillar, whom a rough wind had shaken from the green tree where it was quietly feeding. When it found itself on the hard ground, it wandered about "in dry places seeking rest and finding none," till it reached the bottom of this wall—the foot of this pole—and then it climbed. But you see it has made nothing of it. The green-painted pole is a very different thing from the leafy tree it used to live in. Poor creature!—it is hungry; and the reason why it runs along, and stretches upward so anxiously, is, if happily it may find the juicy foliage it once fed upon. It will never find it there. Up among the branches of the tree of life man once had his home, his resting-place—and there he fed sweetly; but a rough storm of temptation shook him down; and now he runs about among the "dry places seeking rest, and finding none." And you will sometimes find him—poor groveling worm! fallen man!—trying to better himself by climbing up some painted pole; and once he gains its top, you will see him exploring blindly round in emptiness; feeling for some higher object on which to rest—some green thing for his hungry soul to feed on; pivoting and balancing himself, and stretching outward and upward. But the tree of life is not there. Till it comes to live on God himself, the hungry soul of man never will be satisfied. F. F. Trench.

12,300. WORSHIP, Be Punctual at. Be in your place; battles are won not by the men on the muster-roll, but by the men in the engagement. As a rule, sermons are none too warm; an empty pew throws a bucket of cold water over the pulpit. We have seen very good preachers, like very good gophers, drowned out. Every seat in the prayer-meeting is occupied; when you are not in your seat there, some evil spirit occupies it, trying to represent you. Dr. C. H. Fowler.

12,301. WORSHIP, Devotion to. We have some instances in history which should shame us as Christians, and teach us to cultivate a spirit of attention and solemnity both in the closet and in the public worship of God. It is said when the troops had broken into the city of Jerusalem, the people fled some one way and some another, but the priests went on with their sacrifices and the holy rites of the temple, as if they heard nothing; though they rushed in with their swords, yet they preferred their duty to their safety. Buck.

12,302. WORSHIP, Dress for. The Mohammedans think it indecent to come into God's presence in a slovenly manner. So they imagine that they ought not to appear before him in habits too rich or sumptuous, and particularly in clothes adorned with gold or silver, lest they should seem proud. George Sale.

12,303. WORSHIP, Domestic. Every man ought to consider himself as the minister and steward of the church in his own house. And it is his own fault, and, let me add, his folly, if the church in his house be not a lively and genuine part of that branch of Christ's Holy Catholic Church to which he himself belongs.

Bishop Blomfield.

12,304. WORSHIP, Heartless. Without the heart it is no worship; it is a stage play: an acting a part without being that person really which is acted by us: a hypocrite, in the notion of the world, is a stage-player. We may as well say a man may believe with his body, as worship God only with his body. Faith is a great ingredient in worship; and it is "with the heart man believes unto righteousness." We may be truly said to worship God, though we want perfection; but we cannot be said to worship him if we want sincerity; a statue upon a tomb, with eyes and hands lifted up, offers as good and true a service; it wants only a voice, the gestures and postures are the same; nay, the service is better; it is not a mockery; it represents all that it can be framed to; but to worship without our spirits, is a presenting God with a picture, an echo, voice, and nothing else; a compliment; a mere lie; a "compassing him about with lies."

Charnock.

12,305. WORSHIP, Holiness of. The holiness of God's worship is stamped on the very name sanctuary, i. e., a holy place. It was marked most prominently in every part of the tabernacle worship; in the "holy sanctuary," the unblemished sacrifices offered upon the "holy altar," by holy persons, in holy garments, with holy vessels, and in the observance of the holy Sabbath, and the presenting of holy gifts. Everything about the service of the Lord was to be holy—"holy water," "holy ointment," etc. When the altar of burnt-offering at the entrance of the tabernacle is declared to be most holy, the marginal reading is still more emphatic—"It shall be an altar holiness of holinesses," Exod. 40: 10.

Bowes.

12,306. WORSHIP, Jewish. Hardy thus describes the worship in the largest synagogue in Jerusalem: "The women sat at the entrance and in the outer court. The service was chanted, in general by the whole assembly. Nearly all had books in their hands, and they moved their bodies to and fro continually, in conformity, as they say, to the words of David, 'All my bones shall praise thee.' It was mournful to see old men suddenly, with an expression near to agony, lifting up their long, thin, fleshless fingers toward heaven, and crying aloud, as if to say, 'Lord, how long?'"

12,307. WORSHIP, Selfish. "He had respect to the recompense of reward." This might be a good glass to look through, but it is a bad object to look to. The poets report, that many who at first paid their suits to the famous Penelope, were afterwards married to the maidens who attended her. The ass which carried the Egyptian goddess, had many bare heads and bended knees before it; but they were all to the burden, and none to the beast. Thus many are advocates for the enjoyment of happiness, and enemies to the employment of holiness. Demetrius cries up the goddess Diana; yet it was not her temple, but her silver shrines, he so much adored. He was more in love with her wealth, than with her worship. "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth."

Secker.

12,308. WORSHIP, Sensuous. It is indeed the fact that things sensuous in connection with the spiritual help those who are spiritual rather than those who are sensuous. The sensuous lose themselves in them, and in the feelings which they excite; the spiritual make them instruments of truth and holiness. The sensuous are like Jacob lying on the hard ground, dreamily looking at the ladder between heaven and earth, as a beauteous vision; the spiritual are like the angels of God which ascend and descend upon it.

Morris.

12,309. WORSHIP, Spiritual. Our worship is spiritual when the door of the heart is shut against all intruders, as our Saviour commands in closet-duties. It was not his meaning to command the shutting the closet-door, and leave the heart-door open for every thought that would be apt to haunt us. Worldly affections are to be laid aside if we would have our worship spiritual; this was meant by the Jewish custom of wiping or washing off the dust of their feet before their entrance into the temple, and of not bringing money in their girdles. To be spiritual in worship, is to have our souls gathered and bound up wholly in themselves, and offered to God.

Charnock.

12,310. WRATH to Come. A man listened to searching appeals to sinners from Mr. Whitfield, and remained unmoved. Then Whitfield, with uplifted hands, and in a flood of tears, cried out, "O, the wrath to come! the wrath to come!" These words entered his heart. Wherever he went the awful knell rang through his soul. He fled to Christ for safety.

12,311. WRATH, Divine. Burning heat.—"Hot anger," Judges 2: 14, 20; 3: 8; 10: 7; "hot displeasure," Deut. 9: 19; the anger and jealousy of the Lord smoking against sinners, Deut. 29: 20; "fiery indignation" (the terrible anger of insulted mercy). The vintage—wine-press—wine, used especially in the Book of Revelation. Vials "full of the wrath of God," Rev. 15: 7, 16; the concentration of Divine fury. The cup of fury—dregs of the cup of trembling, Jer. 25: 15, 17. "Vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction," Rom. 9: 22. "Children of wrath," Eph. 2: 8. "The day of wrath," Rom. 2: 5; Rev. 6: 17. Three times in Isaiah "the day of vengeance" is contrasted with "the year of the redeemed." "The wrath of God" revealed—coming—poured out—abiding—filled up in its awful fullness upon the ungodly. "The wrath of the Lamb."—One of the most awful words of Scripture! Christ, "the Lamb of God," "slain from the foundation of the world," so gentle—tender—meek; yet in the day of terror full of wrath and holy vengeance! "The wrath of the Lamb." The word must imply all the indignation of insulted mercy and rejected love!

12,312. WRATH, Flee from. Antigonus dreamt that he saw Mithridates reaping a golden harvest. Thereupon he resolved to kill him. He told this to his son Demetrius, at the same time making him swear to conceal his intention. Demetrius took Mithridates to walk with him by the sea side. With the point of his spear he wrote the words, "Fly, Mithridates." He fled into Pontus where he reigned, by his flight saving his life, and gaining a kingdom. Sinner, fly to Christ and you shall save your soul from death and gain the kingdom of eternal glory.

12,313. WRATH, Reserved. I once took tea with a lady who was very particular about her china. The servant unfortunately broke the best bread-and-butter plate; but her mistress took very little notice of the circumstance at the time, only remarking, "Never mind, Mary, never mind, accidents cannot be prevented." "I shall have it by-and-by," said the servant, when she got out of the room; and so it turned out. The good woman's temper was coked up for a season, but it came out with terrible vengeance when the company retired.

Rowland Hill.

12,314. WRATH, Treasuring up. Every man is treasuring up stores for eternity; the good are laying up treasures in heaven, where moth doth not corrupt; the evil and impenitent are "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath." What an idea is this! Treasures of wrath! Whatever the impenitent man is doing, he is treasuring up wrath. He may be getting wealth; but he is treasuring up wrath. He may be getting fame; but he is treasuring up wrath. He may be forming pleasing connections; but he is also treasuring up wrath: every day adds something to the heap. Every oath the swearer utters, there is something gone to the heap of wrath. Every lie the liar tells, every licentious act the lewd man commits, adds something to the treasure of wrath. The sinner has a weightier treasure of wrath to-day than he had yesterday; he will have a weightier to-morrow than he has to-day. When he lies down at night, he is richer in vengeance than when he arose in the morning. He is continually deepening and darkening his eternal portion. Every neglected Sabbath increases his store of wrath; every forgotten sermon adds something to the weight of punishment. All the checks of conscience, all the remonstrances of friends, all the advice and prayers of parents, will be taken into the account; and all will tend to increase the treasures of wrath laid up against the day of wrath.

J. A. James.

12,315. WRECK, Warnings of. Sailing down the Thames, one occasionally sees a green flag, inscribed with the word WRECK over a piece of mast, or the funnel of a steamer, which is just visible above the water. Alas, how many lives ought thus be marked, lest they prove ruinous to others! The debauched, the self righteous, the spendthrift, the apostate, the drunken,—how appropriately might the flag be placed over them, for they each are a wreck!

Spurgeon.

12,316. WRECKERS, Work of. "Lukewarm" professors are like the wreckers on the Florida reefs, who kindle false lights to lure the vessels to destruction. A ship is coming in after nightfall. The night is dark and stormy. The sea runs high. The ship labors. The tempest howls through the rigging. The great waves smite her. The master paces the quarter-deck, anxious and watchful. Oh! if he could see the harbor-light to guide him in the safe channel. He hails the "look-out" in the maintop: "Hallo, aloft!" "Ay, ay, sir." "Do you see the light?" "No light." And again keen eyes peer through the darkness. The vessel rushes blindly on her course. Ah! is that the combing of the breaker? "Hallo, aloft! do you see the light?" "No-o-o!" The storm increases. The vessel groans and strains in every timber. The sea rages. And now the shout comes down: "On deck, there! I see the light!" "Where away?" "Two points off the lee bow." "Steady, quarter-master; keep her full!" And on she ploughs her way, cheered by the guiding light. Ah! what is this? She is in the midst of breakers! And now she strikes on the reef, and the masts "go by the board," and the wreckers come tumbling in over her bulwarks, and their knives are red, and their hands filled with plunder. Their false light has cast away the ship. So a treacherous Christian says to the souls of his fellow-men: "Follow me. I am going into port. I will guide you safely." And following, they come upon the rocks of perdition—and he is a murderer of souls.

12,317. YEAR, Wail of the Dying. "Listen to me, ye mortals! for I also am of the race of the ephemerals. I had my sturdy youth, when it seemed that my life would never end; and I dug, and ploughed, and planted, and enjoyed my jocund prime and my golden summer; and I decked myself in the garlands of May, and reaped the yellow harvest, and gathered the purple vintage of autumn; but scarcely had I attained the object of my desires, and secured the plenty for which I labored, than I found the shadows lengthening, and the days shortening, and my breath growing short with them, and decrepitude coming upon me, and the days at hand of which I said, 'I have no pleasure in them.' I have laid up riches, and know not who shall gather them; have planted trees which must shade far distant years, and stored the vintage of which other years must drink."

Prof. Rogers.

12,318. YEARS, Biblical. Years of weakness and sorrow, Eccles. 12: 1; years of visitation (severe judgments), Jer. 11: 23; years of recompenses, Isa. 34: 8; years of rest, Lev. 25: 5; and of release, Deut. 15: 1, 9; 31: 10; the seventh year. Years of jubilee, Lev. 25:

8-54; 27: 17, 18; the representation of rest—release—liberty—provision—restoration; probably the special type and shadow of millennial happiness; Isa. 61: 2.—“The Acceptable year of the Lord” most probably alludes to this; the special year of grace, when debts were remitted, forfeited inheritances restored, servants set at liberty, and general rest and peace enjoyed. Year of the Lord's redeemed, Isa. 63: 4. Years of forbearance, Luke 13: 7. Years of probation, Luke 13: 8. Years of revival, Hab. 3: 2; Years of death, Jer. 28: 16, 17.—“This year thou shalt die.” Bowes.

12,319. YES and No. Man's first word is—Yes; his second—No; his third and last—Yes. Most stop short at the first; very few get to the last. Atwell.

12,320. YOUNG, Counsel to the. Might I give counsel to my young hearer, I would say, Try to frequent the company of your betters; in books and life that is the most wholesome society; learn to admire rightly—the great pleasure of life is that. Note what the great specially admire; they admire great things: narrow spirits admire basely, and worship meanly. Thackeray.

12,321. YOUNG MAN, Salvation of a. A young captain in the English army, found after the battle that his Bible had been struck by a musket-ball, which penetrated to the text, Ecclesiastes 11: 9, “Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.” His Bible saved his life, and this providence was the means of awakening and saving his soul.

12,322. YOUNG MEN, Advice to. Taste not of fish that have black tails; that is, converse not with men that are smuttied with vicious qualities. Stride not over the beam of the scales; wherein is taught us the regard we ought to have for justice, so as not to go beyond its measures. Sit not on a choenix; wherein sloth is forbidden and we are required to take care to provide ourselves with the necessities of life. Do not strike hands with every man; this means we ought not to be over-hasty to make acquaintance or friendship with others. Wear not a tight ring; that is we are to labor after a free and independent way of living, and to submit to no fetters. Eat not thy heart; which forbids to afflict our souls, and waste them with vexatious cares. Abstain from beans; that is, keep out of public offices, for anciently the choice of the officers of state was made by beans. Plutarch.

12,323. YOUNG MEN Defined. I used to think that young men were men of 17, or 20, or possibly 25. When I was a lad, I thought if ever I reached 30 I should be a man of mature years; and should I ever arrive at 50 I should be an old man. But as I have passed from decade to decade, until I have gone over all these boundary lines, I feel that I have not got out of the sphere of young men. I find young men older than I am. I think of the words of the Apostle: “I write to you, young men, because you are strong.” As long as a man is strong he is a young man. As long as a man is strong—be he 20 or be he 60—his heart is young. He may be a boy; he may be a grandfather; he is a young man. In trying to draw the line, I have thought that some are old at 20, and some are young at 300—or say, a thousand. The great trees of California, botanists say, have been growing since Noah's flood. They show very little signs of age yet. They are still strong, flourishing, beautiful, and I have come to the conclusion that men are very much like those trees. A tree is never to be counted old as long as its heart is sound, and it is able to bear fruit. Well, while a man's heart is sound and he is able to do good, I say he is to be classed among young men.

Bp. Simpson.

12,324. YOUNG MEN, Success of. The greatest captains of ancient and modern times, both conquered Italy at twenty-five. Youth, extreme youth, overthrew the Persian empire. Don John, of Austria, won Lepanto at twenty-five, the greatest battle of modern time; had it not been for the jealousy of Philip, the next year he would have been Emperor of Mauritania. Gaston de Foix was only twenty-two when he stood a victor on the plain of Ravenna. Every one remembers Condé and Roeroy at the same age. Gustavus Adolphus died at thirty-eight—look at his captains, that wonderful Duke of Wiemar, only thirty-six when he died. Banér himself, after all his miracles, died at forty-five. Cortes was little more than thirty when he gazed upon the golden cupolas of Mexico. When Maurice of Saxony died at thirty-two all Europe acknowledged the loss of the greatest captain and the profoundest statesman of the age. Then there is Nelson, Clive; but these are warriors, and, perhaps, you may think there are greater things than war; I do not. I worship the Lord of Hosts. But take the most illustrious achievements of civil prudence. Innocent III., the greatest of the popes, was the despot of Christendom at thirty-seven. John de Medici was a cardinal at fifteen, and, Guicciardini tells us, baffled with his craft Ferdinand of Aragon himself. He was pope, as Leo X., at thirty-seven. Luther robbed even him of his richest province at thirty-five. Take Ignatius Loyola and John Wesley; they worked with young brains. Ignatius was only thirty when he made his pilgrimage, and wrote the “Spiritual Exercises.” Pascal wrote a great work at sixteen (the greatest of Frenchmen), and died at thirty-seven. Ah! that fatal thirty-seven! which reminds me of Byron, greater even as a man than a writer. Was it experience that guided the pencil of Raphael when he painted the palaces of Rome? He died at thirty-seven. Richelieu was secretary of state at thirty-one. Well, then, there are Bolingbroke and Pitt, both ministers before other men leave off cricket. Grotius was in practice at seventeen, and attorney-general at twenty-four. And Acquaviva was general of the Jesuits, ruled every cabinet in Europe, and colonized America before he was thirty-seven. What a career! the secret sway of Europe! that was indeed a position! But it is needless to multiply instances—the history of heroes is the history of youth.

Psalm

Disraeli.

12,325. YOUNG MEN, Temptations of. Cæsar of Heisterboch relates that Philip, a great necromancer, took a company of Swabian and Bavarian youths to a lonely place, and entertained them at their request, with his incantations. He drew a circle round them with his sword and warned them not to leave it on any account. By his first incantation he surrounded them with armed men who dared them to conflict, but none were lured forth. By his second enchantment he surrounded them with a company of beautiful dancing damsels, who tried every power of attraction upon them. A nymph, whose beauty exceeded all others, advanced to one of the young men and wrought such effect upon him, that he forgot the restriction and stretched forth his finger beyond the circle to receive the ring which she proffered. She at once seized him and drew him after her. It was not till after much trouble that the necromancer was able to recover him. This circle is the rule of right and virtue. The armed men are pride, ambition, passion. The charmers are intemperance, voluptuousness and sensuality. The only safety is within the circle. The first finger over the line and the whole body will follow to shame and ruin.

12,326. YOUTH, Counsel to. Vigor, energy, resolution, firmness of purpose,—these carry the day. Is there one whom difficulties dishearten—who bend to the storm? He will do little. Is there one who will conquer? That man never fails. Let it be your first study to teach the world that you are not wood and straw—some iron in you. Let men know that what you say you will do; that your decision, once made, is final—no wavering; that once resolved, you are not to be allured nor intimidated. Acquire and maintain that character.

T. F. Buxton.

12,327. YOUTH, Friendship Formed in. In young minds there is commonly a strong propensity to particular intimacies and friendships. Youth, indeed, is the season when friendships are sometimes formed, which not only continue through succeeding life, but which glow to the last with a tenderness unknown to the connections begun in cooler years. The propensity, therefore, is not to be discouraged, though, at the same time, it must be regulated with much circumspection and care.

Blair.

12,328. YOUTH, Importance of Turning to God in. Young reader, remember that your youthful sins lay a foundation for aged sorrows; you have but one arrow to shoot at the mark; and if that be shot at random, God may never put another into your bow.

Secker.

12,329. YOUTH, Impressions of. The late Dr. Spencer said, that when he was a lad his father gave him a little tree that had just been grafted. One day, in his father's absence, he let the colt into the garden, and the young animal broke off the graft. It was mended, however, on the following day, and continued to grow finely. Years passed, and young Spencer became a man, and a minister. Some time after he became a pastor he made a visit to the old homestead where he spent his boyhood. His little sapling had become a large tree, and was loaded with apples. During the night after his arrival at the homestead, there was a violent thunder-shower, and the wind blew fearfully. He rose early in the morning, and on going out found his tree lying prostrate upon the ground. The wind had twisted it off just where the colt had broken it when it was a sapling. Probably the storm would not have broken it at all, if it had not been broken when it was small. It will usually be found that those who are vicious in manhood dropped a seed of vice in the morning of life; that the fallen youth, who was religiously trained, and has become corrupt, broke off his connection with virtuous ways just where he did a wicked thing in boyhood. Here is a fact to be pondered.

Teachers' Treasury.

12,330. YOUTH, Precocious. It is remarkable that there is nothing less promising than, in early youth, a certain full-formed, settled, and as it may be called, adult character. A lad who has, to a degree that excites wonder and admiration, the character and demeanor of an intelligent man of mature age, will probably be that, and nothing more, all his life, and will cease accordingly to be anything remarkable, because it was his precocity alone that ever made him so. It is remarked by greyhound fanciers that a well-formed, compact-shaped puppy never makes a fleet dog. They see more promise in the loose-jointed, awkward, clumsy ones. And even so, there is a kind of crudity and unsettledness in the minds of those young persons who turn out ultimately the most eminent.

Whately.

12,331. YOUTH, Religion in. Oh, seek religion now, because this is the molding age. Now, because it is the freest part of your time. Now, because your life is immediately uncertain; you are not certain that you shall attain the years of your fathers; there are graves in the church-yard just of your length, and skulls of all sorts and sizes in Golgotha, as the Jew's proverb is. Now, because God will not spare you on account of your youth, if you die without an interest in Christ. Now, because your life will be the more eminently useful, serviceable to God, when you know him betimes, and early begin this service. Augustin repented, and so have many others since, that he began so late, and knew God no sooner. Now, because your whole life will be happier, if the morning of it is dedicated to the Lord. The first fruits sanctify the whole harvest; this will have a sweet influence upon all your days, whatever changes, straits, or troubles you may meet.

John Flavel.

12,332. YOUTH, Renewal of. Some of the South Sea Islanders have a tradition of a river in the world of spirits called the "Water of Life." It was supposed that the aged, when they died, went and bathed there, and became young again, then returned to earth, to live life over again.

12,333. YOUTH, Season of. Youth is the spring of life; and by this will be determined the glory of summer, the abundance of autumn, the provision of winter. It is the morning of life; and if the Sun of Righteousness does not dispel the moral mists and fogs before noon, the whole day generally remains overspread and gloomy. It is the seed-time; and "what a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Everything of importance is affected by religion in this period of life. W. Jay.

12,334. YOUTH, Thoughtless. A youth thoughtless, when all the happiness of his home forever depends on the chances of an hour! A youth thoughtless, when the career of all his days depends on the opportunity of a moment! A youth thoughtless, when his every act is a foundation-stone of future conduct, and every imagination a fountain of life or death! Be thoughtless in any after years rather than now; though, indeed, there is only one place where a man may be nobly thoughtless—his death-bed. Nothing should ever be left to be done there. Ruskin.

12,335. ZEAL, Apostolic. The zeal of the Apostles was this—they preached publicly and privately; they prayed for all men; they wept to God for the hardness of men's hearts; they became all things to all men, that they might gain some; they traveled through deeps and deserts; they endured the heat of the Syrian star and the violence of Euroclydon, winds and tempests, seas and prisons, mockings and scourgings, fastings and poverty, labor and watching; they endured every man and wronged no man; they would do any good, and suffer any evil, if they had but hopes to prevail upon a soul; they persuaded men meekly, they entreated them humbly, they convinced them powerfully; they watched for their good, but meddled not with their interest: and this is the Christian zeal, the zeal of meekness, the zeal of charity, the zeal of patience. Bp. Taylor.

12,336. ZEAL, Attraction of. Humboldt, the great traveler, says: "It seems remarkable that in the hottest as well as the coldest climates people display the same predilection for heat. On the introduction of Christianity into Iceland, the inhabitants would be baptized only in the hot springs of Hecla; and in the torrid zone, in the plains as well as in the Cordilleras, the natives flock from all parts to the thermal waters." So with the preachers of the gospel. They must have the baptism of fire.

12,337. ZEAL, Christian. Weak in yourselves, but strong in God, go forth on this God-like enterprise; the motto on your banner, the prayer of your heart this wish of Brainerd, "O, that I were a flaming fire in the service of my God." Dr. Guthrie.

12,338. ZEAL, Cruel. King Olaf, of Norway, was the bloody foe of heathenism. He reigned twenty-five years, the scourge and terror of his own people, and never made a friend. Their maimed bodies, burned homes, plundered property, was a perpetual memorial of his merciless zeal. He called to his aid robbers and vagabonds, and enrolled them in his army, requiring only one condition, that they should be baptized in the name of Christ. He had white crosses painted on the shields and helmets of all his soldiers. He gave them for a battle cry, "Forward, Christian men! Crossmen!" With all this his last battle was a sad defeat, in which he was slain in 1030. He justified himself, and his horrible barbarities, by saying, "I had God's honor to defend."

12,339. ZEAL, Demands for Ministerial. Mr. Whitefield preached in Yorkshire, near Harworth; thousands gathered in the fields to hear him preach. A temporary pulpit had been erected, and Whitefield, on ascending it and surveying the vast multitude, who with upturned faces stood ready to hear the words about to fall from his lips, was pervaded with a peculiarly solemn feeling. With uplifted hands he offered a most impressive prayer, invoking the Divine presence and the Divine blessing. Then, in a manner peculiarly solemn, he announced his text, "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment." After reading the text he paused for a moment before he proceeded, when suddenly a wild, terrifying shriek issued from the centre of the congregation. At once there was great alarm and confusion. Whitefield requested the people to remain quiet, until the cause could be ascertained. Mr. Grimshaw, leaving the pulpit where had been sitting during the sermon, hurried to the spot, and in a few moments was seen passing toward where Mr. Whitefield stood, exclaiming, "Brother Whitefield, you stand between the dead and the dying! An immortal soul has just passed into eternity; the destroying angel is passing over the congregation; cry aloud and spare not." The solemn event was announced to the awe-struck congregation. After a few moments Mr. Whitefield read his text again, and was about to proceed with his discourse, when another loud and piercing shriek proceeded from near the place where Lady Huntingdon and Lady Margaret Ingham were standing. It fell upon the multitude like the sound of the last trumpet when they ascertained the cause of this second alarm, that another person had fallen by the hand of death. When the consternation had somewhat subsided, Mr. Whitefield proceeded with his sermon amid the stillness of death and the solemnity of the grave. Dr. J. B. Wakeley.

12,340. ZEAL, Desire for. I want to see all in a flame of fire. You know what kind of fire I mean. I desire that none of my wild-fire may be mixed with the pure fire of holy zeal coming from God's altar. Whitefield.

12,341. ZEAL, Longing for. Oh that I had so much zeal as to steep it in its own liquor; to set it forth in its own colors; that the seraphim would touch my tongue with a live coal from the divine altar, that I might regain the de-eyed credit of it with the sons of men! It is good to be zealous in good things; and is it not best in the best? Or is there any better than God? or the kingdom of heaven? S. Ward.

12,342. ZEAL, Ministerial. Every Brahmin is required by the shastas to keep alive the fire which consumes the offering on the day of his investment to the day of his death. In the family of Krishna-Chundra Roy, such a fire has been kept burning for seventy years. It is a hard requirement for the poor priests. Christ requires of his ministers that the fire of love for God and souls shall never grow dim or go out.

12,343. ZEAL, Philanthropic. When I think, after the experience of one life, what I could and would do in an amended edition of it; what I could and would do, more and better than I have done, for the cause of humanity, of temperance, and of peace; for breaking the rod of the oppressor; for the higher education of the world, and especially for the higher education of the best part of it—woman: when I think of these things, I feel the Phoenix-spirit glowing within me; I pant, I yearn, for another warfare in behalf of right, in hostility to wrong, where, without furlough, and without going into winter-quarters, I would enlist for another fifty years' campaign, and fight it out for the glory of God and the welfare of man.

Horace Mann.

12,344. ZEAL, Religious. No man is fervent and zealous as he ought, but he that prefers religion before business, charity before his own ease, the relief of his brother before money, heaven before secular regards, and God before his friend or interest. Which rule is not to be understood absolutely, and in particular instances, but always generally; and when it descends to particulars it must be in proportion to circumstances, and by their proper measures.

Jeremy Taylor.

12,345. ZEAL, Sacrifice to. St. Almachus was so filled with sorrow at the thought of so many souls damned forever through the gladiatorial shows, that he visited Rome to stop them. He rushed into the amphitheatre where men were slaying each other for the amusement of others, remonstrated with them, and tried to prevent the worse than useless effusion of blood. He was struck down and torn asunder because of his benevolent attempt. The emperor Honorius made his death the occasion of the entire abolition of the gladiatorial shows. His death accomplished what his life failed to do. He died January 1st, 404.

12,346. ZEAL, Success of. Bishop Latimer was not such a deeply read scholar as Cranmer or Ridley. He could not quote fathers from memory as they did. He refused to be drawn into arguments about antiquity. He stuck to his Bible. Yet it is not too much to say that no English reformer made such a lasting impression on the nation as old Latimer did. And what was the reason? His simple zeal. Baxter, the Puritan, was not equal to some of his contemporaries in intellectual gifts. It is no disparagement to say that he does not stand on a level with Manton or Owen. Yet few men probably exercised so wide an influence on the generation in which he lived. And what was the reason? His burning zeal. Whitefield, and Wesley, and Berridge, and Venn, were inferior in mental attainments to Bishops Butler and Watson. But they produced effects on the people in this country which fifty Butlers and Watsons would probably never have produced. They saved the Church of England from ruin. And what was one secret of their power? Their zeal.

Ryle.

12,347. ZEAL, True. The true and godly zeal eateth and devoureth up the heart, even as the thing that is eaten is turned into the substance of him that eateth it; and as iron, while it is burning hot, is turned into the nature of the fire, so great and so just is the grief that they which have this zeal conceive when they see God's house spoiled or his holy name dishonored.

Bp. Jewell

12,348. ZION, Mount. Mount Zion was one of the heights on which Jerusalem was built. It stood near Mount Moriah, where Abraham offered up Isaac to the Lord, and witnessed that greatest triumph of human faith; and centuries afterwards, when the temple covered the summit of the former, it formed the heart and strength of the city. Situated at the southern extremity, it rose above every other part of Jerusalem, and came in time to stand for the city itself. At first it seems strange that Zion should have become a word filled with such endearing associations to the Jews. They could never let it go from them when speaking of their city. If her strength as a fortress was spoken of, the language was—

“Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof: mark ye well her bulwarks, and consider her palaces;” if her elevation, it was—“The holy hill of Zion.” God's affection for it was thus expressed—“He loveth the gates of Zion;” “The Lord hath chosen Zion.” Occupied by the son of Jesse, it became “The city of David,” the representative of all that was dear and cherished in Israel. Thus everything conspired to render “Zion” the spell-word of the nation, and on its summit the heart of Israel seemed to lie and throb. But at length it was visited by misfortune and ruin, and the eagles of Cæsar took the place of the banner of David. Now the plough-share is driven over the top of Zion. Where its towers and palaces stood, grain waves in the passing wind, or ruins, overlying each other, attest the truth of the Word of God. The Arab spurs his steed along the forsaken streets, or scornfully stands on Mount Zion, and surveys the forsaken city of God.
